CHAPTER XV: EMISSION OF RAYS

CHAPTER VII: THE FOUR ASSEMBLIES

CHAPTER VIII: THE BODHISATTVAS

CHAPTER IX: THE BODHISATTVAS

CHAPTER X: THE QUALITIES OF THE BODHISATTVAS

CHAPTER XI: THE BODHISATTVAS

CHAPTER XII: UNHINDERED MIND

CHAPTER XIII: THE BUDDHA-FIELDS

CHAPTER XIV: EMISSION OF RAYS
Here is a first attempt at an annotated translation of chapters I to XV of the Mahāprajñāpāramitā (abbreviated as Mppi) by Nāgārjuna. The work has not come down to us in the original Sanskrit, but only through the intermediary of a Chinese translation, the Ta tche tou louen. This version which contains 90 chapters (p' in) in 100 rolls (kiuan), is by the Kuchanese Kumārajīva who worked in T'eh'ăng ngan in the Siao yao Park, in 404 or 405 A.D. 1 Lamotte have edited the edition of Taishō Issaikyō, vol. XXV, no. 159; the numbers in the margins of this translation refer to the pages and columns of this edition.2

The Mppi is a commentary on the Pañcaviṃśatikāraṇāmṛtā, the 'Perfection of Wisdom in Five Thousand Lines', as it appears in Kumārajīva's Chinese translation Mo ho pan jo po lo mi king (Taishō, T VIII, no. 223). Of this Pañcaviṃśatikāraṇāmṛtā we have four Chinese translations, one Tibetan translation, one Sanskrit revision and one Tibetan translation of this Sanskrit revision.

1. The four Chinese translations are:

i) The Kouang tzu king (Taishō, Vol. VIII, no. 222) in 27 chapters (p' in = parivarta) and 10 rolls (kiuan) by Dharmarākṣa, dating from 286 A.D.

ii) The Fan kouang pan jo king (Taishō, vol. VIII, no. 221) in 90 chapters and 20 rolls, by Mokṣaṇa and Saṃgharakṣa, dating from 291.

iii) The Mo ho pan jo po lo mi king (Taishō, vol. VIII, no. 223) in 90 chapters and 27 rolls, by Kumārajīva, dating from 403-404. This version is reproduced in its entirety and abundantly commented in the Ta tche tou louen.

iv) The second part of the Ta pan jo po lo mi king (Taishō, vol. VII, no. 220), in rolls 401 to 478, contains long extracts from the Pañcaviṃśatikāraṇāmṛtā. The translation is by Hiuan tsang and is dated at 660-663.

T. Matsumoto has prepared a useful concordance for these four Chinese translations.3

2. The Tibetan translation is entitled Śāv vha kyi pha rol tu phyin pa ston phug b'i sū ra pa; it consists of 76 chapters (leba = parivarta) and 78 sections (barm po = khaṇḍa). The name of the translators is not mentioned. The work is part of the Bṛhat-hgyur; section s'i phyin, II, it takes up four volumes of the

---

1 P.C. Bagchi, Le canon bouddhique en Chine, vol I, Paris 1927, p. 197. - Different from most Buddhist works, the Mppi was not translated into Tibetan but only into Chinese. For the Mppi and Toun-houang and Khahkhotoo, see Bibliographie bouddhique, vol I, 1930, no. 105; vol. IV-V, 1934, no. 307.

The Mppś is attributed to Nāgārjuna: Kumārajīva’s version has as its title ‘Ta tche tou louen, composed by the ... The Life of Nāgārjuna from Tibetan and Chinese Sources, Hirth Anniversary Volume, London, 1922, p. 421-455.

8 Peking B kaḥ-ḥgyur (vol. ñi-di: Ti betan col lection of the Bibliothèque Nationale, no. 40-43) and three volumes of the Pañcaviṣṭaparivartanī, to which the first 15 chapters of the Mppś serve as introduction, are reformatted in almost identical words at the beginning of other Prajñāpāramitās, such as the Śatāsthārasūtra and the Daśaśāstrasūtra. Therefore it is important to give some bibliographical information here on the literature of the Prajñās. For the Tibetan and Chinese versions, it is enough to refer to the excellent studies of Lalou and Matsumoto; here we will limit ourselves to giving the list of the Prajñās in Sanskrit that have already been edited as a note.

The pañcaviṣṭaparivartanī, ed. with critical notes and introduction (Calcutta Oriental Series, no. 28), London, 1934.

5 This work has been edited by Th. Scherbatsky and E. Obermüller, Abhisamayālāṃkārāloka: Prajñāpāramitā-L padselsa-Shāstra, the work of bodhisattva Maṭṛayu. Fasc. I: Introduction, Sanskrit Text and Tibetan Translation (Bibliotheca Buddhica, no. XXIII), Leningrad, 1929.

8 Śatāsthāraśāstraśāstra, ed. with Prajñāpāramitās-L padselsa-Shāstra, the work of bodhisattva Maṭṛayu. Fasc. I: Introduction, Sanskrit Text and Tibetan Translation (Bibliotheca Buddhica, no. XXIII), Leningrad, 1929.

The bodhisattva Nāgārjuna (Kuṣāṇa) in Tibetan, 'converted by a dragon' or 'converting the dragons'; in Chinese Long chou (dragon tree), Long mong ('unflinching dragon') or Long cheng ('victorious dragon') is one of the most enigmatic, yet also one of the richest figures in Buddhism. He lived in probably the second century of our era and played a rôle of primary importance in the formation of the Buddhism of the Greater Vehicle. Originally from the south, the country of Andhra, his influence extended as far as the north-west of India. Dialectician and metaphysician, he is the founder of the Madhyamaka or 'Middle-Way' school, which, while accepting the buddhology and the mysticism of the Greater Vehicle, submits the old texts of Buddhism to negative criticism and ends up with absolute emptiness (tāṇyānti). Nāgārjuna's theories have been thoroughly discussed in Asia and Europe. The question is whether the Madhyamaka accepts an absolutely existent Reality. L. de la Vallée Poussin has long believed that this school is nihilistic and denies the absolute; on the other hand, Th. Scherbatsky was of the opinion that Nāgārjuna denied appearance only in order to affirm Being. After an argument which at times turned into a quarrel, de la Vallée Poussin drew nearer to the position held by Scherbatsky whereas the latter came very close to adopting the theses defended by de la Vallée Poussin. But this is not the only problem with regard to Nāgārjuna.

Many Sanskrit, Tibetan and Chinese sources give us much information about the life and works of this author, but the facts they contain are soaked in the miraculous and seem to refer to several Nāgārjunas of different date and origin, so that the re-appearance of the same legends is inextricably tied up among them. They have been analyzed, perhaps with inaccuracies of detail, by Walleser and summarized by Saptaśāstraśāstraśāstra, ed. M. Müller (Anecdota Orientalia, Aryan Series, vol. I part III), Oxford, 1881. Adhyāyānātāśāstraśāstraśāstra, ed. E. Leumann, Zur nordischen Sprache und Literatur, Strassburg, 1912, p. 84 seq; ed. S. Togano and H. Iizumi, Prajñāpāramitās-L padselsa-Shāstra, the work of bodhisattva Maṭṛayu. Fasc. I: Introduction, Sanskrit Text and Tibetan Translation (Bibliotheca Buddhica, no. XXIII), Leningrad, 1929.

Winternitz in the second edition of his history of Indian literature. Since then, other information has been collected.

Attention has been drawn to a series of predictions relative to Nāgārjuna found in the Lankāvatāra, the Mahānāgārīśastra, the Mahānāgārīśvāra, and the Ṡaṃyāśīrāmālaṃkāra.

Apart from Nāgārjuna the Mahāyāna philosopher, there was one other (or several) Nāgarjunas, magician, alchemist and writer of tantra. Documents published by G. Tucci and S. Lévi may be added to the information we already possess. Moreover, it may have been Nāgārjuna who discovered and revealed to humans the Mahāvairocanaśāstra, one of the main texts of Buddhist Vajrayana and of the Shinōn sect.

All the sources, in emulation of one another, mention the friendly relations and alchemical collaboration between Nāgārjuna and a king of the Sātavāhana or Sātavāna dynasty (perhaps also Andhra) which, in the second or first century before our era until the end of the second century afterward, disputed the empire of Dekhan with the Śunga-Śaka and with the Śakas, before dying out around Dīnāyakatataka and Amaravati in Andhra proper. S. Lévi has collated these different sources and related them to another cycle of legends relating to the rivalry between a Sātavāhana and the Kuṣana king Kaniska.

Archeological discoveries, old and new, partially confirm the literary documents. According to the Tibetan historians, Nāgārjuna may have spent the last of his life in the land of Andhra, of the Telugu language, between the Godavari and the lower Kṛṣṇa.

The region abounds in sites made famous by archeology:

15 Lankāvatāra, ed. B. Nanjio, Kyoto, 1923, p. 286; Taishō 671, k. 9, p. 596a; Taishō 672, k. 6, p. 627c.
18 Ṡaṃyāśīrāmālaṃkāra, ed. Ganapati Śastri, Trivenandram Sanskrit Series, p. 616-617.

Dīnāyakatataka, ancient capital on the lower Kṛṣṇa, corresponding to the actual Dharanikot, in the district of Guntur, one mile west of the site of Amaravati; upstream and on the same south bank of the Kṛṣṇa, Goli and Nāgārjunkonda; in the north-west, Jaggyayapa. Nāgārjuna, it is said, constructed a building for the shrine of Dīnāyakatataka (Śīlaśīla) surrounded it with a wall and built 108 cells within the wall. According to the same historians, he may have established his residence at Śīrparvata, a monastery situated on a rocky cliff overhanging the Kṛṣṇa, and probably identified with the mountain in the Po lo lo mo kī bī (Bharamarṣi or Mountain of the Bees) which king Sātavāhana had hollowed out and fitted out for the bodhisattva Nāgārjuna. The inscriptions discovered in the area corroborate all this. The outer bulwark of the Amaravati stūpa bears the inscription of two kings of the Andhra dynasty, Pulumūḍy and Yajaitiśa and according to some authors, it is to the latter that Nāgārjuna dedicated his Letter of Subheḷekha. The Bhadanta Nāgārjunacūḍārīṣya himself is mentioned in an inscription found near the stūpa of Jaggyayapa. At Nāharallabodu, beside the mahacetiya of Nāgārjunkonda, an inscription mentions the buildings erected by the lay Buddhist Bodhisirī and mentions ‘the monastery on Śīrparvata to the west of Vijayarāpura’ which must be the monastery of Śīrparvata where the Tibetan historians say that Nāgārjuna died. In a more general way, the written pillars at Nāgārjunkonda bear precious indications on the Buddhism of the south at the time of Nāgārjuna: to a certain point, they inform us about the canonical scriptures (Dīgha, Mahājīmima and Pañcaśīmirakūṭa), the sects (Caitiyika, Aparaśīrṣa, Pārvāsīra, Bhalusīṣṭra, Mahālakṣāsa and possibly also Mahāśīrṣa), the doctrines and especially the area of expansion of the Buddhism of the Andhakas. But the systematic study of these epigraphical facts has hardly yet begun. They should be compared with the Andhaka theses, the refutation of which is the particular aim of the Kārvānti. The discovery should also be mentioned of a Buddhist monastery at Hārvaran in Kashmir, which the Bājārtarangīri (I, 173) calls Saḍharadhavā the ‘Forest of the Six Arhats’, which may have served as residence for Nāgārjuna. Finally, according to Bu ston and Tārānātha, Nāgārjuna stayed for a long time at Nālandi, the central concern of tantric Buddhism, which he 25 Tārānātha, transl. by A. Schiefner, St. Petersburg, 1869, p. 71.

26 Bu ston, p. 127; Tārānātha, p. 73, 81, 303; Dīnāyakatataka, ed. Canda Daus, Calcutta, 1908, p. 86.
29 J. Burgess, Notes on the Amaravati Stūpa, Madras, 1882, p. 57.
30 L. de La Vallée Poussin, Dynasties et histoire de l’Inde, p. 232.
ornamented with monuments and illustrated with his miracles. We may hope that systematic exploration of this site, pursued systematically\(^1\), will one day shed some light on the Nāgārjuna of Nālandā.

The literary and archeological information on Nāgārjuna is so plentiful and extends over so many centuries and different regions of India that it may be wrong to consider them as simple elements of biography. With regard to the person Nāgārjuna, they have but mediocre historical value; but they are documents of primordial interest if, giving up the search in them for a biography of Nāgārjuna, we consider them as evidence, naive but sincere, of the religious movement of reform tendencies to which Nāgārjuna attached his name. Leaving the south, this reform expanded to Kashmir and the north-west of India, not without undergoing, in the course of time, substantial transformation: dialectical and metaphysical in origin, it soon became tinged with magic, underwent the influence of the alchemical school and finally ended up in the tantric Buddhism of the Vajrayāna. To sketch even briefly this long history would take us too far away; here I will return to the Mppī and its first fifteen chapters of which a brief analysis must be given.

The first part of the Nīlāna or Prologue of the Pañcavimāti begins, as all sitras do, with the traditional profession of faith: *Evaṃ maññā tāvam ekasmī samuye, and provides proof of its authenticity by making known the place where the sūtra was preached, by whom and to whom: 'Thus have I heard at one time. The Bhavagat was dwelling at Rājagaha on Gṛdhakātāparvata, together with a great assembly of 500 bhikṣus endowed, except for Ānanda, with eleven excellent qualities, with 500 bhikṣūṇīs, 500 upāsakas and 500 upāsikas, with an immense crowd of bodhisattva- mahāsattvas endowed with 28 qualities and led by the 22 principal ones among them.'

The Mppī devotes thirteen chapters of commentary on this first part:

Chapter I: The twenty reasons why the Buddha preached the Prajñāpāramitā.

Chapters II-III: Explanation of the phrase: 'Thus have I heard at one time'.

Chapter II: Word-for-word explanation.

Chapter III: General explanation.

Chapter IV: Explanation of the word Bhagavat and other epithets applied to the Buddha. - Dissertation on the omniscience of the Buddha.

Chapter V: The place of the sūtra: The abodes (vīhāra) of the Buddha. - Gṛdhakātāparvata. - The frequent sojourns of the Buddha at Rājagaha and Śrīvastī. - The Buddha's preferences for Rājagaha and Gṛdhakātāparvata.

Chapters VI-XIII: The assembly surrounding the Buddha

---

Act VII. The Buddha shows his ordinary (prakṛtyātmabhāva) body to the inhabitants of the trichiliocosm who come to him with flowers. - They throw these to the Buddha. - The flowers form a belvedere (kūṭāgāra) in the air. - Garlands and bouquets hang from it. - The trichiliocosm and the universes of the ten directions take on a golden color. - Each being has the impression that the Buddha is speaking to him in particular.

Act VIII. The Buddha smiles a fourth time and, in the light of this smile, beings of the trichiliocosm and the universes of the ten directions become aware of one another.

Act IX. At the ends of the universes of the eastern direction, the buddha Ratnākara reigns over the Ratnākara universe. - The bodhisattva Samantaraśmi asks him the reason for these marvels that he sees. - Ratnākara explains to him that they are due to the power of the Buddha Śākyamuni who reigns over the Sahā universe. - Samantaraśmi offers to go and pay homage to him. - Ratnākara approves, entrusts him with compliments and precious lotuses for Śākyamuni and makes some recommendations to him. - Samantaraśmi, accompanied by other bodhisattvas, starts his journey to the Sahā universe. - Before departing, he bows to the Buddhas of the East.

Act X. Samantaraśmi, laden with gifts, arrives before Śākyamuni and prostrates at his feet. - He greets him in the name of the Buddha Ratnākara and gives him the lotuses which the latter had intended for him. - Śākyamuni throws the lotuses to the Buddhas of the East. - They immediately fill all the universes of the East. - On each of them, an imaginary buddha preaches the six pāramitās; the beings who receive the teachings are established in bodhi. - Samantaraśmi and his entourage pay homage to Śākyamuni. - The scenes related to Acts IX and X are reproduced to the ends of the other nine directions. - The Sahā universe is transformed in a marvelous way. - It becomes the equal of the most eminent buddha-field (buddhakṣetra). - Śākyamuni gazes upon the immense assembly gathered before him.

***********************

Let the reader not be deceived. This prologue which, at first reading, may appear as a web of childishness, is really a work of precision where every word counts, where every phrase, meticulously chosen, is arranged in a definite order according to a precise purpose. It is the culmination of long centuries of scholasticism. To interpret it correctly a commentary is indispensable, but the Mppś furnishes every desirable explanation for this purpose. It is an enormous compilation abounding in quotations of all kinds made, for the most part, without any precise reference. I [Lamotte] have attempted to identify them throughout the entire Buddhist literature, both canonical and post-canonical. The second fire at the Louvain Library, by restricting me once again to the meager resources of my personal library, made this hunt for references especially difficult. Therefore I did not have access to the Dictionnaire des noms propres du bouddhisme indien by C. Akanuma which would have been useful; on the other hand, I managed to glean from Malalasekara's Dictionary of Pāli Proper Names the volume of notes appended by E. Chavannes to his translation of Cinq cents contes et apaloupites tirés du Tripitaka chinois, and the rich references gathered by L. de La Vallée Poussin in his translation of Vasubandu's Abhidharmakośa. By furthering the research and crosschecking, I have succeeded in gathering quite a rich harvest of references which, I hope, will be useful to those who one day will continue this work. If some of my notes have been extended seemingly abnormally, it is because I have tried to present a complete record of sources from which the Mppś was able to draw. It will, I hope, untangle some general conclusions which I intend to formulate in a later work. Despite the difficulties of the times, the Fondation Universitaire has continued its kindness by defraying the expense of printing the present volume as generously as in the past and I express all my gratitude. How could I not also name J. Duculot, my faithful editor, who knew how to overcome all the obstacles so as to give this work a suitable presentation.

E. Lamotte
ABBREVIATIONS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Acta Or.</td>
<td>Acta Orientalia, Leyden, since 1922.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AM</td>
<td>Asia Major, Leipzig, since 1924.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>- tr. Nyanatiloka</td>
<td>Nyanatiloka, Die Reden des Buddha aus dem A.N. übersetzt, 5 vol., München, s.d.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AO</td>
<td>Archiv Orientāli, Journal of the Czechoslovak Oriental Institute, Prague, since 1929.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Astasāhasrīkā</td>
<td>Astasāhasrīkā Prājñāpāramitāmit, ed. R. Mitra (Bibl. Ind.), Calcutta, 1888 seq.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Athasaṅgī</td>
<td>ed. E. Müller (PTS), London, 1897.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>- tr. Feer</td>
<td>L. Feer, Avadānāśāstra, Cent légendes bouddhiques (AMG No. XVIII), Paris, 1891.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barth, Oeuvres</td>
<td>Oeuvres de Auguste Barth, 5 vol., Paris, 1914-1827.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BCLS</td>
<td>Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres et des Sciences morales et politiques, Académie Royale de Belgique.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beal, Catena</td>
<td>S. Beal, 4 Catena of Buddhist Scriptures, London, 1871.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Abbreviations in the Text

- Bulletin de l'École française d'Extrême Orient, Hanoi, since 1901.
- Bruchstücke des B., ed. E. Waldschmidt (Klein. Sanskrit-Texte No. III), Leipzig, 1926.
- Bibliographie Bouddhique, Paris, since 1930.
- Bodhisattvabūtī, ed. U. Wogihara, 2 vol., Tokyo, 1930.
- ed. P. Minayeff, St. Petersburg, 1890.
- 2nd ed., Tokyo, 1928.
- Cunningham's Ancient Geography of India, ed. Majumdar, Calcutta, 1924.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author/Editor</th>
<th>Title/Work</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>M.M. Hallade</td>
<td>Composition plastique dans les Reliefs de l'Inde, Paris, 1942.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>E.W. Hopkins</td>
<td>Epic Mythology (Grundris d. IA Phil.), Strassburg, 1915.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V. Fausböll</td>
<td>Kalpana Abhi dharmakoṇḍa ed. (HOS No. I), Boston, 1891.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>H. Kern</td>
<td>Sphutaprajñapti ed. (HOS No. II), Cambridge, 1895-1897.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Lüders, Bhārhat und buddh. Literature H. Lüders, Bhārhat und die buddhistische Literatur (AKM, XXVI, 5), Leipzig, 1941.
Macdonell, Vedic Mythology A. Macdonell, Vedic Mythology (Grundris d. IA Phil.), Strassburg, 1897.
Madh. Kārikā Mūlamadhyamakakārikās of Nāgārjuna with the Prasannapadā.
Madhyatvavibhāga ed. S. Yamaguchi, 2 vol., Nagoya, 1934.
Madhyatvavibhāga Th. Schiberbatsky, Madhyatvavibhāga (Bibl. Buddh No. XXX), Leningrad, 1936.
Mahāsūrīntilakalaka ed. T. Ganapatī Śāstrī, 3 vol. (TSS No. 70, 76, 84), Trivandrum, 1920-1922.
OKC  A comparative analytical Catalogue of the Kanjur Division of the Tibetan Tripiṭaka, Kyoto, 1930-1932.
Pañcavīṣṇati  Pañcavīṣṇatiśāhānirīkṣa Prajñāprāpratīmit, ed. N. Dutt (COS No. 28), London, 1934.
Paṭijīkā  Bodhicaryavatāpatijīkā, ed. L. de La Vallée Poussin (Bibl. Ind.), Calcutta, 1901-1914.
- tr. Law  B.C. Law, Designation of HumanTypes (PTS), London, 1922.
Rājatrapālaparpīcēhā  ed. L. Finot (Bibl. Buddh. No. II), St. Petersburg, 1901.
Rh. D, Buddhīst India  T.W. Rhys Davids, Dduhīst India (The Story of the Nations), London, 1903
RO  Rocznik Orientalistyczny, Krakow-Lwow, ince 1915.
Saddharmapuṇḍarīka  - tr. Burnouf
Sūdra  ed. B. Bhattacharyya, 2 vol. (GOS No. XXVI, XLI), Baroda, 1925-1928.
Sāṃdhyārīṣakā  ed.-tr. É. Lamotte (Université de Louvain-Recueil No. XXXIV), Louvain, 1935.
Sāṃgītaka  Mahaśāṅgamāraḥ. – La Soime du Grand Vehicule d’Aṣṭaṅga. II.
Traduction by É. Lamotte (Bibliothèque du Muséon No. VII), Louvain, 1935-1939.
Sāṃgītaka  - tr. Sayyutta
Sāṃgraha  Sarvadāriṣa  - tr. Cowell-Gough
Schleifer, Tibetische Lebensbeschreibung  A. Schleifer, Eine tibetische Lebensbeschreibung Śākyamuni’s, St. Petersburg, 1851.
Schubring, Lehre der Jinaṇas  W. Schubring, Die Lehre der Jinaṇas (Grundriss d. IA Phil.), Berlin-Leipzig, 1935.
Schubring, Lehre der Jinaṇas  Siddhi  Vījąjāptimātratāsiddhi. – La Siddhi de Hiuan Tsaung, tr. and ann. by L. de La Vallée Poussin, 2 vol., Paris, 1928.
CHAPTER I: EXPLANATION OF ARGUMENTS

[k. 1, p. 57c] The prajñāpāramitā is a great path which the Buddha has travelled.

The prajñāpāramitā is a great sea which the Buddha has drained,

The true meaning of the prajñāpāramitās is not closed to the Buddha:

I prostrate to the prajñāpāramitā and the unequalled Buddha.

36

Ceaseless destruction of the two views of existence and non-existence,

37

The true nature of the things preached by the Buddha,

Eternal, stable, immutable, purifying the passions:

I prostrate to the venerable Dharma of the Buddha,

The noble Assembly - a great sea - cultivates the field of merits

38

Śāikṣas and aśaikṣas serve as its ornament,

It has destroyed the thirst that produces rebirths,

39

Suppressed the feeling of 'mine' and destroyed its root.

40

Having renounced the things of the world,

It is the seat of all the qualities.

It is foremost among all the assemblies:

---

36 The first four stanzas are a homage to the Three Jewels (triratna): the Buddha, the Dharma and the Community (saṅgha). In the first, the Prajñāpāramitā is closely associated with the praise of the Buddha, for it is the Mother of the Buddhas (cf. Mṇḍpī, T 1509, k. 4, p. 93a; k. 34, p. 314a; k. 70, p. 550a. - Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra, T 220, k. 441; p. 224c. - Pulcāviṃśati, T 223, k. 14, p. 323b)

37 The view of existence and non-existence (bhavavibhavādṛṣṭi) also called view of belief in the extremes (antagrāhadṛṣṭi) consists of believing in eternity (sāśvata) or extinction (uccheda). It has been formally condemned many times by the Buddha and by Nāgārjuna. Cf. Sampūrtta, II, p. 17: Sābbam asthitī atīvat āsīt eto anto, sābbam asthitī atīvat āsīt eto anto. Etc al sxo anto upagamana majhena Tathāgato dharmam deseti - Madh. kārikā, XV, 10, p. 272-273.

38 i.e., the Buddha who is the punnakāraṇa par excellence.

39 The rṣṇā paunabharatikṣa that 'leads from rebirth to rebirth, accompanied by pleasure and envy, which finds its pleasure here and there: the thirst for pleasure, the thirst for existence, the thirst for impermanence' (Vinaya, I, p. 10).

40 The belief in 'me' and 'mine' (ātmātmīyagrāha) which makes up the satkāyadṛṣṭi.
I prostrate to this Assembly that is pure and full of merits.

Having venerated the Three Jewels whole-heartedly, I also supplicate the saviors of the world, Maitreya, etc., Śāriputra, foremost among sages, Subhūti, who practices the arunāanusādhī.41

Now, according to my skill, I wish to explain the true meaning of Mahāprajñaparamitā.

I would wish that all people of great merit and noble wisdom give their full attention to my words.

Question. - For what reasons (hetuprayaṇa) did the Buddha preach the Maḥo haṃ pao jo lo mi king (Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra)?42 The Buddhas do not preach the Dharma (dharmam delayatā) without a reason (niśāna) or for a futile motive (kārya). It is like the Siu (mi Sumen), king of mountains (parvanārāja), which does not tremble without a reason or for a futile cause. What then are these solemn reasons that determined the Buddha to preach the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra?

[p. 58a] Answer. - In the Tripiṭaka, the Buddha developed many kinds of comparisons (dryṣṭānta), but when he preached to the śrīvakas, he did not speak about the bodhisattva path (bodhisattvavāda). It is only in the Tchong a han pa no king (Puruṣparānakāstātra of the Madhyamagama)43 that the Buddha predicted (vyākaranam) to bodhisattva Mi lo (Maitreya): "Later you will become the Buddha with the name of Maitreya." But even there, he said nothing about the various bodhisattva practices (bodhisattvavacaraṇa).

Here the Buddha wishes to explain the bodhisattva practices to Maitreya, etc., and this is why he preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra.

2. Moreover, there are bodhisattvas who cultivate (bhāvanāvanti) the concentration of recollection of the Buddhas (buddhānusmṛtyusāmarthiyd).45 In order that they progress in this samādhi, the Buddha preached the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra to them. Thus, in the first chapter of the Prajñāpāramitā, it is said: "Manifesting the basis of his miraculous power (yuddhiśrāṇa), the Buddha emits golden (uvanārāṇa) rays (rajinī) that light up in the ten directions (daśaśīdi) as numerously as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgāmātravālapakopama lokadatā). Showing his great body (mahākuṭa) of pure light (vīśuddhārāhāra) and of various colors (nānaśrūtarāpā), he fills all of space (ākāśa). In the middle of the assembly (parayu), the Buddha is upright (citta), beautiful (ahārīrī), peerless (asūma), like Sumeru, king of the mountains, in the center of the great ocean."46 The bodhisattvas, seeing this miracle (prāthīhāra) of the Buddha, progress ever further in the recollection of the Buddha. It is for this reason that the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra.

3. Furthermore, at the moment of his birth (janman), the Bodhisattva47 emits great rays of light (rajinī) that fill the ten directions (daśaśīdi), takes seven steps (saptapadā) and contemplates the four directions (caturādiṣa pakṣa); proclaiming the konś's roar (sinhandaḥ), he utters this stanza:

I have been born, my births are ended.

This is my last existence.

Central Asian sources: In eastern Iranian, the Maitreyasamiti; in Tokharian, fragments of the Maitreyasamiti (Maitreya le consolateur). In eastern Iranian, the Maitreyasamiti; in Tokharian, fragments of the Maitreyasamitā (Maitreya le consolateur). It is known in three Chinese recensions: 1) The "Chouo pen king" (Maitreya: "Later you will become the Buddha with the name Maitreya.

41 The arunāanusādhī is the power to prevent the arising of passion in others. The bibliography for this subject is in Śaṅkhu, p. 53. - Subhūti is the foremost of the arunāvahātras (Āguttara, l, p. 24); see M. Walleser, The liveliness of the Buddha, Heidelberg, 1917.

42 By Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra, the author probably means the collection of the Prajñā literature and particularly the Pañcavārṣaṇī of which the Mppā is the commentary.

43 The Pen no king "Śrītra of the beginning and the end" is known in three Chinese recensions: 1) The "Chouo pen king" of Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 66), k. 13, p. 506c-511c; 2) the "S Parsons che," T 44, p. 829b-830c; 3) the "Po ho li king" of Hien yu, T 202 (no. 57), k. 12, p. 432b-436c. - The Sanskrit title, Purvaparānakāstātra, has two citations as evidence from the Karmavibhāga, p. 39 and 67; the Tibetan title, Smār dasambhāsā mdo, is known by a citation from the Maitreyasākāraṇa, v. 2. - For this śrītra, see also Ś. Lēvi, Maitreyo le consolateur, ML, II, p. 362-363.

44 The literature on Maitreya is considerable, but of rather late date: Pāli sources: Dīgha, III, p. 75 seq.; Suttaṃpāta, ājñānaśūnapuṇḍacī, v. 1932-2039; and Tissamawasuyānasaṇacī, v. 1040-1042; Miśinda, p. 159; Ātharābāī, p. 361, 415, 431; Visuddhāmiga, II, p. 434; Mahāvāṇa, XXXII, v. 81 seq; Āgutāvamaṇa, JPTS, 1886.

45 Sanskrit and Chinese sources; Mahāvāna, I, p. 51; III, p. 246; P'ī p'o cha, T 1545, k. 135, p. 698b; Chouo pen king, T 1562, k. 38, p. 559a; Kośa III, p. 193; VII, p. 298; X, p. 269; Kośavyābhikā, p. 21, 293; Siddhi, p. 176, 418, 622, 737, 772; Maitreyasākāraṇa, ed. S. Lēvi, ML, II, p. 381-402; T 348, 349, 1143, 1525.
I have attained liberation,
Henceforth I will save beings.48

48 Mus, Barabudhur, p. 475-576, has a study on the ‘seven steps of the Buddha and the doctrine of the pure lands’ in which, with his usual skill, he attempts to untangle the symbolon of this legendary act: I [Lamotte] add some information drawn from the Chinese sources. In sequence, the Nikāya-āgamas, the Vinayas and finally the Lives of the Buddha are examined in turn.

1) Majjima, III, p. 123: Samājītā: "Avand, bodhisattva ... dani punabbhavito ti - "Tr: As soon as he was born, the Bodhisattva, placing his feet flat upon the earth, turned to the north, took seven strides (double steps), and with a white parashul behind him, pronounced: "I am the foremost in the world, I am the best in the world, I am the eldest in the world; this is my last birth; there will be no further need for a new existence for me."

2) In Digha, II, p. 15, the same actions and the same words are attributed to all future Buddhas. By contrast, the corresponding passages of the Chinese Agamas show significant differences.

3) T'ou-ān a man, T 26 (no. 32), k. 8, p. 470b: I have heard it said that the Bhagavat, at the moment of his birth, took seven steps without any fear, terror or dread.

4) Te'ēng a man, T 3 (no. 1), k. 1, p. 4b-c: The Bodhisattva Vipāsiyān, at birth, came out of his mother’s right side with untroubled mind. Having come out of her right side, he came down to the ground and took seven steps, without the support of anyone. He looked around in the four directions, raised his hand and said: "Alone, I am the eldest (ijesha) in heaven and on earth. I will enable beings to pass beyond birth (jātil), old age (jūra), sickness (vyādhi) and death (murasu)."

   ‘To pass beyond’ here means ‘to escape from’, ‘to save from’. In the Vinayas, we include not only the Mālasārāvītidā Vinaya but also the Mahāvastu which appears to be the Vinaya of the Mahākūṭa Lokottaravada.

5) Ken pen chou...p'o seng ch'e, T 1450, k. 2, p. 108a: According to the usual rule, after his birth, the Bodhisattva stood on the earth and without anyone’s support, took seven steps. Gazing in the four directions, he spoke these words: ‘I am the first (ṣyat) of all beings; this is the southern region: I am worthy of the offerings (piṭā) of beings; this is the region of the east: I am one of the effect (nivāya); I will undergo no rebirth (punarbhava): this is the region of the north: I have now left the great ocean of saṃsāra.’ - Cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 16.

6) Mahāvastu, II, p. 20: Bodhisattvo sneto ... sa paścādikā mahāvastū ca ... ca ihatī // Tr: The Bodhisattva, aware and thoughtful, without hurting his mother, appeared from her right side and uttered a great laugh. Weary of abiding within his mother’s womb, he took seven steps. As soon as he was born, he took seven steps on the earth, looked in the directions and uttered a great laugh.

7) Two biographies of the Buddha, the Sīke hing pen k’i king, T 184, k. 1, p. 463, translated in 207 by Ta li, and the T’ai tsen joui ying pen k’i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 473c, translated between 222-229 by Tēche K’ien, tell the birth of the Buddha in almost the same words: He is born from the right side and comes down to the earth. He takes seven steps and, raising his hand, says: ‘I am the eldest in heaven and on earth. The threefold world (svabhāvavasu) is completely suffering. I will pacify it.’

By contrast, the various recensions of the Lālaviśvara show notable differences. The oldest, that of Dhamarākṣa (T 186) dates from 308, the most recent, that of Divākara (T187) dates from 683 and is closest to the Sanskrit text.

8) Pou yao king, T 186, k. 2, p. 494a: Then the Bodhisattva was born from the right side and at once came to life on a precious lotus (ratnapadma). He came down to earth and took seven steps. Making the sounds of Brahmā (brāhmaṇavavo) heard, he spoke in an extraordinary tone: ‘I will save heaven and earth. I am the eldest (ijesha) of gods and men. I will bring the sufferings of saṃsāra to an end. Without superior (anuttara) in the threefold world, I will bring the everlasting peace of the Unconditioned (āsvamedha = nirvāṇa) to all beings.’

9) Fāng kouang ta tchouaung yen king, T 187, k. 3, p. 553 compared with the Sanskrit text of the Lālaviśvara, p. 84 (tr. Foucalt, p. 78): At the end of ten months, the Bodhisattva came out of his mother’s right side, aware and thoughtful, without any support from his mother’s womb. He looked at the universe and saw no-one like himself. Sanskrit text: Atka taum yamaye ... bhūṣayāmī sarvasattvāṇāṁ....

T 187: Then the Bodhisattva, endowed with awareness, judgment and right mind, without support, took seven steps to the north by himself. Beneath his feet, lotuses sprang up. Then the Bodhisattva, fearless and without terror, spoke these words: ‘I have obtained all the good dharmas. I will preach them to beings.’ Then facing the south, he took seven steps and said: ‘I am worthy of receiving the offerings of gods and men.’ Then facing the west, he took seven steps and said: ‘I am the eldest in the world, I am the best. This is my last birth. I will put an end to birth and old age, to sickness and death.’ Then facing the north, he took seven steps and said: ‘Among all beings, I will be without superior.’ Then facing the lower regions, he took seven steps and said: ‘I will triumph over the hordes of Mara and, in order to destroy the sufferings of the hells, fire, etc., I will send the great cloud of the Dharma. I will make the great rain of the Dharma to fall, and thus beings will enjoy complete happiness.’ Then facing the higher regions, he took seven steps and said: ‘I will be visible to all beings.’

10) Yi tseu pen snou pen k‘i king, T 188, p. 618a: The prince was born on the eighth day of the fourth month at midnight. He came out of his mother's right side and came down to earth. He took seven steps, his feet, four inches above the ground, did not tread upon the earth. Raising his right hand, he said: ‘I am the eldest in heaven and on earth; no-one can surpass me.’

11) Kouo k‘iu hien t'ai yin kouo king, T 189, k. 1, p. 627a: The royal prince was born from the right side, down onto a lotus made of the seven jewels (saptaratnapadma) and took seven steps. Raising his right hand, he uttered the lion’s roar (śimhindasa): ‘Among gods and men, I am the eldest, the best (ijesha). Endless transmigration is henceforth ended for me [and] my [last] existence will be of use to all, gods and men.’

12) Fo pen hing ti king T 190, k. 8, p. 687b: After his birth and without the support of anyone, the Bodhisattva took seven steps in each of the four directions. At each step, under his feet there arose a great lotus. When he had taken these seven steps, he looked in the four directions: his eyes did not blink, his mouth uttered words. First looking in the east, he expressed himself in a way completely unlike that of a child, in correct language based on regular stanzas: ‘In the world, I am the conqueror par excellence. From today on, my births are ended.’ - Beul, Romantic Legend, p. 44.

13) Buddhacarita, I, v. 14-15: anikālāniyyasamagantuṣamṣāpanāṃ ... bhāyuḥkarāṁ uvacā // Tr: Johnston, p. 4: He who was like the constellation of the Seven Stars walked seven steps with such firmness that his feet were lifted up unwavering and straight, and the strides were long and set down firmly. And looking to the four directions and uttered a great laugh.

14) The legend of Alokā relates the birth of the Bodhisattva quite briefly: cf. Dōcyōdōna, p. 389: jīvaṁ eva ka maṁ ... garbhāvāṃ ca paścātmapaḥ // Tr: As soon as he was born, he took seven steps on the earth, looked in the four directions and uttered this speech: ‘This is my last birth and my last sojourn in the womb.’ The identical passage in Aṣṭa k‘i king, T 192, k. 1, p. 1b.

15) In later appearance, the portion of the legend of Alokā incorporated in the Chinese Sunyatañjana, Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 604), k. 23, p. 166b-c: The Trāhāgata was born here. At his birth, he took seven steps. Looking in the four directions, he raised his hand and pointed to the sky: ‘This is my last existence. I will obtain the unexcelled path. Among gods and men, I am without superior and the eldest.’
After this oath, he grew up. He decided to leave his parents and left home (pravrajita) in order to cultivate the unsurpassed path (anuttaramārga). In the middle of the night, he woke up and considered the ladies of honor and the courtesans (svarūpī) of his harem (aṇṭapura); their bodies appeared like rotting corpses.49 He ordered Tečhi (Chandika) to saddle (kalpayati) his white horse.50 At midnight he passed through the ramparts, traveled twelve miles (yojana) and came to the hermitage (āśrama) where the rṣi Po Ke p'o (Blīvāga)51 lived. With a knife, he cut his hair (asipatena cādāṃ chinnati)52 and exchanged his beautiful garments (vastra) for a rough cloak (saṃghātī).53 He practiced asceticism (duṣkaracaryā) for six years (sadavarsa) on the banks of the Ni lien chan (Nairājñā) river; he ate only one sesame (tīla) seed or one rice (sāndha) grain each day.54 Nevertheless, he said to himself: "This way of life (sīhāra) is not the good way (mārga)." Then the Bodhisattva gave up the practice of asceticism (duṣkaracaryāvihāra), went to the foot of the tree of enlightenment (bodhiḍruma) and sat down on the diamond seat (vajrāsaṁśaya).

32

His hair, perfumed with scented ointment, The most sublime of beings cut and threw up into the air Where Indra of the thousand eyes took it respectfully And placed it in a golden jeweled box.

For once, the corresponding story in Lalitavistara, p. 225 (tr. Foucaux, p. 197) is more sober in its details: Then the Bodhisattva thought: "Why should I keep my top-knot after becoming a wandering monk?" And cutting his top-knot with his sword, he threw it to the wind. It was gathered up by Trīṣṇi, the king of heaven, and was suspended in a golden jewel box. Indra, the king of heaven, seeing that, gathered it in a golden box and, within his paradise, established the shrine of the Top-knot Jewel (cūlāmaṇicettiya). This is what is expressed in the verse:

33

34

35

36

37

38

39

40

41

42

43

44

45

46

47

48

49

50

51

52

53

54

55

56

57

58

59

60

61

62

63

64

65

66

67

68

69

70

71

72

73

74

75

76

77

78

79

80

81

82

83

84

85

86

87

88

89

90

91

92

93

94

95

96

97

98

99

100

101

102

103

104

105

106

107

108

109

110

111

112

113

114

115

116

117

118

119

120

121

122

123

124

125

126

127

128

129

130

131

132

133

134

135

136

137

138

139

140

141

142

143

144

145

146

147

148

149

150

151

152

153

154

155

156

157

158

159

160

161

162

163

164

165

166

167

168

169

170

171

172

173

174

175

176

177

178

179

180

181

182

183

184

185

186

187

188

189

190

191

192

193

194

195

196

197

198

199

200

201

202

203

204

205

206

207

208

209

210

211

212

213

214

215

216

217

218

219

220

221

222

223

224

225

226

227

228

229

230

231

232

233

234

235

236

237

238

239

240

241

242

243

244

245
Māra with his troupe of eighteen nayutas of warriors, came to overcome him, but the Bodhisattva defeated Māra's army ... omniscient, not by virtue of knowing everything but by virtue of the fact that he is able to know whatever he

4. Furthermore, there are people who think that the Buddha is not omniscient (sarvajñā). Why? They say: "The dharmas are infinite (apramāṇa) and innumerable (asamākyeya); how could a single person know them all?"\(^5\) The Buddha abides in the true (bhūtālakṣaṇa) Prajñāpāramitā as pure as space (ākāśātuddha); in infinite (apramāṇa) and innumerable (asamākyeya) texts, he himself has given the assurance: "I am omniscient (sarvajñā); I wish to destroy the doubts of all beings (sarvasatārasanyāsaccheda)".\(^5\) This is why he preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra.\(^5\)

\(^{55}\) Thomas, Life of the Buddha, p. 68, comments that in the canonical story (Majjhima, I, p. 237) there is no mention of either the bodhi tree or of Māra's temptations. The Mīpī thus depends here on more recent sources such as the Padhānakutta (Sūttagāta, v. 425-449); Nidānakāthā, p. 70-75; Buddhacarita, chap. XII, v. 112-118; XIII, XIV; Lalitavistara, chap. XX-XXI; Mahāvastu (II, p. 267-270, 276-283, 304-349). See E. Windisch, Māra und Buddhas, Leipzig, 1895, p. 229, 332-335.

\(^{56}\) According to the interpretation of the Mīpī, when Brahmadatta invited the Buddha to preach the Dharma (below, k. 1, p. 63a-b), it was a matter of the entire Buddhist doctrine without distinction as to Vehicle. In response to this invitation, the Buddha preached not only the Four Noble Truths, the central point of the Hinayāna, but also the "very profound dharmas and the Prajñāpāramitā, the basis of the Mahāyāna dogma. For a long time it has been acknowledged that both Vehicles, referring to one and the same teacher, the Buddha Śākyamuni, tell his life and his propagation of the Dharma in almost the same terms and affirm that their main texts were given by him.

\(^{57}\) Below, K. 2, p. 73b, 74b.

\(^{58}\) Same objection, k. 3, p. 74b.

\(^{59}\) The question of the Buddha's omniscience (sarvajñā) is quite complex. At the time of the Buddha, some individuals claimed to know everything, to understand everything, to have nothing further to know or to understand. They said: "Whether I walk or stand still, whether I sleep or am awake, I have always knowledge and awareness at my disposition" (sabbiṣṭā sabbaśādāvid...paccaupapattih sī). Such were, e.g., the claims of Niyaṯa Nāthaṉapura, Pāṇa Kasaṇa, etc. (Majjhima, I, p. 92; II, p. 31; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 428). The Buddha is more modest: "Those who affirm", he says to Vaczhatuta, "that the monk Gotama is omniscient (sabbiṣṭā), clairvoyant (sabbaśādāvid), do not speak the truth about me... They would be correct to say that the monk Gotama possesses the three knowledges" (tsāvio samano Gotamo). These three knowledges are the knowledge of past existences, the knowledge of the death and birth of beings and the knowledge of the destruction of the impurities (Majjhima, I, p. 482).

The Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika doctrine is based on the canonical line. The Mahānī NASāda, p. 178-178, says that the Buddha is omniscient, not by virtue of his knowing everything but by virtue of the fact that he is able to know whatever he wishes. Describes the perfection of wisdom belonging to the Buddha, Kuśa, VII, p. 832. Identifies a fourfold knowledge:

1) taught knowledge (anupagdhi dhiṇa), 2) universal knowledge (sarvata dhiṇa), i.e., knowledge of all natures, 3) omniform knowledge (sarvatthā dhiṇa), i.e., knowledge of every way of being, 4) spontaneous knowledge (ayatagdhiṇa) knowledge by the simple wish to know.

On the other hand, the Greater Vehicle attributes to the Buddha pure and simple omniscience. The Mīpī asserts below, k. 2, p. 74c, that the Buddha knows all the sciences and that, if he does not teach them, it is because nobody asks him. The explanatory literature on the Prajñāpāramitā, such as the Abhisambadānākāra, p. 1-2, and its commentary, the Ādīkāra, p. 5, attributes a threefold knowledge to the Buddha: 1) sarvādājñātā, omniscience peculiar to the Buddha, ultimate and direct knowledge in one single moment of all aspects of existence, absolute and empirical; 2) sarvajñātā, omniscience relating to the path of salvation, Hinayāna and Mahāyāna; it belongs to the Buddha and the bodhisattvas on the bhūmī; 3) sarvajñātā, omniscience relating to things of the empirical world; it represents the knowledge of all the elements from the non-point of view; it belongs to the Buddhas and bodhisattvas and is accessible to the Hinayāna saints. (cf. E. Obermiller, Doctrine of PP, p. 62, Analysis, 3-6).

The Bodhi, bhūmi, p. 404-405, defines the sarvādājñātā, the omniform knowledge, as follows: tatār yat tathāgatasyanyutapasamācitena ity ucyate. The sarvakāla jñātā allows the Buddha to cut through the doubts of all beings. - This comes from a stanza of the Mahāyānasūtraśāstra, XXII, 58, p. 188.

विष्ठल काकूति...नामो 'स्तु तारी // ।

By means of the trikāya thou hast attained the great omniform enlightenment. Thou cuttest through the doubts of all beings! Homage to thee! This stanza is repeated and commented upon in the Saṃgraha, p. 530; the commentary proposes four interpretations of the epithet sarvādā used applied to the Buddha's knowledge; it concludes by saying: "As for myself, I see the suppression of all obstacles (sarvādṛṣṭārāna) in this omniform knowledge: it cuts through all the obstacles to knowledge (jñānaśūna) and suppresses all the impregnations (sūna). It is a precise knowledge bearing on all the doubts of others." - The question of omniscience is linked with that of knowledge which, in turn, has some complications; see J. Rahder in Hilbgirn, Ch. 283-297.

\(^{60}\) Free quotation of the Puṇḍarīkavīrti, p. 5-7, that can easily be restored into Sanskrit: Atha bhūta Bhagavān...vahāhāthāt śrīdhātāt śrībhūtān. - This passage will be commented on in k. 7, p. 111-114.
the Buddha wishes to teach the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of all dharmas and cut through the bonds of doubt (samayabandhana) of all beings. This is why he preached the Mahāprajñāpāramitā.

6. Furthermore, there are evil people, given up to feelings of envy (bīṣṇa), who slander the Buddha by saying: "The wisdom (prajñā) of the Buddha does not surpass that of men; it is just his magic (māyā) that deceives the world." In order to destroy this scornful arrogance and false pride (mithyādṛṣṭa), the Buddha manifests the immense power (apramāṇabala) of his miraculous power (śuddhi) and wisdom (prajñā). About the Prajñāpāramitā it is said: "My miraculous power has immense qualities (apramāṇagaurava) and surpasses the threefold world (trisādhiśivarūpavṛtti), it is meant for the welfare of all (sarvaparitānā). To form a bad opinion of it is to commit an immense sin (śūpatti); to give pure faith to it (visuddhāśuddhā) is to be assured of the happiness of gods and men (devamanavaswākuṭa) and to reach the fruit of nirvāṇa (sarvāṇāhala) definitively."62

61 Heretics have often treated the Buddha as a magician. Ujjvalasūtra, Majjhima. I, p. 375: Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 133), k. 32, p. 629a26: Samano bhībhante...sāvakā śāvattī: "The monk Gotama is a magician; he knows the hidden magic that seduces others’ disciples." Sanskrit fragments of this sūtra may be found in Horntre, Remaince, p. 27-35; S. Lēvi, Notes indiennes, 1A, Jan.-Mar. 1925, p. 26-35; Viṃśatikā, p. 10, 1. 15. - Pāṇḍitāsūtra, Samyutta IV, p. 340 = Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 20), k. 4, p. 458b: Setaṃ me teṃ...mahāyāna jñāti: "I have heard that the monk Gotama knows magic." - An allusion to this same Pāṭati occurs in Tsa a han a han T 99 (no. 119), k. 5, p. 37b, and in Pī p'o cha, T 1545, k. 27, p. 139a: "The tirthika Pāṇḍita says: Gautama, do you know magic? If you do not, you are not omniscient; if you do, you are a magician." - Pī p'o cha, T 1545, k. 8, p. 38b: "The tirthikas slander the Buddha saying: The śramaṇa Gautama is a great magician who deceives the world." - Kośa, III, p. 30; Kośavākyā, p. 206: Yathāvāyatīrītha...lakṣaṃ bhakāvāyatī: "The heretics criticize the Buddha. These are Māskari, etc. A treatise of the Nṛgranthas says: Who does miracles? Gautama is a magician. - And elsewhere it has been said of the Buddha: After a hundred periods there appeared in the world a magician of this kind who will destroy (expel) the world by his magic." If most of Buddhist texts consider the word 'magician' applied by heretics to the Buddha as harmful, some late sources, elsewhere it has been said of the Buddha: After a hundred periods there appeared in the world a magician of this kind who will destroy (expel) the world by his magic.

62 Buddhists love to mention this disproportion between the error and the punishment on the one hand and the merit and the reward on the other hand. Cf. Bodhicaryāvatāra, I, v. 34-35: iti saṃrūpam ājīvanā...tathāham iv ayatātaḥ //

Tr. Lav., p. 7: "Such is the son of the Buddha, master of a veritable feast. The Buddha has declared: Whosoever sins against him in his heart remains in hell for as many centuries as the evil thought has lasted. But when in the heart is calm and takes delight in the Bodhisattva, this is a merit so great that it destroys old sins. And is violence not necessary to occur to harm the bodhisattvas? Is it not natural to love them?"

- Similarly the Prāṇavātinsivincayaprāṇavātinsiva, cited in Patḍākā, p. 39 and Sūkṣmaśrīmāṇa, p. 85: Tāvanti Mahāprajñā...mayi mahānāvācaya.

7. Furthermore, in order that people accept his doctrine, the Buddha says to them: "I am the great teacher (mahāguru), I possess the ten strengths (bala) and the four fearlessnesses (vaśīvaraṇa); I am established in the abodes of the saints (āryavāraṇa); my mind enjoys the mysteries (vaśīti). Uttering the lion’s roar, I turn the wheel of the Dharma (dharmaucakṣa); in all the universes I am the supreme being."63

8. Moreover, it is for the joy (pramuditā) of beings that the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra. He says to them: "You should experience great joy. [Ś八十] Why? Because all beings enter into the net of false views (mithyādṛṣṭa); they are all deceived by bad heretical teachers (pāṇḍitābājyāsūtrā). I have escaped the dependence of the deceitful net of all bad teachers. The great teacher who possesses the ten strengths (bala) is difficult to find. Today you have found him. I will reveal to you the basket of the profound dharmas (gambhīravāsanātāka), i.e., the thirty-seven wings of enlightenment (bodhipākṣya), etc.; you will gather them as you wish."

9. Furthermore, all beings are afflicted (klīta) by the sicknesses (vyādhi) of the fetters (sāmyojana). In the course of beginningless transmission (amāḍhikālakāsāma), never has anyone been able to cure these sicknesses that are misunderstood by the bad heretical teachers. Today I have appeared in the world as the great king of physicians (mahāvādīkārya).63 I have compounded the medicine of the Dharma (dharmaucāya) and you should take it." This is why the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra.

10. Furthermore, there are people who think: "The Buddha is just like ordinary people; like them, he is subject to transmigration (sāmaśṛṇa); he really experiences the pains of hunger (bhūḥsāka), thirst (piṭṣita), cold (śīta) and heat (śūna), old age (jvara) and sickness (vyādhi)."65 In order to suppress such concepts, the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra and says: "My body (kāya) is inconceivable (acintya) 66.

63 On the Buddha, king of physicians (vaśīvaraṇa), master of medicines (bhūhāśīvaraṇa), see below, k. 22, p. 224a, k. 85, p. 657b. For details, see P. Dimiéville in Hīhatgīrinī, Byō p. 228, 230-231. - The 'Śīta of the good physician' or the 'Śīta on the comparison of the physician' are important, the Sanskrit texts of which may be found in Kośa, VI, p. 121, n. 4; Kośavākyā, p. 514; and the Chinese version in Tsa a han a han T 99 (no. 589), k. 15, p. 105a-b. - Other sources mentioned by Dimiéville: T 276, p. 384c; T 159, k. 5, p. 328c; T 330b; T 375, k. 5, p. 631c; T 26, k. 4, p. 442-443; k. 60, p. 804-805, etc. Further references to Pīlī and Sanskrit texts: Antagutta, III, p. 238: seyyathi pi bho...abhattham gacchanti. - In a list of epithets applied to the Buddha, (Antagutta, IV, p. 340), there is that of bhūṣita, 'physician'. The Mīlinda compares the Buddha to a sejjia, p. 74, and to a bhūṣita, p. 112, 169, 172. - The Lalitavistara invokes him as vaśīvaraṇa or vaśīvaraṇa, p. 46, 97, 283, 351, 358. - The Bodhicaryāvatāra calls him the omniscient physician, skilled in curing all suffering (vaśīvaraṇaḥ svabhāpūṣṭaḥbhūṣitaḥ, II, v. 37), the best of physicians (varaviśuddhi, VII, v. 24). - Similarly, Śīkṣaṇasamuccaya, p. 145, 234, 295.1.

64 Religious preaching plays an important part in Buddhist therapy; cf. Hīhatgīrinī, Byō, p. 257.

65 Like many Mahāyāna sūtras, the Mpi attaches two bodies to the Buddha, one human, the other superhuman. The latter is in question here. Cf. Siddhi, p. 776; Hīhatgīrinī, p. 178-182.

66 Marvelous though his powers may be, the Buddha is considered as an ordinary human, not only by his enemies the heretics but also by his first disciples, the Therās, who compiled canonical scriptures and elaborated the Sarvāstivādinscholasticism: see Siddhi, p. 764-772; Hīhatgīrinī, p. 174-177. It is exclusively on these sources, which represent only a part of Buddhism, that H. Oldenberg has based his well-known work, Le Buddha, sa vie, sa doctrine et sa communauté.
If the Buddha's body is immense (apramāṇa), so also are his rays (raśmi), his voice (vac), his morality (śīla), his samādhi, his wisdom (prajñā) and his other buddha qualities (buddhadharma). Refer to the three mysteries (gūhya) explained in the Mi ti king (Guhakasūtra)69 on which it will be necessary to enlarge.

11. Furthermore, at the time of his birth, the Buddha came down to the earth, took seven steps (saṅgapadā) and spoke some words, then was silent.70 Like all infants, he does not walk and does not talk; he suckles milk for three years; nurses feed him and he grows slowly. However the body (kāya) of the Buddha is incalculable (asaṃkhyeya) and surpasses all the worlds (sarasvaśākākāranā). But he appears to beings as an ordinary man (prthivagāna). Ordinarily, in a new-born baby, the limbs (kāyadhātu), the faculties (indiya) and the mental consciousness (manavihāna) are undeveloped (siddha, parinipāpana) and thus, the four bodily positions (dyapādha) - sitting (niśadana), lying down (ṣayyā), walking (gamana) standing (ṣihāna) - going from speech to silence, and all the other human behaviors (manasyadharmā) are incompletely manifested. With the passing of the days, months and years, the child practices little by little and takes on

Moreover, when the Buddha turned the wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakra), bodhisattvas from foreign regions (devantara) came to examine the Buddha's body67 which surpasses space (ākāśa) and the immense buddha-fields (buddhakāśa). Having come from the universe of the Buddha Houa chang (Padmaśāra),68 they saw the body of the Buddha and exclaimed:

Space is infinite,
So are the qualities of the Buddha.
To want to measure his body
Would be an endless task.
He surpasses the world of space
And the immense buddha-fields.
To see the body of the Lion of the Śākyas
Is just that and none other.
The body of the Buddha is like a mountain of gold,
He sends out great rays,

[59a] He is adorned with the major and the minor marks
Like a garland of lotuses in springtime.

67 In the Mahāvastu, III, p. 343-345, and the Lalitavistara, p. 438, these are the devas or devaputras who come to praise the Buddha.
68 The Buddha residing at the limits of the nadir (Pañcaviṃśati, p. 17).
human behaviors. But why was the Buddha born, if before birth he was already able to talk and walk, and afterwards he could not? This seems strange; but the single purpose of the Buddha is to use his power of skillful means (upayo); the Buddha manifests human behaviors (manusyaadharma) and adopts the human positions (jivyapatha) so that beings will believe in his profound Dharma. The Bodhisattvas were able to walk and talk as soon as he was born, people would say: "This man that we see is extraordinary (adhisya), he must be a god (deva), a naga or a demon (asura). The doctrine which he professes is certainly not within our reach. Transmigrating (samsrāra) and fleshly (māṃsākayā) beings as we are, in the grasp (ākṣipta) of the activities of the fetters (samsyajana), we do not have the capacity (vāisāti) for it; who among us could attain such a profound Dharma?"71 Victims of their own modesty, they cannot become firm adepts of the holy Dharma (āryadharmabhājana). It is for them that the Buddha is born in the Luan p'ī ni yuan (Lumbinivana).72 - Although he might have gone directly to the tree of enlightenment (buddhārama) and become Buddha there, he pretended by skillful means (upāya) to act as a child (kumāra), as an adolescent (bāla), as a young man (dīrgha) and as a grown man. As he, successively fulfilled the appropriate rôle: childish play (kumārakīrāda), study of the arts (kāla), householder's duty (svauna), enjoyment of the five objects of desire (paṭca kāmaṅgaṇa). Endowed with human faculties, he contemplates the painful spectacle of old age (jātā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maranya) and experiences revaluation (saṃvega)73 for them. - In the middle of the night, he passed outside the ramparts, left home (pravrajya) and went to the riṣi Yu ūo ie (Udraka) and A lo lo (Arāda). He pretended to be their disciple, but did not follow their teaching. Having always had the superknowledges (abhijñā), he recalled his former existence (pūrvaajnana) when, at the time of the Buddha Kī cho (Kāya), he followed the path of discipline (śīlacaryamārga).74 Nevertheless, for the moment, he pretended to practice asceticism (daskaracaryu) and searched for the path (mārga) for six years. - Although he reigns over the trिशिलसमसमतिहास-लोकालंभ, the Bodhisattva pretended to destroy Māra's army (māravandu) and attain the supreme path (anuttaramārga).

71 The same idea expressed in almost identical words in the Lalitavistara, p. 87-88: garbhāvasthitah ca...pariprattyayatnam iti. - Tr. Foucaux, p. 81-82. It is out of compass for beings that Bodhisattvas is born in the world of men, because if he were a god, he would not turn the wheel of Dharma. And because of that, Ānanda, could how beings not fall into discouragement? (They would say): The Bhagavat Tathāgata Arhat is truly the perfect and accomplished Buddha; but we, being only humans, are incapable of fulfilling the conditions.

Indeed, if the canonical scriptures are to be believed, Sākyamunī's contemporaries did not know how to characterize him and perplexedly wondered: Is he a man, a god, a gandharva or a yaksha? Cf. Aṅguttara, II, p. 38 (corresponding passage in Tsa t'ao lu, T 99 (no. 101), k. 4, p. 213-a-c; Tseng yi a hui, T 125, k. 31, p. 717-c-d); Majjhima, I, p. 386; Itakata, I, p. 66.

72 The Lumbinivana, the birthplace of the Buddha, is rarely mentioned in the canonical sources. See, however, Suttaniputta, v. 683 (Lambayu yasanapada); Kathavattu, p. 97, 559. - But all the biographies of the Buddha, Sanskrit and Chinese, as well as the Pali exegetical literature, agree in having the Buddha born at Lumbinī: Mahāvastu, II, p. 18, 145; Lalitavistara, v. 82, 96, 234, 411; Buddhaacariya, I, v. 6; Nīlanākatthā, p. 53, 54; Manoratha, I, p. 16; Cullavāsma, II, v. 10; Ken pen chou...p'o sang che, T 1450, k. 2, p. 107c, etc. - At Lumbini, actually Rumindel, near the Nepalese village of Paderi, two miles north of Bhagavanpurā, there is a column erected by Akioka on the spot where the Buddha was born bearing the following inscription: "Here the Buddha was born, sage of the Śākyas... He has erected a stone column which makes it known: Here the Blessed One was born." (Oldenberg, Buddha, p. 110, 111).

73 For the miracles of childhood and youth, Thomas, Life of the Buddha, p. 38-50.

74 The Mppī mentions only three encounters (the old man, the sick man and the dead man), like the Buddhaacariya, III, v. 25-62; the Lieou tsi king, T 152 (no. 77), k. 7, p. 41a-b (Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 267-270) and the Ts'ou vao king (Tokyo Trīpiṭaka, XXIV, 6, p. 43). - But most sources add a fourth, the meeting with a monk: cf. Mahāpadināsutta, Dīgha, II, p. 21-28; Nīlanākatthā, p. 59; Mahāvastu, II, p. 150-157; Lalitavistara, I, p. 187-191; Ken pen chouo...p'o sang che, T1350, k. 3, p. 112c-114a; Chinese biographies: T 184, p. 346-467; T 185, p. 474-475; T 186, p. 502-503; T 187, p. 570-571; T 188, p. 618; T 189, p. 629-631; T. 190, p. 719-724.

75 For them that the Buddha is born in the path of discipline (madhyamadharmakāya) refers to the chapter of the Cho li 'ta (Sanskrit, Āḷākāyū p'ā). - Contrary to what the Mppī says here, the Buddha followed the teachings of Ārāda before those of Udraka: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 163-167, 249, Dhammapadatta, I, p. 70-71, Nīlanākatthā, p. 66; Mahāvastu, II, p. 119-120, Divya, p. 392, Lalitavistara, p. 238-239, 243-245, Buddhaacariya ch. 12, Tch'eng a hong, T 26 (no. 204), k. 56, p. 776-b-e; Ken pen chouo...p'o sang che, T 1450, k. 4, p. 119.

76 These are the two extremes of laziness (kāmaśukhakāsamārgo) and rigorism (āramaśamāramārga), condemned by the Buddha who preaches a middle way (madhyamadharmakāya) in the sermon to Benares. Vinaya, I, p. 10: dve 'na bhikkhave ānta...nibbānāya saṃvattati. Mahāvastu, III, p. 331: dhūv imau bhikkavahāṛaviparītyā...sambodhyā nirvāṇāya saṃvattati. Lalitavistara, p. 416: dhūv imau bhikkavahāṛaviparītyā...pratipadattā tathāgato dhammaṃ deliṣayati. See also Dīgha, III, p. 113; Majjhima, III, p. 230, Samyutta, IV, p. 330; V, p. 421; Nettipakarana, I, p. 110; Visuddhimagga, p. 5; Mahāyānaśrīśālākāra, p. 53; Sanghagha, p. 2; Bodh. bhāna, p. 185, 187. In reality, the literature of the Prajñā understands the middle way not in as moral or disciplinary sense as does the LesserVehicle, but rather in a philosophical sense. The two extremes which it attacks are not only laziness and rigorism but also, and particularly, the extreme views of being and non-being, of eternalism and nihilism, etc. Cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 269; Madh. advātā, p. 22 (tr. Lav., Musōn, VIII, 1907, p. 271); Vādāya, Étude sur Āryadeva, p. 35-37; Lav., Mahāvastu, p. 10; Dutt, Mahāyāna, p. 46, 54.

14. Furthermore, he preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra in order to teach about the bodhisattva’s irreversibility (avastambha) and about the characteristics (linga) of this avastambha. He also preaches in order to thwart the tricks and works of Māra.

15. Furthermore, he preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra so that future centuries will honor (prajñā) the Prajñāpāramitā and in order to predict (vyākaranā) the Three Vehicless (yānātraya). Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: After my nirvāṇa, this Prajñāpāramitā will go to the south (dakṣiṇapātha); from the south, it will go to the west (paścinādeśa); in five hundred years, it will go to the north (utarapātha).

There will be many believers in the Dharma and the daughters of good family will offer flowers (puṣpa), incense (dhiṇa), garlands (māla), standards (divāja), banners (paṭalas), music (tūrṇa), lamps (diya), jewels (manimatsa) and other riches (vaṃsa). They will write it, preach it, study it, listen to it, reflect on it, meditate on it, and worship it in the usual ways. For this reason, these people will enjoy all kinds of worldly happiness (lokasukha), will obtain the three vehicles (yānātraya) without delay and enter into nirvāṇa-without-residue (nirvāṇadinesvānirvāṇa). This will be seen in following chapters. It is for these reasons and these motivations that the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra.

16. Furthermore, the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra to explain the absolute point of view (pāramārtikā siddhāntasākāra). There are four points of view (siddhānta): 1) the mundane point of view (laukika siddhānta); 2) the individual point of view (pratīti prakāra); 3) the therapeutic point of view (pratīti piṭakā); 4) the absolute point of view (pāramārtikā siddhānta). In these four points of view to the east, dove into the sea, emerged, rolled to the south, to the west and north the Buddha went from the region of the west to the region of the south. According to the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, the Buddha traveled: 1) from the region of the south to the region of the north; 2) from the region of the north to the region of the south. The Buddha said to Ānanda: After my nirvāṇa, this Prajñāpāramitā will go to the south (dakṣiṇapātha); from the south, it will go to the west (paścinādeśa); in five hundred years, it will go to the north (utarapātha).

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.

Some writers call upon this so-called itinerary to assign a southern origin to the Prajñāpāramitā. The authenticity of the Prajñāpāramitā should be weighed against the evidence presented here.
points of view are contained, in its entirety, the twelve-membered scriptures (dvādaśāṅga) and the eighty-four thousand baskets of the doctrine (caturśaṅga-dharmapitakakanhasastra). All four points of view are true (satya) and do not contradict one another (ananyonyavapakrtya): in the Buddha-dharma, there are realities of mundane order, realities of individual order, realities of antidotal order and realities of absolute order.

a. What is the mundane point of view (śaṣṭikā saṣṭhita)? Real dharmas resulting from causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamagṛtya) exist, but do not have a nature distinct (bhūnavabhāva) [from these causes and conditions].

Thus the chariot (ratha) exists by the coming together of the pole, the axles, the spokes and the rim of the wheel, but there is no chariot distinct from its constituent parts.

In the same way, the Fākū (Dharmapada) says: “A mind is able to save a mind; another man is able to save a mind; the practice of good and wisdom is the best savior.” The Buddha has said in the Pīng cha wang ying king (Bimbhāśrūjį-pratyayadgamanāstvā): “The ordinary person (prthuagāna) does not listen to the Dharma, the ordinary person is attached to the Āmān.”

However, in the Fā eul ye king (Śūtra of the two nights of the Dharma, or Dharmanārājāvijñayanāstvā), “From the night when he acquired the Path to the night of the parinirvāṇa, every teaching given by the Buddha is true and not false.”

Now if the individual did not usefulness of many people. This is the Buddha Bhagavat.” In the same way, the Fa kiū (Dharmapada) says: “A mind is able to save a mind; another man is able to save a mind; the practice of good and wisdom is the best savior.”

Also, the Buddha has said in the Pīng cha wang ying king (Bimbhāśrūjį-pratyayadgamanāstvā): “The ordinary person (prthuagāna) does not listen to the Dharma, the ordinary person is attached to the Āmān.”

However, in the Fā eul ye king (Śūtra of the two nights of the Dharma, or Dharmanārājāvijñayanāstvā), “From the night when he acquired the Path to the night of the parinirvāṇa, every teaching given by the Buddha is true and not false.”

Now if the individual did not Lav., Muisc, VIII, p. 313; Bodhisattvāvatāra, IX, v. 2. It is also discussed in the Mppū, k. 38, p. 336b. See Ottramare, Théosophie, 1907: 300-303; Lav., Documents d'Élhadharma. Les deux, les quatre, les trois vérités, MCB, V, p. 159-187. - The first three śāḍhītās correspond to the four, the fourth to the absolute truth. Sauvetāsanāya = 1) śāṣṭikā śāṣṭhītā + 2) pratiṣapaunvātta śāṣṭhītā + 3) pratiṣapaunvātta śāṣṭhītā.

Pāramānāthaśāsa = 4) pāramānātha śāṣṭhītā.

To my [Lamotte]’s knowledge, the theory of the four śāḍhītās appears only in the Mppū. However, the Bodh. bhūmi, p. 37, mentions four śātraus or realities and four degrees of knowledge:

1) lokapāpasādhītāvara, common reality, known to the whole world; 2) yadapiṣaṭaśādhītāvara, reality established on proofs, 3) ekāyāvanasavośādhītāvara, the sphere of knowledge free of any obstacle consistently consisting of passion; 4) jñéśvaravānasavośādhītāvara, the sphere of knowledge free of any obstacle to consciousness. For the expressions klesa- and jñéśvara, frequently found in the Vijñānavāda texts, see Triṇikā, v. 15, Samgūth, p. 6, Madhyāvatāvātu, index; Siddhi, p. 366. - It is clear that, under these different names, the four śātras of the Bodh. bhūmi correspond exactly to the four śāḍhītās of the Mppū.

82 When the Buddha speaks of the point of view, the individual, or from the absolute view, the individual is not different from the five skandhas that constitute him. Most of the texts mentioned here are taken from chap. IX of the Kośa, devoted to the refutation of the ārya-buddhi.

83 An allusion to the reply of the nun Vajirāvakṣī to the monk Cāṭakāraṇa in the Kośa, IX, p. 66; Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 137), k. 34, p. 645b18: yañ ca rattim tathāgato....eva hoti mo aññathā.

84 Moreover, a śūtra says: “A person has been born into this world for the joy, happiness and 85 A śūtra says: “A person has been born into this world for the joy, happiness and truly exist, why would the Buddha say [without lying]: "With my divine eye I consider beings"? It must be concluded that the individual does exist, but only from the mundane point of view and not from the absolute point of view.

Question. - The absolute point of view is true (bhūtām satya) and, because it is true, it is called absolute; the other points of view cannot be true.

Answer. - That is not correct. Taken separately, the four points of view are true. The true nature (tathātā), the nature of phenomena (dharma-tā), the summum of existence (bhūta-koti), do not exist from the mundane point of view, but they do exist from the absolute point of view. In the same way, individuals exist from the mundane point of view, but do not exist from the absolute point of view. Why? When the five aggregates (skandha) that are the causes and conditions (hepatrātyaya) for the individual exist, the individual exists. Just as when the color (rūpa), odor (gandha), taste (rasa) and tangible (sprāṣṭrayaya) that are the causes and conditions for milk (kṣīra) exist, the milk exists. If milk did not really exist, the [66u] causes and conditions for milk would not exist either. But since the causes and conditions for milk really do exist, it too must exist.99 Since the causes and conditions for a second head (dvitiya stūra) or a third hand (trītya hastā) do not exist in humans, it is out of the question (prayātipi) for them. Such characteristics (nimittadāna) constitute the mundane point of view.

b. What is the individual point of view (pratipauraskṛtya siddhānta)? It is to preach the doctrine taking into consideration (apekṣya) the state of mind (cittrāpravṛtti) of the individual. The latter understands or does not understand the given subject. Thus a stūra says: "As a result of actions of different retribution (sambhinnavipākakarma), one is reborn in different universes (sambhinna-lokalādhitā), one experiences different contacts (sambhinna-aparastā) and different feelings (sambhinna-vanvedanā)." On the other hand, the Po' k'um na king (Phalgunāstūra) says: "There is no-one who undergoes contact; there is no-one who experiences sensation."91

Question. - How do these two stūras agree?

Answer. - There are people who doubt the hereafter (ānaiva), who do not believe in sin (paśca) or merit (puṇya), who commit evil acts (akātalacarā) and who fall into the wrong view of annihilation (ucchādāṛṣṭi). In order to cut these doubts (sāmyata), to suppress these bad practices and uproot this wrong view of nihilism, the Buddha asserts that a person is reborn in different universes, with different contacts (sparśa) and different sensations (vedaṇa). But Phalguna himself believed in the existence of a soul (ātmā), the existence of the purusa, and had fallen into the wrong view of eternalism (ākalavatātya). He asked the Buddha: "Venerable One (bhaddanta), who is it that experiences sensation?" If the Buddha had replied: "It is such and such (ānaka) a one who experiences sensation", Phalguna would have fallen more deeply into the wrong view of eternalism, his belief in the pudgala (individual) and the ātman (soul) would have grown and been irremediably strengthened. That is why the Buddha, when talking to him, denied that there is a being who feels (vedātā) or a being who touches (sparśiṇa). Characteristics such as these are called the individual point of view.92

Later it was accepted that the Bhagavat teaches by an instantaneous emission of voice (akṣayaguddhāvrama), or even that he does not speak at all (cf. Vasumitra, p. 20; Fo houa yen king, T 279, k. 80, p. 445c; Wei mo kie so choou king, T 475, k. 1, p. 538a; Nīlapanamantava by Nāgājuna, v. 7, in JRAS, 1932, p. 314: nodālītam tuvaḥ… dharmanvareṣu tarpitak; Hoborgiri, p. 215-217; Siddhi, p. 796). The "Sūtra of the two nights" was modified consequently: Madh. vrīt, p. 366, 539: yām ca saṁstamātvarūṭi… na pūrṇāḥkāraṇaḥ. - Palākṣita, p. 419: yaśadhāv tuvaḥ tathāgato… stocarastunivartīnam. - Lāulkottāla, p. 142-143: yām ca rūtraḥ tathāgato… evaṃ naṃ buddhavacanaṃ. 98 The example of milk is repeated in Kośa, IX, p. 239.

92 It is a well-known fact that in his teaching, the Buddha takes into account the intention and state of mind of his questioner. See the interview of the Buddha with Vacchagotta: Saṅyutta, IV, p. 400; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 961), k. 34, p. 245b; T 100 (no. 195), k. 10, p. 444c.

The Buddha refuses to say to Vacchagotta whether the self exists or whether it does not exist. Ānanda asks him the reason. The Buddha explains himself by saying: If, Ānanda, when the wandering monk Vacchagotta asked me: "Does the self exist?", I had answered him: "The self exists", that would have confirmed, Ānanda, the doctrine of the Samanas and the Brāhmans who believe in eternalism. If, Ānanda, when the wandering monk Vacchagotta asked me: "Does the self not exist?", I had answered: "The self does not exist", that would have confirmed the doctrine of the Samanas and the Brāhmans who believe in nihilism. If, Ānanda, when the wandering monk Vacchagotta asked me: "Does the self exist?", I had answered: "The self does not exist", would that have been useful in making the knowledge arise in him that all dharmas are non-self? - "That would not have been so, O Lord." - "If, on the other hand, Ānanda, when the wandering monk Vacchagotta asked me: "Does the self not exist", I had answered: "The self does not exist", would that not have had the result of precipitating the wandering monk Vacchagotta from one misconception into another greater misconception: "My self did not exist previously. And now it does not exist at all."

99 (Kośa, IX, p. 262-4: Why has the Bhagavat not declared that the vital principle (jīva) is the body? Because the Bhagavat takes into consideration the intention (ālaya) of the person who is questioning him. The latter understands by jīva, not an imaginary being, the simple designation of the elements, but an individual, a real living entity, and on thinking of this individual, he asks if the jīva is identical with or different from the body. This jīva does not exist in an absolute manner: it bears no relationship either of identity or difference with what is: the Bhagavat therefore condemns both answers. In the same way, one cannot say that the hairs of the tortoise are hard or soft… Why does the Bhagavat not answer that the jīva does not exist in an absolute way? Again because he takes into account the intention of the questioner. The latter perhaps is asking about the jīva with the idea that the jīva is the series of elements (skandha). If the Bhagavat answered that the jīva does not exist absolutely, the questioner would fall into wrong view. Besides, as the questioner is incapable of understanding dependent arising (pratītyasamutpāda), he is not a suitable receptacle for the holy Dharma: the Bhagavat therefore does not tell him that the jīva exists only as a designation. - Lav. Nīlāvha, p. 118-119: "The scholastic likes to say that the Buddha varied his teaching according to the dispositions of his listeners; that some stūras, of clear meaning (śrūtra), must be understood literally; that other stūras, of implicit and non-inferential meaning (svaydhū) must be interpreted: a convenient hypothesis for the exegetists and legitimate in many cases. The Canon sees in the Buddha a physician, the great physician; the scholastic represents him as an empiricist. The Buddha was afraid lest the common man, reassured on the side of hell, should not commit sin; he wants the wise to learn to divest themselves of all egotism: thus to some he teaches the existence of a self and to others the non-existence of a self. In the same way the tigeress carries her young ones in her jaw: she locks her teeth just enough so that they don't fall - into the heresy of nihilism of the empirical self - but..."
mind (sūkṣma ni puṇapaṇditavijñāvedanīya). If a fool (mūḍha) can barely understand superficial phenomena, how could he understand profound causes and conditions? Then why do you say that the fool should contemplate the law of causes and conditions?

Answer. - The word ‘fool’ does not mean stupid in the manner of an ox (śvala-sāvyūha). The comparison of the tigress is from the Eastern Monachism: Dhammasaṅgīta, chap. XII: "he who voluntarily seek pleasure or are angry with their neighbor, such a contemplation is not good, is not a remedy; it is the contemplation of the disgusting (aśubhābhāvāna) or contemplation of loving-kindness (matirīcchamananipātakā) which would be a good remedy for them. Why? Because these two contemplations are able to uplift the poisonous thorn (vīṣakankalā) of hatred and attachment (rāga). Furthermore, there are beings attached (aabhinnivāyita) to the erroneous thesis of eternalism (nityavipaśyāta), who are ignorant of the series of similar moments (sadarasamantā) that constitute a phenomenon." For such people, contemplation of the transitory nature of the dharmas is therapeutic order (pratītyasamutpādadarśana) is the antidote for mañjuśrī (p. 219-228). Cf. Tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 196-215.

c. The antidotal point of view (pratītyasamutpāda). - There are dharmas that exist as counteragents (pratipakṣa) but do not exist as true natures (bhūtavabhūta). Thus hot (uṣṇa), fatty (medavins), acidic (kātaka), salty (lavasa) plants and foods (osadāḥśākhāvā) are a counteragent in illnesses of wind (vāryovāḍha), but are not a remedy in other sicknesses. Cold (śīla), sweet (madhura), bitter (티ka), acidic (kāraka) plants and foods are a counteragent in illnesses of fire (tejojyovāḍha) but are not a remedy in other illnesses. Acidic (kātaka), bitter (티ka), acidic (kāraka) and hot (uṣṇa) plants and foods are a counteragent for chills (śītavāḍha) but are not a remedy in other illnesses. It is the same in the Buddhadvadhara, to remedy sickness of the mind (cittavajñā). Contemplation of the disgusting (aśubhābhāvāna)94 is a good counteragent (kuṣala pratipakṣadhāma) in the sickness of attachment (rāgayovāḍha); it is not good (kuṣala) in the sickness of hatred (dveṣayovāḍha) and it is not a remedy (pratipakṣadhāma). Why? Aśubhābhāvāna is the contemplation of bodily defects (kāyadosapariṣkāśa); if a hateful man contemplates the faults of his enemy, he increases the flame of his hatred. - Meditation on loving-kindness (matirīcchamanāskāra) is a good remedy in the sickness of hatred (dveṣayovāḍha); it is not good, not a remedy, in the sickness of attachment (rāgayovāḍha). Why? Loving-kindness (matirīcchamanāskāra) is consistent with seeking reasons for love and contemplating their qualities (gana). If a person full of attachment seeks the reasons for love and contemplates the qualities [of the person whom he loves], he increases his attachment (rāga). - The contemplation of causes and conditions (hetupratītyasamutpāda) is a good counteragent in the sickness of delusion (mohayovāḍha); it is not good, not a remedy, in the sickness of hatred (uṣṇaḥ) and attachment (rāgadveṣayovāḍha). Why? Because it is as a result of previous wrong contemplation (dūravānityakarīṇa) that wrong view (mithyadṛṣṭi) arises. Wrong view is delusion (moha).95

Question. - In the Buddhadvadhara it is said that the twelve causes and conditions (hetupratisagga) are profound (gambhīrā). Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: "This dependent arising (pratītyasamutpāda) is profound (gambhīrā), difficult to see (śīrās), difficult to understand (dvaravādhoda), difficult to discover (dvarasanabhosa), difficult to penetrate (dvaradīghamaṇa), knowable only by a sage of subtle and skillful mind (sīkṣama ni puṇapaṇditavijñāvedanīya).96 If a fool (mūḍha) can barely understand superficial phenomena, how could he understand profound causes and conditions? Then why do you say that the fool should contemplate the law of causes and conditions?

Answer. - The word ‘fool’ does not mean stupid in the manner of an ox (śvala-sāvyūha). The comparison of the tigress is from the Eastern Monachism: Dhammasaṅgīta, chap. XII: "he who voluntarily seek pleasure or are angry with their neighbor, such a contemplation is not good, is not a remedy; it is the contemplation of the disgusting (aśubhābhāvāna) or contemplation of loving-kindness (matirīcchamananipātakā) which would be a good remedy for them. Why? Because these two contemplations are able to uplift the poisonous thorn (vīṣakankalā) of hatred and attachment (rāga). Furthermore, there are beings attached (aabhinnivāyita) to the erroneous thesis of eternalism (nityavipaśyāta), who are ignorant of the series of similar moments (sadarasamantā) that constitute a phenomenon." For such people, contemplation of the transitory nature of the dharmas is therapeutic order (pratītyasamutpāda) is the antidote for mañjuśrī (p. 219-228). Cf. Tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 196-215.

93 For pathogenesis and medical practices, see Hobgolint, Blh, p. 249-262.
95 The ideas expressed in this line are repeated and developed by Śantideva in his Śikṣasamuccaya, chap. XII: Contemplation of the horrible (aśubhābhāvāna) is the antidote (pratipakṣa) for rāga (p. 206-212); loving-kindness (matirī) is the remedy for hatred (p. 212-219); the analysis of dependent-arising (pratītyasamutpadadaranīya) is the antidote for mahānīṣaya (p. 210-228). Cf. Tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 196-215.
96 The words addressed by the Buddha to Ānanda are, rather: gambhīrā cāyaṁ ānanda paticcasamuddāpā gambhīrabhūvāhā ca: cf. Santsutt, II, p. 92; Digha, II, p. 55; Tīrīng a han, T 1 (no. 13), k. 10, p. 680b10; Jin po yu cheng, T 14, p. 342a; Tīrīng a han, T 16 (no. 97), k. 24, p. 578b; Taención, T 52, p. 844b. - The more developed formula, given by the Mīśī, was pronounced by the Tathāgata at the foot of the Aśīḷānāgonadhā tree, after his enlightenment: Vinaya, I, p. 4; Dīgha, II, p. 36; Mahājīna, I, p. 167; Santsutt, I, p. 136, etc.: adhīgato kho me avam dharmo gambhīra ṭhādayā svavādaṃ svādumbhā saṃpiṇṭo atākāvikero nīpaṇaṃ paṇḍitavaddanto. - The Sanskrit phrase is longer and shows less uniformity; it occurs in Mahāvīra, III, p. 314, l. 15; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 2914-2927; Lalitavistara, p. 392; Divya, p. 492 (which is very close to the Pāli): gambhīrā me dhamma gambhīrabhūvāhā dūrdhāvādumbhā tārō ṭhādayāvādum bhā sūkṣma ni puṇapaṇditavijñāvedanīya.
97 In other words, they ignore the momentary nature of the dharmas (dhammasakārās). According to the Buddhism of the Lesser Vehicle, the phenomenon persists from instant to instant and is reborn, similar to itself, from moment to moment. It thus appears as a series (sāntāna, prabhāna) of similar moments (sāntāna). The Saṃvādaśa-\dha-Vaibhūika and the Saṃāntāka schools debate on the duration of the kāraṇa and on the evolution of the sāntāna (Karmasāntāna-prakaraṇa, Introduction, p. 1-30).
98 Madh. kāekā, XXIII, 13, p. 460; Tīrīng a han, T 1564, k. 4, p. 31c10; Pan jo teng loun che, T 1566, k. 14, p. 123a6: anitāya nitya ity evam gṛhiḥ viparayasyah // anityam vidyate śāte gṛhiḥ viparayasyah //
Question. - All conditioned phenomena (samskṛta) have a transitory (anitya) nature: that is an absolute mark. Why do you say that the transitory is unreal (asaṣṭaya)? Conditioned dharmas (samskṛta), by virtue of the marks of arising (upādā), duration (sthiti) and cessation (bhāṅga), first arise, then last, and finally perish; why do you say that the transitory is unreal?

Answer. - Conditioned dharmas cannot have these three marks (laikaṇa). Why? Because these three marks are not real. If birth, duration and cessation were marks of the conditioned, these three marks would equally have to be present at the arising of the conditioned, for arising is a mark of the conditioned. In the same way, these three marks each would equally have to be present separately everywhere, which would be absurd. It would be the same for duration and cessation. Since birth, duration and cessation, taken separately, do not each [and per modum unius] have birth-duration-cessation, they cannot be called marks of the conditioned (samskṛtalakṣana). Why? Because the marks of conditioned dharmas do not exist. Consequently, the transitory nature of dharmas is not of the absolute order.

Furthermore, if every real entity (bhātāsvabhāvā) were transitory (anitya), retribution of actions (karmavipāka) could not take place. Why? Because transitoriness is the cessation after arising. Just as a rotten seed (pitikā bija) [66] cannot produce a fruit (phala), thus there would be no action (karma) and, the act not existing, how could there be retribution (vipāka)? Now every good doctrine (āryadharma) accepts retribution. That which should be believed by a person of good knowledge (kañcihālajñāna) should not be denied. Therefore the dharmas are not transitory. For innumerable reasons of this kind, we say that the transitoriness of the dharmas cannot be affirmed. [What is said here about the alleged transitory characteristic of the dharmas] is also true for their nature of suffering (duḥkha), of non-self (anūtma), etc. 102 Characteristics of this kind are called the therapeutic point of view.

d. The absolute point of view (pāramārthikasaddhānā). - Every essence (dharmatā), every category of speech (upadeśihādhirūpa), every dharma and adharma, may be subdivided (sabhūta), broken into pieces (bhūta) and scattered (prakṛti), one after the other. But the true dharma (bhātādharma), the domain (gocara) of the buddhas, prayakabadhas and arhats cannot be broken apart nor scattered. That which has not been understood (tong) in the preceding points of view is completely understood here. What is meant by ‘understood’? By ‘understood’ is meant the absence of any defect (sarvadvaśivasamyoga), unchangeability (aparīnatārtha), invincibility (ājeyṛtva). Why? Because if one deviates from the absolute point of view, the other teachings (upadeśa), the other points of view (saddhāna) are all destroyed. Some stanzas in the Tīhong yi king (Aṣṭaragavya sūtra) [104] say:

101 For Buddhists, belief in the after-life and the retribution of actions is the corner-stone of morality. Negation of good and evil is the wrong view (mī�yaḍyēṣa) by excellence (Koša, IV, p. 36, 137, 167). - On the other hand, the Buddha recognized the jātis, worshippers of fire, and admitted them without nucivice (parivivā) "because they believe in karma" (Vinaya, I, p. 71).

102 All dharmas are transitory (anicia), perishable (vyāśadhānā), non-self (anatā) and of suffering (duḥkha). Cf. Samyutta, II, p. 44 (the corresponding Sanskrit of which may be found in JRAS, 1913, p. 573, and the Chinese version in Tsa a han, T' 99 (no. 84), k. 3, p. 21c): rāpaṃ bhātikāvaso anvicanto... anuvardha āsavoḥ. - Other references in Rhyos Davids - Stede, s. v. saṃkāra, in fine.

103 Expressions to designate the absolute are not lacking in Buddhist texts. Lav. in Siddhi, p. 748-750 cites some lists which are given here:

1) Ta pan jo mi ti ko king T 220, k. 360, p. 853c:10; tathāt, dharmatā; avikāratah, avikāratabhātāt, avikāratah, aviktāt; dhammaniyam, dharmaśāhāti, akśamādhi, bhātāsahāti, avikāratabhātentaye.

2) Patilīkā, p. 421: bodhiḥ buddhatvam ekālavesāvatbhāvāvikkāt... saṃsṛṣṭi upālāvabhāvāvikkāte.

4) All these words are repeated and defined in the Vījñānavādin treatises. Madhyāntnavihāra, p. 49-51: tathāt bhātāsahāti cintāmin tam... - Sattiiṃgha, p. 121: pratyavacitādha, tathāt, śāhātya, bhātāsahāti, animitta, paramārthā, dhammadhatu; - Tsa ni liu, T' 3000, k. 2, p. 702b: tathāt, nāritīlānya, śāhātya, animitta, bhātāsahāti, paramārthā, dhammadhatu; - Po ti kung king, T' 1530, k. 7, p. 323c:24, tathāt, dhammadhatu, tattva and bhāvā, śāhātya and avikāratah, bhātāsahāti, paramārthā.

104 These Arthavargyau sutrāni, Aṭṭhakavagga in Pāli, constitute one of the earliest of the primitive Buddhist documents.

In Pāli, the Aṭṭhakavagga "Section of the Eight" is a group of sixteen sūtras forming the fourth chapter of the Suttanipāta, which itself is the fifteenth work of the Khuddakakārika, fourth and last collection of the Suttaπāta (cf. Winternitz,}
Being based on wrong views (dyṣṭi)
And on futile nonsense (prapañca), each one gives rise to quarrels (vivāda).
Seeing the arising of all that
Is the correct view of knowledge.
If the refusal to accept the system of another (paradharmā)
Is the action of a fool (bāla),
Then all the teachers (apadeśīn)
Are, in truth, fools.

[61a] If being based on personal views
In order to produce futile nonsense
Constituted pure knowledge,

There would be no-one of impure knowledge.105
In these three stanzas, the Buddha is concerned with the absolute point of view.
[First stanza]. - It is said that ordinary people depend on wrong views (dyṣṭi), on systems (dharmas), on theories (upadeśas) and therefore stir up quarrels (vivādas). Futile nonsense (prapañca) is the origin of quarrels and futile nonsense gives birth to wrong views (dyṣṭi). A stanza says:
Because one adopts systems, there are quarrels.
If no-one accepted anything, what could they discuss?
By accepting or rejecting 'views'
People are all divided.
The yogin who knows this does not accept any system (dharmas), does not accept any nonsense (prapañcas), adheres to nothing and believes in nothing.106 Not really taking part in any discussion

---

105 These stanzas probably mean: (1) The real truth consists of not adhering to any system, in not entering into any aulochical quarrel. - (2) Indeed, all the teachers are fools: they treat as fools those who do not accept their ideas and themselves are treated as fools by their adversaries. - (3) All claim to have found the truth and, if they were to be believed, in the world there would be only impeccable philosophical systems.

These three stanzas roughly correspond to the first five strophes of the Cūḷavīhāra, the twelfth sutta of the Athakavagga (Suttanipāta, v. 878-882, tr. Faure, p. 167-168; tr. R. Chalmers, Buddha’s Teachings, Cambridge M, 1932, p. 211). The Pāli text differs considerably from the citation of the Mppī given here, as well as the Chinese translation of Tehe k’ien in T 198, k. 2, p. 182a-b).

(1) 5aham sāham...āchati do.
(2) Evam pī vāpyoḥya...mahākṣa vādām.
(3) Parassā ce dhammaṃ...ime dhīhiparābhasānā.
(4) Sandhībhavīce pama...pi sattā samuñāt.
(5) Na vākham etam...ti param dhamanti.

Transl. The Disciple. - (1) Fixed in personal views, many [masters], quarrelling amongst themselves, affirm that they are [the only] wise ones [and say]: "Those who accept that understand the [true] doctrine; those who reject that are imperfect." - (2) Quarrelling thus, they debate and say: "My adversary is a fool, an ignoramus." Then what is the true doctrine among all of these, because all these [masters] claim to be [the only] wise ones?

The Buddha. - (3) If he who does not recognize the doctrine of his adversary is a fool, an inferior being of little intelligence, then all of these [masters] are fools of little intelligence, [for] all hold to their own [personal] views. (4) Or, if they are truly purified by their own views, if they are of pure intellect, wise and mindful, no-one among them is of little intelligence for their views are equally perfect. - (5) But I do not call 'realism' that which these fools say to one another. They make the truth of their own view; that is why they treat their adversary as a fool.

106 The horror of the Buddha and his disciples for any argument, more pretended than real, is well known: Suttanipāta, v. 897: yād kāc' imdhammatā...khattim akabhamino. - Sanskrit text in Bodh. bhāmi, p.48-49: yād kācana samayatā...kātīm asamakavatā. - Tr.: The Muni does not take up the opinions that are current in the world, for he is independent. How could the person who feels no attraction to what he sees and hears submit himself?
(vivāda), he knows the taste of the ambrosia (amṛitarasa) of the Budhadharma. To act otherwise is to reject the doctrine.

[Second stanza]. - If all of those who do not accept the systems of others (paradharma), who do not know them and who do not adopt them, were ignoramuses, then all the masters (apadeśin) would be ignoramuses. Why? Because, taken individually, each one reject the systems of his neighbors [to adhere to his own]. Actually, a system that affirms itself to be absolutely pure (paramārthakusala) is denigrated by others as being impure. Such, for example, are the mundane penal laws (dāndha-dharma), by virtue of which executioners carry out punishments (danda), executions (vadhā) and impurities (aisbhā) of all kinds.107

Worldly people accept them and hold them to be absolutely pure, whereas others, pravrajitas and layas, consider them to be impure. According to the ecstasies of the tīrthikas and the pravrajitas, one stays between five fires, one stands on one leg, one tears out one's hair, etc.108 - What the Ni K'ien ts'eu (Nirgranthaputras) hold as reasonable, other people call foolishness. In the various systems of the Buddhists, pravrajitas, śvetātmanas, śrāvakaśramaṇam, etc., each considers good what his neighbor denigrates. - In the Buddhist system as well, there are Tou ts'eu (Vatsiputrya) būkas who say: "Just as there is a dharma 'eye' (daikṣara) by the coming together of the four great elements (catutramahābhātasamāyoga), so there is a dharma 'individual' (pudgala)109 from the coming together of the five aggregates (pañcaśaṅkhāramāyoga).

In the Tou ts'eu a pî t'an (Vatsiputryabhādharma) it is said: 'The five aggregates (skandha) are not separate from the pudgala and is not separate from the five aggregates. It cannot be said that the five aggregates are the pudgala nor that there is a pudgala apart from the five aggregates. The pudgala is a fifth category, an ineffable (avaktavya) dharma, contained in the piṭaka.'110 The adepts of the Chouo yi ts'ie yean (Sarvāvata) say: "The five aggregates are either (anupanna), non-destroyed (aniruddha), empty (śūnyatā) and non-existent (akṣayatā). They are non-existent like the horns of [61b] a hare (śaśāvijñā) or the hair of a tortoise (kārmaroman)."111 All these 107 The Vāsūtuśāstra dharma has been lost, if the Mūsa is to be believed (below, k. 2, p. 70a), at least imosaf as it here concerns the Śiśāputrādharma, T 1548, particularly respected by theVatsiputryas. - But the text cited here is found in the San mi t'o pou louen, T 1649, k. 1, p. 465b29: It cannot be said that the skandha and the ītman are different or non-different... The ītman also is ineffable (avaktavya). - Kośa, IX, p. 232: The Vatsiputryas accept a pudgala that is neither identical with the elements nor other than the elements: ibid. p. 237. The Vatsiputrya maintains that the pudgala is ineffable (avaktavya) concerning its relationship, identity or non-identity, with the elements... He distinguishes five categories of phenomena capable of being cognized (pāthaśivāda ṣārayam {1-3} conditioned phenomena (samāvīś) or, in other words, past, present and future phenomena; (4) non-caused phenomena (avatāra), (5) the ineffable or pudgala. - Madh. avatāra, p. 268: Some maintain the real existence of a pudgala in which one cannot say that it is identical with the skandhas or different from the skandhas, permanent or impermanent; it is cognized by the six vījñā; it is the object of the concept of self.

111 The Sarvāstivādin doctrine is that the self is merely a designation of the series of elements and a self does not exist in it. No proof, no evidence of proof, no evidence of induction, establishes the existence of a self independent of these elements. That which in common language is called soul, self, vital principle, person, is merely a series (sāmāna, sámāri), of which the elements are in the relationship of cause and effect, subject to the law of causality (pratyayasamāpāṇa). This solution, outlined in the Canon, Dīgha, III, p. 105 (cittamāna), Saṃyutta, III, p. 143 (samāna), was adopted and developed by all the schools of the Lesser Vehicle which reject belief in a pudgala and profess naivāya. For the school of the Pāli language and its doctrine of bhavaṅga, an explanation and some references will be found in Samgagala, p. 8-10. For the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣika's series on the one hand and the Sautrāntika's series on the other hand, consult Kośa, IX, p. 185: good resume in Lav., Morav., p. 196-200: Karmasiddhiṣṭakarána, Intro., p. 15, 23-27.

110 The Āyavada's Po louen, T 1569, k. 1, p.168b. - Several sūtras inform us about the ascetic practices at the time of the Buddha, e.g., Majjhima (no. 12), I, p.68-83; (no. 14), I, p. 91-95. Lav. Histoire, I, p.290-314, has an important chapter on Hindu asceticism, mendicant and monastic life and the sects of the Buddhist epoch.

teachers boast about their own system but reject that of others: they say: "This is true, the rest is false (idam eva saccaṃ mohgam aṭṭhānā)." It is their own system that they accept, it is their own system that they respect (piṭṭhavanti), it is their own system that they practice (bhāvavanti). As for the system of another, they do not accept it, they do not respect it: they criticize it.

[Third stanza]. - If by the sole fact of having a system of their own these teachers were pure and attained to the absolute, then there would not be any impure teachers, for they are all of them attached to a system.

Question. - If the views (dhyāṇa) are all false, what is the absolute point of view (pāramāṇārtha śiddhānta)?

Answer. - It is the path that transcends all discourse (sarvaśākṣaśīlāvādha), the arrest and destruction of the functioning of the mind (citupavavattitthitavodha), the absence of any support (anārāyaṇa), the non-declaration of the dharmas (dharmanām anārāyaṇanām), the true nature of the dharmas (dharmanām satyacakṣaṇam), the absence of beginning, middle and end (anādhinādyānta), indestructibility (ākṣavaya), inalterability (arvparśāmavatā). That is what is called the absolute point of view. It is said in the Mo ho yen yi kie (Mahāyāṁmārthakhāṭa):

The end of discourse,
The arrest of the functioning of the mind,
Non-arising and non-destruction,
Dharmas similar to nirvāṇa.

Speaking about subjects promoting action (abhisamākāśāhita):
Those are mundane systems.

Speaking about subjects promoting non-action (anabhisaṃkāśāhinta):
That is the absolute system.

Everything is true, everything is false,
Everything is both true and false at the same time,
Everything is both false and true at the same time.

That is the true nature of the dharmas.

In various sūtras of this kind, it is said that the absolute point of view (pāramāṇārtha śiddhānta) has a profound (gambhīra) meaning, it is said that the absolute point of view (dharvabuddha). The Buddha preaches the Mahāprajāpāramāṇātsūtra to explain [this meaning].

17. Furthermore, the Buddha has preached the Mahāprajāpāramāṇātsūtra because he wanted the brahma-octet Tekhāung tchao (Dīghānākha) and other great masters (upadeśācārya), e.g., Sīla ni p'o t'o k'iu to lo (Sīnāka Vasūtra), Tso t'o k'iu ti lo (Vacchagottasa) to have faith (śraddhā) in the Buddha and his teachings. These great masters of Ten feu s'i (Jambudvīpa) said that all the treatises can be refuted, all the confused affirmations (vāda) and all the twisted beliefs (grāha), and consequently, there is no true religion deserving of belief (śraddhā) or respect (arcana, satkāra).

116 For the names of the absolute, see above.

117 Cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 369: "sarvam tathāyaṃ na vā tathāyaṃ...eṣaḥ buddhām uśāsanaṃ."
Thus the Chô lî fou pen mo king (Śāriputrāvadānasūtra) says: Śāriputra's uncle (mātula), called Mo ho kiu ntch'ei lo (Mahākauṭṭhila), in a [learned] discussion with his sister Chô lî (Śrī), reflected thus: “My sister is not very strong; she may become pregnant with a sage (jātini) who would borrow her mother’s mouth in order to speak. If he is wise before he is even born, what will he be like after birth when he is grown up?” This thought hurt his pride (abhādāna) and, in order to increase his knowledge, he left home and became a brahmācārin. He went to southern India (daksitāpatha) and began to study the great treatises (āṭstra). People asked him:

[61c] “Brahmacārin, what are you looking for, what are you studying?” Dīrghanakha (Kauṭṭhila’s surname) replied: “I want to study the eighteen great treatises in depth.” They replied: “If you would dedicate your whole life to understand a single one, then how would you ever come to the end of all of them?” Dīrghanakha said to himself: “Previously, I acted out of [injured] pride because I was outshone by my sister; again today these men are covering me with shame (paralajjā). For two reasons, I take an oath henceforth not to cut my nails (saṅkha) before I have exhausted the eighteen treatises.”124 Seeing his long nails, people called him the brahmācārin ‘Long Nails’ (dīrghanakha). By the wisdom that he derived from treatises of all kinds, this man refuted (neighnāti) by every means Dharma and Adharma, compulsory and optional, true and false, being and non-being. He confounded the knowledge of his neighbors (parapadesa). Like an enraged mighty elephant (gaja) whose raging trampling cannot be directed, the brahmācārin Dīrghanaka, having triumphed (abhībhavati) over all the teachers by the power of his knowledge, returned to Mo Kie (Magadha), to Wang chō (Rājagaha) in the public square (naranigama). Having come to his birthplace, he asked people: “Where is my nephew (bhāgīneya) now?” They said to him: “From the age of eight years, your nephew has exhausted the study of all the treatises (āṭstra).”125 When he was sixteen, his learning triumphed (abhībhavati) over everybody. But a monk of the Che clan (Śākya), called Kiu t'ān (Gautama) made him his disciple. “At this news, filled with scorn (abhādānā) and disbelief (dāraddhā), Dīrghanaka exclaimed: ‘If my nephew is so intelligent (medhāvī), by what trick (vulcana) has this Gautama succeeded in shaving his head for him and in making him his disciple?’ Having said this, he went at once to the Buddha.

At that moment, having been ordained a fortnight ago (ardham-sopasampanna), Chô lî fou (Śrīputra) was standing behind the Buddha, fan in hand (vyujanayugrastha), fanning the Buddha. The brahmācārin Dīrghanaka saw the Buddha and having exchanged salutations with him (kauṭṭhila), reflected thus: “My kauṭṭhila (Mahākauṭṭhila) was this Gautama able to win over my nephew?” Having reflected thus, he said to the Buddha: “Gautama, no thesis is acceptable to me (suvam me na kumatur).” The Buddha said to Dīrghanaka: “No thesis is acceptable to you; then even this view is not acceptable to you?” The Buddha meant: You have already drunk the poison of false views (mithādyāsīva). Now expel the traces of this poison (vivāsānā). You say that no thesis is pleasing to you, but this view does not please you? - Then, like a fine horse (aśvā) which, on seeing the shadow of the whip (kāsākāla), rouses itself and goes back to the proper route, in the face of this shadow of the whip that is the Buddha's speech (buddavac), the brahmācārin Dīrghanaka collected himself and laid aside (nirjarati) all pride (dārava).”127 Shameful (lājjamadā) and with drooping head (adhomukha) he thought: “The Buddha is inviting me to choose nails, people called him the brahmācārin ‘Long Nails’ (dīrghanakha). By the wisdom that he derived from treatises of all kinds, this man refuted (neighnāti) by every means Dharma and Adharma, compulsory and optional, true and false, being and non-being. He confounded the knowledge of his neighbors (parapadesa). Like an enraged mighty elephant (gaja) whose raging trampling cannot be directed, the brahmācārin Dīrghanaka, having triumphed (abhībhavati) over all the teachers by the power of his knowledge, returned to Mo Kie (Magadha), to Wang chō (Rājagaha) in the public square (naranigama). Having come to his birthplace, he asked people: “Where is my nephew (bhāgīneya) now?” They said to him: “From the age of eight years, your nephew has exhausted the study of all the treatises (āṭstra).”125 When he was sixteen, his learning triumphed (abhībhavati) over everybody. But a monk of the Che clan (Śākya), called Kiu t’ān (Gautama) made him his disciple. “At this news, filled with scorn (abhādānā) and disbelief (dāraddhā), Dīrghanaka exclaimed: ‘If my nephew is so intelligent (medhāvī), by what trick (vulcana) has this Gautama succeeded in shaving his head for him and in making him his disciple?’ Having said this, he went at once to the Buddha.

At that moment, having been ordained a fortnight ago (ardham-sopasampanna), Chô lî fou (Śrīputra) was standing behind the Buddha, fan in hand (vyujanayugrastha), fanning the Buddha. The brahmācārin Dīrghanaka saw the Buddha and having exchanged salutations with him (kauṭṭhila), reflected thus: “My kauṭṭhila (Mahākauṭṭhila) was this Gautama able to win over my nephew?” Having reflected thus, he said to the Buddha: “Gautama, no thesis is acceptable to me (suvam me na kumatur).” The Buddha said to Dīrghanaka: “No thesis is acceptable to you; then even this view is not acceptable to you?” The Buddha meant: You have already drunk the poison of false views (mithādyāsīva). Now expel the traces of this poison (vivāsānā). You say that no thesis is pleasing to you, but this view does not please you? - Then, like a fine horse (aśvā) which, on seeing the shadow of the whip (kāsākāla), rouses itself and goes back to the proper route, in the face of this shadow of the whip that is the Buddha's speech (buddavac), the brahmācārin Dīrghanaka collected himself and laid aside (nirjarati) all pride (dārava).”127 Shameful (lājjamadā) and with drooping head (adhomukha) he thought: “The Buddha is inviting me to choose say that Dīrghanaka, while still in the world (gesshu) loved to play the guitar (hien kouan); later, when he became a monk, he remained attached to his long nails and did not cut them. Yet other masters say that he was a member of those religious heretics who keep their nails. That is why he was called the brahmācārin ‘Long Nails’. According to the Avadānasūtra, II, p. 187, Śrīputra, at the age of sixteen years, had studied the grammar of Indra (aṇdru vidyāram).

126 The intention of the Buddha is to lead Dīrghanaka to abandon his opinion without adopting another. This is very clear in the Dīrghanakhasutta and the Avadānasūtra, I. c e.

127 An allusion to a stanza of the Dhammapada, v, 144, Sanskrit Udānavarga, p. 240: bhādrot yathāvah kākāyābhīoti...prajāhati dakkham.
between two contradictions (nigrahasthāna).128 If I say that this view pleases me, that is a gross (ausārīka) nigrasāhāna which is familiar to many people. Why then did I say that no thesis is pleasing to me?129 If I adopted this view, that would be a manifest lie (mâyâyūda), a gross nigrasāhāna known to many people. The second nigrasāhāna is more subtle (śikṣāsu); I will adopt it because fewer people know it.130

Having reflected thus, he said to the Buddha: "Gautama, no thesis is agreeable to me, and even this view does not please me." The Buddha said to the brahmachārin: "Nothing pleases you, and even this view does not please you! Then, by accepting nothing, you are no different from a crowd of people. Why do you puff yourself up and develop such pride?" The brahmachārin Dīghanakha did not know what to answer and acknowledged that he had fallen into a nigrasāhāna. He paid homage to the omniscience (suravajñāna) of the Buddha and attained faith (śraddhācittina). He thought: "I have fallen into a nigrasahāna. The Bhagavat did not make known my embarrassment. He did not say that it was wrong, he did not give his advice. The Buddha has a kind disposition (nispacitina). Completely pure (parumaviśuddha), he suppresses all subjects of debate (abhīlāpasthāna); he has attained the great and profound Dharma (mahāgambhiśradhāma); he is worthy of respect (aravinda). The purity of his mind (cittaviśuddhī) is absolute (parama)."

And as the Buddha, by preaching the doctrine to him, had cut through his wrong views (mityādṛṣṭi), Dīghanakha at once became free of dust (vīraṣa) and defilements (vīgamana) and acquired the perfectly pure (viśuddha) Dharma-eye (dhammacakrakāsa). Also at that moment, Sāriputra, who had been following this conversation, became an arhat.129 The brahmachārin Dīghanakha left home (pravrajya) and became a monk (ivamana); he became a very powerful arhat. If the brahmachārin Dīghanakha had not heard the Prajñāpāramitā preached, the powerful doctrine excluding the four alternatives (citthukotikavajra)130 and dealing with the absolute (paramārthahasamprayaṣa), he would not have had faith. How then would he ever have been able to gather the fruit of the religious life (pravrajimārgaphala)? Therefore it is in order to convert the great teachers (upadesacārya) and men of sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendrīya) that the Buddha preaches the Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra.

18. Furthermore, the Buddhās have two ways of preaching the Dharma: [sometimes] they take into account (apokasante) the minds (citta) of their listeners and adapt themselves to the beings to be converted (vaśeyuḥ), [sometimes] they have in view only [the object of their sermon], the nature (laksana) of the [69b] dharmas. Hence, the Buddha preaches the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra in order to speak about the true nature of the dharmas. Thus it is said in the chapter of the Śang pavāng (Laksanakānakaparivarta) that the gods (deva) asked the Buddha: "This Prajñāpāramitā is profound (gambhirā); what is its nature (laksana)?" The Buddha replied to the gods: "It is empty (śūnya). It has as its nature existence and non-existence

128 The nigrasahānas, faults against logic, were catalogued by the Buddhist logicians; see, e.g., a list of 22 nigrasahānas in Tarkālaṃkāra, Tucci, Pre-Dōkyō, p. 33-40.

129 Cf. Avadānaśāstra, p. 194: atibhāyanatā Śāriṇiprasauṣijām...dhammacakrav upaṇam.

130 Th teaching that excludes the four alternatives which establishes the four-branched syllogism: "Nothing whatsoever arises, whether of itself, or of other, or of both, or without any cause." This negativity which characterizes the Madhyamaka (cf. Keith, Buddhist Philosophy, p. 237-241; Lavoie, Madhyamaka, p. 19) has already been presented by Sāriputra in the canonical scriptures: Samyutta, II, p. 112-115; Tsa a han, Y 99 (no. 288), k. 12, p. 8-1a-c.

131 This quotation is taken from the Paićavāniṣṭa, T 220, k. 510, p. 694c (of vol VII), T 221, k. 11, p. 77b; T 223, k. 14, p. 325b.

132 The Sāṃkhya-nirvacanacāra, IV, enumerates a whole series of subjects leading to discussion (e.g., the nature of the skandhas, dhātu, ayatanas; the scope of the Buddhist truths). Those who debate such subjects are ignorant that "the absolute is subtle, profound, difficult to understand and everywhere has the same taste (śarvasalakṣaṇa)."

133 The Vajraśekhara, p. 22, expresses the same idea in different words: yevaḥ sahāte laukarasnamsantat-thāthāgato ducitayah. -Tr. - O Subhūti, where there is a seat of characteristics, there is a lie; where there is no seat of characteristics, there is no lie; that is why the Tathāgata must be defined by the absence of characteristics.

134 The distinction between good (kuśala) and bad (akusala) dharmas is frequent in the Buddhist canon. The Abhidharma also distinguishes non-defined (avyākāta) dharmas which are neither good nor bad. Cf. Dhammasaṅgani, p. 1; Viśuddha, p. 180; Nettipakarana, p. 191; Mādāla, p. 12. Other references in Geiger, Pāli Dhamma, p. 105-113.
the same for the other categories of three dharmas: 1) dharmas of the disciples (śaikṣa), masters (aśaikṣa) and those who are neither disciples nor masters (naiśaikṣaśaikṣa),\textsuperscript{135} 2) dharmas to be abandoned by seeing the truths (darśanahāya), dharmas to be abandoned by meditation (bhikṣavanahāya) and the Dharma which is not to be abandoned (abhaya);\textsuperscript{136} 3) visible dharmas that offer resistance (saṁdarśanāntarajñātīha), visible dharmas that do not offer resistance (saṁdarśanānāntarajñātīha), invisible dharmas that do not offer resistance (saṁdarśanānāntarajñātīha).\textsuperscript{137} 4) lower, middling and superior dharmas; 5) small, great, immense dharmas, etc.

Furthermore, in other stūtras it is a question of the four applications of mindfulness (smṛtyupasthāna) conforming to the teachings (dharmaparyāya) of the śrāvakas.\textsuperscript{138} During this application, the bhikṣu considers (asampayuyati) the thirty-six substances (dravya) of his own body (ādhyatmikākaya) and expels the sickness of attachment (vāsaryādi), then he considers the body of another (bhūbyākaya) in the same way, and finally both his own body and that of another (ādhyatmikābhūbyākaya). Here, in relation to the four smṛtyupasthānas, the Buddha wishes to preach the Prajñāpāramitā by analogy.\textsuperscript{139} Thus he said: "In considering his own (gṛha) body, the bodhisattva produces no notion of body (kāsyasamjñā), does not grasp at the body, for the body does not exist. By considering in the same way the body of another, then both his own body and the body of another, he produces no notion of body, does not grasp at the body, for the body does not exist. In the course of kāsyasamjñā, he considers the body without producing the notion of body: this is very difficult to do. It is the same for the other three smṛtyupasthānas, [application of mindfulness of] sensation (vedanā), mind and dharmas." It is the same for the four correct practices (samyakpradhāna), the four foundations of miraculous powers (āryāsiddhi), the four dhyānas, the four truths (ṣatya) and all other groups of four dharmas.

Furthermore, in other stūtras, the Buddha spoke of the transitory nature (anitiya), the suffering (dukkha) nature, the empty (śūnya) nature and the non-substantial (anamika) nature of the five aggregates (skandha). Here he wishes to preach the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśrutra in analogy with the five skandhas.

135 Dhammasaṅgāni, p. 318-155; Kośa, VI, p. 231.
136 In Pāli: dassanaṃ pahātabhāb, bhāvanāṃ pahātabhāb, neva dassanaṃ na bhāvanāṃ pahātabhāb, Dhammasaṅgāni, no. 1002, 1007, 1008, p. 183-183; Viabhūga, p. 12, 126, 97; Kośa, p. 78.
137 Kośa, I, p. 51.
138 The four smṛtyupasthānas play an important part in the canonical scriptures: Diṅgha, II, p. 290 (tr. Rh. D., II, p. 322-326); Majjhima, I, p. 56, II, p. 11; Sānuyutta, V, p. 9, 14, 142; Aṭṭhānāta, I, p. 39, 296; II, p. 256; III, p. 450, IV, p. 300, 457: idha bhikkhave kāye...dhammatamo dharmajñātītaḥ. - Sanskrit phrase in R. Pischel, Bruchstücke des Sanskritkanons aus Jayakārī, SPAW, XXV, 1904, p. 1143. - Chinese versions, e.g., Tc hong a han, T 26 (no. 98), k. 24, p. 582b; Ta a han, T 99 (no. 623), k. 24, p. 174a; Taeng yi a han, T 125, k. 5, p. 566a. - The smṛtyupasthānas have been studied in detail in the Abhidharma: Aungh, Compendium, p. 79; Viabhūga, p. 239-266; A pī t'ān pu kiu sou louen, T 1543, k. 29, p. 905-908; A pī t'ān ma fo tühe louen, T 1544, k. 19, p. 1072-1074; A pī t'ān ma fo fa yun tiou louen, T 1537, k. 5-6, p. 475-479; Pi pū cha, T 1545, k. 187-192, p. 936-960; Kośa, VI, p. 158-162.
139 Lamotte gives 'equivalence'. Monier-Williams gives 'to approach from, to come near' for the root pary-yā.
140 E.g., in Sānuyutta, III, p. 44: āpyām bhikkhave aniccam...ma as anāti. Corresponding Sanskrit passage in JRAS, 1913, p. 573; in Chinese, Ta a han, T 99 (no. 84), k. 3, p. 21c. - Other references in Rhys Davids-Stede, s.v. samkhāra, in fine. - According to the Viabhūgīyas, the four aspects of the truth of suffering are: anitiya, dukkha, śūnya and anamika (Kośa, VII, p. 31).

NOTE: The lengthy Sanskrit and Pāli quotations have been abbreviated for convenience, the beginning and the ending given so that they may be located.
CHAPTER II: EVAM MAYĀ ŚRUTAM EKASMIN SAMAYE

Sūtra. - Evam mayā śrutam ekasmin samaye: Thus have I heard at one time.

2. Furthermore, the Buddha's doctrine is profound (gambhīra) and distant; it requires a Buddha to understand it. Without being a Buddha, the believer can enter into the Buddha's doctrine by the power of faith (śraddhāhāla). Thus, Fān 'rên wăng (Brahmādevārī) invited the Buddha to turn the wheel of the doctrine (dharmaçañca) 143 He invited him with this stanza:

In Jambudvīpa, at one time, there appeared
Man'yō impure doctrines,
Open the gate of immortality,
Preach the pure path. 144

The Buddha replied with this stanza:
My doctrine is very difficult to grasp,
It is able to cut through the fetters.

These various versions show great divergence both as to the number of stanzas exchanged between the Buddha and Brahmā and the very meaning of the words pronounced. One gets the impression that the compilers and the translators only partially understood the meaning of the documents they used.

144 Vinaya, I, p. 5; Majjhima, I, p. 168; Samyutta, I, 137: pūravahosī Magadhe... samalambhavatthāni...vinālamabhavatthāni

145 In his commentaries on the Nikāyas (Sumati, I, p. 26; Papalca, I, p. 3; Sirattha, I, p. 4), Buddhaghosa mentions all the possible meanings of evam along with supporting texts. This adverb can indicate comparison (upāsī), information (upadesa), approval (sampahosana), reproach (garahasena), acceptance (vucanasaṃgahasanena), style (ākāra), designation (vidassanena) and affirmation (avadhāraṇena). In the expression evam me satun, the adverb evam expresses manner, designation and affirmation (sādavaḥ idaḥ ākārādarsanaḥvadhāraṇena datthabbva). To the author of the Mpp, evam symbolizes the faith of the believer in the words of the Buddha that he has heard. Some manuals of Buddhism have a tendency to present Buddhism as a rationalistic system, a simple appeal to reason (E. Hardy, Buddha, Leipzig, 1903, p. 54; Pischel, Leben, p. 54). But Buddhism is also adherence to the word of the Buddha and faith plays an important, although secondary, role in the doctrine of salvation (Kern, Historé, I, p. 1; Manual, p. 50; Lav., Opinions, p. 132-139; Ottifare, Théosophie, pp.341-342; B.M. Barua, Faith in Buddhism, BIS, XII, p. 329-349).

146 Faith is often compared to a boat: saddhāya taratī oghum (Suttanīpā, p. 184; Samyutta, I, p. 214; Sanskrit Udnānagara, p. 113). The Śūkṣmaśāntakṣa, p. 62, speaks about the ship of faith (śraddhānāva) on which one embarks to go to the treasure island (ratnaparvata).
Those whose minds are attached to the desire of the triple world (tribhavatṛṣṇā) are unable to understand it. 145

Brahmādevārjī said to the Buddha: "O Venerable One (bhuddanta), in the universe (lokadhātu), knowledge is of superior, middling or inferior category. People of sensitive and upright mind can easily obtain salvation. If these people do not hear the doctrine preached, they fall into grave difficulties. It is like the lotus (upalā) in the water: some are born, some ripen, some remain within the water without emerging.146 If they do not have sunlight (śrīyapravhā), they do not [63b] expand (vikasanti). The Buddha is like [the sunlight]: sent forth by his great loving kindness and great compassion (mahāmaitrīkarunā), that he might have pity for beings and preach the doctrine."

The Buddha recalled the qualities (dharma) of the buddhas of the three times (ryadvan), past (attīta), future (anāgunta) and present (pratyayapanna), all of whom preached the doctrine in order to save beings: "I too", said he, "must do the same." After having had this thought (manaskāra), he accepted Brahmādevārjī's and the other gods' invitation (adhyesāṇā) and preached the doctrine. The Bhagavat replied with this stanza:

Now I open the gate to the immortal.

The faithful shall obtain joy.
I preach the wonderful doctrine to men,
I do not preach in order to harm anyone.147

145 Vinaya, I, p. 5; Dīgha, II, p. 38; Majjhima, I, p. 168; Samyutta, I, p. 136: kicchena me adhigatam... tamoikkhandhena āvānīlvā ālocaṇīla
Pratītyaṃ and anuvrataṃ should probably be corrected to pratītyaṅtām, 'going upstream', and anuvrataṃ, 'going downstream'.
Lalitavistara, p. 397: pratītyagājānāmiṃgāṃmūrgāṃmāṃgrāvīdaṣṭāḥ tamāscālahāvānīlvā ālocaṇīla
Pratītyaṃ and anuvrataṃ should probably be corrected to pratītyaṅtām, 'going upstream', and anuvrataṃ, 'going downstream'.

146 The exact extent of the comparison between the three categories of knowledge and the stages of maturity of the lotus appears more clearly in other texts:
A. Vinaya, I, p. 6; Dīgha, II, p. 38; Majjhima, I, p. 169; Samyutta, I, p. 138: addasā kāt bhagavā..., āṃsāpitāminī udakāna.
B. Mahāvīra, III, p. 317-318: atha kāhā bhagavān... āvadāhriśālokayaṃ adāśrākītī
c. Lalitavistara, p. 399-400: atha kāhā tathāgataḥ... satvāṃśe tvaśāḥ āvyayāntiḥ
d. This stanza has always taxed the skill of translators, old and modern. It shows important differences in the Sanskrit and the Pāli texts.
A. Vinaya, I, p. 7; Dīgha, II, p. 39; Majjhima, I, p. 169; Samyutta, I, p. 138: apīrūṭā tehāṃ amatāya... manjujo Brahma Pumbhihavanatam saṃsāraḥ may mean either 'that they may reject faith' or 'that they may have faith'; viṃśasārīlayi is unclear, it may be translated as 'fearing injury', without knowing whether the Buddha feared lest he be the door or the victim of this injury.
H. Oldenberg, in 1881, in his Vinaya Texts, I, p. 88, has translated: "Wide opened is the door of the Immortal to all who have ears to hear; let them send forth faith to meet it. The Dhamma sweet and good I spoke not, Brahmā, desiring of the weary task, to men." He remains faithful to this translation in his Redis of the Dharma, München, 1922, p. 41: "Der Ewigkeit Tor, es sei jedem aufgetan der Ohren hat. Mag sich dann Glaube regen! Vergebliche Mühe zu meiden habe ich...

The idea is the same in the Mahābhāṣya, III, p. 317-318:
... lokāḥ abhivāyoranto... and  not... sattvāḥ svatāḥ
d. The translation of buddha in the Pāli texts is always uncertain. The usual translation is 'Buddha', and the most common one is 'Brahmā'.

"Now I open the gate to the immortal, O Brahmā! Those who wish to hear the Bhagava reject their pernicious belief. At one time among the Maṅgadhāna there was a pernicious, inferior, impure doctrine."

The idea is the same in the Mahābhāṣya, T 1421, k. 15, p. 104a: "Previously, fearing useless fatigue (cf. the Pāli viṃsaśārīlayi), I did not preach the profound meaning. Now I shall open [the gates] of the immortal. All should listen.

By correcting praguno to apraguno (praguno) in the fourth pada, mad [Lamote] translation is: "I have opened the door of the immortal, O Brahmā! Those who wish to hear the Bhagavat reject their pernicious belief. At one time among the Maṅgadhāna there was a pernicious, inferior, impure doctrine."

By correcting praguno to apraguno (praguno) in the fourth pada, mad [Lamote] translation is: "I have opened the door of the immortal, O Brahmā! Those who wish to hear the Bhagavat reject their pernicious belief. At one time among the Maṅgadhāna there was a pernicious, inferior, impure doctrine."

The idea is the same in the Mahābhāṣya, T 1421, k. 15, p. 104a: "Previously, fearing useless fatigue (cf. the Pāli viṃsaśārīlayi), I did not preach the profound meaning. Now I shall open [the gates] of the immortal. All should listen.

If these texts are compared, the meaning of the stanza becomes clear: Previously the Buddha did not preach the doctrine for fear of useless fatigue, but yielding to Brahmā's invitation, he is going to open the gates of the immortal, and all his listeners should renounce their old beliefs, impure beliefs current in Magadhā.

B. But apart from this tradition, which I [Lamote] would readily call the Maṅgadhāna tradition, there exists another tradition which gives a completely different meaning to the stanza: the Buddha announces that he is going to open the gates of the immortal; the faithful (āvābhuddhāvataḥ and not kṣetrasvāṃtaraḥ) will profit from his teaching; this teaching will avoid doing harm to others (different interpretation of the Pāli viṃsaśārīlayi).

This stanza is represented by a whole series of Chinese texts, among which is the Mppi:
Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 10, p. 593b: "The god Brahmā came to encourage the Tathāgata to open the gates of the immortal. The listeners having sincere faith will understand the profound Dharma. As at the summit of a high mountain, all kinds of beings are found. I, who possess this Dharma, will climb up to the temple (v. sic) and will manifest the Dharma-eye:

-Dharmagupta Vinaya, T 1428, k. 32, p. 787b: "Brahmā, I say unto you: I am going to open the gates of the immortal. The listeners will receive it with faith. It is not to molest [beings] that I preach, O Brahmā, the marvelous doctrine obtained by the Mani." -Mīlaśāntavādinī Vinaya, T 1450, k. 6, p. 126c: "To those who listen to the Dharma with joy, I will open the gates of the immortal. If it were in order to blame and look down on men, O Brahmā, I would never preach.

C. Of somewhat confused origin, the Lalitavistara, p. 400, seems to be a contamination of the two traditions: aprīrūṭa teṣāṃ anuvratyāṃ... dharman maṅgadhāvaḥ sarvāḥ. "The gates of the immortal, O Brahmā, are open for those who always have ears; they enter, those enter who do not think of harm; they listen to the Dharma, the beings of Magadhā.

74
In this stanza, the Buddha does not say that it is the generous person (dāyaka) who will obtain joy, or the person with knowledge (baśirīcara), morality (śīla), patience (ksīntī), energy (vīrya), dhyāna, or wisdom (prajāti). The Buddha is speaking only of the faithful. His intention is the following: My supreme (parāvāna) profound (gāmbhīra) doctrine is subtle (stīkṣma), immense (upramāna), inestimable (asamkhyeya), inconceivable (acinītva), immoveable (acalā), without support (anīdiṣṭa), and without perceived object (anālamhana). But it is not true that the omniscient one (sarvaṅgā) is unable to explain it. That is why, in the Buddha's doctrine, the power of faith is primordial. It is by faith that one enters into it and not by generosity (dāna), discipline (śīla), patience (ksīntī), energy (vīrya), dhyāna or wisdom (prajāti). Thus some stanzas say:

- In this world, the mind of beings is changeable.
- They love the rewards of merit.
- But they dread meritorious action.
- They seek existence and avoid destruction.

First they listen to doctrines [drawing their inspiration] from wrong views.
- Their mind becomes attached to it and they penetrate it deeply.
- My doctrine is very profound.
- Without faith how can it be understood?

Thus the great disciples T'i p'o ta (Devadatta),148 Kiǔ kia li (Kokālikā)149 etc., not having faith in the Dharma, fell into the evil destinies (āyogīta). These men had no faith in the Buddha's doctrine and were unable to discover it by their own wisdom (prajāti). Why? Because the Buddha's doctrine is profound (gāmbhīra). Thus Brahmādevārūṇa uttered this stanza to Kokālikā:

- You want to measure the incommensurable doctrine.
- The wise man has nothing to measure.
- He who wants to measure the incommensurable doctrine

Is nothing but a dull worldling.150

3. Another meaning of Evam. - The person whose mind in animated by correct faith can understand the doctrine. Otherwise, he understands nothing. A stanza says:

- The listener of pure and clear attention
- Attentively (ekacitta) follows the discussions.
- Leaping for joy, he hears the doctrine, his mind full of joy:
- That is the sort of person to whom it should be preached.

4. Furthermore, the word Evam occurs at the beginning of Buddhist texts. Present happiness (āhalokasukha), future happiness (anurārasukha), the happiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasukha), all happiness has its roots (āśīrāma) in very powerful faith.

[63c] 5. Furthermore, all religious heretics (trīthikaparāśravaka) imagine that their own doctrine is subtle (stīkṣma) and absolutely pure (paramasiddhā). These men exalt the doctrine that they practice and designate (vinikṣanti) that of others. That is why, here below, they quarrel and argue; after death, they fall into hell (narakā) and suffer immense pain of all kinds. A stanza says:

- Attached to their own doctrine.
- They blame that of other people.
- Even by observing moral conduct (śīlacaryā) they do not escape from the torment of hell.

In the Buddha's doctrine, all attachment (sangha), all false views (māyāvyāpata), all pride of self (asmināna), is abandoned and cut; one becomes detached from them. Thus the Fu yu king (Kolopamasītra) says: 'If you have understood the sermon on the comparison with the raft (kolopamu dharmaparāśrava), you must abandon the holy Dharma and, a fortiori, adharma.'151 The Buddha himself is not attached to the Prājāpātīramāṇa, why then would he be attached to other doctrines? That is why Buddhist texts begin with the word Evam. The intention of the Buddha is as follows: My disciples will not love the doctrine, will not become attached to the doctrine, will not have fancies (paruṣukṣma). They will seek only freedom from suffering (duḥkhaśaya), deliverance (vimukta), the nature of dharmas free of empty discussions 148 Devadatta, cousin and enemy of the Buddha. For the genealogy of this well-known individual, see below, k. 3, p.83c.

149 Kokālikā (Kokālikiya), son of a brahmin and ardent supporter of Devadatta (Vinaya, III, p. 174) allowed himself to be involved by the latter in a plot against the Buddha (Vinaya, II, p. 196, III, p. 171; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 25, p. 164). He appears in several Jātakas (see Watters, Travels, I, p. 392; Malalasekera, p. 657).
150 Sañjīva, p. 148: appamano paminanto... mañhe bhājyagonam.
151 Mahāmīna, p. 155: kūlippamam vo bhikkhave dhānānātī... paccayena anādhammā. Vajrajātaka, p. 23: kolopamam dharmaparāśram... pho evadhammā. Lokakāraka, p. 17: Tichong a han, T 26 (no. 200), k. 54, p. 764b-c; Pī t'o cha, T 1545, k. 97, p. 513b-c. - The Buddhist doctrine is often compared to a raft which must be abandoned when one has crossed over the river of transmigration: Suttanipāta, v. 21; Kośa, I, p.13; VIII, p. 186; Siddhi, p. 616; Falijib, p. 413; Lav. Mādhyanamaka, p. 31-32; Hidhārī, Barton, p. 62.
If it is not by absence of view, tradition, etc., Nor by absence of morality that it is attained, Then according to my reasoning, It is by observing a doctrine of silence that the Path is attained.

The Buddha replied:
You are depending on wrong views.
I am aware that you are deluded about the Path.
You have not seen the deceptive notion, Consequently you will be silent.

6. Furthermore, to say: "My doctrine is true (sātyam), the other doctrines are deceptive (mrutiśādā); my doctrine is absolute (parama), the others are wrong (abhātā);" such is the origin of quarrels (vivādamāla).
Here the term Evam designates a doctrine free of quarreling: listening to the words of others, it declares: "This man is not wrong." That is why the Buddhist sūtras begin with Evam.

The meaning of Evam has been explained in brief (samaśvadah).

MAYĀ

Let us now speak about the word Mayā. 153

Question. - In the Buddha's doctrine, it is said that all dharmas are empty (ātmanya) and without a substantial self (anātmanakaraṇa). 154 Why do the Buddhist sūtras begin with the words: "Thus have I heard"?

Answer. - 1. Although the disciples of the Buddha understood the non-existence of self (anātman), they conform to current usage (samyutarahma) and speak of a self (ātman). But this ātman is not a true ātman. Thus there is nothing ridiculous in exchanging copper coins (tāmrakaśāpya) for gold coins (svaṁrakaśāpya). Why? Because the rules of commerce (kṛṣṇavikrṣṇadharma) demand it. It is the same when we speak of ātman. In a system [that sets up the thesis of] the anātman, we can talk about the ātman; by conforming to current usage (lokāsanāntari), we do not incur any blame. Thus a stanza of the T'ien wen king (Devapariśehāstra) says:

---

152 For Arthavargīya, see above, p. , n. 2.

153 Māyā in the expression evam mayā ātmanam corresponds to me in the Pāli phrase evam me satam. Me is the enclitic form of the personal pronoun of the first person singular; it replaces the genitive, dative or instrumental singular. Buddhaghosa, in his commentaries on the Nikāya (Samaññaga, I, p. 28; Papuleca, I, p. 4; Sārārtha, I, p. 6), explains that me, in the phrase evam me satam, replaces both the instrumental and the dative: iḍha pana mayā satam ti ca satam ti ca atthāvikya yuvāti. Continuing his explanation, he comments that me designates the 'me' (atta), the individual (puggala), the person endowed with auditory consciousness (sotavādhisamājatipuggala).

154 Sarve dharmāni anātmanāh, in Pāli sābbe dharmāt anattā, i.e., according to the explanation of the Kośavyākyā: na caita ātmanabhāvah na caita ātmātā caḥ viśuddhatā iṣ ātātmanāh. This phrase is found in, e.g., Sūnyatā, III, p. 135; IV, p. 28, 401; Vinaya, V, p. 86; Sūtrālamkāra, XVIII, 101, p. 158; Tson a han, T 99 (no. 262), k. 10, p. 66b16, etc.
If he is an arhat bhikṣu
Whose impurities have been destroyed,
And who is in his very last existence,
Can he say: Is it I?
The Buddha replies:
An arhat bhikṣu
Whose impurities have been destroyed
And who is in his very last existence
Can say: It is I.\(^1\)

In current usage (lokādharmā), we speak of the ātman, but not from the absolute (paramārtha), true point of view, for all dharmas are empty (Īttvya) and devoid of substantial self (anātma). In current usage there is nothing wrong in speaking of ātman.

2. Furthermore, current language (lokaḥbhūtāp) has three roots (mūla): (1) wrong views (miśrayādṛṣṭi), (2) pride (mūna), (3) convention (ṣamketa). The first two are [646] impure (aśīva), the third is pure (śīva).

In all worldly people (pratyagāna), the three types of language, wrong views, pride and convention, exist.

In the āryas on the path of seeing (dāriyamārga), there are two types of language, that of pride and that of convention. In the āryas, only the conventional language exists. Without inwardly condemning the true doctrine (sadādharmā), they imitate ordinary people and borrow their language. Rejecting the wrong impure views of the world (lokamithyāṣyati), they conform to usage (ṣamvyti) and avoid quarrels (vivāda); thus they reject the other two impure roots of language. By conforming to the world, they use only one kind of language, i.e., conventional language. The Buddha's disciples who speak about the ātman, by conforming to usage, are not committing a fault.

3. Furthermore, the objection may be made to people who cling (abhītinyāja) to the doctrine of ātman and who claim that it is true and the rest is false (etad eva satyam moham anyat) in this way: "If, according to you, all dharmas are truly without substantial self (anātma), how can you say: 'Thus have I heard'?" But here the disciples of the Buddha do not cling to emptiness (Īttvya) and the non-existence (āktamucanyā) of all dharmas. Neither do they cling to the real nature (bhūtaśākṣekṣaṇa) of dharmas, nor a fortiori to the doctrine of ānītman. That is why they cannot be reproached or asked why they speak of self. Thus, in the Tcheng loua (Madhyamakāśūtra), some stanzas\(^2\) say:

[\(^{155}\) Sutta, entitled Araham, of the Sūmyutta, I, p. 14; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 581), k. 22, p. 154b-c; T 100 (no. 166), k. 9, p. 435c: yo khoti bhikkhu araham... pi so vadavya (iti devata) yo khoti bhikkhu katāci... vohārvamattena so vo hāvyavya (iti Bhavagīvī).

Buddhaghosa interprets this suṭta in the same way in the Sārūṭra, I, p. 51.\(^{156}\) Of the three stanzas cited here, [1 Lamotte] have been able to find only the first in Madhyamakaśūtra, XIII, 7; Madhp. vrtti, p. 245; the Chinese versions of the Madhyamakāśūtra: Tchong louen, T 1564, k. 2, p. 18c; Pan jo teng louen che, T 1556, k. 8, p. 91b. It is possible that the author of the Mppī had at his disposal an augmented edition of the Madhyamakāśūtra.\(^{157}\) Madhp. vrtti, p. 245: See Candrakīrti's commentary in the same place and Grousset, Philosophies indiennes, I, p. 237.\(^{158}\) The Chinese characters Nyan yin (170 and 14) or Nyan nen (115 and 14) render the Sanskrit word yogakṣema (cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 139). In Tibetan it is always translated as grub pa dkar bde ba, 'perfection-happiness'.

According to Buddhaghosa (Sārūtra, I, p. 255; II, p. 164) yogakṣema is catakiyo yogehi khaṃ, the fact of being free from the four yogas (kāma-, bhava-, dītīṭhi- and avijñāyoga), a synonym for nibbāna or sainthood (arahattu). This expression which has already occurred in the Vedas is frequent in Buddhist texts. See references in Rhys Davids-Stede, s.v., and Sangrāha, notes and references, p. 4. The translators render it as 'security' (Lévi), 'safety' (C. Rhys Davids), 'true end' (Wellmer). See R.R.A. Ray, Yogakṣema, BSOS, VII, 1934, p. 133-136 and H. Jacob, Tenthāsavātiktī das Fasabandhu, Stuttgart, 1932, p. 54.

In his commentaries on the Nikāyas (Sumanagala, I, p. 28; Papalica, I, p. 4-5; Sārūtra, I, p. 6; Manoratha, I, p. 7), Buddhaghosa enumerates all the possible meanings of suṣṭa; but, he adds, in the expression evam me suṣṭa, suṣṭa designates a perception relating to the auricular offifice (sotādhāvāsāmaya upādāvānena...), it indicates the perception (gohanas), the activity of the individual (puggalalīca) and, by extension, the thing (dhamma), the perceived object (vinaya). According to him, the phrase evam me suṣṭa means: By me, an individual endowed with auditory

\[^{155}\text{Sutta, entitled Araham, of the Sūmyutta, I, p. 14; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 581), k. 22, p. 154b-c; T 100 (no. 166), k. 9, p. 435c: yo khoti bhikkhu araham... pi so vadavya (iti devata) yo khoti bhikkhu katāci... vohārvamattena so vo hāvyavya (iti Bhavagīvī).}

\[^{156}\text{Of the three stanzas cited here, [1 Lamotte] have been able to find only the first in Madhyamakaśūtra, XIII, 7; Madhp. vrtti, p. 245; the Chinese versions of the Madhyamakāśūtra: Tchong louen, T 1564, k. 2, p. 18c; Pan jo teng louen che, T}

\[^{157}\text{Sutta, entitled Araham, of the Sūmyutta, I, p. 14; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 581), k. 22, p. 154b-c; T 100 (no. 166), k. 9, p. 435c: yo khoti bhikkhu araham... pi so vadavya (iti devata) yo khoti bhikkhu katāci... vohārvamattena so vo hāvyavya (iti Bhavagīvī).}

\[^{158}\text{The Chinese characters Nyan yin (170 and 14) or Nyan nen (115 and 14) render the Sanskrit word yogakṣema (cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 139). In Tibetan it is always translated as grub pa dkar bde ba, 'perfection-happiness'.}

\[^{159}\text{The meaning of Mayā has been explained in brief (samāvatā).}
dharma hears sounds. Why? The ear-organ, lacking intellect (śavabodha), cannot hear sounds; the [64c] consciousnesses, both auditory consciousness as well as mental [consciousness], being non-material (arūpa), offering no resistance (apratiṣṭha) and outside of space (adesa), are not able to hear sounds. Sound (śabda) itself, lacking intellect (śavabodha) and lacking the organ (indriya), cannot hear sounds. But if the ear-organ (śrotrendeṇṭītya) is intact, when the sound reaches the auditory field and when the manas wants to hear, the coming together of the object [i.e., sound] and the manas (sthālamaṇasamānpita) determines the arising of an auditory consciousness (śrotraviṃśāṇa).

Follow this auditory consciousness, there arises a mental consciousness (manovijñāna) that can analyze (vikalpana) all types of causes and conditions (hetapratyaya) and succeeds in hearing sounds. This is why the object cannot be made: "Who hears sound?" In the Buddha's doctrine no dharma is agent (kāraṇa), perceiver (drasṭṛ) or cognizer (jñāna). Some stanzas say:

If there is an action (karma), there are also fruits (phala).

The non-existence of the agent (kāraṇa), of the action and of the fruit

Is the absolute (parama) and profound (gambhīra) law

That the Buddha was able to discover.

There is emptiness (śūnya) but not annihilation (acchada),

Continuity (prabandha), but not eternity (śaiva),

Sin (āpari) and merit (puṇya), and not destruction (vipraṇa):

---

166 The viśṇūma is arūpa, adesānta, sāndraviṇakāyānta, Kośa, III, p. 135. It is in contrast to the organs and objects that constitute the rūpaśānta. See Kośa, I, p. 27.

167 With some modifications, this is the canonical theory on the origin of the consciousness: "By virtue of the ear and sound, the auditory consciousness is produced; the coming together of the three is contact" (sattatattā patteca saudde ca appajajāt sanskṛtānām, tinum saṁgati phasu). Samyutta, II, p. 72; IV, p. 68, 86, etc.). - On the problem of contact (parasa), see Kośa, III, p. 95-101.

168 Equipped with the vikalpas of examination (nirūpaṇā) and memory (amamrana), the mental consciousness, by itself, has a clear notion (sanyāsa) of the object. The other consciousnesses have only a very vague notion. The visual consciousness cognizes blue (niśara jñāna), but does not know "It is blue" (so tu niśrā iti). In the same way, the auditory consciousness is insufficient to identify a sound; it must be complemented by a mental consciousness. See Kośa, I, p. 28, n. 1, on this subject.

169 This stanza is quite in the Madhyamaka spirit. Cf. Madh., vṛtti, p. 328-329; na pratyayaam parṇam nāpratyayaam nāpratiprāpyaṁ lata eva bhāvavāya. "Since action is neither produced by virtue of conditions nor non-produced for the same reason, the agent itself does not exist either. - If the action does not exist, how would the agent and the fruit of the action exist? There not being any fruit, how would the enjoyer of the fruit exist?"

The views of eternity and annihilation (ācchadantāvadānta) are two extreme views (antadāya) to be avoided carefully. Cf. Samyutta, II, p. 17; III, p. 135; Madh. vṛtti, p. 269; Madh. avatāra, p. 22; Madhāvastu, III, p. 448; P. Vaidya, Études sur śāvyadeva, Paris, 1923, p. 35-37; Dutt, Mañjuśrī, p. 46, 54; Lav., Madhyamaka, p. 10.
Such is the law which the Buddha preaches.
The meaning of Śrutam has been explained in brief (samāsataḥ).

EKASMIN
Let us now speak about Ekasmin.

Question. - In the Buddhist doctrine, the dharmas, number (sankhyā), time (kalā), etc., do not exist, because they are not included (sangṛhita) in the list of aggregates (skandha), bases of consciousness (āyatana) and elements (dhātu) [set up by Buddhists].169 Then why is it said: 'at time' (ekasmin samayet)?

Answer. - According to current usage (lokasaṁyuti), there is 'at time'. It is not wrong [to express oneself in that way]. If a piece of carved wood represents the image of a deity (deṣaṇaprajñā) and by thinking of this deity, one pays homage to it (vandana), that is not wrong.170 In the same way, when we speak of 'at time', it is not wrong; even though this time does not really exist, it is in conformity with usage (saṁyuti) that we speak of 'at time'.

Question. - It is impossible that there is not 'at time'. 1. The Buddha himself said: "When 'at man appears in the world, many men obtain joy. Who is this man? It is the Buddha Bhagavat.171 Furthermore, the Buddha spoke this stanza:

{65a}My conduct (caryas) has no master (aśčadysa).

My resolve (chanda) is one and peerless.

By observing a single practice, I have become Buddha.

By myself (svata), I have penetrated the noble Path (āryamārga).172

In the same way, the Buddha spoke about one-ness in many places. Therefore it must exist.

169 The lists of five skandhau, twelve āyatana and eighteen dhātu.

170 The cult of images is authorized by virtue of the same principles in Alokavadinu (Przyliński, āloka, p. 361-362), Sūtrālamākta (tr. Huber, p. 272) and Divyavadinu, p. 363.

171 Text cited above, n.

172 Stanza pronounced by the Buddha when he met with the Śīlaśīla Upaka (or Upaga, Upagana).

Vinaya, 1, p. 2a-b, 3c-d; Majjhima, I, p. 171: na me dāśīno attā, ‘tāna nibbuto.

Sanskrit Udādasaṅgagac. 263: dāśīno me na va, ‘sambodhīto utamāṁ.

Lāliṭvatistara, p. 405: dāśīno na hi me kaicitt, ‘śibbāto niśārapah.

Tiang yi li hao, T. 125, k. 14, p. 618c8-9: ‘I have no master, there is no-one like me. Alone I am the flawless Buddha. Having reached cool the nature, I am free of corruptions.'

Wou fen liu, T. 1421, K. 13, p. 104a: ‘My conduct has no master, by myself, I have penetrated the noble Path.' *Sen fen liu, T. 1428, k. 32, p. 78c: ‘By myself, I have attained awareness. From whom should I have learned it? I have had no teacher.’ *Ken pen chou, p'o seng che, T. 1450, k. 6, p. 127a: ‘I do not derive my activity from any master. No-one is my equal… By myself I have found awareness; I do not depend on a teacher.’

2. Furthermore, it is by association (samyoja) with the dharma 'one-ness' that a substance (dravya) is said to be 'one'. If the dharma 'one-ness' did not truly exist, why does a single substance invoke the notion of one-ness, unity, and not of duality or three-ness? Why do two substances evoke the notion of duality and not of one-ness or of three-ness? Why do three substances evoke the notion of three-ness and not of duality or of one-ness? If numbers really did not exist, a single substance would be able to invoke the notion of two-ness, two substances would be able to evoke the notion of one-ness, and similarly for three, four, five, six, etc. That is why we know with certainty that a substance 'one' possesses the dharma 'one-ness' and that, by association (samyoja) with this dharma, this substance 'one' engenders the notion of one-ness.

Answer. - There is a fault both in the case that one-ness is identical (eka) with substance (dravya) and in the case that one-ness is different (anyu) from substance.

Question. - If [one-ness and substance] are the same, what is the fault?

Answer. - 1. If a vase (ghata) is synonymous with one-ness, in the way that Yin t'i li (Indra) is synonymous with Che kiu (Śakra), then wherever there is one-ness, there must be a vase, as everywhere where there is Indra, there must be Śakra. Henceforth all substances, cloth (pata), etc., will be vase and one-ness. Since the vase is one-ness, wherever there is one-ness, there must be vase, and not only vase, but also cloth, etc., because all of them being 'single' substance, they are not different (viśesa).

2. Furthermore, one-ness being a number-dharma (sankhyādharma), the vase also must be a number. Since the nature of the vase (ghatavahāva) involves five attributes (dharma), one-ness also will involve five attributes. Since the vase is material (rūpin) and offers resistance (sagratāga), one-ness also will be material and resistant. [However], wherever there is one-ness, there is no question of the vase. It is not necessary that the vase be one-ness, since to speak of one-ness is not to include the vase therein and to speak of the vase is not to include one-ness therein.

3. Finally, if the vase and one-ness were not different, then to speak of one-ness, one would be talking about the vase, and to speak about the vase, one would be talking about one-ness. This would be confusing.

Question. - If [one-ness and the vase] were identical, those would be the faults. But if they are different, where is the fault?

Answer. - If one-ness were different from the vase, the vase would be that which is not one-ness [i.e., it would be multiple, anyo]. If the vase were different from one-ness, one-ness would be everything that is not the vase. If the vase, united with one-ness, is called 'one', why is one-ness, united with the vase, not called 'vase'? This is why we cannot say that the vase is different from one-ness.

Question. - It is because it is united with the number 'one' that the vase is 'one'; but one-ness does not make the vase.
Only so as to conform with current usage do the disciples of the Buddha speak of one-ness, but their minds do not truly cling (abhitinśīṣā) to it; they know that the dharma 'number' (samkhya-dharma) has a conventional existence (samketa-vyabhichāra). This is why, when the Buddhist texts talk about 'a' man (ekāḥ pudgala), 'a' teacher (eka diśyaḥ) 'a' time (ekaḥ samayah), they do not fall into the error of wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭi).

We have explained in brief the meaning of Ėkasmin.

SAMAYE

Let us now speak about Samaye:

Question. - In India, there are two words to designate time, Kīa lo (kalā) and San mo ye (smayya). Why does the Buddha say samaya and not kāla?

Answer. - If he said kāla, there would be uncertainty.

Question. - For ease of elocution, he ought to have said 'kāla', because 'kāla' has only two syllables whereas 'samaya' has three and is harder to pronounce.

Answer. - 1. It is in order to avoid wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭi) that he said samaya and not kāla. Indeed, some say that all beings in heaven and earth have kāla as cause. Thus some stanzas in the Čhe king (Kālasūtra) say:

- Time passes and beings ripen,
- Time passes and beings grow,
- Time can understand men,
- That is why time is cause.

The universe is like the wheel of a chariot,

- Time revolves like the turning wheel,
- Man also is like the chariot wheel:
- Sometimes above, sometimes below.

2. Furthermore, some say: 'Even if all beings in heaven and on earth and all substances (dravya) are not created by time, nevertheless time is immutable (avyāya). That is why it truly exists. But as the dharma 'time' is subtle (stāksma), it is invisible (adṛṣṭya) and unknowable (aṃjhyāya). It is by its effects, flowers (puṣpa), fruits (phala), etc., that its existence may be known and its characteristics (lakṣana) may be seen, such as the past year or present year, long ago or recently, slowly or quickly. Although time is not seen, it is possible to know its existence; for it is by seeing the effect (phala) that one knows the existence of the cause (hetu). That is why a dharma 'time' exists, and as this dharma 'time' is immutable (aryāya), it is eternal (nitya).'

Answer. - Present time (pratyaupanā) is like a ball of clay (merupiṇḍa), past time (ātita) like the dust of the earth (jethīṛya) and future time (anāgata) like the vase (ghana). Since time is eternal (nitya), the past does not make the future, according to your texts, time is a single substance (ekadravya). This is why the past does not make the future or the present, for they are confused with the past. In the past there is no future. That is why there is no future or present.

Question. - You accept that the past [is comparable] to the dust of the earth. If there is a past, there must necessarily be a future. That is why the dharma 'time' must exist necessarily.

Answer. - You have not understood what I have just said. The future is the vase; the past is the dust of the earth. The future does not make the past, because by falling into the characteristics (anātita) the past is destroyed; the past does not make the future, because the future is destroyed by the characteristics (anāgata and future time). Why? Because its self-nature (ātita) has the characteristics of the past, and the future (anāgata) has the characteristics of the future.

Answer. - If the three times each had their own characteristics (sva-lakṣana), they would always be 'present' and there would be neither past nor future. If the future existed presently, it would not be called 'future' but indeed 'present'. That is why your thesis (vāda) does not hold.

Question. - The past and the future do not function with the nature of the present; the past functions with the nature of the past and the future with the nature of the future. That is why there is a [different] time for each nature separately (ekaita dharma-lakṣana).

Answer. - If the past has 'passed', it loses the nature of the past; if the past has not 'passed', it does not have the nature of the past. Why? Because its self-nature (sva-lakṣana) is absent. It is the same for the future. That is why the dharma 'time' is not real. How could it produce the beings of heaven and earth, flowers (puṣpa), fruits (phala) and other substances (dravya)? [The Buddhist texts] do not speak about kāla but about samaya in order to dispel wrong views of this kind. We speak metaphorically (prajñapti) about time with regard to birth (upasāda), the elements (dhātu) and bases of consciousness (āyatana), but there is no distinct time [existing as a separate substance]. Expressions such as 'region' (deśa), 'time' (kāla), 'separation' (viyoga), 'union' (saṃyoga), 'singleness' (ekāra), 'multiplicity' (nāṇḍra), 'length' (ārghatva), 'smallness' (kṛṣṇara), etc., come from convention (nāma-saṃketa). Fools (bāla) cling (abhitinśīṣā) to 173 These are the Kālavīdīns, cf. Saddarṣīrmanascuṣaya, p. 10-11.

174 Interesting variation of a well-known stanza (Bōhtlingk, Ind. Sprüche, no. 1688; Madh. vṛtti, p. 386; Saddarṣana, p. 111): kālaḥ pacati bhūtānā... kālo hi duvatiḥramah.
CHAPTER III: GENERAL EXPLANATION OF EVAM MAYA ŚRUTA

Now let us explain the expression Evam mayā śrutam ekasmin samaye as a whole (sāmānyatā), "Thus have I heard at one time." 178

Question - The Buddhas are omniscient (sarvajñā); independent and without a teacher (dīkṣāyā), they do not follow the teaching of others (paradeśaṃ), they do not adopt the doctrines of others (parādharma), they do not use borrowed systems (paramārge). They preach the Buddha-dharma without having heard it from another. How can they say: "Thus have I heard (evam mayā Ṣrūtyam)?"

[66h] Answer - 1. As you have said, the Buddha is omniscient, independent, without a teacher; he preaches the Dharma without having heard it from another. But the Buddhist doctrine is not the only utterance that has come from the mouth of the Buddha (buddhakāñcikaritaḥ); it is also all the truths (sānya) and all the good words (subhāṣita) propagated in the world (loka). 179 Skillful words (nīpuna), well spoken (subhāṣita) come them and say that these are [66a] real dharmas (sadbhāta). That is why mundane conventional dharmas of purely nominal existence must be excluded.

Question. - If time does not exist, why is it permissible 'to eat at the proper time' (khālaḥbhogeṇa) and forbidden 'to eat at the wrong time' (akālaḥbhogeṇa)? 176 Those are common disciplines (līlā)! Answer. - I have already spoken above about these worldly (laukika) and conventional (samkētika) dharmas: there is a time, but it is not a real dharma. You cannot object to that. Besides, the disciplines imposed by the Vinaya are true for the world without having the nature of an absolute, real dharma (paramasyatadvaharmalakāsana), for the ātman and the dharmas do not really exist (nopalabhisyante). But in order to moderate the impatience of the community (saṃgha), in order to protect the Buddhist doctrine and ensure its longevity (cirasthiti), in order to regulate the disciples' rituals, the Bhagavats of the triple world have set up prohibitions (līlā) of the subject of which one should not question whether it is true (sātya, bhūta) or conventional (nāmāsukketa), what is associated (samukṣeta) or dissociated (viprayukta), what is a dharma with such and such a characteristic (laksana) or without that characteristic. That is why no objection can be made there.

Question. - When it is a question of 'food at the improper time' (akālaḥbhogeṇa), or 'medicine at the proper time' (kālaḥbhogeṇa) or 'robes at the proper time' (kālavastra), the word 'kāla' is always used. Why not say 'samaṇya'? Answer. - Lay people (avatātavasana) do not understand the expression in the Vinaya; how then could the heretics (āśritya) understand it? They would take up wrong views (mithiyakṛtya). Everybody understands the expression 'samaṇya' in the other texts. Therefore by saying 'samaṇya', they are prevented from forming wrong views. 'Samaṇya' is a contrived word, 'kāla' likewise is a metaphorical expression (prajñapti). Besides, in the Buddhist texts, the word 'samaṇya' is often used and rarely the word 'kāla'. 177 Since its use is rare, no objection can be made there.

The meaning of the five words Evam mayā śrutam evaṁ min samaye has thus been explained in brief (samāskṛtaḥ).

176 For the restriction of eating at the wrong time (akālaḥ, vi-kālaḥbhogeṇa), i.e., after noon, see Sanyutta,V, p. 470; Majjhima, I, p. 180, 268, 448; Aṅguttara, I, p. 232; II, p. 209; III, p. 216, 260, etc.

177 In his commentaries on the Nikāya (Samatagala, I, p. 31; Pāñcaśī, I, 8; Sāratthā, I, p. 9-10; Manorathā, I, 11), Buddhaghosa illustrates the use of samaṇya by many citations from the canonical texts, e.g., Dīgha, I, p. 205; II, p. 254; Majjhima, I, p. 438; II, p. 22; Sanyutta, I, p. 187; IV, p. 205; Aṅguttara, I, p. 134, III, p. 246; Vinaya, IV, p. 117.

NOTE: The Pāli and Sanskrit quotations have been abbreviated, only the beginning and ending phrases being cited.

178 Other old commentaries on this phrase have been noted by P. Demiéville, Les versions chinoises du Milinda- punishments, BEFEO, XXV, 1924, p. 52-57.

179 The criterion of authenticity varies considerably among Buddhist scholars. The question of its variations has been posed by L. de La Vallée Poussin, Opinions, p. 138-145; Nīvāna, p. 24.

a. The traditional orthodox point of view is that of the pious Āsoka in the edict of Bairat (Senātī, Piyadasi, II, p. 208; Hultsch, Āsoka, p. 173; Smith, Āsoka, p. 172): "All that the Blessed Buddha has said is well said." (kēchi bhante bhagavati Budhama bhājya sarve saṃkhīte). As a result, in order to know if a doctrine or a text is the word of the Buddha, the translators of the canon say that it must be compared with the collections of Buddhist scriptures which alone are authoritative.

A Pāli sûtra, dedicated to the four great authorities (mahāpajā), found in Dīgha, II, p. 123, and Aṅguttara, II, p. 167, considers as the word of the Buddha any text conforming to the Sūtras and the Vinaya: "When a text is proposed on the authority of the Buddha, a community (saṃgha), a group of Elders (とも) or an individual Elder, it is necessary to see if this text (padaryaśāya) occurs in the Sūtras (sātya uttari) and appears in the Vinaya (vinaye sandissanti). If yes, it must be accepted as being the word of the Buddha (bhagavato vacana); if no, it must be rejected." For the expression mahāpajñā, see Dīgha, tr. Bh. D., II, p. 123; tr. Franke, p. 220, n. 4; Aṅguttara, tr. Woodward, II, p. 174; L. de La Vallée Poussin, Mahāpajñā, Kālleruṭe, HIAS, III, 1938, p. 158-160.

The same phrase, but more elaborate in form, requires that the controversial text must not only be found in the Sūtras and in the Vinaya, but also that it must not contradict the nature of things (or the truth). This modified formula occurs in the Chinese Dhīrgāhāra, Te'rang a hān, T, I, k, 3, p.17c. (cf. T, 5, k, 1, p.167a; T, 6, k, 1, 195c; Ken pēn chow... ten che, T 1451, k, 37, p. 389b-390b). It is quoted in Śrīlahākāra, ed. Lēvi, p. 4. "The characteristic mark of the word of the Buddha is that it is found in the Sūtras, that it appears in the Vinaya and that it does not contradict the truth (bhuddhavacanam samudayam laukam yat ete 'nātaram vinayo pratyayāt dharmaśānta ca na viśnumati). The same principles are repeated in Pāṇḍita, p. 431: "That which comes down to us as the word of the Buddha traditionally by succession of teachers and students, that which occurs in the Sūtras, that which appears in the Vinaya and does not contradict the truth (dharmaśānta), that is the word of the Buddha and none other" (sad pravītasya yaparamparayaṃ nyāyāt bhuddhavacanam nānām). According to Kosā, IX, p. 252, the dharma, which the text cannot contradict is the law of dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda).
forth everywhere in the Buddhadharma. Thus the Buddha said in the Vinaya: "What is the Buddhadharma? The Buddhadharma is that which has been spoken by five kinds of people: 1. that which the Buddha himself has spoken (buddhābhāṣita); 2. that which the disciples of the Buddha have spoken (śrāvakabhāṣita); 3. that which the sages have said (pratisaraḥ); 4. that which has been said by the gods (devabhāṣita); 5. that which appearance beings have spoken (upapādabhāṣita)." 180

83

The requirements increase in the Chinese Ekottara, (Tseng yia han, T 125, k. 20, p. 652b. For this passage see Kauśika, K. 9, p. 125a, encourages the exegete to have recourse to the truth in himself, not to authority, whatever it may be, even of the Buddha (dharmam pratiivaram na padgalaḥ). Already the Suttanāṭā, III, 3, defines the characteristics that allow recognition of the "Good Word" (subbhāṣita), the irreproachable word: "It is well said and not badly said (subbbhāṣitā śravaḥ bhāṣitā no dhūbbhāṣitāṃ); agrees with salvation and is not contrary to salvation (dharmam śravaḥ bhāṣitāḥ no adharmam); pleasant and not unpleasant (prīyā śravaḥ bhāṣitāḥ no apriyam); true and not false (saucch śravaḥ bhāṣitāḥ no atilakām).

84

c. Finally, the criterion of authenticity is completely abandoned. To accept a sûtra, one need no longer be troubled to know if it was preached by the Buddha in such a position and such a person; one need only ask whether or not the doctrines which it contains are useful and profitable. This is the triumph of the inner critic over the outer critic, of subjectivity over objectivity. The early phrase: "All that the Buddha said is well said" is reversed, and it is generally proclaimed: "Everything that is well said has been said by the Buddha." In the following pages, the Mpps resolutely defines this point of view with supporting texts. One could add other citations to the ones it brings. The Mahāvīraṃsceodasamāraṇa, cited in Sākhāsamaeṣu, p. 15, and Pudādikā, p. 431-432, says: "Every word of the Buddha may be recognized by four characteristics: it is endowed with usefulness and not harmfulness; it agrees with the Dharma and does not contradict the Dharma; it destroys the passions and does not increase them; it shows the qualities and benefits of nirvāṇa and does not show the qualities and benefits of saṃsāra. Whoever teaches or will teach a doctrine presenting these four characteristics should be regarded as a Buddha by the faithful, sons and daughters of good family. They should consider him to be their teacher and listen to his doctrine. Why? Because all that is well said has been said by the Buddha (api tu, maitreya, caturbhi apī tu, maitreya, caturbhi pratisaraḥ api tu, maitreya, caturbhi apī tu, maitreya, caturbhi pratisaraḥ)."

d. When the Greater Vehicle texts in the Buddha.Dharma literature with its innumerable sûtras, the adverts of the Lesser Vehicle protest: "These texts are not authentic; they are not the words of the Buddha." The scholars of the Greater Vehicle have only arguments of reasoning to oppose them. They say: "The Mahāvīra leads to supreme enlightenment; this is why we know that they are the words of the Buddha." All their argumentation in the end leads back to this single affirmation. See Mahāvīranaśagha, p. 9, Sūtrālaṃkāra, I, v. 7, p. 3, Siddhi, p. 176-178; Hien yang cheng kia lovon, T 1602, k. 20, p. 581b; Dutt, Mahāvīra, p. 68-75. 180 Passage taken from the Sarvatvāśādī Vinaya, Che song liu, T 1428, p. 11, 639a16: "The doctrine in padis is what the Buddha has pronounced, what the śrāvakas have expressed, what the rśis have expressed and what the devas have expressed." This passage is identical with the Pāli. - Mālasarvatvāśādī Vinaya, Ken pen cho... p'i nai ye, T 1332, k. 26, p. 771b2: "The word 'dharma' means the doctrine that the Buddha and the śrāvakas have pronounced." - The bodhisattvas appear in the definition of the doctrine in "Nandimitra's Relation": In the collections of the holy Dharma, there are texts that have been pronounced by the Buddha, others by the bodhisattvas, others by the śrāvakas, others by the rśis, others by the gods, others by the sages; they can inspire fairness and benefit." Cf. S. Lévi, Les seize Arhat protecteurs de la loi, JA, 1916, p. 20-21. 181 Kauśika (in Pāli, Kosāya) is a rather rare, it is true, epithet of Indra-Sakra. It occurs already in the Rigveda (I, 10) and Mahābhārata (3, 99 and 135,20). See Macdonell, Vedic Mythology, p. 62, and W. Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 123. - It occurs in Buddhadharma texts: Dīgha, II, p. 270; Majhiṃa, I, p. 200, 202, 315, 403. This epithet, which means 'belonging to the Kuśa family,' is a survival from the time when Indra was the god of the Kuśa clan, according to Rysys Davis (Dīgha, tr. II, p. 296).

182 J [Lamotte] have not succeeded in identifying this text, but in Asgāta, IV, p. 163-164, there is a conversation between Indra and some bhikṣus where the latter also affirms that everything that is well said has been said by the Buddha. Indra congratulates the monks on their speech: "That is a fine doctrine. Do you know it from your own enlightenment or do you hold it from the Buddha?" The monks reply: "When, at a distance from a large granary, one sees some people who are carrying grain in a basket, in their robes, in their hands, one can easily deduce where that grain came from; in the same way, all that is well said, every good word, is the word of the Blessed One." (Yam kinci subbhāṣitam sabbām tam Bhagavato vacanam).
The destruction of specific and general characteristics
Is like the iron that comes out of the gangue.
Who would think
That a forest of evaṇḍa
Could contain the goṣṭhīśya
Would believe that a bad seed
Could contain the wondrous honey fruit?
Then we would believe
That the works of heretics
Themselves contain good words.

Good and true words
All come from the Buddha,
Like the perfume of the sandal wood (candana)
Comes from Mo-li chan
Withhold Mo-li chan
And there would be no further sandalwood.

Similarly, withhold the Buddha
And there would be no further good words.

2. Furthermore, the phrase Evam mayī śrutam is an expression used by the disciples of the Buddha such as A-nāna (Ānanda), etc. Since it partakes of the marks (laksana) of the Buddhahdharma, it is called Buddhahdharma. Thus the Buddha, at the time of his parinirvāṇa, was at Ku-yi na kie (Kusinagara) between two Sa lo (śāla) trees; lying with his head to the north, the Buddha was about to enter into nirvāṇa. At that time, Ānanda, still under the influence of the affictions (anuvaya), had not yet dispelled or eliminated passion (vīṣa). His heart was plunged into a sea of sadness from which he was unable to come out. Then the sthavira A ni lo teu (Aniruddha) said to Ānanda: “You, keeper of the basket of the Buddhist texts, you ought not to founder in a sea of sadness like an ordinary person (prabhāganyo). All conditioned dharmas (sandhikṣetra-dharma) are transitory in nature (anitya-laksana). You should not be sad. Moreover, the Buddha has entrusted the doctrine to you and now, in your despair, you forget the task which he entrusted to you. Therefore ask the Buddha the following questions: After the Buddha’s parinirvāṇa, what path (mārga) shall we follow? Who will be our teacher (ācārya), our critic and our guide? What will be our refuge (upasatva)? What words will we place at the beginning of our Buddhist texts? You should ask the Buddha about these things to come (anīlayatvam).

When Ānanda heard this advice, his sadness decreased a little and he found the strength to think about the path. He helped the Buddha to lie at the edge of the bed and asked him these questions.

The Buddha said to Ānanda: ‘Henceforth after my departure, you yourself will be your own refuge (ātma-sīrṣa), the Dharma will be your refuge (dharma-sūtra), and you will have no other refuge (anuvaya-sūtra). How, O bhikṣu, will you be your own refuge, how will the Dharma be your refuge, and how will you have no other refuge? The bhikṣu considers his own body (kāya anupaśyati); he always dedicates to it his full attention (akṣācita), his wisdom (prajñā), his zeal (prajñātā), his energy (vīra) and he rejects the worldly desires and resulting dissatisfactions (loke bhikṣudhāna-rūpa). In the same way, he considers another body of another, then his own body and that of another at the same time. The same for the sīrṣapanthānas of feeling (vedana), mind (citta) and dharmas. Then it can be said that this bhikṣu is himself his own refuge, goes to the Dharma for refuge and has no other refuge. 187 Henceforth the Kīrti t'o kīrti king (Pramokṣa-sūtra) will be your great teacher (mahācārya). You should carry out bodily activities (kāyakarman) and vocal actions (vākakarman) according to the instructions of the Pratimokṣa-sūtra. - After my Nirvāṇa, your guide (chandaka), O bhikṣu, will be the punishment according to the rule of Brahmā (brahmādanda).188 - If someone is in a state of mind of panic (abhīhitacittā), he should be taught the 183 evaṇḍa, according to Monier-Williams: the castor-oil plant, Ricinus communis or Croton pbrandraceus, or Palma Christi.

---

184 goṣṭhīśya, according to Monier-Williams: a kind of sandalwood (brass-colored and very fragrant).
185 Mo-li chan, also transcribed by the characters Mo lo chan (Przyluski, Concile, p. 207) and Mo lo ye chan (Ś. Lévi, Catalogue géographique des Yaks, JA, Jan.-Feb., 1915, p. 41) is most likely Mount Malaya where goṣṭhīśya candana is collected, below, k. 10, p. 132a.
186 This paragraph gives the ultima verba of the Buddha before his entry into parinirvāṇa. At the request of Aniruddha, Ānanda asks five questions of the dying Buddha who answers with five pieces of advice. I [Lamotte] do not find this episode in the other stories of the parinirvāṇa where Aniruddha appears only once to learn from Ānanda if the Buddha has entered into nirdhīnasamāpatti. Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 156; Teď'ang a han, T 1, k. 4, p. 26028; Pan ni yam king, T 6, k. 2, p. 188b26; Ta pan n'ın'an kíng, T 7, k. 2, p. 205a10; Ken pen chouo... tsa tshe, T 1451, k. 38, p. 309b6.
187 The same sermon on the four sīrṣapanthānas was already spoken to Ānanda at Beluvā (Dīgha, II, p. 100); Teď'ang a han, T 1, k. 2, p. 15b; Ken pen chouo... tsa tshe, T 1451, k. 30, p. 387b and at Sāvatthi (Sānyutta, V, p. 163) and to the bhikkhus at Mānīla (Dīgha, III, p. 58, 77; Teď'ang a han, T 1 (no. 6), k. 6, p. 391; Tchhong a han, T 26 (no. 70, k. 15, p. 520b) Tsubōtī iii'ānanda attāpaḥ tuhārathā... dhammadhipi dhammasaṅkhaṇa anāthaścāraṇo.
188 Brahmādanda was inflicted by the Buddha upon Chanda: “Let Chanda say to the bhikkhus whatever he wishes, but let the bhikkhus not speak to him, nor admonish him, nor advise him.” (cf. Dīgha, II, p. 154; Vinaya, II, p. 290. Cháma bhikkhu yam icceyya... na anukātādhibhū.)

---

85 86
Chan t'o kia tegan yen king (Samthakātyāyanasūtra); then he will be able to obtain the Path.189 - As for the precious basket of the Dharma (dharmaratnapiṭaka) compiled during three incalculable periods (asambhūyakalas), it must begin with the following phrase: "Thus have I heard at one time (evam mayā śrutam ekasmin samaye), the Buddha was dwelling in such and such a place, in such and such a country, in such and such a grove." Why [this beginning]?

87

189 In this sūtra the Buddha praises the good meditation, without content or object, which prepares the way to nirvāṇa. He congratulates Sāthi Kātyāyaṇa (in Pāli, Saṇhāṇa or Suddha Kācālyāja; cf. Aṅguttara, V, p. 323; Sammutta, II, p. 155) for having no concept whatever of what is. And the gods venerate Sāthi, saying: "Homage to you, excellent man, for we have not that on which you meditate!"

We have several versions of this sūtra with important variants - in Pāli, in Aṅguttara, V, p. 325-326; - in Sanskrit, from a citation in Bodhisattvabhinīmata, p. 49-50; - in Chinese, in Tsa hauan, T 99 (no. 926), k. 33, p. 253c-256b, and T 100 (no. 151), k. 8, p. 430c-431b; from citations in Yu kiu ch'ei ti loun by Asanga, T 1579, k. 36, p. 189b, and by Ta t'ehng tchang t'ehn loun by Bāhāvavīke, T 1578, k. 2, p. 276c (tr. L. de La Vaillé Poussin, Le Joyau dans la main, MCB, II, 1932-33, p. 127).

Here is the Sanskrit text of this sūtra which, with the exception of some additions which I [Lamotte] have made in brackets, corresponds exactly with the Pāli version: Iha Sāthi bhūkṣa na prādhīnām nirvāṇa... kam tvam nirvāṇa dhiyatyasi. Poussin, who several times has mentioned the importance of this text, comments: "Two schools read confirmation of their metaphysical theses in this old sūtra and the meeting is rather thorny. Maitreyya-Asanga's school thinks that the son of Kātyāyaṇa meditates on ineffable reality, on the dharma called tathātā which it discovered centuries after the redaction of the sūtra and of which old scripture knew nothing. Bāhāvavīke says that the son of Kātyāyaṇa meditates on the void, for only voidness exists in the universe; he makes the son of Kātyāyaṇa a precursor of Bāhāvavīka... The sūtra teaches nothing other than right meditation." (Lav., Dogme et Philosophie, p. 92; see also idem, Madhyamakula, MCB, II, 1932-33, p. 55).

190 āyuṣmat: 'life-possessing', honorific title applied to royal personages and Buddhist monks (Monier-Williams).

191 In telling this episode of the Council of Rājaγha, the Mppi, according to its custom, follows the Sarvavīdān Vinaya word for word (Che song lio, T 1435, k. 60, p. 44b; Przyluski, Concile, p. 230).

192 The Tsa fa king, which the Mppi takes as its pattern in the narrative of the first Council, should be very close to the K'ia ye kie king, T 2027. Przyluski has commented that the account in the Mppi "is rather similar to the K'ia ye kie king, especially in the verse sections."

The account of the Council in the Mppi has been translated by Przyluski in his well-known Le Concile de Rajeugha, ch. III, p. 57-73. I [Lamotte] cannot do better than to reproduce his translation with a few slight modifications. In my notes, I use mainly the other sources gathered by him, of which here is the list with references to the Taisho edition:

1) Among the sūtras and commentaries: Kia ye king, T 2027, vol. 49, p. 49b-7a. - A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 6, p. 150a-152c, and A yu wang chouan, T 2043, k. 3-4, p. 112a-114a25. - Po fan ni yuan king, T 5, k. 2, p. 175a-175b21 and Fan ni yuan king, T 6, k. 2, p. 190a-191a. - Three short extracts from Fen sie kong louen, T 1507; an extract from Ta pei king, T 380, k. 5, p. 971b11; an extract from Pou sa l'th'ou fai king, T 384, k. 7, p. 1054a-b.

Przyluski has purposely set aside the narrative of the council in the Milaśravīdān Vinaya. We will have to rely on the Chinese version of Ken pen chou... tua che, T 1451, k. 39, p. 402c-407c, the Tibetan version of Duha, XI, p. 651 sq., the English translation by E. Obermüller of Bu ston, II, p. 73-91. We should not forget the information furnished by the commentaries of Vasumitra. Cf. P. Demiéville, L'origine des sectes bouddhiques d'après Paramārtha, MCB, I, 1931-32, p. 25-30.

A detailed bibliography of earlier works on the first Council will be found in Mahāvāma, tr. Geiger, p. LI-LIV.

193 Similarly, it is said at length in the Ts'i fa king (Dharmasamgrahastātra)192. When the Buddha entered into nirvāṇa, the earth trembled six times, the rivers reversed their courses, a violent wind blew up in a tempest, black clouds arose on the horizon in the four directions. There was thunder and lightning, hail and rain came down in floods; here and there stars fell. Lions and other wild beasts began to howl; gods and men uttered great moans, all wailing: "The Buddha has passed into Nirvāṇa! Alas! the eye of the world (lokacakṣus) is extinguished." At the same time, plants, forests, grasses, trees, flowers and leaves suddenly split open. Samuera, king of mountains, trembled from its very base. Waves rose up in the sea, the earth quaked terribly. Mountains and cliffs crumbled, trees snapped and smoke arose from the four quarters of the horizon. There was great panic. Ponds and rivers became soiled with mud. The stars appeared in full daylight. People began to walk, the gods lamented, the goddesses choked with their tears. The āsākṣas suffered in silence; the āsākṣas told one another that all conditioned dharmas (samskṛtadharma) are transitory (anitā). Thus the gods, mānasas, yakṣhas, rākṣasas, gandaḥvaras, kimnaras, mahoragas and nāgas all felt great sadness.

The arhats who had crossed the sea of old age (jārī), sickness (vyādha) and death (marana) said to one another:

We have crossed the river of worldly passions, pounding correctly (yonīmamāntikāra) on the Dharma, I obtained the eye (cakṣus), knowledge (ijñāna), the ear (ārūṇa) and awakening (buddhi)."

We have destroyed old age, sickness and death with disgust.

We have seen that the body is like a chest containing four great serpents.\(^{193}\)

Now let us enter into the nirvāṇa of cessation without residue.

The great arhats everywhere, gave up their bodies at will in the mountains and forests, near rivers and springs, in the valleys and ravines, and entered into [67b] parinirvāṇa.\(^{194}\) Other arhats took their departure into the sky (ābhāsa) like the king of the swams (kaṇḍāraśja). They manifested all kinds of miraculous powers (rādhīhīla) so that the multitude of men might obtain pure faith (śravāvīduccuddha). Then, after their parinirvāṇa, the devas, from those of the six realms of desire (kāmaloka) up to those of the pure abodes (suśuddhāvīha), seeing that the arhats had all entered into nirvāṇa, had this thought: "The sun of Buddha has set. The disciples who cultivate all kinds of dhyāṇa, samādhi, liberations (vimoksaa) and wisdom, their light, too, is extinguished. Beings suffer all kinds of sickness: desire (rūga), hatred (dveṣa) and stupidity (moha). Now that these physicians of the Dharma (dharmabhātāyaśācārya) hasten to enter into nirvāṇa, who then will heal them? Like the lotus (pundarīka), the disciples, arisen in the immense ocean of wisdom, are now withered. The tree of the Dharma (dharmavyaksa) has been cut down; the cloud of Dharma (dharmamegha) has dissipated. The king of elephants (ajapata) of great wisdom has withdrawn, the offspring of the elephants (gaçiopa) follow after him. The merchants of the Dharma (dharmavarniy) have gone, from whom can we request the jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna)? A stanza says:

The Buddha has gone to rest forever: he has entered into Nirvāṇa.

The multitude of those who have destroyed the bonds has likewise departed. Thus the universe is empty and without knowledge.

The shadows of ignorance thicken, the lamp of knowledge is extinguished.

Then the devas prostrated at the feet of Mahākāyapa and uttered this stanza:

Elder! You have given up desire (rūga), anger (dghāla) and pride (māna).

Your body is like a column of red gold (rakṣasavrūnaśastambha).

From head to toe, you are majestic, marvelous, peerless, peerless.

The clarity of your eye is pure like the lotus.

Having praised him thus, they said to Mahākāyapa: "O venerable Kāyapa! Do you know, O Śākya, the ship of the Dharma (dharmadvau) is broken. The citadel of the Dharma (dharmamegara) is crumbling. The ocean of the Dharma (dharmadhārā) is drying up. The standard of the Dharma (dārmapatākā) is being turned upside down. The lamp of the Dharma (dārmapradāpa) is about to be extinguished. Those who proclaim the Dharma are about to leave. Those who practice the Path are becoming more and more rare. The power of the wicked is ever growing. In your great loving-kindness (mahābhāntā), it is necessary to found solidly (avasthāpyaya) the Buddhadharma."\(^{195}\)

Then the Great Kāyapa, whose mind is like a clear tranquil ocean, replied: "You have spoken truly. It is truly as you have said. Before long, the universe will be without knowledge (ākāma) and plunged into shadows." Then Kāyapa the Great, by his silence, accepted their invitation. The devas prostrated at the feet of Kāyapa the Great; at once they disappeared and returned home.

Then after some time, Kāyapa the Great thought: "What shall I do so that this great doctrine, acquired with difficulty by the Buddhā during three incalculable periods (asamkhya kalpa), will remain for a long time?" Having pondered thus, [he said]: "I know how to ensure a long life for this doctrine: it is necessary to compile the Śīraou tou lou (Sūtras), the A pî's t'an (Abhidharma) and the Pî ni (Vinaya) and make the three baskets of the Dharma (dharmapaduka). In this way, the Buddhadharma will last for a long time and the people of the ages to come will receive it and practice it. Why is that? From age to age, with painful effort and out of compassion (anuṣampād) the Buddha exerted himself to acquire this doctrine and has proclaimed it to men. We must likewise comply respectfully with the Buddhadharma, spread it and develop it."

Then, having pronounced these words, Kāyapa the Great went to the top of [67c] Mount Sumeru. He struck the bronze gandā\(^{196}\) and recited this stanza:

Disciples of the Buddha!

Keep well the memory of the Buddha.

We must recognize the benefits of the Buddha.

Do not enter into nirvāṇa.

The sound of the gandā and the sound of the words of Kāyapa the Great spread throughout the entire trichiliomegachiłość (trisāhasramahāsahāsralokahādādu) and all heard him. The disciples endowed with miraculous powers (rādhīhīla) assembled around Kāyapa the Great who said: "The Buddhadharma is about to be extinguished. The Buddha, who for three incalculable periods (asamkhya kalpa), by difficult effort and out of compassion (anuṣampād) for beings, has acquired this Dharma, has entered into parinirvāṇa. Those of his disciples who know the Dharma (dharmajāta), retain the Dharma (dharmadhāra)\(^{197}\)"

194 The parinirvāṇa of the arhats following the Buddha's death and the anxiety of the gods are also mentioned by the Kia āsa: "O venerable Kāyapa! Do you know, O Śākya, the ship of the Dharma (dharmadvau) is broken. The citadel of the Dharma (dharmamegara) is crumbling. The power of the wicked is ever growing. In your great loving-kindness (mahābhāntā), it is necessary to found solidly (avasthāpyaya) the Buddhadharma."\(^{195}\)

195 In the Kia ye kie king (Concile, p. 4) and also in the Legend of Aioka (Concile, p. 28), the devas and especially Śaka and the four devarūgas, invite Kāyapa to gather up the doctrine.

196 In the legend of Aioka (Concile, p. 28) also, Kāyapa called the assembly together by striking a gandā which resonated throughout Jambudvīpa and the trichiliom. - Other sources, Kia ye king, Tchouan tsan san tsang (Concile, p. 5, 95) simply say that Kāyapa called together the same gandā. - In the Pīsa sa t'hou'tai king (Concile, p. 126) Kāyapa sent his five hundred arhats to all the universes of the ten directions to announce the council. They brought back with them, in Sahāloka, 804,000 individuals. and recite the Dharma (dharma�hānakā), have all entered nirvāṇa along with the Buddha. Now that the Dharma is about to be lost, it is necessary to have the greatest compassion (kāraṇa) for beings to come. Having lost the eye of wisdom (prajñāvakus), they will be stupid and blind. In his great kindness and great compassion (mahāmaitrīkāraṇa), the Buddha has had pity for beings. We should respectfully comply with the Buddha's doctrine. Let us wait until we have compiled the baskets (pajāka) of the sacred words and then we will enter into nirvāṇa as we please.

197

All who had come to the assembly accepted this command and remained. Then Kāśyapa the Great chose a thousand individuals. 198 With the exception of Ānanda, all were arhats, having acquired the six superknowledges (ābhiṣiktā), liberation (vimokṣa) complete and without any doubt. All had acquired the three knowledges (vidyā), mastery of samādhi (samādhihīvatā). They could practice the samādhis in a forward or reverse direction (pratītāpatīmātātā). All were without obstacles (āraṇādhi). They recited the three baskets (pajāka) and understood the inner (ādhiptiśakta) and outer (ādhiśyā) 199 sacred scriptures. They recited and knew fully the eighteen kinds of great sīlas (cakṣusā) 200 and all of them were able to conquer the heterodox (pātāṇḍa) in debate.

Question - Since there were incalculable numbers of such arhats, why were only a thousand chosen and no more?

Answer - When king Pūṇa p'o so lo (Bimbhastha) found the Path, eighty-four thousand dignitaries also found the Path. Then the king decreed this command in the palace: “Let there always be enough rice to offer to a king Ajātaśatru: “Give us food. Let someone bring us our food each day. We are about to compile the baskets of the texts here and we will be unable to occupy ourselves with anything else.”

In this place, at the time of the summer retreat (vassa), the fifteenth day of the third month, at the time of the recitation of the precepts (kīla), having gathered together the samgha, Kāśyapa the Great entered into samādhi. With his divine eye (dhyānakus), he contemplated to see if, in the present assembly, there was someone who had not yet completely subdued the afflictions (klesa) whom it was necessary to expel. Ānanda was the only person who had not completely subdued them. The other 999 had already destroyed the impurities (āshoṣṭhāṇa); they were pure (visuddha) and stainless (vināsī). Kāśyapa the Great, coming out of samādhi, led Ānanda by the hand out of the assembly and said to him: “Here in this pure assembly, they are going to recite the texts. Your bonds (bandhana) are not yet suppressed, you must not stay here.”

Then Ānanda wept with shame and thought: “For twenty-five years I accompanied the Bhagavat; I served him; I was at his disposal.204 I have never yet suffered such great sorrow. The Buddha was truly venerable, compassionate and patient.” Having had this thought, he said to Kāśyapa the Great: “In the long run, I would have had the strength to find the Path, but in the Buddhadharmā, arhats must not serve anyone, must not be at the disposal of anyone, must not carry anyone’s orders. It is for that reason that I have kept a trace of bonds (bandhana) and have not completely broken them.”

Kāśyapa the Great said: “However, you have committed faults (āpaṭṭha). The Buddha was unwilling that women should leave home. You insistently begged the Buddha to allow them to practice the Path. For this reason, the proper law of the Buddha will be exhausted at the end of five hundred years and will diminish. In this you have committed a dukṣṛta faulty.206 Ānanda said: “I was sorry for Kiu t‘an mi (Gautami).”

(Mahāśaṃghika Vinaya, T 1425, k. 32, p. 490c; Legge, Fa-hien, p. 85); a cave situated on the north side of mount Dikṣū (Hsiao-tang in Watters, Travels, II, p. 160); the cave of Nyagrodha (Dalwa in Rockhill, Life, p. 151). 201 When he was fifty years old, after twenty years of ministry, the Buddha attached Ānanda to himself as an apatikyaśaka. Before accepting this duty, Ānanda had set conditions: never to share the food or clothing of the Buddha, not to accompany him on his visits among lay people, always to have access to him. See Che tch‘ō king (Upāñyāsakūṭra) in Tch‘ang a han, T 26 (no. 33), k. 8, p. 471c–475a, the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya (Rockhill, Life, p. 88), and other later works, such as Wen kiu, comm. on Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, T 1718, k. 2, p. 18b. - The apatikyaśaka does not have its correspondent in the Pāli canon, but reappears in Buddhist authors’ comments in a more elaborate form, where the conditions set by Ānanda increase to eight: Manorātha, I, p. 294–296; Comm. on the Theragāthā in Rh. D., Boddhis., p. 350–352; Hardy, Manual, p. 234–235. 202 In all the accounts of the council, Kāśyapa reproached Ānanda with a number of faults: two in the case of the Fen pie kong lī joun (Concil., p. 126–122); four in the Tch‘ouan t‘i sin t‘ang (ibid., p. 97–98); five in the Pāli Vinaya (ibid., p. 156–159); six in the Mahāśaṃghika Vinaya (ibid., p. 148–153), the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya (ibid., p. 232–234) and the legend of Akoja (ibid., p. 47–51); seven in the Dharmaqaśīna Vinaya (ibid., p. 182–186), the Mahāśaṃghika Vinaya (ibid., p. 214–215), the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya and the Parinītavāsūtra (ibid., p. 83); nine in the Kia kie kia king (ibid., p. 13–15). - The Mppī counts six faults but enumerates only five. 203 The institution of the order of nuns at Ānanda’s request is related in the Vinaya, II, p. 253 (tr. Rh. D.–Oldenberg, III, p. 320); Auiguttara, IV, p. 274; Tch‘ong a han, T 26 (no. 116), k. 28, p. 605a: K‘iu t‘an mi ki kouo king, T 60; Ta feng pien
Moreover, in the doctrine of the Buddhas of the three times (tryadhvan), there are always four categories of disciples. Why would our Buddha Śākyamuni be the only one not to have them?

Kāśyapa the Great again said: “When the Buddha was about to enter into nirvāṇa, he came to the city of Kiśa ni (Kusināgar). He was suffering from a backache. Four upper robes (uṭtarāśaṅgī) were laid down one on top of another; he lay down and said to you: ‘I need some water.’ You did not give him any. In that you committed a dukkha fault.”207 Ānanda replied: “At that time, five hundred chariots were crossing the stream, making the water turbid and impure. This is why I did not take any.” Kāśyapa the Great again said: “Exactly, if the water was impure, the Buddha had miraculous power (ādibhātā) strong enough to purify an ocean of impure water. Go and confess your dukkha faults.”

Again Kāśyapa the Great said: “The Buddha summoned you: a man learned in the practice of the four bases of miraculous power (ādibhātā) could remain in this world for a kalpa or a fraction of a kalpa. You remained silent without answering. He questioned you three times and you remained silent. If you had answered him, the Buddha, learned in the practice of the four bases of miraculous power, would [68b] have remained in this world for a kalpa or a fraction of a kalpa. Because of you, the Buddha has prematurely entered into nirvāṇa. In that, you have committed a dukkha fault.”208 Ānanda said: “Mitra

---

1) Tch'ang a han, T 1 (no. 2), k. 3, p. 19c: Being thirsty, the Buddha asked Ānanda three times in succession to go and fill his bowl at a river. Ānanda replied that the water had just been disturbed by the passing of five hundred chariots and suggested that he go to get water from the Kakutsthā river. Then an asura, converted to Buddhism, filled a bowl “with water purified eight times” and offered it to the Buddha who accepted it out of compassion for him. - It is this refusal of the water which is blamed on Ānanda in all the narratives of the first Council with the exception of the Pāli Āsamatavagga.
2) Fo pao ngen king, T 156, k. 5, p. 152; Ta ngai tao pi K'ieou ni king, T 1425, k. 30, p. 471a; Sseu feu liu, T 1428, k. 48, p. 92c; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 15; Ken pen chou… tsa che, T 1451, k. 29-30, p. 350b. - This instituting is also narrated in Sanskrit in the fragments of the Bhikṣuśnkaravacana published by C. M. Ridding and L. de La Vallée Poussin in BSOS, 1, 1920, p. 124-125.

207 This episode is told in very different ways in the texts:
1) T'o'ng' an han, T 1 (no. 2), k. 3, p. 19c: Being thirsty, the Buddha asked Ānanda three times in succession to go and fill his bowl at a river. Ānanda replied that the water had just been disturbed by the passing of five hundred chariots and suggested that he go to get water from the Kakutsthā river. Then an asura, converted to Buddhism, filled a bowl “with water purified eight times” and offered it to the Buddha who accepted it out of compassion for him. - It is this refusal of the water which is blamed on Ānanda in all the narratives of the first Council with the exception of the Pāli Āsamatavagga.
2) Fo pao ngen king, T 156, k. 5, p. 152; Ta ngai tao pi K'ieou ni king, T 1425, k. 30, p. 471a; Sseu feu liu, T 1428, k. 48, p. 92c; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 15; Ken pen chou… tsa che, T 1451, k. 29-30, p. 350b. - This instituting is also narrated in Sanskrit in the fragments of the Bhikṣuśnkaravacana published by C. M. Ridding and L. de La Vallée Poussin in BSOS, 1, 1920, p. 124-125.

208 This reproach is not the same in all the narratives.
kind, he dwells constantly in closed retreat. He abides in the calmness of the mind (cittasamatha). He knows the Vinaya- and Dharmapitaka. Now he abides in the heavens of the Che li cha chou yuan (Śrīṭavaṇa).\textsuperscript{211} Let a messenger be sent to ask him to come.

Kāśyapa the Great said to a recently ordained bhikṣu:\textsuperscript{212} “Are you under the orders of the saṃgha?” The recently ordained bhikṣu answered: “What does the saṃgha command?” Kāśyapa the Great said: “The saṃgha requests you to go to the heavens of the Śrīṭavaṇa, to the dwelling of the arhat Gavāṃṭapi.”

Carried away with joy, the bhikṣu received the orders of the saṃgha. He said to Kāśyapa the Great: “When I have reached the arhat Gavāṃṭapi, what shall I say to him?” Kāśyapa the Great said: “When you arrive there, you will say to Gavāṃṭapi: Kāśyapa the Great and the other arhats who have destroyed the impurities (kṣīṇaṇa) have all assembled in Yeu fou ri (Jambudvīpa). There is great business for the saṃgha related to the doctrine. Come quickly.”

\textsuperscript{[68c]} The recently ordained bhikṣu protruded himself before the saṃgha (saṃgham tirāvahīvandya), and circumambulated it three times to the right (triḥpradaksinikārya). Like the bird with golden wings (garudā), he took his leave into space. He came to Gavāṃṭapi, prostrated and said to him: “O venerable, gentle and kind, you have few desires (alpaçccha), you know how to be content with little (alupamārtha samassatā), you are ever in contemplation (samātmāśāsa). Kāśyapa the Great addresses himself to you in these words: ‘Now there is great business for the saṃgha related to the doctrine. Hasten to come down to see the assembly [like] gathered jewels.’” Then Gavāṃṭapi had some doubts; he said to this bhikṣu: “Does not the saṃgha have some quarrelsome subject (vivadbavana), that it calls upon me? Are there not some schisms in the saṃgha (saṃghabhedā)? Has the Buddha, this sun, been extinguished?” The bhikṣu said: “It is truly as you have said. The great master (mahācārya), the Buddha, has gone into nirvāṇa.” Gavāṃṭapi said: “How quickly has the Buddha entered into nirvāṇa! The eye of the world (lokacakṣus) is extinguished! My upādhyāya Chāli fou (Śrīpatrā), the chief [of the doctrine], who could turn the wheel of the Dharma like the Buddha, where is he now?” He replied: “He has already entered into nirvāṇa.” Gavāṃṭapi said: “The great teachers are far away. What resources are left for us? Mo ho mou k'ye lien (Mahāmahāgalākṣāyana), where is he now?” The bhikṣu answered: “He also has entered into nirvāṇa.” Gavāṃṭapi said: “The Buddhadharma is going to dissolve. The great men are gone. Beings will mourn.”

He asked: What is the ayumāt Ānanda doing now?” The bhikṣu answered: “Since the Buddha's nirvāṇa, the ayumāt Ānanda weeps with sorrow and despair.” Gavāṃṭapi said: “Ānanda’s remorse comes from the fact that he is still in the bondage of passion (ananuyābadhāna) and [for him] the separation gives rise to suffering. What has become of Lo heou lo (Rāhula)?” He replied: “Having obtained artheathood, Rāhula has neither grief nor sorrow. He contemplates only the nature of impermanence (anitiyalakṣaṇa) of the dharmas,” Gavāṃṭapi said: “It is difficult to break the afflictions and having broken them, to be without sadness.” Gavāṃṭapi said: “I have lost the great Teacher free of desires (vibhāraṇa). What is the use of remaining in Śrīṭavaṇa? My upādhyāya and the great teachers all have entered nirvāṇa. I can no longer go down to Jambudvīpa. May I remain here in order to enter parinirvāṇa.”

\textsuperscript{[69a]} Having spoken these words, he entered samādhi and leapt into space. His body emitted light rays (rāmiṇi) and water and fire.\textsuperscript{213} With his hands he touched the sun and moon and manifested all kinds of miracles (pratīkārya). From his mind there emanated flames that consumed his body. From within his body came water which flowed in four streams as far as Kāśyapa the Great. From the water there came a voice that pronounced this stanza:

Gavāṃṭapi salutes by bowing his head
To the saṃgha of venerable ones, the excellent supreme saṃgha.

Having learned of the Buddha's nirvāṇa, [he said]: "I am leaving in my turn."

Thus, when the great elephant departs, the little one follows him

Then the recently ordained bhikṣu, carrying the robe and bowl, returned to the saṃgha.

At that moment, Ānanda reflected [on the nature] of dharmas and sought to exhaust his last impurities (āśā). During the night, he sat in dhīyāna, walked to and fro, and sought the Path (mārga) anxiously and zealously. Ānanda's wisdom (prajñā) was great, but his power of samādhi was weak. That is why he did not obtain the Path immediately. If his power of concentration had been equal to his wisdom, he would have quickly obtained [the Path]. Finally, when the night was almost over, he was very tired, he lay down. Now, on lying down to reach his pillow (tīmbohana), just as his head touched it, suddenly he attained enlightenment.\textsuperscript{214} As a bolt of lightning drives away the shadows, he saw the Path. Then Ānanda entered the diamond-like (vajra) samādhi and crushed the mountain of all the afflictions (kleśa). He obtained the three knowledge (vijñāna), the six superknowledges (abhijñā), complete liberation (vimokṣa) and became an arhat of great power.

Then, during the night, he went to the door of the hall where the saṃgha was gathered, knocked at the door and called. Kāśyapa the Great asked: “Who is knocking at the door?” He answered: “It is I, Ānanda!” Kāśyapa the Great said: “Why have you come?” Ānanda replied: “Tonight I have destroyed the impurities (āśrayakṣaṇa).” Kāśyapa the Great said: “The door is not open to you. Enter through the key-hole.” Ānanda answered: “So be it!” Then, thanks to his miraculous power (oddhūlā), he entered by way of the keyhole.\textsuperscript{215} He prostrated at the feet of the monks and confessed [his faults], saying: “O Great Kāśyapa! Do not recriminate!” Kāśyapa the Great touched his hand to Ānanda’s head and said: “I did it intentionally for your own good so that you would find the Path. Do not hold a grudge against me. In this manner, I

\textsuperscript{212} Pūrṇa or Suprabuddha according to other sources.

\textsuperscript{211} For this individual, see Vinaya, I, p. 19; Dīgha, II, p. 356; Theragāthā, v. 38; Sumatagala, III, p. 8.14. Przyłęski (Concile, p. 255) identifies him as a god of dryness and of wind.

\textsuperscript{213} These are twin miracles (saṃsāravrātākārya) which the Buddha accomplished on many occasions (Niulanakāthā, p, 77, 88, 193; Mahāvastu, III, p. 115; Divyavedāna, p. 161, 378) and which the saints often produced at the time of entering nirvāṇa (see below, k. 3, p. 79a, Mahākāśyapa's nirvāṇa).

\textsuperscript{214} Cf. Vinaya, II, p. 286: apattai ca sitvam bimbobhamam bhūmito ca pādã mutta. This strange detail is noted by almost all the sources: Legend of Aiko (Concile, p. 36); Mahāśāsaka Vinaya (p. 140), Dhamagupta Vinaya (p. 175), Mahāsāṃghika Vinaya (p. 208) and Milaavavavīdī Vinaya (Rockhill, Life, p. 156).

\textsuperscript{215} In the Mahāsāṃghika Vinaya (Concile, p. 209), Ānanda found the door shut, but did not enter through the keyhole.
have brought you to realize yourself. Thus, when one, with one's hand, paints space, space is not filled. In the same way, the mind of an arhat who is at the center of all dharmas is not affected. Take you former place."

At this time, the sangha deliberated in these terms: "Gavāmpati has entered nirvāṇa. Is there anybody else who is able to compile the basket of the Dharma (dharmapiṭaka)? The āyuṣmat Aniruddha said: "There is the āyuṣmat Ānanda. Among the Buddha's disciples, he has always served the Buddha and lived close to him. He has heard the texts, has been able to remember them, and the Buddha has constantly praised him and approved of him. This Ānanda could compile the texts." Then the āyuṣmat Mahākāśyapa touched Ānanda's head and said to him: "The Buddha entrusted you to keep (dhārayati) the basket of the Dharma. You should be grateful for the blessings of the Buddha. In what place did the Buddha first explain the Dharma? The great disciples of the Buddha who were able to keep the basket of the Dharma have all entered nirvāṇa. There is only you. Now, in accord with the Buddha's mind and out of compassion for beings, you must compile the basket of the Buddhadharma." Then, prostrating before the sangha, Ānanda sat down on the lion-seat (simhāsana). Then Kāśyapa the Great recited these stanzas:

The Buddha is the holy king of the lions.
Ānanda is the son of the Buddha.
Seated on the lion's seat
He contemplates the assembly lacking the Buddha.
Just as the assembly of the venerable ones
Lacking the Buddha, has lost its power (prabhāva),
So in the moonless night
The constellations are without charm.
O great sage, speak!
Son of the Buddha, you must explain
In what place the Buddha spoke for the first time.
You must reveal it now.

Then the āyuṣmat Ānanda, with one-pointed mind (ekacitta), joined his palms, turned towards the place of the Buddha's nirvāṇa and spoke thus:

When the Buddha preached the Dharma for the first time,
I did not see it.
Thus have I heard by tradition (paramparayā):
The Buddha was living at Vārāṇasī.

For the five bhikṣus, the Buddha
Opened the gate of the immortal for the first time.
He preached the sermon of the four truths:
The truths of suffering, its origin its cessation and the path.
Ājñāta, Kaṇḍinya,
Were the first to attain the vision of the Path.
A multitude of eighty thousand devas
All penetrated into the course of the Path likewise.

Having heard these words, the thousand arhats rose up into space to the height of seven to lo (tāla) trees.
They all said: "Alas! The power of impermanence (anityatābala) is great! In the same way as we saw with our own eyes the Buddha preaching the Dharma, here now he is speaking and we are listening!" Then they uttered these stanzas:

We have seen the marks of the Buddha's body,
Like a mountain of fine gold.
These marvelous marks have lost their virtue,
That is why it is necessary, by every possible means,
To endeavor to leave the three worlds
By accumulating zealously the roots of good.
Nirvāṇa is the supreme happiness.

Then the āyuṣmat Aniruddha uttered this stanza:

Alas! The universe is impermanent
Like the moon (reflected in the water) and like the banana tree.
The one whose merits fill the three worlds
Has been destroyed by the wind of impermanence.

Then Kāśyapa the Great also uttered these stanzas:
The power of impermanence is very great.
Stupid people and wise people, poor and rich, whether they have or have not found the path, no-one can escape it. Neither skillful words nor marvelous jewels nor lies nor strenuous protestations (allow one to escape from it). Like a fire that consumes everything, such is the law of impermanence.

Kālayapa the Great said to Ānanda:216 “From the Tchouan fa louen king (Dharmaçaakra-pravartana-astūra) up to the Ta phan nî p'ou'n (Mahāparinirvāna-astūra), the collection forms the four A han (Āgama): 1. Tseng yi a han (Ekottarāgama), 2. Tcheng a han (Madhyamāgama), 3. Tek'ung a han (Dīrghāgama), 4. Siang ying a han (Samṣukūgama). This is what is called the Basket of the Dharma of the Śūtras (stūrapitaka).”217

216 The end of this chapter tells about the compilation of the Buddhist scriptures. The formation of the canon or canons has already been the object of many studies, the list of which is in Winternitz, Litteatur, II, p. 1, n. 1, and in Lav., Dogme et philosophie, p. 198. It is important to take the Pāli canon down from its pedestal where Rhy's Davids and Oldenberg have placed it. On this subject, see S. Lévi, Observations sur une langue precanonicte du Bouddhisme, JA, Nov.-Dec. 1912, p. 511; Przyłęski, Concile, p. 333-365; F. Weller, Die Ueberlieferung des älteren buddhistischen Schrifttums, AM, IV, 1928-39, p. 149-182; A. B. Keith, The Home of Pāli, BS, XXXI, p. 747.

The great arhats asked further: “Who can clearly bring together the basket of the Vinaya (vinayapitaka)?” They all said: “The āyuṣmat You p'o li (Upāli). Of the five hundred arhats, he is foremost of those who maintain the discipline (vinayadhara). Let us invite him now.” Then they invited him with these words: “Get up and sit on the lion-seat (śītraṅkṣi), and tell us in what place the Buddha first enunciated the Vinaya and collected the precepts (śītraṅkṣa).” Upāli received the orders of the saṅgha. Seated on the lion-seat, he said: “Thus have I heard: once the Buddha was at Pīṭhā chi li (Vaishālī). At that time, Sīa t'na (Sudinna) son of the householder Kiu tan tō (Kaland) conceived a lustful desire for the first time.”218

(1-3) The Explanations relative to the 250 Precepts (paścasiaddhiyātasaṅsārṇayapakānāthārtha) in three sections (varga), (4) the Seven Precepts (saptadhara), (5) the Eight Precepts (aṣṭadhara), (6) the Pi k'ieou ni pi ni (bhikṣaṇabhāṣa), (7) the Tseng yi (Ekottara), (8) the You p'o li wen (Upālīparipṛcchāḥ), (9) the Tsu pu (Kuḍārakavarga), these 80 sections (varga) form the Basket of the Discipline (vinayapitaka).219

Again the arhats had this thought: “Who can clearly bring together the basket of the A p'i t'an (Abhidharmapitaka)?” They thought: “Among the five hundred arhats, the āyuṣmat Ānanda is the foremost of those who explain the śūtras. Let us invite him.” Then they invited him with these words: “Get up and go to sit on the lion-seat (simhāsana). In what place did the Buddha first preach the Abhidharma?” Ānanda received the orders of the saṃgha. Seated on the lion-seat, he said: “Thus have I heard: once the Buddha was dwelling in the city of Cīrī pī’s īḷī (Srīvastī). At that time, the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: ‘Those in whom the five fears (bhaya), the five sins (āpatti) and the five hatreds (suvira) have not been suppressed and extinguished experience innumerable evils in this life in their bodies and their minds for this reason and, in subsequent lives, they fall into the bad destinies (durgaṭi). Those who do not have the five fears, the five sins and the five hatreds, for this reason are, in this life, happy in every way in body and mind and, in subsequent existences, they are reborn in the heavens (svarga) or in a pleasant abode (subhāvāśrī). What are the five fears that must be discarded? 1. Murder (prātātāpāta), 2. theft (adhatādana), 3. illicit sexual relationships (kāmānimittadhātra), 4. falsehood (miyādāvā), 5. alcoholic drinks (madhyaśāpānah).220 All of this is called the Basket of the Abhidharma (abhidharmapāṭikā).

[70a] When the three baskets of the doctrine were brought together, the devas, asuras, nīgas and devis made offerings of all kinds. They rained down celestial flowers (nuspa), perfumes (gandha), banners (paṭikā), parasols (chattra) and heavenly garments (vastra), to pay homage to the doctrine. Then they recited this stanza:

Out of compassion for the universe
The three baskets of the Dharma have been collected.
The omniscient one who has the ten strengths (daiaśala).
The wisdom of his words is the lamp that destroys ignorance.

Question. - What is the origin of the subseuent existences, they are reborn in the heavens (sūtra). They rained down celestial flowers (chattra), and, in subsequent lives, they fall into the bad destinies (vast). 101

Answer. - 1. When the Buddha was in this world, the doctrine did not meet any opposition. After the Buddha had departed, when the doctrine was recited for the first time, it was still as it was in the time when the Buddha was alive. - A hundred years later, king A chou kia (Asoka) brought together a great assembly of five hundred (pālavacsarsparṣād) and the great masters of the dharma debated.222 As a result of their dialogues, the Abhidharma of the Basket came to be formed (āṣā). That is why, in later centuries, the Basket is called the Basket of the Abhidharma.

Concilium Bddhāṃghāmaśīla, T 1531, p. 136-137 (tr. D. Caro, in Concile Bddhāṃghāmaśīla, pp. 138-139).

Note: In this recitation of the Abhidharma noticed by Ānanda, the Buddha explained the five fears in question here: Patucus, gahubatī, bhīvanī vṛtti... vacati suktarī ca upapajāti.

With the exception of errors, the same sūtra has no correspondent in the Chinese āgamas. The Pāli Aṅguttara was able to incorporate into the Nikāyas a sermon held by other schools to be part of the Basket of the Abhidharma.

221 Prajñāsu, Concile, p. 72, translates ‘the Abhidharma in eight bim tōu (ākhaṇḍa) and the Abhidharma in six sections’. Later we will see the justification for the Sanskrit titles proposed here.

222 An allusion to the second Buddhist Council and to the first doctrinal schism that ended in the formation of two separate schools, that of the Sthāvira and that of the Mahāsāṃghika. The Mppi is strictly dependent upon the Kashmir tradition represented by:

1) the Mahāvibhāṣa, T 1545, k. 99, p.510c-512a.

3) Paramārtha’s commentary on the preceding treatise, a commentary extracts of which are incorporated into the San jōna Anan sī by Ki tsang (T 1852, p. 84-c) and the Sararājanī kāvyākha by Chikkan T 2380, p. 455b-456b translated by P. Demiéville, L’origine des sectes bouddhiques, MCB, I, 1931-33, p.30-40.

4) The Sī yī ī by Hsuan tsang T 2087, k. 3, p.886b; tr. Beal, I, p. 150-151; tr. Watters, Travels, I, p. 267-269, which is inspired directly by the Mahāvibhāṣa.

P. Demiéville has summarized this tradition: “It was only in the time of the second Council, held at Pāṭaliputra in the 116th year after the nirvāṇa, in the reign of king Asoka, that the controversies provoked by the heresiarch Mahādeva caused a real doctrinal schism that resulted in the formation of two separate schools, the school of the Elders (Sthāvira) and the school of the Great Assembly (Mahāsāṃghika). Mahādeva’s heresy was twofold: on the one hand, he claimed to incorporate into the three baskets the sūtras of the Greater Vehicle, and on the other hand, he professed five theses tending to concede to the sātras, arhats or stotapānas, various imperfections such as the faculty of being physically tainted, doubt, a certain ignorance, etc. According to the Mahāvibhāṣa, the argument was decided by Asoka in favor of Mahādeva. Paramārtha seems to wish to spare the memory of the pious monarch; according to him, it was the queen, circumvented by her lover Mahādeva, who had the adversaries of the heresiarch thrown into the Ganges. But the latter, using their magical powers, fled to Kashmir, where the king soon had them sought out. According to the Yāttīrah, they refused to leave Kashmir (where, later on, according to a tradition which is, however, debatable, the Vīḷābīḍhāṣa itself was composed). According to Paramārtha, they accepted Asoka’s invitation and returned to Pāṭaliputra where, Mahādeva having died, the two schools came together for a new Council in order to purify the five famous theses. And it was then, Paramārtha tells us, that the real schism was produced and the two schools separated.

Bhavya’s Sāke pa la da d par bha⊥ sa vam bha⊥ bha⊥ pia (Bhātān-āgara, Mdo igher, XC, 12) tr. in Walliser, Sākon des altes Buddhīsmus, Heidelberg, 1927, p.78-93), tells of a twofold tradition: One Council regarding Mahādeva’s five points was held at Pāṭaliputra in the 157th year after the nirvāṇa, under kings Nanda and Mahāpadma, and ended in the splitting of the Sthāvira and the Mahāsāṃghika (Walliser, p.81-82). - In the 160th year after the nirvāṇa, under the reign of Dharmākṣa in Pāṭaliputra, some arguments [on the five points of Mahādeva] provoked a schism in the community which divided the Mahāsāṃghika and the Sthāvira (ibid, p. 78).

The sources noted so far constitute a relatively homogeneous group that I [Lamotte] would like to call the Kashmir tradition. Deliberately or not, it seems to ignore another group of traditions related to the second Buddhist Council which was held at Vāsīḷā in order to condemn ten innovations (dauv vaṭha) introduced into the discipline of the monks of Vāsīḷā. The references gathered by W. Geiger in his introduction to the Mahāvāṃsa, p. LIV-LVI and by L. De la Vallée Poussin in ERE, IV, p. 179-185, art. Councils, are not sufficient to get an idea of the question. Here is a summary of the sources:

a. The Council of Vāsīḷā took place in the 100th year after the nirvāṇa, according to the Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 294-307 (tr. Rh. D.- Oldenberg, III, p. 386-414; Muson, 1905, p. 258-312); Wou fen tiou, T 1421, k. 30, p. 1964-1964; Mo ho seng k’i tiou, T 1425, k. 33, p. 493a-z (does not give the date); Ssei fen tiou, T 1428, k. 54, p. 906b-97c; Sanamatanākṣa (in Vinaya II, p. 294i-296i, and the Chan kien tiou p’i p’u cha, T 1462, k. 16, p. 677c; P’i ni mou king, T 1463, k. 4, p. 819b; Fa hien tchouan, T2005 (tr. Legge, p. 77).

b. The Council of Vāsīḷā took place in the 110th year after the nirvāṇa according to the Che song liu, T 1435, k. 60-61, p. 450b-456b ; Ken pen cho : tsa che, T 1451, k. 40, p. 411-c14b, with the Tibetan correspondent in Duluwa, XI, p. 323-330, of which there is a translation in Bl u suton (Obermiller), II, p. 91-96; Tāranātha, p. 41b2 (who proposes different dates); Hsuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 7, p. 890b (tr. Beal, II, p. 74-75; tr. Watters, Traveli, II, p. 73-77).
differences, two distinct sects (nikāyas) subsequently developed, [each] having a name. - Finally a Brahmin monk named Kīya icham yon (Kātyāyana), wise and of keen faculties (ārāmcariya), completely recited the three Basket texts (tripitaka), the inner and outer texts (ādhyātmitkasuttavāra). Wishing to explain the words of the Buddha, he compiled the Fa iche king pa kien tou (Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha). The

c. According to the Singhalese chronicles, the second Council was held at Vaisālī in the 19th year after the nirvāṇa under the reign of Kāliśāka (Dīpavamsa, IV, v. 44, 47; Mahāvamsa, IV, v. 8) and according to the Dīpavamsa (IV, v. 30-39), the Viśputrakas who had been excommunicated at the Council, in their turn held a great assembly (mahāsamghīṭa) whose name was the Mahāśāṃghika sect. - The Singhalese sources are also the only ones to note the existence of a third Council which was held at Pāṭaliputra under the chairmanship of Tissa Moggaliputta in the 236th year of the nirvāṇa (Dīpavamsa, VII, v. 34-59), which was the seventeenth year of Aśoka's reign (Mahāvamsa, V, v. 288). Tissa had missionaries adopted by the Elders of Kathāvatthu (Dīpavamsa, VII, v. 41, 56-58; Mahāvamsa, V, v. 278) and sent them everywhere. If the Kāśmirin tradition is compared with the traditions relating to the Council of Vaisālī, it is seen that it has nothing in common with the sources enumerated under a. and b., but that it does have points in common with the Singhalese chronicles (cf. W. Geiger, Die Sekten des alten Buddhismus, Calcutta, 1925; M. Walleser, Die Sekten des alten Buddhismus, Berlin, 1908). According to concordant information, he may have been the author of the Patickāpadeva (Gandharvanāma, p. 59, attributes this work to him. - The Mppi, k. 2, p. 79-20-23 says: "Mahākātyāyana, during the lifetime of the Buddha, explained the words of the Buddha and made a Fa iche (Pāṭika), box-collection' in the Tēn language, which, until today, is used in southern India." - Paramārtha (in P. Demićvile, Origine des sectes, p. 49-50) says: "In the time when the Buddha was in the world, Mahākātyāyana exposed a āśira to explain the Āgama sūtras of the Buddha." (This again concerns the Patickāpadeva and the Abhidharmāṇāṭāparāṇa.)

[The Patickāpadeva is a well-known work: cf. R. Fuchs, Specimen des Patickāpadeva, Berlin, 1908. According to E. Hardy, Nettipakara, p. 8, vi., it dates from the beginning of our era. It is a semi-canonical work: the Singhalese tradition rejects it among the extra-canonical books; by contrast, the Mppi includes it among the Abhidharmas, and the Burmese Buddhist countries include it, along with the Pettipakara, the Suttasaṅγhala, and the Milindapāṇi, in the canonical collection of the Khuṭakānukīya (cf. M. Bode, Pāṭīl Literature of Burma, London, 1909, p. 1-94). The Patickāpadeva is one of the main sources of Buddhaghoṣa's Viṣṇudhamma and Upatissā's Viśukānika (cf. P.V. Bapat, Viṣṇudhamma and Viṣṇudhamma, Poona, 1937, p. XXV). - According to the evidence of Helmer Smith (in Prayukti, Concile, p. 75, n. 6), it is still in use in Ceylon.]

There, it is said, lived Kātyāyana, the author of the Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha. - Here also (p. 70a10-12) the Mppi tells us that after the Council of Aśoka (therefore, according to its accounting, in the 200th year after the Nirvāṇa) Kātyāyana composed the Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha. This date was confirmed by Paramārtha (in Demićvile, p. 50) who informs us "that in the 200th years, Kātyāyana left Lake Anavatapta, came to the country of Magadha into the Mahāśāṃghika sect, where he established distinctions related to the text of the Tripitaka...; those who accepted his teachings formed a separate school called 'the school that generaties distinctions'; these were the disciples of Mahākātyāyana." Actually, Kātyāyana was not a Mahāśāṃghika, but a pure Sārīputrāṇa. Paramārtha later corrects himself (p. 53-55) in associating Kātyāyana with the beginnings of the Sārīputrāṇa school which was formed at the beginning of the 3rd century after the nirvāṇa. It was a Sārīputrāṇa, but the sources do not agree either on the place of origin or on the date of this work. We have just seen that the Mppi locates it at the Council of Aśoka, therefore in the 200th years after the Nirvāṇa. - According to the Vibhāṣa (T 1545, k. 5, p. 21c), "when the Bhadanta (Kātyāyana) composed the Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha, he was living in the East; this is why he cites [T 1544, k. 1, p. 916c] the five rivers known in the East." - According to Husan tsang, Si yu ti (T 2087, k. 4, p. 896c), "three hundred years after the nirvāṇa, the āśira master Kātyāyana composed the Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha in Tāmajana," near Chau buk in the right bank of the Bielor (cf. Watters, I, p. 294-295). - According to Paramārtha in his Life of Vasubandhu (T 2049, p. 189a) it is "in the five hundred years after the nirvāṇa of the Buddha that Kātyāyana of the Sārīputrāṇa school went to Kashmir where he gathered 500 arhats and 500 bodhisattvas to compile the Abhidharma of his school; the result of this compilation was the Asūgamata, also called Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha." The Mppi designates this work as Fa iche king pa kien tou. In a pinch, one could take this to mean, as do Przyǒski, "Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha in eight挥 (93 and 9) tou (touhōu)," but Paramārtha, in his Life of Vasubandhu (T 2049, p. 189a) explains that 93 (5 and 10) tou is equivalent to 94 tou (nine and 5; 140 and 17; and 9 and), i.e., grantha; this is why I [Lamotte] have restored the title as Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha. It is actually known that the Asūgamatabhādharma, or the Abhidharma in Eight Volumes, is a synonym of the Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha (cf. J. Takusokusa, Abhidharma Literature of the Sārīputrāṇa, IPTS, 1905, p. 82, n. 2; Lav. Introduction to the Kośa, p. XXX). The Jānanapradhāṇaṭagrantha is cited several times in the Kośa yā khyā of Vasubandhu (p. 89-12, 52, 116, 157, 694); it follows from these citations that the work was in Sanskrit and was subdivided into skandhakas. - We have two Chinese versions: 1. A p'i tan kien tou loun (Abhidharmāṭāparāṇaṭagrantha, T 1543, translated at Lo yang in 383 by Sa nghādeva and Tchou fo nien; first chapter (śaṅkhāraka) deals with the supreme worldly dharmas (laukikāgra-dharma). Subsequently, his disciples made it from a Pīṭha (Vibhūtā) for people of age to come who could not completely understand the Astaghātra (or Jñānaprasthāṇa). 225

2. Some say: In the Lieuea fen a p’i’r an (Śaṅkādibhiṣṭha) the third part in eight chapters (p’i’n = parivarta) is called Fen p’ie che t'chou (Lokadhiṭṭhārabheda?); this is the third part of the Leou t’an king in six parts; it is the work of Maudgalyāyana. 228 In the [Abhidharma] in six parts, the first part contains eight chapters (p’i’n); four are the work of the bodhisattva Po siu mi (Vasumitra) and four others the work of the arhats of K’i’pin (Kaussi) 229. The other five parts are the work of the Leou y’i che (apadākārya).

3. Some say: When the Buddha was in this world, Śāriputra composed the Abhidharma in order to explain the words of the Buddha. Later, the Tou tseu (Vatsiputrya) monks recited [this work]. To this day, this is what is called the Chou li fou a p’i’r an (Śaṅkāpūṭhabhāṣa). 230

225 This is a question of the Prakauranāḍī (T1541 and 1542) which actually consists of eight chapters: Pañcādharma-vibhaṅga, Jñānavibhaṅga, Ayataṇavibhaṅga, Sattapāṭhāravibhaṅga, Aṣṭaṭāvibhaṅga, Pratibhāvibhaṅga, Sahārasariputrapāṭhāvibhaṅga, Nirvedavibhaṅga. If the Mppi is to be believed, only the first four would be the work of Vasumitra.

228 This is an introduction to the Abhidharma by P’o so wu che (Pāṇḍava), a commentator who had as upper disciple the bodhisattva P’o so wu mi (Vasumitra) and was the work of the Buddha Mahāvajra (cf. Bagchi, I, p. 161; II, p. 489).

229 This is a question of the Prakauranāḍī (T1541 and 1542) which actually consists of eight chapters: Pañcādharma-vibhaṅga, Jñānavibhaṅga, Ayataṇavibhaṅga, Sattapāṭhāravibhaṅga, Aṣṭaṭāvibhaṅga, Pratibhāvibhaṅga, Sahārasariputrapāṭhāvibhaṅga, Nirvedavibhaṅga. If the Mppi is to be believed, only the first four would be the work of Vasumitra.

230 The Chou li fou p’i’r an leou (T1548) was translated into Chinese at the Che yung sswu monastery by Dharmayāsa in the years 407–408 (Bagchi, I, p. 175).

The Pāṇḍava school divides its Basket of Abhidharma into seven books, but the Haimavatā school which is almost confused under Kaniṣṭha, p. 553) with the Vibhajyavibhaṅga annexes treatises that are its continuation (p’in); four are the work of the bodhisattva P’o so wu mi (Vasumitra) and four others the work of the arhats of K’i’pin (Kaussi). 225

The description of the bulls that came, it says, “at one time,” under Kaniṣṭha, p. 553) with the Vibhajyavibhaṅga annexes treatises that are its continuation (p’in); four are the work of the bodhisattva P’o so wu mi (Vasumitra) and four others the work of the arhats of K’i’pin (Kaussi). 225

226 According to some sources, the Vibhūtā was compiled in the course of a council held under Kaniska in the monastery of Kavana near Jālandhara or at the vihara of Kandālava in Kanśi. Here is a short summary of sources related to this council:

Tibetan sources: Bu ston, II, p. 997 (which tells of several different traditions); - Tanānātha, p. 58-61; - Schiefner, Tibetische Lebensbeschreibungen, p. 310.

This collection of unfounded traditions has, as its evident intention, the setting up of Kaniska as against Aioka, and attributing to the Sarvāstivādin a council which would somehow serve as a match for the synod of the Vibhajyavādin presided over by Tissa Mogallaputta. As de La Vallée Poussin has said: “It is likely that Kaniska did not call a council and that there was no such council.” It is not unreasonable that the Mppi has made no mention of it.

In any case, if the Vibhūtā was compiled by Kaniska to serve as commentary for the Jñānaprasthāṇa of Kāśyapa, it is certainly different from the Mahāvihāra in 208 rolls which has come down to us in the Chinese translation of Hsuan tsang (T 1545). The latter, in effect, tells a story of a eunuch (7, it is a misprint in the French – Migné Chadron) and bulls that came, it says, “at one time,” under Kaniska (cf. T 1545, k. 114, p. 593a).

227 The Śaṅkādibhiṣṭha, the title of which is attested in the Kośayāñkā, p. 466, is the Jñānaprasthāṇa and the six annexed treatises that are its continuation (anuśruta) or ‘fruit’ (cf. Kośa, I, n. 4, n. 4). There is a list of them in Sanskrit in the Kośayāñkā, p. 9, and in Tibetan in Busston, I, p. 49 and Tanānātha, p. 296: i) Prakauṇḍila by Vasumitra (T 1541 and 1542); ii) Viśalāñkāya by Devārman or Devaśa (T 1539); iii) Dharmakṣāṇa by Śāriputra according to the Tibetan sources, of Maudgalyāyana according to the Chinese sources (T 1537); iv) Prajñāpattitāra by Maudgalyāyana (T 1538); v) Viśalāñkāya by Pūrṇa according to the Tibetan sources, of Vasumitra according to the Chinese sources (T 1540); vi) Samānpūryāya of Mahākāśyapa according to the Tibetan sources, of Śāriputra according to the Chinese sources (T 1536). - Along with the Jñānaprasthāṇa, these are the seven treatises of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. The best study of these works is that of J. Takakusa, On the Abhidharma Literature of the Sarvāstivāda, Extract of JPTS, 1905, which is complemented by de La Vallée Poussin’s Introduction to the Kośa, p. XXIX-XLII. - For the comparison with the seven books of the Pāli Abhidharma, refer to Winternitz, Literature, II, p. 165-173; Law, Pāli Literature, I, p. 336-342; Nyāṇatiloka, Guide through the Abhidhamma-Pitaka, Colombo, 1938.

228 This is probably the Dharmakṣāṇa (T 1537) attributed to Maudgalyāyana by the Chinese tradition; but in Hsuan tsang’s translation, it consists of twenty-one chapters.
4. During the lifetime of the Buddha, Mahākātyāyana explained the words of the Buddha and composed a Piṭā (peṭaka), 'box-collection' in the language of the Ts'in. It is used even today in southern India.\footnote{For Mahākātyāyana and his Petakopadesa, see above.}

As all these works are commentaries on the words of the Buddha, when it is said: "The five precepts (śīla)\footnote{The same list but with different order in Dīgha, III, p. 254; Samyutta, V, p. 60; Aśguttara, IV, p. 9; Viśuṭṭha, p. 340, 383; Kathvatthu II, p. 405 sq; Kośa, V, p. 3; Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 490), k. 18, p. 127a28.} are material (rūpīna), others are non-material (aniśīpa); some are visible (sāntāsānya), others are invisible (sāndarshana); some offer resistance (sātāpātīha), others do not offer resistance (apratīha), some are impure (sāvṛava), others are pure (anāsāvṛava); some are conditioned (sandhyā), others are non-conditioned (sasamkṛta); some are with retribution (vipakā), others are without retribution; some are good (kusala), others are bad (akusala); some are morally defined (vyakṣṛta), others are morally non-defined (avyakṣṛta). All this is what is called the Abhidharma.

Furthermore, there are seven tendencies of defilement (anuśayas)\footnote{For the ten knowledges (kṣitipada) of the expression Evaṃ mayā itum ekasmin samaye.}: 1) knowledge of dharmajñāna, 2) the five precepts (śīla), 3) the seven tendencies of defilement (śīla), 4) knowledge of its origin (sāravajñāna), 5) knowledge of its cessation (nīrodayajñāna), 6) knowledge of its effect (nīrodhadarśanajñāna), 7) knowledge of its form (bhāvanajñāna), 8) knowledge of the Path (pratipaddhāna), 9) knowledge of the cessation [of suffering] (nīrodhadarśanajñāna), the rest are abandoned [708] by seeing the Path (pratipaddhāna). Some are complete anuśayas, the others are incomplete anuśayas.

The ten knowledges (kṣitipadas)\footnote{The ten knowledges (kṣitipadas) of the expression Evaṃ mayā itum ekasmin samaye.}

- 1) knowledge of dharmajñāna (dharmaṃjñāna),
- 2) subsequent knowledge (anavajñāna),
- 3) worldly knowledge (lokasaṃjñāna),
- 4) knowledge of the mind of another (paracitajñāna),
- 5) knowledge of suffering (duḥkhaṃjñāna),
- 6) knowledge of its origin (samudayajñāna),
- 7) knowledge of its cessation (nīrodayajñāna),
- 8) knowledge of the Path (mārgajñāna),
- 9) knowledge of the cessation [of the defilements] (kṣaṇajñāna),
- 10) knowledge of no further rebirths (anupāddāgatā).

These are the ten knowledges. Some are pure (sāvṛava); some are impure (anāsāvṛava); some are conditioned (sasamkṛta), others are unconditioned (asasamkṛta); some are sāvṛava causes, others are anāsāvṛava causes. Some are causes belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātu), some are causes belonging to the formless realm (aprāpyadhātu), others are causes belonging to no realm (anāvuddhā). Some are acquired on the uninterrupted path (bhāvanajñāna).
CHAPTER IV: EXPLANATION OF THE WORD BHAGAVAT

Sūtra: Bhagavat
Śāstra: Now let us explain this word.

3. Furthermore, bhāga means glory (yuṣas-) and vati indicates its possession: "the one who possesses qualities." 236

2 Furthermore, bhāga means to analyze (vibhāga) and var indicates skill (kula). Skillful in analyzing the general and specific characteristics (svasāmānyalakṣāṇa) of the dharmas, he is called Bhagavat. 237

234 This chapter is devoted to the synonym of the name of Buddha. The first ten constitute a traditional formula of praise: bhagavān tathāgato yham samyakambuddho vidyācaraṇasampannah saccato lokavādi anuttaraṃ paramāñaṃ satyaṃ devamanusyanam buddho bhagavān. Cf. the Dhāvāgārtrīta of which we have the Sanskrit version (Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke, p. 47), the Pāli version (Sātāyī, I, p. 210) and the Chinese version (Tsa a han T 99 (no. 981), k. 35, p. 255b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 49, p. 615a). This formula is very frequently encountered in the Pāli Nikayas, e.g., Dhīgha, I, p. 49; III, 237: Majjhima, I, p. 37, 69, 179, 285, 390, 346, 401, 412, 502, 521; II, p. 55, 133, 238; Sātāyī, I, p. 219; II, p. 69; III, p. 85; IV, p. 320; V, p. 197, 343, 445; Anguttara, I, p. 168, 207; II, p. 33, 56, 66, 147; III, p. 2, 10, 310, 65, 153, 212, 285, 312, 341, IV, p. 3, 5, 109, 225, 270, 284, 288, 324, 406; V, p. 15, 183, 204, 329, 333, 336.

On the other hand, it is much more rare in the Chinese Āgamas, either because the afore-mentioned sūtras do not have a correspondent in the Chinese collections or because the formula is omitted in the parallel sūtras of the same collections. It may be assumed that the Pāli school above all contributed to the success of this formula. However, it is not completely absent in the Chinese Āgamas. Tēhōng a han, T 26 (no. 132), K. 31p. 623a; no. 146, K. 36, p. 658c27; (no. 161), K. 4, p. 658a; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 946), K. 20, p. 141c; (no. 981), K. 35, p. 255b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, K. 6, p. 574a27; K. 14, p. 615a. - It is also found in later texts, e.g., Lalitavistara, p. 3; Saddharma-pundarīka, p. 17, 65, 67, 151, etc.; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 1 sq.

The early commentators gave etymological explanations of these epithets, imaginary for the most part: see, e.g., the Chinese Bagabu, III, p. 198-215 (tr. Nyanatiloka, II, p. 313-340) to be compared with Upatissya's commentary in Kāra te tsu loun, T 1648, k. 6, p. 426; Kumārījīva's notes in the Tso tél’ yan san mei king, T 614, k. 2, p. 277a; Harivarman's commentary in his Te’rung chou loun, T 1646, k. 1, p. 242. - Other references in Hobo qibat, Bantu, p. 192.

235 Compare the explanations of the Mahānīkāda, p. 142; Cullavādakas, p. 466; Sampangi, I, p. 33-34; Visuddhimagga, I, p. 210-212; Hobo qibat, Bagdū, p. 46.

236 Visuddhimagga, p. 210; yasām lokayakātāraṃ sahasrāḥbhūtabhūtaṃ... Bhagavā ti vuccati.

237 Visuddhimagga, p. 211; yasām kaivaldham bhedehā... ti vattate Bhagavā ti vuccati.

3. Furthermore, bhāga means glory (yuṣas-) and var indicates its possession. Thus this word means "the one who possesses glory". No-one else has as much glory as the Buddha. The noble cakravartin kings, Indra, Brahmā, the lokapālas, are inferior to the Buddha. What then could be said of ordinary men (prahājyana)? Why? - The noble cakravartin kings are fettered by bonds (bandhanamsaṃsāka); the Buddha has broken the bonds. - The noble cakravartin kings are sunk in the mire of birth (jātī), old age (jvar), sickness (vyādhi) and death (marava); the Buddha has transcended them. - The noble cakravartin kings are enslaved (āḍita) by their passions (anunaya); the Buddha has eliminated them. - The noble cakravartin kings dwell in the womb of the calamities of the human jungle (lokakāntāra); the Buddha has escaped from it. - The noble cakravartin kings dwell in the shadows of ignorance (avidyāndhakāra); the Buddha lives in the supreme light. - The noble cakravartin kings often reign over the four continents (caturdhyāpaka); the Buddha reigns over countless universes (apramāṇalokadhātu). - The cakravartin kings have mastery over wealth (parijāvāvaiśā); the Buddha has mastery over mind (cetośāśā). - The noble cakravartin kings covet heavenly bliss (devaśākha); the Buddha covets nothing, having reached the well-being of the summit of existence (bhavāgṛasukha). The cakravartin kings seek their happiness from others; the Buddha rejoices in his own heart. This is why the Buddha surpasses (abhīhavatā) the noble cakravartin kings. He also surpasses all the other beings, Indra, Brahmā, the lokapālas who are [76c] even inferior to the noble cakravartin kings.

4. Furthermore, bhāga means to crush (bhāga) and var indicates the ability. The person who can crush desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and stupidity (moha) is called Bhagavat. 239

Question. - The arhats and pratyekabuddhas are also able to destroy attachment, hatred and stupidity; in what do they differ from the Buddha?

Answer. - Although the arhats and pratyekabuddhas have destroyed this threefold poison (trīṣṭva), they have not entirely eliminated the latent predispositions (vāsa) of poison. 240 It is like perfume (gandha) in a vase (bhājanā); when the perfume is removed, a trace of the odor remains. Or it is like kindling (indhana): the fire burns, the smoke (ādhaṇa) disappears, but the ash (bhāsam) remains, for the strength of the fire is decreased. On the other hand, in the Buddha, the threefold poison (trīṣṭva) is eliminated without residue. It is like at the end of a kalpa when the fire burns Mount Meru and the entire earth; these disappear completely without leaving smoke or charcoal.241[beec], for example, the traces of hatred (dveṣavāsana) in...
Śāriputra, the traces of attachment (rāgavāsanā) in Nandō (Nanda) and the traces of pride (māna) in Pingk'ia (Pi-ting k'ia) less than that of the Buddha. These benefits were the reward for his earlier merits. See below, k. 4, p. 92a.

The Buddha, who knew it, asked Rāhula: "Why are you so thin (ārka)?" Rāhula replied with this stanza:

243 This story is drawn from the Sārivāsāvāda Vinaya, Che song liu, T 1435, k. 61, p. 463c-464c. The Buddha was dwelling at Sārvatūrī. A vāsīya invited the Buddha and the saṃgha to dine at this house the next day. The Buddha accepted by remaining silent. The vāsīya, having understood that the Buddha had accepted, was silent, arose, protruded at the feet of the Buddha and returned home. During the night, he prepared all sorts of food. Early the next morning, he arranged the seats and sent a messenger to the Buddha to say: "The meal is ready. The Sage knows the time." The saṃgha of the Buddha and returned home. During the night, he prepared all sorts of food. Early the next morning, he arranged the seats and sent a messenger to the Buddha to say: "The meal is ready. The Sage knows the time." The saṃgha, with their robes and begging bowls (pāṭighrasāmaññā) entered the home of the vāsīya, but the Buddha remained at the monastery (vihāra) to take his meal. The vāsīya, seeing the saṃgha well-seated, proceeded with the ablations, placed abundant and excellent morsels before the elders (vaṭṭa), but to the recently ordained monks (novāvābhiśka) and novices (śrāmarācāra) he distributed only rice (śāla) cooked for 16 days, a nasty sesami soup (hov ma = sīla) and cooked vegetables. Having given the vaṭṭas and the saṃgha abundant and excellent dishes, he proceeded to the (second) ablations, took a low seat and sat down in the midst of the saṃgha to hear the Dhamma. When the śīlavrī śāriputra had preached the sermon, he arose and went away. At that time, Rāhula was still a novice. Having eaten, he went to the Buddha, prostrated at his feet and sat down at one side. Buddhas have the custom of asking, after the vaṭṭas have had their meal, whether the food was sufficient. And so the Buddha asked Rāhula: "Was the saṃgha's meal sufficient?" Rāhula replied: "For those who had it, it was enough, for the others, it was not enough." The Buddha asked: "Why do you say that?" Rāhula answered: "Before the vaṭṭas and the elders they placed abundant and excellent morsels, but to the recently ordained monks and novices they gave only rice (śāla) cooked for sixteen days, a nasty sesami soup and boiled vegetables." At that time, Rāhula was thin and weak. The Buddha, knowing that, asked Rāhula: "Why are you so thin and weak?" Rāhula answered with this stanza:

242 Examples of saints who, having eliminated their dominant affliction, still keep the outer gestures. The Saṅgha of the Buddha and returned home. During the night, he prepared all sorts of food. Early the next morning, he arranged the seats and sent a messenger to the Buddha to say: "The meal is ready. The Sage knows the time." The saṃgha, with their robes and begging bowls (pāṭighrasāmaññā) entered the home of the vāsīya, but the Buddha remained at the monastery (vihāra) to take his meal. The vāsīya, seeing the saṃgha well-seated, proceeded with the ablations, placed abundant and excellent morsels before the elders (vaṭṭa), but to the recently ordained monks (novāvābhiśka) and novices (śrāmarācāra) he distributed only rice (śāla) cooked for 16 days, a nasty sesami soup (hov ma = sīla) and cooked vegetables. Having given the vaṭṭas and the saṃgha abundant and excellent dishes, he proceeded to the (second) ablations, took a low seat and sat down in the midst of the saṃgha to hear the Dhamma. When the śīlavrī śāriputra had preached the sermon, he arose and went away. At that time, Rāhula was still a novice. Having eaten, he went to the Buddha, prostrated at his feet and sat down at one side. Buddhas have the custom of asking, after the vaṭṭas have had their meal, whether the food was sufficient. And so the Buddha asked Rāhula: "Was the saṃgha's meal sufficient?" Rāhula replied: "For those who had it, it was enough, for the others, it was not enough." The Buddha asked: "Why do you say that?" Rāhula answered: "Before the vaṭṭas and the elders they placed abundant and excellent morsels, but to the recently ordained monks and novices they gave only rice (śāla) cooked for sixteen days, a nasty sesami soup and boiled vegetables." At that time, Rāhula was thin and weak. The Buddha, knowing that, asked Rāhula: "Why are you so thin and weak?" Rāhula answered with this stanza:

He who eats oil (tañ̄ā) gains strength;
He who eats butter (ghṛta) gains fine color;
He who eats sesami and vegetable dishes has neither color nor strength.

The Buddha, god among gods, ought to know that. The significant persons and the vaṭṭas who flirted before dying). See also the story of the inattentive listeners in the Dhammaṇāsavaṇṇa, the Buddha, having come out of samādhi, set out to walk followed by Lo heuo lo (Rāhula). The Buddha asked Rāhula: "Why are you so thin (ārka)?" Rāhula replied with this stanza:

22, pl XI, 1; A. K. Coomaraswamy, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 464-473, fig. 234-238. - Amarīvatī, no. 89-143, p. 51-74. - Amarīvatī, no. X: Sundaraṇavarta, see the story of the seven bhikṣus who, having eliminated their dominant affliction, still keep the outer gestures. The Saṅgha of the Buddha, having come out of samādhi, set out to walk followed by Lo heuo lo (Rāhula). The Buddha asked Rāhula: "Why are you so thin (ārka)?" Rāhula replied with this stanza:

He who eats oil (tañ̄ā) gains strength;
He who eats butter (ghṛta) gains fine color;
He who eats sesami and vegetable dishes has neither color nor strength.
In his turn, the āyuṣmat Pi lin g k'ia p'o ts'o (Pilindavatsa) always suffered from eye disease. To beg his food, he usually crossed the Ganges river (gaṇīṣ). Having come to the edge of the river, he snatched his fingers and said to [the Ganges]. "Vatsala (little slave!) Stop flowing!" Then he crossed the river between two walls [of water] and went to beg his food. The goddess of the Ganges went to the Buddha and said: "The disciple of the Buddha, Pilindavatsa, always insults me by saying: 'Vatsala, stop flowing.' The Buddha said to Pilindavatasa: "Apologize for your fault (deviṣa kāmāṇiya) to the goddess of the Ganges." Then Pilindavatsa, joining his palms, said to the goddess of the Ganges: "Vatsala, little slave, don't be angry. I confess my fault." Then the great assembly made fun of him: "Why do you still insult her [by calling her Vatsala] when you are confessing your fault?" The Buddha said to the goddess of the Ganges: "Do you see this Pilindavatsa who, with his palms joined, confessions his fault to you? He apologizes and it is not out of malice (avamāna) that he calls you this. Know that it is not his fault. For five hundred years, this man has always been born in a brahmīn family; always haughty, he has reviled other men. He has retained the language he formerly used, but his heart is free of scorn." ¹²⁴⁶

Thus, although they have destroyed the fetters (āsana), there are the disc uncovered Ciñcāṇīputra who had ordained Ruhula (Vinaya, I, p. 82) and had initiated him into the ascetic practices (Mahābhūtadvādāsata in Majjhima, I, p. 421 sq. and Tenśi ti a han, T 123, k. 7, p. 581c).

²⁴⁴ Moreover called Anāthapiṇḍada.
Buddha ate oats (yava), he expressed no anger\(^{248}\), but when the king of the gods offered him food of one hundred flavors (ākāra latarasasampanna) [as compensation], he felt no joy.\(^{249}\)

\(^{248}\) In the twelfth year of his ministry, the Buddha was visited by a brahmin called Verañja in the Palace of King Udaya. He was too busy with his pleasures and, according to some sources, Māra forbade monks to eat rice and had advised them to eat oats.

\(^{249}\) According to some theories opposed by the Māyāvādins, the hero of the story is the brahmin Ānanda, the name of a famous brahmin clan; cf. Malalasekara, II, p. 373, Sepp, 1932, p. 116, she remarks that at the beginning, Buddha's health in this way at Verañja was condemned to eating oats and who, at the end of three months, the monks were satisfied with this coarse food, but when the Buddha ate it, the gods gave flavor (āsavā) to each mouthful that he took. At the end of three months, the Buddha gave notice of his departure to Verañja or Agissatā. The latter excused himself for his lack of hospitality, offered the monks a grand feast and gave a gift to each of them. According to the Upādāna, the Buddha was condemned to eat oats for three months because in the course of one of his previous existences, at the time of the Buddha Pussa, he forbade monks to eat rice and had advised them to eat oats.

According to some theories opposed by the Māyāvādin, the slanders of Ciścāla was one of the punishments of the nine sins of the Buddha, cf. below, k. 9, p. 121c.

In the twelfth year of his ministry, the Buddha was visited by a brahmin called Verānja in the Pāli sūtras, or more often Agissatā in the Chinese sources. He wanted to know why the Buddha did not bow to the aged monks and, having asked a series of questions, he invited the Buddha and his monks to spend the rainy season at Verānja (cf. Vinaya, III, p. 1-16; Āguttara, IV, p. 175-179; Tchong haan, T 26 (no. 157), k. 40, p. 679b-680b). When the Buddha, accompanied by 500 monks, went to Verānja, the brahmin who was at the same time the king of that region, did not receive him in his palace. He was too busy with his pleasures and, according to some sources, Māra had disturbed his mind. As there was a famine occurring at that time, the monks returned with empty bowls from their alms round. Some horse dealers (asava-yanta) gave them some oats (ma ma), according to the Chinese expression, “dry grain measured in puthas” (pathappathamālamadā) according to the Pāli sūtras. For three months the monks were satisfied with this coarse food, but when the Buddha ate it, the gods gave flavor (āsavā) to each mouthful that he took. At the end of three months, the Buddha gave notice of his departure to Verānja or Agissatā. The latter excused himself for his lack of hospitality, offered the monks a grand feast and gave a gift to each of them. According to the Upādāna, the Buddha was condemned to eat oats for three months because in the course of one of his previous existences, at the time of the Buddha Pussa, he forbade monks to eat rice and had advised them to eat oats.

\[^{250}\] Eight explanations in Buddhaghosa, Sutta-paññāna, I, p. 174-174, the same brahmin is called Udaya. The result of all this is that Bīhāradvāja, Agissatā-Verānja and Udaya are all one; BuddhaHASHGeneral has already noticed this, and he notes in his Samantapadikāda, I, p. 111, that the real name of the brahmin was Udaya that he was called Verānja because he was born and lived in Verānja.

In the short, the brahmin who, at Verānja, forced the Buddha to eat oats and who, at Śrīvatsa or at Rājagṛha, ended up by filling his bowl three times had, as his personal name Udaya, as the name of his clan, Bīhāradvāja, as his surname, Verānja (because he was born and lived in Verānja), and was called Agissatā (because as brahmin, he worshipped fire).

Finally, we note that the Mahāvastu (III, p. 108, i. 170-179, i. 4) puts into the mouth of Udaya the stanzas addressed to Udaya in the Samyutta, I, p. 174, which is probably an error.

\[^{249}\] "Vollendeter”. - L. de La Vallée Poussin, Dogme et Philosophie, Paris, 1930, p. 169: In classical Buddhism, the Buddha's mind remains indifferent. It is like pure gold which, even when burned, melted, beaten or polished, shows no increase or decrease. [On the contrary], the arhats, although they have broken the bonds (bandhastra) and have found the Path, still retain the traces (vīṣṇa) [of the passions]; this is why they cannot be called Bhagavat.

Question. - Bhagavat is one name, but the Buddha has other epithets.

Answer. - Since the qualities (guna) of the Buddha are innumerable (apramāṇā), his epithets also are innumerable. These epithets include all his glory, for people understand it in many ways. The Buddha possesses still other names: he is called Tathāgata, etc.
Why is he called To t'o a k'ie t'o (tathāgata)?

1. He preaches the natures of the dharmas (dharmalakṣaṇa) in the way (tathā) that he has understood (gata) them.

2. In the way that the [previous] Buddhas have gone by the path of safety (sugāṇamārga), thus (tathā) the [actual] Buddha is going (gata) and will not go on to new existences (punarbhāva). 251

ARHAT 252

The Buddha is also called A lo ho (arhat). Why is he called Arhat?

1. Ara means enemy (ari) and hat means to kill (hun). The expression therefore means "killer of enemies". Some stanzas say:

- The Buddha has patience (kuññat) as his armor (varman),
- Energy (viyāya) as his helmet (līṭayaka),
- Discipline (sīla) as his great steed (mahādīva),
- Dhyāna as his bow (dhanus),
- Wisdom (praṇītā) as his arrows (ısara).

Outwardly, he destroys the army of Māra (mūrasena).

Inwardly, he destroys the passions (klecīa), his enemies.

He is called Arhat.

2. Furthermore, A marks negation and rahat means 'to be born'. The expression means, therefore, 'unborn'. The seeds (bijas) of the mind of the Buddha (budhacitta) do not arise in the field of rebirths (punarbhuakṣuṇa), for ignorance (avidya) in him has been dissolved.

3. Finally, arhat means worthy (arhat) of receiving worship (piṣṭa). The fetters (sanyojana) have been cut in the Buddha, he has attained omniscience (sarvaajñāna); therefore he merits receiving the worship of beings in heaven and on earth. This is [71c] why the Buddha is called Arhat. 254

SAMYAKSAṂBUDDHA

He is also called San mio san fo t'o (samyaksambuddha). Why?

1. Sanyuk means perfectly, sam means fully, and budh means understanding. The expression thus means "He who understands all dharmas perfectly and completely".

Question. - How does he understand perfectly and fully?

Answer.

- He understands suffering (dukkha) as suffering (dukkhakalaksana),
- He understands the origin (samsara) as origin,
- He understands cessation (niruddha) as cessation,
- He understands the Path (ṁārga) as the Path.

Therefore he is called Samyaksambuddha.

2. Furthermore, he knows that all the dharmas are truly unchangeable (abheda), without increase or decrease. Why are they unchangeable? When the functioning of the mind (citraṇya) is stopped (śuddha) and destroyed (niruddha), when the path of speech (abhidpamārga) is cut, he understands that dharmas are motionless (acala)256, like nirvāṇa itself. This is why he is called Samyaksambuddha.

3. Finally, the languages (sadhiṣcana) of all the universes (lokadhātu), the ten directions (daśādi), the languages of beings (sautra) in the six destinations (guṇa), the history of previous lives (pūrvaajanamāraṇa) of beings and their birthplaces (upadāśana) in future generations (anāgatajāna), the natures of the mind (cittalaksana) of all beings in the ten directions, their fetters (sanyojana), their roots of good (kaśīla) and their outcome (āthāmaraṇa): all the dharmas of this kind he knows in detail.257 This is why he is called Samyakasambuddha.

VIDYĀCARĀṆASAMPAÑNA

He is also called Pu ttre śō lo na sa mpana (vidyācarāṇasampanna), i.e., endowed with knowledges (vidyā) and practices (carana).258 Why is he called thus?

The three knowledges (vidyā) are: 1) the memory of former existences (ṛṣayāmadiśāntasmi), 2) the divine eye (dīcyākṣa), and 3) the destruction of the impurities (āvākṣaṇa).259

Question. What difference is there between the superknowledges (abhijñā) and the knowledges (vidyā)?260

Answer. The abhijñā knows the past causes (antarapāla) of the truth of suffering (bhāvanā samudayā). He knows that by freeing oneself so the fetters (āvājanasā) have been destroyed, one is no longer reborn. These three vidyās are not the prerogative exclusively of the Buddha; they are also attained by the great arhats and the great pratyekabuddhas.

Question. If that is so, how are they different from the Buddhas?

Answer. Although they have these three vidyās, their knowledge is not complete (paripārana). In the Buddha, the knowledge is complete: that is the difference.

Question. What is incomplete knowledge (aparipārana vidyā)? What is complete knowledge (paripārana vidyā)?

Answer. By means of their knowledge of previous existences (prāvanītāsamunāṭiśāli), the arhats and pratyekabuddhas know themselves and know others in an incompletely way only. Some arhats remember only one, two or three generations, [72a] ten, a hundred, a thousand or ten thousand kalpas, even 80,000 kalpas, but beyond that, their memory stops and they know no more. This is why they do not have the complete knowledge of the divine eye (dīcyākṣavida), but the Buddha knows of future generations (anāgatamana) likewise [as imperfect]. On the other hand, the Buddha knows the time of arising (upādā), duration (sthitī) and cessation (bhāva) contained in a single moment (ekākṣaṇa), the time of arising of the fetters (samsūyana), the time of their duration and the time of their cessation. He knows which fetters are cut during the stage of patient acceptance of suffering (dākhikā dharmakānti) and the patient acceptance of the cognition of suffering (dākhikā dharmakānti). He knows that by freeing oneself thus from the fetters (samsāyaninasaman) and liberation of conditioned dharmas (samskṛtadharma) is obtained in such and such a place, and liberation of unconditioned dharmas (asamskṛtadharma) is obtained in another place, and so on up to the patient acceptance similar to the Path (mārgapamakanti) and the fifteen mind-moments of the path of seeing of the truths (sahādanamārga).261 All of this is unknown to the śīvās and the pratyekabuddhas because their time is limited. It is thus that the Buddha knows the history (miñāna) of past beings (āvāsanna) and the [moment of the] destruction of their impurities (āvākṣaṇa). He knows the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna) in the same way. This is why he is said to be “endowed with the knowledges and the practices.”

By practices (carana) we mean here physical and vocal acts (kāyavedākārana).262 For the Buddha alone, physical and vocal acts are perfect (sampanna)263; in all others, they present faults. He is therefore called Vidyaśarmanasampanna.

257 The Buddha derives these consciousnesses from his abhijñās. There is a short bibliography of the abhijñās in Samgurāla.

259 For the three vidyās, it refers to the Bhayabheravacsatā (Mahājīna, I, p. 22) and for the eight vidyās to the Amāthāsattā (Dīgha, I, p. 100). For the avākṣaṇa, the Dīgha, III, p. 97, 98, 237; Samyutta, I, p. 153, 166; II, p. 284; V, p. 197; Anguttara, II, p. 163; IV, p. 238; V, p. 237; Suttaniputta, III, p. 163, 289, 442.

259 For the three vidyās acquired during the three watches under the Bodhi tree: Dīgha, III, p. 220, 275; Majjhima, I, p. 22, 248; Anguttara, V, p. 211. The Kośa, VII, p. 108, defines them: aśīlā, pūrvac.: āvākṣaṇa, vinnāha, kālācitā, sāvāya.

260 According to the Kośa, VII, p. 108, among the six abhijñās cited by these śīrasas (e.g., Dīgha, III, p. 281), the last three are vidyās: the memory of previous existences, the divine eye and the destruction of the impurities.

261 The Path proper is the path of abandonment of the passions (sahādanamārga). It begins with the Path of seeing (dākhikāmārga) consisting of the understanding (ābhisamaya) of the four truths. It is composed of sixteen thoughts, four thoughts for each truth. Let us take as example the cognition of the truth of suffering (dhūkhavīriyā). At the first moment, the law takes hold of the truth of the suffering of kāmadhanā by means of a patient acceptance called dākhikā dharmakānti. At the second moment, he cognizes this same truth by means of a knowledge called dākhikā dharmadāna. By this very fact, he cuts the possessiveness (āpātik) of a certain category of afflictions (kāla), then he takes possession of the destruction of these afflictions. At the third and the fourth moments, through a new patient acceptance and a new knowledge, he takes hold of and then grasps the truth of the suffering of rūpas- and ārūpas-dhatu, and expels, in two times, the category of afflictions relative to them. The same exercise is repeated four times for the other three truths, which makes a total of sixteen moments, involving a total of eight patient acceptances and eight knowledges. At the sixteenth moment, the law obtains the fruit of entry into the stream (suvālopa); he is assured of arriving at liberation. But before attaining nirvāṇa, he must still travel the Path of meditation (āvākṣana) and destroy the passions which the seeing of the truths had not been able to extirpate. - For further details, see Lavo., Note sommaire sur le Chemin, Kośa, V, p. 14-X: Notes sur le chemin du Nirvāṇa, Bull. de la Cl. des Lettres de l’Ac. Roy. de Belgique, 1924, p. 282-302; 1925, p. 13-34; Morale, p. 93-117.

262 By carana, the Visuddhimagga, p. 202, means: discipline (sīlavatī), sense restraint (indriyaviṭṭhadāna), moderation in eating (bhūjānā mutthudīnā), vigilance zeal (jāgarīsāmaya), the seven virtues (satta saddhālīna, cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 3-7) and the four dhyanas of the material realm (cattāri rūpasamādhi, vinnāha). See below, k. 26, p. 247b-c: the physical, vocal and mental acts of the Buddha are preceded by knowledge and are in conformity with knowledge (suvālopa, vinnāha, jāhānapamāna, jāhānapamānasi). This is one of the 18 special attributes of the Buddha (āvīTransmission of Buddha Dharma).
Furthermore, his knowledge of the world is not like conventional knowledge (saṃvṛtiṣṭijñāna) or like heretical knowledge (śrīṭīṣṭijñāna); he knows that the world is suffering (duḥkha) because it is transitory (anītya), and non-substantial (anatilāma) because it is suffering.

3. Finally, he knows that the world by its nature is neither eternal (sārūyata) nor non-eternal (asaṃsārata), neither finite (ananta) nor infinite (acarata), neither changing (cetana) nor unchanging (acetana). He is not attached (abhinivesha) to such characteristics (lakṣāna). Pure (vissuddha), eternal (ānițya), unalterable (anippanas), [the world] is like space (ākāśasaṃsāma). This is why he is called Lokavid.

ANUTTARA

[72h] He is also called A neou to lo (anuttara), i. e., Without superior. Why is he Anuttara?

1. Nirvāṇa is the highest dharma. The Buddha alone knows this nirvāṇa; he has not learned it from another. Besides, he guides beings and leads them to nirvāṇa. Just as nirvāṇa is without superior among all the dharmas, so the Buddha is without superior among beings.

2. Furthermore, no-one is his equal and, a fortiori, surpasses him in discipline (śīla), samādhi and wisdom (prajña). This is why he is called Anuttara.

3. Furthermore, A knows that the world is suffering (naḥyata) because it is transitory (naḥsyata) and pure (vissuddha). But the doctrine of the Buddha cannot be either refuted or destroyed because it escapes any discussion (sarvaviddasaṃatatīrtha); it is true (sasya) and pure (vissuddha). This is why he is called Anuttara.

PURIṢADYAMASĀRATHI

He is also called Fou lou cha t'an miao so lo t'i (purussadamyasārathi). Purusa means man, damya means to be converted and sārathi means the leader of a caravan. The expression thus means 'Leader of the caravan of men to be converted'.

---

264 Four explanations in Visuddhimagga, p. 203: Subhanagavanatā sudarman aññam gatitā samādhisatūtā samādī ca gatitā Sugato. "He is Sugata because his path is noble, because he goes to a good place, because his walk is correct, and because he speaks (gaṭa) correctly."

265 Visuddhimagga, p. 204: Subhatthi pi viṭṭiałalokatā pana Lokavid. The Buddha knows the world of the formations (sankhāralokata), the world of beings (sattalokata) and the world of space (lokāloka) with all their subdivisions.

266 Visuddhimagga, p. 204: Ibid., p. 207: Attanām panas ganehī visiṣṭhataasasa kassaci abhivattato naṭhīt etasā uttaro ti Anutaroo "There is no-one better endowed with qualities than him; no-one surpasses him."

267 Visuddhimagga, p. 207: Purīśadamanā śāsāti ti ... pana samāsāpurṣopātī pi. According to this explanation, the puruṣas that the Buddha converts are male beings, whether they are animals (tīṭṭhāna), human (mannasa) or manusya. The Visuddhimagga gives as example some conversions of animals: Apalā (Divyāvadāna, p. 348, 385; Samanatapādi, IV, p. 742; Mahāvamsa, XXX, v. 54; Hiun-tsang, tr. Beal, I, p. 122; Fa hien, tr. Legge, p. 29); Āḷagā ṇā and Āḷagā ṇā (Mahāvamsa, I, v. 45 seq.; Samanatapādi, I, p. 120); Āḷavāla (Mahāvamsa, XII, v. 9-20; Samanatapādi, I, p. 65); Dānapālita (this is the well-known elephant (Xīlīqī). - Conversions of manusyas, e.g., Ālavaka (Saraththa, I, p. 317; Suttanāpīṭṭha Činn, I, p. 217-248); Sīlocana and Kharulama (Samyutta, I, p. 207 seq.; Suttanāpīṭṭha, II, 5). Saṅka (Dīgha, II, p. 263 sq.).
1. With his great loving kindness (mahāmaitri), his great compassion (mahākaruṇā) and his great wisdom (mahājñāna) he uses a voice that is sometimes sweet (sākṣa), sometimes harsh (parusa), sometimes lukewarm (sukaṃparuṣa) so that the caravan (sārtha) does not lose its way. 268 Some stanzas say:

   The doctrine of the Buddha is a chariot, the disciples are the horses,
   The true dharmas are the merchandise, the Buddha is the leader.
   When the horses stray from the path and wander from the way,
   The Buddha corrects them and controls them.
   If they do not spurn his orders,
   He carefully sets them back onto the narrow path.
   But if they are incorrigible, he abandons them.

   This is why he is a peerless leader.

2. Furthermore, there are five kinds of leaders (sārthā): (i) the law of one’s parents, brothers and sisters and the family, (ii) the law of the village head, (iii) the law of the mandarin. These three laws govern the present life. (iv) King Yen-lo (Yama) governs the future life, (v) the Buddha ensures the well-being (bhīta) [of beings] by present happiness (ijharassakha), future happiness (pararatassakha) and the happiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇassakha). This is why he is the supreme leader. People do away with the [first] four laws soon enough; they are unable always to observe them. The Buddha governs (cche) men by means of the threefold Path (mārgatraya). He never abandons them along the way. Just as the self-nature (svalakṣaṇa) of fire (tejasa) accompanies fire until it is extinguished (nirvāda), so the Buddha, who procures good dharmas (kusalaḥadharmā) for men, follows them up to their death and does not abandon them. This is why the Buddha is called Purusadānīyārathī.

   Question. - The Buddha converts (vinayaḥ) women (strī?) also and makes them fond of the Path. Why is it a question of men only [in the name purusadānīyārathī]?

   Answer. - 1. Because men are noble whereas women are lowly, because the woman follows the man and because the man [alone] is master of his actions.

   2. Furthermore, women encounter five hindrances (dvāravyāna): they cannot become cakravartin king, or Śakradēvarāja, or Mitrādevarāja, or Brāhmaṇadevarāja. 269 This is why the Buddha does not say it [here].

268 Allusion to Kesittātta of the Amiddūtta, II, p. 112 (cf. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 923, k. 33, p. 234b-2)): Ahaṃ kho Kesī... pi vināṃ.

269 The source is Mahājīna, III, p. 65-66 (missing in Tchong a han, T 26, k. 47, p. 723; Amiddūtta, I, p. 28; Vīheṇa, p. 336; Nettipakana, P. 93: “It is impossible that in the present and the future a woman should become a perfectly enlightened arhat (= the Buddha), a cakravartin king, Śakra, Māra or Brahmā. That does not happen.” (ādhāram etam anvadāvah... n'etam thāman vijāti). Thus there are five impossibilities for a woman: she cannot be Buddha or cakravartin or Śakra (Indra) or Māra or Brahmā.

3. Finally, if one said that the Buddha is the leader of the caravan of women (strīsārtha), this would be disrespectful. By saying that he is [the leader of the] caravan of men, all classes of [human beings] are included. When [one says] “The king is coming”, one knows that he is not coming alone but is accompanied by his retinue (paravitā)270; in the same way, when one speaks of men (parusa), [mentally] one includes hermaphrodites (aṃbhayaṃjana), asexual beings (aṃjana) and women (strī). This is why [only] men are spoken of [here]. For these reasons the Buddha is called Purusadānīyārathī.

   ŠĀṬĀ DEVAMUṆUṢṆĀṆM 271

He is also called Chō ṭo r' ṭ' p' n ma neu chō nān (šāṭā devamuvanuṣāṇām). Šāṭā means teacher, deva means gods and muṣāṇāṁ means men (in the genitive case). The expression thus means “Teacher of gods and men”. Why is he called teacher of gods and men? The Buddha shows [gods and men] what should be done and what should not be done, what is good (asīla) and what is bad (akṣīla). Those who follow his instructions do not abandon the doctrine of the Path and acquire liberation from their passions (kleśhāvatīmokṣa) as reward (vipāka). Thus he is called Teacher of gods and men.

   Question. - The Buddha [does not save only gods and men]. He can save also the beings who have fallen into other destinies (gati) such as the nāgas, the asuras, etc.272 Why is it said only that he is the teacher of gods and men?

   Answer. - 1. The Buddha rarely saves beings belonging to the other destinies, whereas he frequently saves those who are reborn among gods and men. [This is why it is said that he only saves gods and men.] Just as when a man is white in color, even if he has black stains on his face, he is not described as a negro, because the black is insignificant.

The Saddharmapundarikā, p. 264, retains this rule, but modifies its formulation slightly: Paścī suhāsīṁ stṛ avadhīṣṭgam uṣāṇāṁ pavacanam āśvitarīvatadhitvābhutāḥ śāntahāṁ. There are exceptions to the rule: thus it is known, p. 263, that the daughter of Śagara, king of the nāgas “is capable of reaching the state of fully accomplished Buddhahood” (ādi samayakāśamboḥ abhisambodhitā samāraṇā). The Mppī, which is familiar with the case of Śagara's daughter to which it will allude below, (k. 4, p. 92b) sees here the impossibility of maintaining the canonical formula in its integral text. As a good exegetist, it resorts to a compromise that consists of retaining the textual plan while completely emptying it of its content: it recognizes that a woman encounters five impossibilities, but it enumerates only four of them: women cannot be cakravartin, Śakra, Māra or Brahmā. This omission is deliberate and is not to be explained by a mere omission for, later on (k. 9, p. 125a6), it will say that a woman cannot become a cakravartin king or Śakradēvarāja or Mitrādevarāja or Brāhmaṇadevarāja, but it carefully omits saying that she cannot be Buddha.

270 The same comparison in Athithuttā, p. 67: Yathā cūpā ṣuṇāta... yeva āṇato ti padākṣari.

271 Cf. Viśuddhimagga, p. 208: Dithādhammasamāsaniṃ ṣūpasamādhi... c'etaṃ vattati.

272 See above the examples of conversions among animals and ammonial. Viśuddhimagga, p. 208-209, tells the story of the frog Mandaṇa which, at Ćampi, was listening to Buddha preaching, when a cowherd, leaning on his stick, crushed his head; it was reborn among the Trīṣṭrivṛttrāṇa gods (cf. Viṃśavatthu, V, 1; Viṃśa Com., p. 216 sq.; Milinda, p. 350; Samantapāsādikī, I, p. 121).
1) Maheśvara or Śiva - Jou Ta Tch' Eng Louen, T 1634, k. 2, p. 46b: When one has purified the tenth level, one acquires "three-eyed god" (Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 219-220), Vṛṣavāhana 'Seated on a bull' (Bhavagiriśa, 126).

2. Furthermore, the fetters (saṃyojana) among men (manuṣya) are light and detachment (nirvedacitta) is easy to... 864c.

273 The Visuddhimagga, p. 209, gives four explanations of which here is the first: Viśuddha, being the teacher of gods and men.

274 Maheśvara, Viṣṇu and Kumāra, that is, Śiva, Viṣṇu and Brahmā are the gods of the brahmanical trimūrti.

BUDDHA:273

He is also called Fo t'o (buddha) [in the language of T'sin, scholar]. What dharmas does he know? He knows all dharmas, past (ātita), future (anātita) and present (pratyayapanu), animate and inanimate (sattvānātvasusamkhyāta), permanent and impermanent (nityānitya). He knew them all completely under the bodhi tree (bodhvṛkṣa). This is why he is called Buddha.

Question. - Other individuals also know all the dharmas, e. g., Mo hí choou lo (Maheśvara) [in the language of T'sin, Great Lord]: he has eight arms (asaṭṭhabhāja), three eyes (trīnetra, tryākṣa) and he is mounted on a white bull (vṛṣṇākhaṇa) [Nandi]. Or also the god Wei niou (Viśṇu) [in the language of T'sin, Pien wen, Universal Eye]: he has four arms (caturbhāja), holds a conch (śankha), and a wheel (cakra), and rides a golden-winged bird (garuda). Or also the god Kieou mo lo (Kumāra): he holds a cock (kśatriya), a bell (ghanṭā), a red standard (lohitapattākā) and is mounted on a peacock (iśkīgata).274

273 The Visuddhimagga, p. 299, gives four explanations of which is the first: Viṃśa pana kāci kīrti nīma nīma, sabbeśa eva buddhāt vino dhākrūlo dhākrūlo svātisaṃuddhāna buddha. Cf. Mahānāḍeśa, p. 457-458; Patrānmba, I, p. 174; svātis nīmaśāmaśāma kutam... yuhidam Buddhist ti. - Hohogiron, Rūta, p. 191-192, refers to the definitions of the Mpp, T 1509, k. 70, p. 552b; Nārāyaṇamitra, T 375, k. 16, p. 712b; Kośa, I, p. 1; Buddhahāmśāstra, T 1510, k. 1, p. 293b; Vībhāṣa, T 1545, k. 143, p. 735b; T 1851, k. 208, p. 864c.

274 Maheśvara, Viṣṇu and Kumāra, that is, Śiva, Viṣṇu and Brahmā are the gods of the brahmanical trimūrti.
On the other hand, it is rather far from the traditional iconographical type: The ascetic generally has four arms; the two upper hands hold a drum (dhālika) and a deer (nyrogi), the two lower arms make the gesture of generosity (varada-hasta) and absence of fear (abhaya-hasta). As well as his two human eyes, he has a third eye in the forehead. As clothing, he wears only a tiger skin, and as a necklace, a live snake. On his high brahmanical head-dress he wears the color of his body is light blue. His three eyes are blood-shot. He has two fangs sticking upward, and skulls as necklace (keyūra), on his head-dress, the crescent moon, a skull - the fifth head of Brahmā, allusion is made to it, e.g., T 1640, p. 157c; T 1003, k, 2, p. 611; T 1796, k. 2, p. 595b. L'Inde, Paris, 1930, p. 171-172; see also Mythologie asiatique illustré, Paris, 1928, p. 93-98. - This traditional type of Śiva is described precisely in an anonymous undated text, the Che eul t'ien kong yi kouei (Dvakkādāyavijñākāra), T 1298, p. 386a: In the north-west, the god Išana, also called Mahēśvaradeva. He is seated on a yellowish bull (?) His right hand holds a kīś po pei (kapāla, i.e., a skull) full of blood; his left and holds a sun ki te'ouang (trīlīla, or trident). The traditional iconographical type: The ascetic generally has four arms; the two upper hands hold a drum (dhālika) and a deer (nyrogi), the two lower arms make the gesture of generosity (varada-hasta) and absence of fear (abhaya-hasta). As well as his two human eyes, he has a third eye in the forehead. As clothing, he wears only a tiger skin, and as a necklace, a live snake. On his high brahmanical head-dress he wears the color of his body is light blue. His three eyes are blood-shot. He has two fangs sticking upward, and skulls as necklace (keyūra), on his head-dress, the crescent moon, a skull - the fifth head of Brahmā, allusion is made to it, e.g., T 1640, p. 157c; T 1003, k, 2, p. 611; T 1796, k. 2, p. 595b. L'Inde, Paris, 1930, p. 171-172; see also Mythologie asiatique illustré, Paris, 1928, p. 93-98. - This traditional type of Śiva is described precisely in an anonymous undated text, the Che eul t'ien kong yi kouei (Dvakkādāyavijñākāra), T 1298, p. 386a: In the north-west, the god Išana, also called Mahēśvaradeva. He is seated on a yellowish bull (?) His right hand holds a kīś po pei (kapāla, i.e., a skull) full of blood; his left and holds a sun ki te'ouang (trīlīla, or trident). The color of his body is light blue. His three eyes are blood-shot. He has two fangs sticking upward, and skulls as necklace (keyūra), on his head-dress, the crescent moon.

2) Vīṣṇu. See below, k. 8, p. 116a; k. 10, p. 128a and Hobogirin, Rīchū, p. 76-86. - His main hands hold the wheel (iron wheel with a thousand spokes, symbol of the sun); they give him the epithet Śaṅkucakavahavara (Mahābhārata, 3, 189, 40). For his physical aspect in the epic, Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 204-207; for his mount, the ganada, ibid., p. 108, 203. Illustrations, Mythologie asiatique illustré, p.103 sq.

3) Kumāra. According to Ki tiang, in his commentary on the Madhyamakāśāstra, T 1824, k, 1, p. 14c, Kumāra means 'young man'; this is none other than king Brahmā of the first dhīya (cf. Kōla, III, p. 2-3), called thus because he has the aspect of a young man. He is also called Nālāyana, that is, the origin of beings. - According to the Pī tiang ki cited in the Bukkyo dajiten, p. 310b, the god Kumāra has the form of a young man with six faces, yellow in color, holding a sword and seated on a peacock. - In Brahmanism, this is the god Skanda (cf. Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 227-231). God of war, he is Sanatkumāra, 'Ever youthful', one of Brahmā's sons (Mahābhārata, 12, 37, 12). In the eulogy to Śiva (ibid., 13, 14, v. 378), he appears beside Umi, seated on a peacock and holding a bell and a spear. His birth is told in the Mahābhārata, 9, 43-46. Nursed by the Kṛttikā (Pleiades), he developed six mouths in order to suckle them, hence his epithet of the six-faceted god (sañāñama, sammukha).

We may ask why Nālāyana talks about three gods here, Mahēśvara, Vīṣṇu and Kumāra, whereas in the Madhyamakāśāstra (T 1564, k, 1, p. 1b) he mentions only the first two. The question has been asked by Li tsang in his commentaries on the Madhyamakāśāstra (T 1824, k, 1, p.14c) and Āryadeva's Satārātā (T 1827, k, 1, p. 243c-244a). He answers in the following way: (i) The three gods of the heretics take the place for them of the three kīyasā: Tivara is the root, like the dharmakāya; Vīṣṇu is the enjoyment, like the sambhogakāya; Brahmā is produced by emanation in Vīṣṇu's navel, and he is comparable to the nimānakaśyā. But the Mahāyānaśrāparamitāśāstra teaches three bodies; this is why it mentions three gods. [This is a mistake; the Mppē teaches only two bodies; see Hobogirin, Rīchū, p. 181]. The Madhyamaka and the Satārātā teach only two bodies, that of the law and that of enjoyment; this is why they mention only two gods. (ii) Brahmā is found in Vīṣṇu's navel; there is no need to mention him separately.

The triinitarian notions implied by the Brahmanical trimūrti doctrine and the Buddhist theory of the trikāya mark the end of a long evolution. In both systems it appears that dualism probably preceded triunitarianism. The epic formulate the trimūrti only late in time and in a single passage: Mahābhārata, 3, 272, 47. The late epic poems present Vīṣṇu and Śiva as two aspects of the same god; they do not try to establish a triunitarian theology (Cf. Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 231). Similarly in Buddhism, the Huinayāna scriptures and many important Mahāyāna texts recognize only two bodies for the Buddha, the fleshly body born from father and mother, and the body of the law. The theories of the trikāya mark the end of a long evolution. - Besides, the Brahmanical trimūrti is well known to the Buddhist masters; allusion is made to it, e.g., T 1640, p. 157c; T 1003, k, 2, p. 611; T 1796, k, 2, p. 593b.

The trinitarian notions implied by the Brahmanical trimūrti doctrine and the Buddhist theory of the trikāya mark the end of a long evolution. In both systems it appears that dualism probably preceded triunitarianism. The epic formulate the trimūrti only late in time and in a single passage: Mahābhārata, 3, 272, 47. The late epic poems present Vīṣṇu and Śiva as two aspects of the same god; they do not try to establish a triunitarian theology (Cf. Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 231). Similarly in Buddhism, the Huinayāna scriptures and many important Mahāyāna texts recognize only two bodies for the Buddha, the fleshly body born from father and mother, and the body of the law. The theories of the trikāya mark the end of a long evolution. - Besides, the Brahmanical trimūrti is well known to the Buddhist masters; allusion is made to it, e.g., T 1640, p. 157c; T 1003, k, 2, p. 611; T 1796, k. 2, 2, p. 593b.

Answer. - 1. They cannot be omniscient. Why? Because their mind remains attached (abhinnivīśita) to hatred (dveṣa) and pride (abhinnūsā). Some stanzas say: Gods of painting and sculpture, Gods of tradition and the hymns!

These four kinds of gods

All of them brandish a weapon in one hand.

Out of weakness they fear others

Or out of spite they dread them.

Whether they fear others from necessity

Or they dread them from weakness,

The gods are all eternal cowards,

Unable to escape from the suffering of death.

Those who revere and honor them

Can fall into a sea of misery.

Those who distrust and scorn them

Can enjoy good fortune here below,

We should know that these gods are false, unreal.

This is why the wise man does not believe in the gods.

Beings in the world

Wander about as a result of their actions:

By virtue of merits, they are reborn in the heavens.

By virtue of mixed actions, they are reborn among humans

The destiny of the world depends on causes and conditions;

This is why the wise man does not depend on the gods.275

275 By affirming that the gods are false and without reality, that the wise man does not believe in the gods, these stanzas depart somewhat from Buddhist tolerance.

1) Buddhism is atheistic in the sense that its entire system rests on karma and retribution. All beings transmigrate as a result of their actions: these are their past deeds which determine their good or unfortunate destiny. Action takes the place of fate. There is no place for a creator distributing good and evil among his creatures. Buddhism has always opposed theistic systems (saiva/iva) that make out of their god a Lord (Īśvara) creator and controller of everything. - Aṅguttara, I, p. 174 (= Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 13), k. 3, p. 435b): Those who reduce everything to creation of the Lord
Furthermore, the three gods [Maheśvara, Viṣṇu and Kumāra] wish the fulfillment of all their desires for those who love them; to those whom they hate, they wish the seven destructions. The Buddha is not like that. While he was still the Bodhisattva, he offered his flesh (māṃsaka), his head (ōcāra), his eyes (nayana), his marrow (majjā) and his brain (maṣṭaṭṭha) to his enemies (amitrācchāra) who had come to kill him. 276 preached by the Buddha." (vallaka, gosapati, bhagavāna dhamma) Uga answered them ironically: "O deities, whether you recognize or not, the Dharma has been well-preached by the Blessed One." [This episode is given by Agutatvā, IV, p. 211, and the Chinese version of the Madhyāmāgama, T 26 (no. 383), k. 9, p. 481a] - In a passage from the Keśitaraghadhvā, cited in the Śīkṣāsamuccaya, p. 89, all the gods, from the deus to the plācās, give the following assurance to the Buddha: Whether whoever observe the holy doctrine and bring fame to the Three Jewels, we will protect him, we will preserve him and make him prosperous in ten ways. We will prolong his life and will always dispel the obstacles that threaten him. We will increase his health, his position, his wealth, his enjoyment and his pleasures, his sovereignty, his glory, his good friendships and the perfection of his wisdom. We must bear in mind the whole Buddhist tradition in order to appreciate the exact extent of the attacks directed at the gods of painting, sculpture, tradition and hymns. "It is not the deities attacked here by N...

And so, now that he has become Buddha, he will even less spare his life. This is why only the Buddha can bear the name Buddha. One must pay homage (namasya-) [73b] to the Buddha, take the Buddha as teacher and not serve the gods.

SARVANAROTTAMA

Moreover, the Buddha possesses two things: (i) great qualities (guna) and the power of the superknowledges (sambhīdās), and (ii) an absolutely pure mind (paramasattvācītta) and the destruction of the fetters (samaśojanaśārdhana). Although the gods have an accumulation of merit (puṇyasamāḥbhūta) and miraculous power (yuddhāda), their fetters are not destroyed and consequently their mind is not pure. Since their mind is impure, their miraculous power is decreased. Among the īśvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, the fetters are destroyed and the mind is pure; nevertheless, as their accumulation of merit (puṇyasamāḥbhūta) is reduced, their power (prabhāvā) is weak. In the Buddha, the two qualities (merit and purity of mind) are perfected (pārīkṣurima). This is why he is called Sarvanarottama, Superior to all men. He is the only one to surpass all men.

OTHER EPITHETS

Bhagavat means endowed with qualities, as has been said above. He is also called:

A so mo (asama) [in the language of the Ts‘in, Without equal].
A so mo so mo (asamasama) [ibid., Equal to that which is without equal].
Lou kia na t’a (lokanātha) [ibid., Protector of the world].
Po lo k’ie (pratara) [ibid., Having reached the other bank].
P’o t’un t’a (bhaddanta) [ibid., Venerable one].
Che li k’ie na (śrīgūna) [ibid., Perfection of beauty].

These are his innumerable epithets. His parents named him Si ta t’a (Śiddhartha) [in the language of the Ts‘in, Profit-realized one]. When he found the Path and understood all dharmas, he was called Buddha. When he accepted the worship of gods and men, he was also called by the names Bhadanta, Śrīgūna. Thus, in various ways, names are given to him according to his qualities.

THE OMNISCIENT BUDDHA

and cuts his head off himself to give it to the brahmī. - The Chinese pilgrims locate the scene near Takṣasālī, the name of which, says Chavannes, must have given rise to the legend by a false etymology: Takṣasālī = “cut-off head,” in place of Takṣasālī = “cut-off off.” - At any rate, the future Buddha renewed the gift of his head during a thousand successive births.

Chinese sources: Liou tou tsi king, T 152 (no. 5), k. 1, p. 2b-c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 17-19); P‘ou sa pen yun king, T 153 (no. 5), k. 2, p. 626-646; Ta fa t‘i p‘ei fo pao ngien king T 156, k. 5, p. 149b-150b; Yue kouang y‘ou sa king, T 166, vol III, p. 406-408 (corresponds to Divyāvadāna); Hien yu king, T 202 (no. 31), k. 6, p. 387b-390b (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, p. 174-183); P‘i y‘o cha, T 1545, k. 114, p. 593a-606, King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 25, p. 137a-c. The stūpa of “the gift of the head” at Takṣasālī near Shah-Dheri, was visited by Fa hien, T 2085, p. 858b7-8 (tr. Legge, p. 32) and by Hiuán tsang, T 2087, k. 5, p. 884a-21-23 (tr. Beal, I, p. 138; Watters, I, p. 244).

(iv) The “gift of the eyes”: King Śibi gives his eyes to Śakra who transformed himself into a vulture (or a brahmin). The gift is rewarded and he soon recovers his sight.

Pāli sources: Sīsīlājāta, no. 499 (Jātaka, IV, p. 401-412); Cariyālājāta, I, p. 8-78 (tr. Rh. D., p. 99-100); Milānā, p. 119 sq. (tr. Rh. D., p. 179).

Sanskrit sources: Siaun ts‘i yun king, T 200 (no. 33), k. 4, p. 218a-c; Hien yu king, T 202 (no. 32), k. 6, p. 390b-392c (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, p. 288-300). The stūpa of “gift of the eyes” at Puṣkamārtvā near Cauśaddha was visited by Fa hien, T 2085, p. 858b4-5 (tr. Legge, p. 31) and by Hiuán tsang, T 2087, k. 2, p. 881a-23-24 (tr. Beal, I, p. 110; Watters, I, p. 215).

(v) The “gift of marrow”: When he was king Utpala, the Bodhisattva wrote a text of the Dharma with one of his broken bones as pen, his marrow as ink and his skin as parchment. This episode is told in the Kien yu king, T 202, k. 2, p. 351b (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, p. 15; P. E. Foucault, Grammaire de la langue tibétaine, Paris, 1858, p. 211-212). P‘ou sa pen jing king, T 155, k. 3, p. 119b16. The scene occurred at the Monastery of the Leṃtis (niṃsaṃvasāṅgbhūrā) at Gumbatai, near Turkas, in Buner, and was visited by Song Yun, T 2092, k. 5, p. 1020b11-14 (tr. Chavannes, BIEFEO, III, p. 412) and by Hiuán tsang, T 2087, k. 3, p. 883a-12-13 (tr. Beal, I, p. 124; Watters, I, p. 233-234). This episode is also told in the Mpp‘i, k. 16, p. 178c and k. 40, p. 412a, but the hero is the brahmī Ngaśa (Dharmaratī) or Lo ḯa (Dharmaratī), besides, he writes the stanzas with his skin as parchment and his blood as ink, there is no mention of marrow. Thus it is possible that the Mpp‘i, speaking of the “gift of marrow” was not thinking of this episode.

In the “gift of marrow,” I [Lamotte] rather see an allusion to the Jātaka where prince Candrasprabha “broke one of his bones and pushed out the marrow to cure a sick man.” This deed is told by the Mpp‘i below, k. 12, p. 146b. It is also known to the Rāmālikī where the prince, like the īśi mentioned above is called Utpala (cf. Ta fa t‘i king, T310, k. 111, p. 631a; Maitreyaparipṛitīchā, T 349, p. 188c; King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 10, p. 55b).

277 Asamasama, epithet found, e.g., in the Suddhammapudarīka, p. 456, the Mahīśūtra, III, p. 231, the Mahīśūtrapati, no. 529, 6379. Baroux and Kern translate it as ‘equal to that which has no equal’; but the early interpretations vary: (i) completely incomparable (T 1718, k. 10, p. 1712); (2) the Buddhas are not the same (asama) as beings but the dharmakīya is the same (same) in nature (T 1522, k. 2); (3) There is no equality (asama) between Buddha and non-Buddha, there is only equality (sama) between Buddha and Buddha (T 1775, k. 1; T 1721, k. 12); (4) in the nine spheres, the mind of beings cannot succeed in equalizing things; it is only in the Buddha sphere that he can; the mind of the Buddha is thus equal (sama) to the unequal (asama) (T 1728, k. 10). In the same way, the six pāramitās are equal to the unequal Buddha (T 1509, k. 40). These different interpretations have been gathered together in Hobogirīṇa, Asokamālam, p. 38.
Question. - You are a partisan of the Kṣatriya clan! As son of king Śuddhodana, the Buddha was called Siddhārtha. It is out of [Hattery] that you are decorating him with great names and that you call him omniscient (sarvajñā). He is not an omniscient one.

Answer. - Not at all! Rather, it is you, maliciously, are jealous and slander the Buddha. The omniscient one truly exists. Among all beings the Buddha is unequalled for his beauty (rūpa), grace (prasadā) and perfection (pjṛṣa). By his characteristics (lakṣaṇa), his qualities (guna) and his brilliance (āloka), he surpasses all men (sarvaranotana). Humble people who saw his physical marks (āyālakṣaṇa) recognized him to be omniscient (sarvajñā) and, a fortiori, the Great Man (mahāpuruṣa).

Thus in the Fang nieu p'i-yu king (Gopālākāvadaṁśuttra)278, it is said:

The king of Mo k'ie t'o (Magadha), P'in p'o so la, invited the Buddha and his five hundred disciples for three months. The king required fresh milk (navaṇita kṣīva) and cream (sarpaśī) to offer to the Buddha and the assembly of monks (bliksuosamgha). He ordered the cow-herders (gopālaka) to establish themselves in the neighborhood and to bring fresh milk and cream every day. At the end of the three months, the king, out of compassion for these cow-herders, said to them: "Come and see the Buddha, and then you can go back and keep your herds." The cow-herders, while coming to the Buddha, talked to one another along the way: "We have heard it said that the Buddha is omniscient (sarvajñā). We are lowly and humble, how could we judge if he is really omniscient? The brahmins, who love cream, always come to visit the cow-herders; they are friendly to us. Through them, the cow-herders have heard speak of all kinds of works and brahmanical texts. They have spoken to us about the four Wei t'o (Vedas) and the knowledge [73c] they contain: therapeutic (bhājyajya) and military arts (ksatradharma), astronomy (jyotisa), 278 The craft of cow-herding and in particular the eleven rules to be observed for the well-being of cows have been described in almost identical terms by many texts. The documents can be classified into two groups: the Mahāgopālākāvadaṁ and the Gopālākāvadaṁ.

1) The Mahāgopālākāvadaṁ is attested by two Pāli editions and four Chinese versions:
(iv) Chinese Ekkottara: Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 46, p. 794.
(v) A single śūtra transl. by Kumārajīva under the title Fang nieu king, T 123., p. 546.
(vi) A single śūtra transl. by Hsian tsung under the title Yuan k'i king, T 124., p. 547.

2) The Gopālākāvadaṁ, development of the preceding śūtra which has come down to us in Sanskrit fragments and two Chinese collections:
(vii) Kalpānāmaindikā, ed. Lüders, p. 177-178.
(viii) Ta tsuo so ang yun louen king, T 201 (no. 61), k. 11, p. 316b-319a (tr. Huber, Śūtrālaṁkāra, p. 308-313).
(ix) Ta tcde tou louen, T 1509, k. 2, p. 73b-74c.

The translation of the eleven rules of the ox-herder present some difficulties. S. Lévi has compared the Pāli text with the Chinese versions no. iii, iv and viii (Alavghoua, Le Śūtrālaṁkāra et ses sources, JA, July-Sept., 1908, p. 140-144). The comparison of all these sources would take us too long, but here below we will give the Sanskrit and Pāli text of the eleven rules.

sacrificial rites (yajñadharma), chants (gītā), teaching (upadeśa), dialectic (codyadharma): in brief, the sixty-four arts (kalā) in use in the world.279 The son of Śuddhodana (the Buddha) is wise and learned (bahuśruta); if he knows these things, we cannot object to him in any way. But he has not kept cows from the time he was born [like we have]. We will ask him about the secrets of breeding. If he knows them, he is truly omniscient."

While they were talking thus, they entered into the Tchou yuan (Venavana) and saw the rays of the Buddha which lighted up the woods. They approached the Buddha and saw him seated under a tree; he was like a golden mountain in size; like a butter-lamp, he shone with great brilliance; like molten gold, he spread a golden light over the Venavana. The cow-herders could not take their eyes off him; their hearts felt great joy. They said to one another:

This lion of the Śākyas,
Is he omniscient or not?
When one sees him, one is forced to rejoice,
The investigation is already conclusive.
His rays of light are extremely luminous,
His aspect is noble and grave,
His physical marks majestic, his qualities perfect.
He is saluted by the name of Buddha.
His marks are quite evident
His power is complete,
His merits and his qualities are intertwined
Those who see him are compelled to love him.
A halo (vyomaka) surrounds his body.
Those who contemplate him cannot be surprised.
If the omniscient one exists
He must necessarily possess these qualities.
All the paintings,
Jewelry, ornaments and images
That would try to imitate this wondrous body
Are unable to equal it.

279 These 64 worldly arts are enumerated in the Śūtrālaṁkāra, tr. Huber, p. 311-312.
He can fulfill those who contemplate him
And cause them to find supreme happiness.

That he is certainly omniscient.

Having thought thus, they greeted the Buddha and sat down. They asked him: "How many rules for the cow-herder (gopālaka) should be kept so that his herd (gogana) prospers (spatikiri), how many rules should he neglect for his herd to decrease and lose its prosperity (yogakṣema)?" The Buddha answered: "If he observes eleven rules, the cow-herder is able to make his herd prosperous (ekkalavabhir anagha samudgata gopālakavo bhavyo goganan pariharitum spatikaritum). What are these eleven rules? (1) He knows their colors (rūpam jānātī). (2) He knows the distinctive marks (ṭukṣanāmī jānātī). (3) He knows how to brush them (āśātādīṭītāyati). (4) He knows how to heal their wounds (ṭoṇam pratichadalaya). (5) He knows how to make smoke (for them) (ādhamam kartā bhavati). (6) He knows the good paths (ṭītham jānātī). (7) He knows what the herd needs (ṭītham jānātī). (8) He knows the fords (ṭītham jānātī). (9) He knows the good pastures (gocaran jānātī). (10) He knows how to milk them (sahosaiṣadābhi bhavati). (11) He knows how to pay respect to the leaders of the herd (ye ca tē rṣabhā gavāṃ patayat tām atitṛkapiṭhāyu pājīyati koti). The cow-herder who observes these eleven rules can make his herd prosper. In the same way, the bhikṣu who knows eleven rules can make his good dharmas (kaśālakarma) progress (vārdhaya). (1) How does he know the colors? The cow-herder knows the black (kuṇā, white (avādmatā) or mottled colors (of his herd). In the same way, the bhikṣu knows that all matter is made up of the four great elements (mahabhūta) or of matter derived from the four elements (upādiṣṭīpṛṣa). 282 (2) How does he know the distinctive marks? The cow-herder knows the favorable and unfavorable marks. When his animals mix with other herds, he recognizes them by these marks. In the same way, the bhikṣu, finding in someone the mark of good actions, recognizes him to be a wise person (pandita), finding in someone else the mark of bad actions, recognizes him to be a fool (bāla). 283 (3) How does he know how to brush them? The cow-herder brushes (ṭūṭiyati) them and destroys the insects (āśātādikā) that drink the blood (of his animals) and aggravate their wounds. In the same way, the bhikṣu chases away the insects of perverse views that drink the blood of the roots of good (kaśālalātī) and aggravate the wounds of the mind (cittavaranā). When he has chased them away, there is safety (yogakṣema). (4) How does he heal their wounds? The cow-herder, with the help of cloth (pata), herbs (tyāra) or leaves (pata), heals the small stings caused by mosquitoes (maśaka). Similarly, by means of the holy Dharma (read ye tēchanga, saddharmena), the bhikṣu heals the wounds inflicted by the six sensory pleasures. He does not allow himself to be stung by these bad insects called desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha). (5) Why does he know how to make smoke? By making smoke, the cow-herder drives away the mosquitoes (maśaka); seeing the smoke at a distance, the cows go towards his house. Similarly, the bhikṣu preaches the Dharma according to the teachings he has received (yathādāra) and drives away the mosquitoes of the fetters (samyōjana). By the smoke of their preaching (dharmadesāna) they invite beings to enter into the abode of the non-self (anātman), of the true nature (satyalakṣana) and of emptiness (śūnya). (6) How does he know the paths? He knows the good paths to be used and the bad paths to be avoided by the herds. In the same way, the bhikṣu knows the eightfold noble path (dṛṣṭāntikā marga) that leads to nirvāṇa; he avoids the bad paths of nihilism (uccheda) or eternalism (dǎvata). (7) How does he know the needs of the herd? The cow-herder acts in such a way that his animals multiply (bhavatīṃ). When his animals mix with other herds, he recognizes them by these marks (āśātādīṭītāyati). (8) He knows their pastures (āśātādīṭītāyati). (9) He knows the pastures (āśātādīṭītāyati). (10) He knows how to milk them (sahosaiṣadābhi bhavati). (11) He knows how to pay respect to the leaders of the herd (ye ca tē rṣabhā gavāṃ patayat tām atitṛkapiṭhāyu pājīyati koti). The cow-herder who observes these eleven rules can make his herd prosper. In the same way, the bhikṣu who knows eleven rules can make his good dharmas (kaśālakarma) progress (vārdhaya). (1) How does he know the colors? The cow-herder knows the black (kuṇā, white (avādmatā) or mottled colors (of his herd). In the same way, the bhikṣu knows that all matter is made up of the four great elements (mahabhūta) or of matter derived from the four elements (upādiṣṭīpṛṣa). 282 (2) How does he know the distinctive marks? The cow-herder knows the favorable and unfavorable marks. When his animals mix with other herds, he recognizes them by these marks. In the same way, the bhikṣu, finding in someone the mark of good actions, recognizes him to be a wise person (pandita), finding in someone else the mark of bad actions, recognizes him to be a fool (bāla). 283 (3) How does he know how to brush them? The cow-herder brushes (ṭūṭiyati) them and destroys the insects (āśātādikā) that drink the blood (of his animals) and aggravate their wounds. In the same way, the bhikṣu chases away the insects of perverse views that drink the blood of the roots of good (kaśālalātī) and aggravate the wounds of the mind (cittavaranā). When he has chased them away, there is safety (yogakṣema). (4) How does he heal their wounds? The cow-herder, with the help of cloth (pata), herbs (tyāra) or leaves (pata), heals the small stings caused by mosquitoes (maśaka). Similarly, by means of the holy Dharma (read ye tēchanga, saddharmena), the bhikṣu heals the wounds inflicted by the six sensory pleasures. He does not allow himself to be stung by these bad insects called desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha). (5) Why does he know how to make smoke? By making smoke, the cow-herder drives away the mosquitoes (maśaka); seeing the smoke at a distance, the cows go towards his house. Similarly, the bhikṣu preaches the Dharma according to the teachings he has received (yathādāra) and drives away the mosquitoes of the fetters (samyōjana). By the smoke of their preaching (dharmadesāna) they invite beings to enter into the abode of the non-self (anātman), of the true nature (satyalakṣana) and of emptiness (śūnya). (6) How does he know the paths? He knows the good paths to be used and the bad paths to be avoided by the herds. In the same way, the bhikṣu knows the eightfold noble path (dṛṣṭāntikā marga) that leads to nirvāṇa; he avoids the bad paths of nihilism (uccheda) or eternalism (dǎvata). (7) How does he know the needs of the herd? The cow-herder acts in such a way that his animals multiply and are not sick. In the same way the bhikṣu, when the Dharma is preached to him, experiences the pure joy of the Dharma (vividhatharmaveḍa) and his roots of good (kaśālalātī) increase. 285 (8) How does he know the fords? The cow-herder knows the places easy of access, easy to cross, sheltered from the waves (sarango) and from nasty insects (kṛma). In the same way, the bhikṣu goes to the wise monks (bhakṣauṇa) and questions them on the Dharma. Preachers (dharmadhāraka) who know in advance if the mind (citta) of their listeners is keen (āṭikṣa) or dull (medha), if their passions (klesa) are light or heavy, [easily] lead them to good fords and have them cross safely (yogakṣema). 286 (9) How does he know the pastures? The cow-herder knows the places sheltered from ferocious beasts like tigers (yulghra) and lions (simha) and nasty insects (kṛma). Similarly the bhikṣu knows the safety (yogakṣema) of the four foundations of mindfulness (smṛtyupadāna) sheltered from the wild beasts that are the passions (klesa) and the evil māras. When he has penetrated there, he knows safety free of unhappiness. (10) How does he know how to milk them? It is because the cow (vatsa) loves her calf (vatsa) that she gives it her milk. Also when the cow-herder [refrains from depleting her completely] and leaves her some milk, the cow is happy and the calf is not left thirsty. The owner of the herd and the cow-herder are both benefitted each day. Similarly, when the farmers (vaiśya) and the lay people (avatāravasana) give the bhikṣu garments (cīvara) and food (āhāra), he knows how to stay within bounds (udāra) and not deplete them entirely.287 Thus the generous patrons (dānapati) are content, their faith (āvadāhāvaca) remains intact, and the [monk] who enjoys their gifts (pratigrāhaka) is not wearied [by their alms].

(11) How does he know how to pay respect to the leader of the herd? Specially designated big cows watch over the herd. It is necessary to take care of them and watch that they do not get thin. The cow-herder gives them oil (taśāla), dresses them rings (keyāra, niṣka) and gives them an iron horn (ayabhārīga) as a sign. He brushes them, flatters them and calls them [by their name]. In the same way, as is customary (yathāyogena), the bhikṣu serves (satkharoti) and venerates (pālayati) the high individuals of the community (sangaḥ) who protect (pālayanti) the Buddhadharmas, conquer (abhāhāranti) the heretics (āṭṭhikā) and lead the eightfold community to plant (avatārana) the seeds of good (āvadāmāla).288

When the cow-herders heard these words, they had the following thought: “[Of all these rules] we ourselves knew only three or four. Our masters themselves only know five or six. And so, hearing these words of the Buddha, we cry out at the miracle (adbhuta). If the Buddha knows the craft of cow-herding, he also knows everything else. He is truly omniscient (sarvajñā), there is no doubt about it.”

This sûtra has been recited here fully. By it, we know that the Omniscient one exists.

Question. - There is no Omniscient one because the things that he must know (jñeya) [to be omniscient] are numberless. The dharmas are innumerable (svarūpaand) and infinite (ananta). If many men together cannot know them, how could one single man know them? Therefore there is no Omniscient one.

[74c] Answer. - If the dharmas are innumerable, the wisdom (gopulā) of the Buddha itself is immense (ananta). It is like an envelope: if the letter is big, the envelope is large; if the letter is short, the envelope is small.

Question. - The Buddha himself has preached the Buddhadharmas, but he has not spoken about the other sciences, medicine (bhisajyā), geography (bhūgalavālī, astronomy (yvatan), arithmetic (ganaṇa), politics (nīh), etc. If he is omniscient, why has he not spoken of all these sciences? Therefore we know that he is not omniscient.

Answer. - 1. He knows everything, but he talks about it when it is useful and does not talk about it when it is useless. If he is questioned, he speaks; if he is not questioned, he says nothing.

2. Furthermore, he has spoken of everything in general (samsatāsah) as being of three types: (i) conditioned phenomena (samskrta dharmas), (ii) unconditioned phenomena (asamskrta dharmas), (iii) inexpressible phenomena (avacayadharmas). These three categories include all the dharmas.

Question. - We know that the Buddha is not omniscient because he did not reply to fourteen difficult questions.290 What are these fourteen difficult questions?

287 Ibid., p. 352: bhikkhu sauddhi pahapatīti: ... nattam jāti u patti gāvahānīya.

288 Ibid., p. 353: bhikkhu ye ti bhikkhu ikhi ratatthi: ... pucatpātipatīticav evo raho ca.

289 These are the four types that accompany the awareness of the Buddha truths which are called āvayuprasada: faith relating to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha and the disciplines held by the saints (āyuktadr̥śāli iśhān). Cf. Dīgha, I, p. 227; Majjima, I, p. 37; 46; II, 51; III, p. 253; Sutta, II, p. 99; IV, p. 271; 304; V, p. 343, 409; Aṅguttara, I, p. 222; II, p. 56; III, p. 212, 332, 451; IV, p. 406; V, p. 183; Avarānasutta, I, p. 92; Mahāvīramati, no. 6823; Bodh. bhāmi, p. 161, 327; Kośa, VI, p. 292; Kośayākhyā, p. 605.

Question. - There is no Omniscient one because the things that he must know (jñeya) [to be omniscient] are numberless. The dharmas are innumerable (svarūpaand) and infinite (ananta). If many men together cannot know them, how could one single man know them? Therefore there is no Omniscient one.

290 These fourteen difficult questions are often referred to in scholasticism by the term "Fourteen reserved or non-defined points" (caturdaldvāsatavatvarī). Cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 446; Madh. avatāra, p. 250-251 (tr. Lav. Musiol, 1911, p. 297-298; Kośa, V, p. 43. The Pāli canon and the Chinese translation of the Mahāyānagama (T 26) list only ten reserved points. (1-2) Sassatto loko, assassato loko, (3-4) Antarālo loko, amatara loko. (5-6) Tam jīvaṁ tām sarvām, uddhām jīvaṁ uddhām sarvām. (7-10) ākoti tathāgato param mūrādī, na ākoti tathāgato param mūrādī, ākoti vā na na ākoti tathāgato param mūrādī. This formula, the most frequent, occurs in Dīgha, I, p. 187-188; Majjima, I, p. 157, 426, 484; Sutta, III, p. 213-216; III, p. 258, IV, p. 280, 391-392; V, p. 418. The same formula is repeated in Tchonga han, T 26 (no. 221), k. 60, p. 804b (corresponding to Majjima, I, p. 426).

But most of the Chinese Nikayas are already familiar with these fourteen points. As a general rule, when a Pāli sutta enumerates ten points only, the corresponding sûtra in the Chinese Samyuktāya counts fourteen: Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 962), k. 34, p. 245c (corresponds to Majjima, I, p. 484); ibid., (no. 963), k. 34, p. 246 (corresponds to Sutta, III, p. 258); ibid., (no. 968), k. 34, p. 248 (corresponds to Anguttara, V, p. 186); ibid., (no. 408), k. 16, p. 109a-b (corresponds to Sutta, V, p. 418). - The fourteen points are also in the abridged version of the Chinese Samyukta, T 100 (no. 196), k. 10, p. 445a; (no. 202), k. 11, p. 448c. - The Chinese version of the Dīgha also has sixteen points by adding two supplementary points to nos. 13 and 14 of the formula of fourteen points: Tchonga han, T 1 (no. 28), k. 17, p. 111a (corresponds to Dīgha, I, p. 187-188). - As do all the treatises of scholasticism, the Mpp has adopted the formula of fourteen points. A few rare texts (Dīgha, I, p. 16; III, p. 137; Majjima, II, p. 233) modify the fourteen point formula by adding āti in front of the word loka that appears in the first eight points. Thus they say: sassato āti loka ca, assassato āti loka, etc. - This modification has been adopted here by the Mpp. - [There is an aberrant formula in the Chinese version of the Ekottara, Teng yi a han, T 125, k. 43, p. 784b: Does the self exist? Does it not exist? Does both exist and not exist? Is the world eternal? Is it non-eternal? Is the world finite? Is the world infinite? Is the soul the same thing as the body? Is it different from the body? Does the Tathāgata die? Does he not die? Is there death? Is there no death?]
(1-4) Are the world and the self eternal? Are they non-eternal? Are they both eternal and non-eternal? Are they neither eternal nor non-eternal? Are they finite or infinite? Are they both finite and infinite? Are they neither finite nor infinite? (Anuvāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā)

(5-9) Are the world and the self finite? Are they infinite? Are they both finite and infinite? Are they neither finite nor infinite? (Anuvāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā, antavāna lokaśā cā).

(9-12) Does the Tathāgata [or the saint freed from desire] exist after death? Does he not exist after death? Does he both exist and not exist after death? Is it false that he both exists and does not exist after death? (Bhavati tathāgata pariṇānaṁ na bhavati tathāgata pariṇānaṁ bhavati ca na bhavati ca tathāgata pariṇānaṁ na bhavati ca tathāgata pariṇānaṁ).

(13-14) Is the life-principle the same as the body? Is the life-principle different from the body? (Sa jīva tucchartam, anyo jīva 'nucchartam'.) If the Buddha is omniscient, why did he not answer these fourteen difficult questions?

Answer. - 1. These questions are futile and that is why the Buddha did not answer them. The eternity (ātivāta) of the dharmas is unnecessary (āsyaśta); their cessation (uccheda) is even more unnecessary. This is why the Buddha did not answer. If it is asked how many liters of milk (kīrva) is given by a cow's horn, that is not a proper question and it is not necessary to answer it. Besides, the universe (lokādhātaḥ) has no end (anavasthāḥ): like a chariot wheel (rathacakra), it has no beginning and no end (apūrvavacarama).

The Buddha always declined answering these questions and some Indianists have used this as an excuse to present him as an agnostic. Some are even of the opinion that his agnosticism conceals a total nihilism: if the Buddha refused to provide a solution to the great problems that perplex humanity, it is because he had answered in the negative in perto. de La Vallée Poussin, who has always argued in favor of the blessed nirvāṇa, has put forth and discussed these interpretations in his article 'Agnosticisme', ERE, I, p. 220-225, and in his work, Nirvāṇa, Paris, 1923, p. 85-129. Probably early Buddhism, more preoccupied with asceticism than with metaphysics, did not ask these questions, but when they were raised in the time of the Buddha, the intellect of the Buddhas is profound, the nature of things is also profound. The Tathāgata, who is a solution to the great problems that preoccupy humanity, it is because he had answered in the negative in the questioner's mind... But Kośa, IX, p. 267, tells us that, by loka, some mean the soul (ātman), others, transmigration (samsāra).

2. Furthermore, there is no advantage in answering these questions, but there is the disadvantage of leading [the questioner] into error. The Buddha knows that these fourteen difficult points hide the four truths (cattor dṛṣṭayataḥ) and the true nature (satyalakṣana) of the dharmas endlessly. If there are noxious insects at a [75a] ford, people should not be invited to cross there. A place should be safe (ṣaṭyagam) and without danger (anupādavra) so that people can be invited to cross.

3. Furthermore, some say that these questions can be understood only by the Omniscient one; since [other] men cannot understand them, the Buddha does not reply. 293

4. Furthermore, some people call existent (sat) that which is non-existent (asat), and call non-existent that which is existent. They are not 'omniscient'. The Omniscient one does not call non-existent that which does not exist, does not call non-existent that which does not exist; he preaches only the true nature (satyalakṣana) of the dharmas. Why should he not be called omniscient? The sun (ātīrya) does not create the mountains and the valley nor does it create the plains, but it does illuminate everything uniformly. In the same way, the Buddha does not make non-existent that which exists, does not make non-existent that which does not exist. He always speaks the truth (satya) and the brilliance of his wisdom (prajñālīkā) illuminates all the dharmas. He is like a unique path (ekamārga). When people ask the Buddha if the twelve-membered law (pratītiṣaṃpadāla) was created by the Buddha or by another, the Buddha answers: "I have not created the twelve-membered law nor has anyone else created it. Whether Buddhas exist or do not exist, birth (jīva) is the cause and condition (hetupratyataya) of old age and death (jīvamrcitraṁ) that is the eternal and enduring law." 294 The Buddha teaches that birth is the cause and condition of old age and death, and coming to the end [of the causal chain], that ignorance (avidyā) is the cause and condition of the formations (samskrutā).

292 This second point concerns the fourth series of questions: "What is the nature of the life-principle?" The answer depends on the intention of the questioner. Vacchagatta, who believes in the existence of the soul, receives an answer different from Phaguna who disbeliefes in it. See above.

293 Some Buddhists gladly confine themselves to 'the charcoal-burner's faith' without trying to understand the mysteries. Cf. Saṅghamitta, VIII, 19, p. 200: Some beings do not understand the Buddhist formulas correctly; however, they stick to it and are faithful to it. They say: "The sermons preached by the Lord are profound... We don't understand their meaning... But the intellect of the Buddhas is profound, the nature of things is also profound. The Tathāgata knows, we preach the teaching of the Tathāgata penetrates into each being according to their various levels of faith." - Ratnakūta cited in the Śīkasamuccaya, p. 55: yeśu cātāya gamabhūvā buddho... pravartata iti. 294 Later (k. 32, p. 298a), the Mppk will return to this āśtra and will indicate the reference to it: As is said in the Tsu a han (Sammukāgama), a bhikṣu asked the Buddha if the twelve-membered law had been made by the Buddha himself or by someone else. The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: "It is not I who made the twelve-membered law and nobody else has made it. Whether Buddhas exist or do not exist, this dharma-nature of the dharma, this substance of the dharma, is stable" (apīptdikā vā tathāgataṁ amātādikā vā tathāgataṁ tathāvāyasya dharmam dharmataṁ dharmasthātā). As a result, that being, this is; by the production of that, this is produced, namely, the formations originate from ignorance; from the formations consciousness originates, and so on up to: [from birth] originates old age, suffering and moaning, sadness, grief and despair. This is the origin of this mass of suffering (yad uta cātāya gamabhūvā buddho... dukhhasandhasāyopyabdho bhavati). Conversely, that not being, this is not; from the cessation of that, this ceases, namely, by the cessation of ignorance, the formations cease; by the cessation of the formations, consciousness ceases, and so on.
5. Furthermore, to reply to the fourteen difficult questions would be to commit a fault. If you ask of what type is the size or the physique of a son of a barren woman and a eunuch (vandhyāpanḍakaṇḍaputra)295, that would not deserve an answer, for such a son does not exist.

6. Furthermore, these fourteen difficult questions are wrong views (mithyāsūyata), are not realities (satya). Now the Buddha is occupied only with realities. This is why he stops (sthāparityut) and does not answer.

7. Finally, to be silent and not answer is an answer. There are four ways of answering (vyākaranā): (i) answering in a categorical way (ekākāniṃ vyākaraṇa); [this is how he answers when it concerns], for example, the Buddha, the absolute (parama), nirvāṇa and salvation (yogakṣema); (ii) answering by distinguishing (vibhaṣjayāvyākaraṇa); (iii) answering by asking a question (paripṛchḍhyāvyākaraṇa); (iv) answering by not replying (sthāpaṇavyākaraṇa). Here the Buddha answers by not replying.296

You say that there is no omniscient one! Such a statement is absurd and constitutes a serious falsehood (mithyā). Thus the Omniscient one exists, but who is it?

You say that there is no omniscient one! Such a statement is absurd and constitutes a serious falsehood (mithyā).

So be it! The Omniscient one exists, but who is it?

He belongs to the noble line of the Śākyas.

He is the crown prince of king Saddhudhana.

At the moment of his birth, he moved three thousand Sumerus and stirred up the water of the ocean.

In order to destroy old age, sickness and death, Out of compassion, he came to the world.

At his birth, he took seven steps.

His rays filled the ten directions.

The Buddha is like the light of the sun and moon.

By that I will awaken beings

This is the cessation of all this mass of suffering (dīvya cakṣavāryaśāti), he knows the cessation of all the impurities (svāti samuccaya, p. 14). Da has not been made by him or by any other person; the rest is an accumulation of stock phrases endlessly repeated in the canonical scriptures, both Pāli and Sanskrit. The well-known formula aupādā va athāpyaṅgānām ... occurs with several variations in Saṃyutta II, p. 25 (cf. Ts a h an, T 99 (no. 298), k. 12, p. 85b-c) which situates it at Kiu-tien-čheou Tsan-nien-tsiü-lo (Karau Kalamādāmyaṣyāma). This sūtra, which is absent in the Pāli Saṃyuttaṇīya, has its exact correspondent in the Chinese Saṃyuṣāgāma (Ts a h an, T 99 (no. 298), k. 12, p. 85b-c).

The Buddha is omniscient. Why? Because he has attained the ten powers (bala), he knows what is possible (sthāna) and what is impossible (asthāna), he knows the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) and the retribution of actions (karmavipāka), he knows the samādhis and the deliverances (vimokṣa), he knows the good or bad faculties of beings (sattavendraśavāravāra), he knows the various kinds of deliverances from desire (nātāvīdharāganirmokṣa), he knows the innumerable lineages (śing, 38 and 5) of all the types of universes (nātāvīdhaśakādhravā-pramāṇagotra), he knows all the abodes (vihāra) and their paths (mārga); he knows the conduct (caryā) and the thoughts (manaskāra) of beings in their previous existences (pūrvaṇjanam), he has acquired the discrimination of the divine eye (dīvya cakṣavāryaśāti), he knows the cessation of all the impurities (sarvāvramokṣa), he distinguishes clearly between good (śubha) and bad, he preaches a supreme doctrine (agradharma) in all the universes, he has acquired the taste of ambrosia (nettarasa), he has found the middle path (nātāvīdhaśakādhravā-pramāṇa), he knows the true nature of all conditioned (saṃskṛta) or unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) dharmas, he has rejected forever all desire of the three worlds (trailokyaśāti). It is for these reasons that the Buddha is omniscient.

[75b] So be it! The Omniscient one exists, but who is it?

Answer. - It is the supreme one (parama), the Great Man (maḥāpuruṣa), the one who is venerated in the three worlds (trailokyaśāyēṣṭaḥ): he is called Buddha.

Thus the Tsa n fo k ié (Buddhastotragāthā) say:

First-born (mātrahāsa) and king cakravartin,

The Buddha is like the light of the sun and moon.

He belongs to the noble line of the Śākyas.

He is the crown prince of king Saddhudhana.

At the moment of his birth, he moved three thousand Sumerus and stirred up the water of the ocean.

In order to destroy old age, sickness and death, Out of compassion, he came to the world.

At his birth, he took seven steps.

His rays filled the ten directions.

He gazed four times and uttered a great cry:

“My births”, he cried, “are finished.”

Having become Buddha, I will preach a marvelous doctrine I will beat the drum of the Dharma loudly, By that I will awaken beings And the world out of the sleep of ignorance.”

In many forms, such were the miracles (adhyāta) that appeared. Gods and men, Seeing them, rejoiced.

The Buddha had a body adorned with the marks.

A great light shone on his face.

All men and women Could not get enough of seeing him.

When the child was nursed and fed,
His strength surpassed that of a nayuta of gandhāhasītan. The power of his ruddhipāda was extreme, that of his praṇāha immense.

The great rays of the Buddha illuminated his body outwardly. In the midst of his rays, the Buddha was like the moon in its splendor.

The Buddha was criticized in many ways, he experienced no sorrow from that; the Buddha was praised in many ways, he experienced no joy from that.

His great maitrī is extended to all, enemies and friends alike, without distinction. All classes of intelligent beings know all the effects of that.

By the power of his kṣānti, lajja, maitrī and karunā, he conquers the whole world. In order to save beings, from age to age, he accepts the effort and the pain.

His mind is always concentrated on doing good for beings. He has the ten powers (bala) of knowledge (jñāna) and the four fearlessnesses (vaiśradya).

He possesses the eighteen special (āveṇika) attributes and a treasury of immense qualities (guna). Such are the innumerable powers of his prodigious qualities.

Like a fearless lion, he destroys the heretical systems;

[75c] He turns the peerless wheel of Dharma, he saves and delivers the threefold world.
CHAPTER V: RĀJAGRHA

Sūtra: The Buddha was dwelling in the city of Rājagṛha (rājagṛhe viharati sma).

Question. - Why is it said that the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagṛha instead of describing the teachings of the Prajñāparamitā directly?

Answer. - The author mentions the place (devā), the time (kāla) and the individuals (pudgala) so that people will trust (śīraddha) his story.

VIHĀRA

What is meant by dwelling?

1. The four bodily positions (āryānāmarāṣṭrāḥ): sitting (niśadana), lying (sāyā), walking (gamana) and standing (sthāna) are called dwelling. The Buddha takes up these positions to frighten Māra's troops (mārasena) and so that his disciples will rejoice (pranomānte) and enter into all kinds of dhyānas.

2. Furthermore, there are three dwellings: divine abodes (āryavihāra), the abode of Brahma (brāhmaṇavihāra) and the abode of the saints (āryavihāra).

The divine abodes are the abodes of the six classes of the gods of desire (rājadhāna).

The brāhmaṇavihāras are the abodes of the Brahmā gods, etc., up to the gods who are neither with nor without perception (saivasaṁjñānāsvaṁjñāyata) and the individual's (saṁsattvā). But previously they bore another name.

Of these three types of abodes, the Buddha chooses the āryavihāra. But [here], out of compassion (avasāna) for beings (sattva), he abides in the city of Rājagṛha.

3. Furthermore, three things, generosity (dana), discipline (sīla) and good thoughts (kusala-cetasā) constitute the āryavihāra. The Buddha dwells in the āryavihāras.

[76a] The four limitless minds (aparamānacittā): loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karuṇā), joy (mādā) and equanimity (upekṣā) constitute the brāhmaṇavihāras.

The three samādhis, namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (anātmita) and wishlessness (apranītā) are called āryavihāra. The Buddha dwells in the āryavihāras.

Finally, there are four kinds of abodes: āryavihāra, brāhmaṇavihāra, āryavihāra and buddhavihāra.299 We have already spoken about the first three. As for the buddhavihāras, these are the innumerable samādhis such as the heroic walk (śārangama), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaśyāvadya), the eighteen special attributes (duṇkudharmas) of the Buddha, omniscience (svaśājñāna) and wisdoms (prajñā) of all kinds. It is also the 84,000 baskets of the Dharma (dhammapatika), the means of saving men.300 These various Buddha-qualities are the places inhabited by the Buddha: the Buddha abides there.

The brief description of the vihāras is finished.

RĀJAGRHA

Question. - The great cities such as Chāṇḍa pūrī (Śrīvatsā), Kiśāna pūrī (Kapilavastu) and Po lo nai (Vārāṇasi) are all royal residences (rājagṛhas). Why does this city alone bear the name of Rājagṛha?

Answer. 301-1. Some people give the following explanation: A king of Mo K'iu t'o (Magadha) had a son who, although he had but a single head, had two faces and four arms. The people took this as a bad omen; the king therefore cut off the baby's head and abandoned the body in the jungle (ākṣaṁbha). Līlā (Līti) rejoined the two parts of the body and nursed the child with her own milk. In the course of time, he grew up and became a man; his strength was so great that he was able to conquer the kings of other kingdoms; he owned the whole world and took all the kings, in the number of 18,000 men, and established them in the midst of five mountains;302 by means of his great power, he governed Ten fēu t'o (Jambudvīpa). This is why the inhabitants of Jambudvīpa give these mountains the name 'City of the kings' residence' (rājagṛha).303

2. Others say the following: In the city in which the king of Magadha lived, there were fires; each time the city burned down, it was rebuilt. This happened seven times. The people of that country were overwhelmed by the work imposed upon them. Saddened and fearful, the king assembled all the wise men (pandita) and asked their advice. Some said that he should change the location of the city. The king therefore sought out a place where he could settle; he saw these five mountains which formed an enclosure like a wall; he built 299 Cf. Hidh. bhūmi, p. 90: tattva śūnyatānimitātāpratihāvihāre... vihāre ity acyate. - Same definition in Saṁgraha, p. 137.

300 This is the 80,000 or 84,000 dharma-skandhas taught in order to heal the four types of adeptes: cf. Mahālāṅghika Vinaya (Prajñākā, Concil., p. 155) Theragāthā, v. 1024; Sumatigāla, I, p. 24; Avadānasūtraikā, II, p. 155; Pi t'o cha, T 1545, k. 74, p. 383; Kūla, I, p. 45-47.

301 In this paragraph Lamotte follows the translation of E. Chavannes, Cinque contes et apologies, III, p. 285-290, with a few modifications.

302 These five mountains were called in Pāli Vibhāra, Paṭācara, Vepullā, Cugkhākita and Isigili. Cf. Magha, III, p. 68 (= Tseng yī a han, T 125, k. 32, p. 723a); Suttanipāta Comm., III, p. 285-290). But previously they bore another name.

303 Same explanation in Suttanipāta Comm., II, p. 413; Rājagṛha is called thus because many kings, such as Mandhārak and Mahāgoviṇḍa, lived there.
one should kill living beings and eat their flesh; indeed, these living beings, having died in sacrifice to the gods, will be able to be reborn in the heavens.

The pravrajitarṣa exclaimed: "You are greatly mistaken! Your words are untruthful!" and they spat upon him, saying: "Criminal, disappear!" Immediately the hermit Vasu sank into the earth up to his ankles (gaṇḍha) because he had been the first to open the door to great sins (mahāpattī). The pravrajitarṣa said to him: "You should speak the truth; if you persist in lying, your whole body will sink into the earth." The hermit Vasu answered: "I know that it is not a sin to kill sheep (udaka) and eat their meat when it is for the gods."

Immediately he sank into the earth as far as his knees (jīva). In this way, he disappeared gradually as far as his thighs (kāśī), then up to his neck (kṣaṇī). The pravrajitarṣa said: "Now your deceitful speech has received its punishment in this world. If, however, you decide to speak the truth, even though you are under the ground, we can pull you out and allow you to escape from punishment."

Then Vasu thought thus: "As a noble person, I should not say two different things. Besides, in the Wei chō (Veda) of the brāhmaṇas, the sacrifices to the gods are made in all kinds of different ways. If I myself die, would that be worthwhile?" Then he said singlemindedly (ekacittena): "In the sacrifices to the gods, it is not a sin to kill living beings and eat their flesh." The pravrajitarṣa shouted: "You are a hardened sinner! Then disappear completely, we don't want to see any more of you." Then he was swallowed up completely by the earth. From that time until today, the rule given by the recluses Vasu has always been observed: When a sheep is killed in the sacrifices to the gods, at the moment when the knife descends on the animal, one says to it: "Vasu is killing you." Then he thought: "My father, the former king, was swallowed alive by the earth even though he had gone forth from home; if I continue to rule the world, I will render myself guilty of a great sin again. Where then should I go?"

306 The Ta fång têng ch’o ni king, T 1339, k. 1, p. 644, gives quite a different version of this story which the Houa-tsîu, Bao, p. 58 summaries in these words: At the time when the Buddha was dwelling in Tútsia heaven, Vasu was the head of 6,200,000 merchants whom he was taking to sea to search for jewels. On their return, the fleet was assailed by the makaras, waves, wind and the yaksas. Each of the merchants promised Mahâleôara to sacrifice a being and in this way they avoided these four dangers. On their return, they wanted to go to the temple to fulfill their vow; but on the way, Vasu reproached them for being party to such an evil practice and proposed to save the sheep. To this end, he produced by metamorphosis a brâhinî and a monk; the brâhinî set himself at the head of the merchants; he was questioned by the monk who accused him of committing a sin by killing beings; the debate was brought before Vasu himself, changed into a Seer. Vasu ridiculed the monk who asserted that by making bloody sacrifices, rather than going to heaven, one falls into hell: "You will see that for yourself", cried the monk, and at these words, Vasu fell into hell alive. Frightened, the merchants released the sheep and all became seers; in their subsequent lifetime they were born in Sâvatthē where the Buddha converted them. As for Vasu, he was drawn out of hell by the luminous power of the Buddha Houa-tsîu ‘Flower-Collection' coming from the east. Vasu went to pay homage to the Buddha with the innumerable beings whom he had converted in the hells. To Sârîputra, who was astonished at having previously heard it said by the Buddha himself that Vasu had been condemned to remain in hell forever, the Buddha replied that such a belief is false; and he added various interpretations of the name Vasu, all tending to prove his non-infernal nature: vu means 'heaven', svu means 'wisdom'; a being who possesses heavenly wisdom cannot be infernal.
he had this thought, he heard in the air a voice that said to him: "If, as you travel, you see an extraordinary (adhaṭṭa) place that is hard (durlabha) to reach, you should establish your home there." When these words had been spoken, the voice was silent. A little later, having gone out into the country to hunt, the king saw a deer (sūrya) that fled as swift as the wind; he ran after it but was unable to reach it. As he pursued it without resting, the members of his [76c] retinue were able to stay with him. In front of him he saw a place where five mountains formed a steep and well-sheltered basin; the ground there was level and produced fine soft grass; beautiful flowers covered the earth; there were forests of all kinds of perfumed trees which bore flowers and fruits in abundance; hot springs (uṣṇodaka) and cold pools (siṭṭhāgīra) everywhere presented their purity; this was a marvelous place. On all sides there grew celestial flowers (divyapuppu) with heavenly perfumes (divyagandha) and celestial music (divyatīrya) was heard. When the gandharva musicians saw the king, they all withdrew. [The king thought]: "This place is extraordinary (adhaṭṭa) and nobody has ever seen its like (apūrvaadṛṣṭa). This is where I should establish my residence." When he had thought thus, all his ministers and his officials who had been following him arrived. The king declared: "The voice that I heard in the air told me: 'If you see on your journey an extraordinary place that is difficult to find, that is where you must establish your residence. Now I have just discovered this extraordinary place; it is here that I must establish my residence." Then he abandoned the city where he had lived previously and settled in these mountains. This was the first king to become established there and starting there, his successors, one after the other, lived there. Since this king first had a palace built there, thence came the name 'City of the royal residence.'

The explanation of the origins of Rājagaha in summary is finished.

GRDHRAKṬAPARVATA

Sūtra: [The Buddha was dwelling] on the Ki chō kiu chan (Grdhra-kṭaparvata), the Vulture Peak mountain.

Śāstra: Grhdha means vulture and śāstra means peak.

Question. - Why is it called Vulture Peak mountain?

Answer. - 1. The summit of this mountain resembles a vulture and the inhabitants of Rājagaha, because of this resemblance, agreed to call it Vulture Peak mountain. This is why it is called Grdhra-kṭaparvata.

2. Furthermore, south of Rājagaha, in the Cē ρō ńa (Śūtavāna), there were many corpuses; 309 vultures commonly came to devour them and then went to perch on the peak of the [nearby] mountain. 310 people then named it Vulture Peak mountain. It is the highest of the five mountains [of Rājagaha]. It abounds in precious forests and waters. The āryas live there.

309 Above, we saw that the Śūtavāna served as a cemetery of Kusāṇa, the old city. This detail has been confirmed by the Dīvyavādana, p. 264, 268. Going there one day, Aṣṭhapāpunkita was seized by fear (Vinuṣa, II, p. 155).

310 The twofold explanation given here is repeated in many places by Buddhaghosa, e.g., Papulicca, II, p. 63: tassa pabbatavā gījñānasam - ti vuccati.

THE BUDDHA'S FREQUENT SOJOURNS IN RĀJAGHṛA AND ŚRĀVASTĪ

Question. - We have understood the meaning of Grdhra-kṭaparvata. Why does the Buddha dwell at Rājagaha? The custom of the Buddhas is to show their loving-kindness (maitrī) towards all. It is like the sun (sūrya) that illuminates everything (draṣṭva); there is nothing that does not receive its light. But there are great cities like:

* Ngou tche ni (Ujyajin)*

Fou lou na po t'an (Pīṇavardhana)

---

311 The Grdhra-kṭaparvata was visited by Fa hien (Legge, p. 82-83) and by Hiuan tsang (Watters, II, p. 151).

Cunningham (CAGI, p. 534) identifies it with the modern Śāṅgili, two and a half miles north-west of the old city.

312 Ujjayin, in Pāli Ujji, in Greek Oxene (Poseney, VII, i, v. 63; Periplet of the Erythrean Sea, v. 48), capital of Avanti, situated at 77 degrees E and 23 degrees N (Rh. D., Buddha, the old city. This detail has been confirmed by the Sanskrit form

310 The twofold explanation given here is repeated in many places by Buddhaghosa, e.g., Papulicca, II, p. 63: tassa pabbatavā gījñānasam - ti vuccati.
Ahicchatra,314

... founded by the Macedonian conqueror during his expedition into India: Alexandria of Arachosia or Kandahār; most likely Alexandria of Cœasarea, i.e., of the Hindu-Kush (Arrian, Anabasis, III, 28, 4, IV, 22, 3; Diodorus of Sicily, XVII, 83; Quintus-Curcius, VII, 2, 22) which may be located at Pāvān, the actual Dījōlārīṣajā (J. Hachkin, Recherches archéologiques a Bougram, Paris, 1939, p. 6).

However, it is doubtful that A lan tch'ö to lo transcribes Alexandria. The Han of China knew Alexandria in Egypt under the name of Li Kian (93 and 8; 177 and 3) or Li kien (93 8; 177 9); on this subject see P. Pelliot in TP, 1915, p. 690.

... But since the language and culture of the Indian traditions of the Buddhist sources is Greek, it is possible that the Alexandria of the Buddhist sources (Divyāvagāña, p. 435 sq.) was represented on a coin from northern Pāñcāla showing an individual hitherto unknown but named Ahicchatra, capital of northern Pāñcāla; today Rāmnāgar, near Aonla, in the Barailly district of Rohilkand; it was part of the kingdom of Drupada, in Mahābhārata, books VII, 1, 22) which may be located at Parvān, C. Cunningham, pl. VI, no. 15; CHA, pl. v, no. 3). - This story is the object of the reading Achicchatra found in the List of Bṛhatā Inscriptions of Liders and on the variant Anicchatra, attested in a manuscript of Ptolemy (Paris, no. 4805). According to him, the slāga, the appointed protector of Achicchatra (cf. Divyāvagāna, p. 435 sq.), was represented on a coin from northern Pāñcāla showing an individual hitherto unknown but who is none other than a many-headed nāga (Cunningham, Coins of Ancient India, pl. VI, no. 15; CHA, pl. V, no. 3). - But the king of the snakes Achicchatra is not linked indisputably with the city bearing his name. In the Dhampuradāpā, III, p. 241-247 (t. Burlingham, Legend, III, p. 63-67), he lives in a great mound of sand (mahāśādārūs) erected by Agdattā and his companions at the borders of the lands of the Aṅga-Maṅgadhāna and the kingdom of the Kūraus (Aṅga-maṅgadhāna ca Kuru-vajrātasa ca antara). Megdāllāna, sent by the Buddha to Agdattā and his companions to convert them, upon not being received by the latter, wanted to take possession of the sand mound inhabited by the snake. A struggle ensued; by his magical power, Megdāllāna triumphed over the snake and the next day, when Agdattā and his friends came to the hill to see what had happened to Megdāllāna, they found him sitting on the sand; Achicchatra, the snake king, set food around him and, spreading his hood to the size of a bell-tower, he held it above the head of the Elder (nāgrāyā vākālaḥ śāntiḥ; spati dāhīr).

All these great cities are populous and wealthy and nevertheless the Buddha did not reside there. Why did he stay [so] often in the cities of Wangchö (Rajagaha) and Chödro (śrāvasti)? Although he stayed sometimes at Plo nai (Vārāṇasī), at Kṣi dro (Kālāpura), at Tcham dro (Campā) at Slok tso (Šāketu), at Khin chen pī (Kausambī), at Kieu leon (Karu), etc., nevertheless he of Gandhāra, refer to A. Foucher, Sur la géographie ancienne du G., BEFEO, I, 1901, p. 322; Notes sur l'état de la question du的日子里, in Études Asiatiques, 1923, I, p. 236; De Kūpāraivā a Pukkhravatā, BSOS, VI, 2, p. 341. Pukkhravatā had a coinage representing, on the obverse side, the goddess of the city with the inscription Pukkhravatā devadeva; on the reverse side, the Indian bull with the inscription Tāpiroca Usābhe. The goddess bears a mural crown and holds a lotus in her right hand (cf. CHL, p. 557 and pl. VI, 10). - Her temple was outside the city near the western gate and, according to Huisen, her image worked miracles. See Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 2, p. 881a (tr. Beal, I, p. 109; Watters, I, p. 214). - The Greek kings who succeeded at Pukkhravatā identified her with Artemis, for coins of the Artemis type (Indian bull) were struck by Artemidor and Peukaloos. - Huisen tuang (l. c.) venerated a great stūpa north of the city (according to Foucher, the mound of Bālī-Hissar), built by Alokā on the place where the Buddha gave the gift of his eyes.

According to Dīgha, II, p. 146, the six great cities at the time of the Buddha were Campā, Rājagaha, Śrāvasti, Śāketu, Kausambī and Vārāṇasī. According to the Mappi, the Buddha stayed mostly in eight cities, especially in Rājagaha and Śrāvasti.

Rājagaha, capital of Magadha (Bihar), the present Rajgir south of Patna. Its location has been definitively identified and excavated by Marshall, AR Arch. Survey, 1905-1906, 1925-1926. See B. C. Law, Rājagaha in Ancient Literature, M. Arch. Survey, no. 58, Delhi, 1938. - The Buddha stayed there during the 1st, 2nd, 4th, 17th and 20th varṣa of his ministry (Buddhavamsa Comm., p. 3).” 316 Śrāvasti, capital of Kosala (Aṣṇade), the present village of Saheth-Maheth in U.P. Cf. Marshall, Excavations at Saheth-Mahet, AR Arch. Surv., 1907-1908, p. 82; 1910-1911, p. 3; B. C. Law, Śrāvasti in Indian Literature, M. Arch. Surv., no. 50, Delhi, 1935. - For the 45 varṣas of his ministry, the Buddha spent 25 at Śrāvasti (See below, k. 9, p. 125f; Buddhavamsa Comm., p. 3).

Vārāṇasī or Kālā, on the central Ganges, the actual Benares. - It was at Benares in the Deer Park that the Buddha preached his first sermon, the Dharmakapārapuṣvatāsastra. He returned there several times afterwards (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 189, 216, 289; Sānyutta, I, p. 105; V, p. 406; Aṭṭagutta, I, p. 110, 279; III, p. 392, 300). There he converted Yaśa and many outstanding people (Vinaya, I, p. 15).

Kālāpura, in Nepal, a principal city of the Sikya clan. Its location has been discovered near the village of Paderia, two miles north of Bhanuvar. Cf. P. C. Mukherji, Antiquités in the Tarai, Nepal: the region of Kālāpura, AR Arch Surv., 1901; V. A. Smith, Kālāpura, in ERE, VII, p. 659. - The Buddha was born in the Lumbini park (Rumīdīr) east of the city; he stayed there until his departure for enlightenment. He returned during the first years of his ministry and made a large number of conversions (Ken pen chou... plo seng che, T 1450, k. 9, p. 143 sq.; Rockhill, Life, p. 51 sq.; Feer, Extras., p. 50 sq.; Nāḍinakathā, p. 87 sq.). He returned again to pacify the conflict between Śākya and Koliya concerning the Rohini river (Bhumnagudārtha, III, p. 254), and during the punitive expedition of Vidiḍadhana (Sākyamuni, IV, p. 144 sq.).

Campā, capital of Aruna (Bengal), the location of which is probably marked today by the two villages, Campūpara and Campāpara, near Bhadgrāpur (CAGL, p. 3). The Buddha visited there several times (Vinaya, I, p. 312; Sānyutta, I, p. 195; Aṭṭagutta, IV, p. 59, 168; V, p. 151, 189).

Śāketu, a city in Kosala, near Ayodhyā with which it may be confused. Its site has been identified with the ruins of Sākān Kōy on the Sai, in the district of Unao of the present province of Aṣṇade (Malasereka, II, p. 1086. It is the Śākāna of Puslīna (VII, I, 71).}

All these great cities are populous and wealthy and nevertheless the Buddha did not reside there. Why did he stay [so] often in the cities of Wangchö (Rajagaha) and Chödro (śrāvasti)? Although he stayed sometimes at Plo nai (Vārāṇasī), at Kṣi dro (Kālāpura), at Tcham dro (Campā) at Slok tso (Šāketu), at Khin chen pī (Kausambī), at Kieu leon (Karu), etc., nevertheless he stayed most often at Rājagaha and Śrāvasti. How do we know that he stayed especially in these two places? We see that the Buddhist sūtras are mostly located at these two cities and rarely in another. Answer. - 1. Although the great loving-kindness (mahāmettā) of the Buddha [77a] reaches all equally, the great cities like Uśinjīnti, etc., are frontier-countries (pratyanuṣanapada). That is why the Buddha does not reside there. 326

2. Moreover, criminals (mlecchha) are numerous there and, as their roots of good are not ripe (aparipakuṣaśālañcāla), [the Buddha does not reside amongst them]. Thus some stanzas say:

The sun's rays shine equally [on all];
The mature flowers blossom at once,
But the flowers not yet in bloom
Do not necessarily open up.
In the same way, when the Buddha
Preaches the Dharma [to all] with the same feelings (samacittā) to all,
The roots of good that are already ripe blossom at once,
Those that are not so do not open up.
This is why the Bhagavat
Resides amongst those who show the three following qualities:

Keen knowledge (tīkṣṇājñāna), ripe roots of good (paripakuṣaśālañcāla),
Reduced fetters (samyōjana) and reduced afflictions (klīśā).

3. Furthermore, it is out of gratitude that the Buddha frequently resides at Rājagaha and Śrāvasti.

Question. - Why is it out of gratitude that he often stays in these two cities?

325 Kaulini, capital of the Vatsa, today Kosam on the Jamna, 50 km. from Allahabad. It had several parks, Kukkutā and Ghotōrīsīmā, where the Buddha frequently stayed.

324 Kura is a country rather than a city. It is one of the sixteen Mahājanapadas listed in Dīgha, II, p. 200; Aṭṭagutta, I, p. 213, etc. The country corresponds to the district of Thānasar, capital of Indraprastha, near the present city of Delhi (CAChI, p. 379). In one of its villages, Kalmikāyānya, the Buddha preached some of his most important sermons, such as the Mahāvidyā and the Mahāupāyupāsūniṭṭhāna.

325 Woodward, Kindred Sayings, V, p. XVIII, has determined that among all the sūtras of the four Nīkāyas, 871 were given at Śrāvasti, 9 in the Dīgha, 73 in the Majjhima, 736 in the Sāmañña, 54 in the Aṭṭagutta.

326 Buddhist texts frequently express their distrust towards the frontier lands. Cf. Kūnasaraṣṭāpi in Lav., Cosmologie, p. 335: "Why is the Bodhisattva not born among the barbarian thieves of the frontiers? The people of the frontier lack manners and doctrine: there would have been no common ground between the Bodhisattva and them." To live in a border-land is one of the conditions making it difficult (aśakṣa) to practice the Buddhādharmā (Dīgha, III, p.263-265; Aṭṭagutta, IV, p. 225-227).
Answer. - The kingdom of Kśaṇa saḷoli (Kośala) is the native land of the Buddha. This is why the Buddha one day replied to king Pūṇa p'o lo (Bimbisāra) with these stanzas: 327

There is a wondrous country
Situated on the borders of the Himavat;
Opulent and rich in various treasures,
It is called Kośala.
Being of the solar clan and Sākya family,
I was born in that place.
Filled with disgust with old age, sickness and death,
I have left home to search for Buddhahood.

4. Moreover, the leader of Kośala, king Pusaṇu ni (Prasenajit), lived in the great city of Śravasti, and the Buddha, in his quality of king of Dharma (dharmarāja) also lived in that city, for the two leaders should live in the same place.

5. Furthermore, Kośala is the country of the birth-body (janmakāya) of the Buddha, and it is out of gratitude that the Buddha often lives in Śravasti.

Question. - If it is out of gratitude that he often lives in Śravasti, why does he not often live also in Kapilavastu, which is closer to his birth-place?

Answer. - Among the Buddhas, clinging (bandhana) has been extinguished; there are not even traces (vāsāṇa) of it left. When he goes to visit his parents (bandha), he feels no emotion (nāsī 327 These stanzas are taken from the story of the first meeting between king Bimbisāra and the future Buddha when he was still a wandering monk. The oldest Pāli sources do not know this episode (cf. Thomas, Life, p. 69), but it is related in Paññavatthu of the Suttanipāta, III, i, v. 405-424 (tr. Fausboll, SBE, X, p. 67; Chalmers, p. 100); Niddānakathā, p. 66; Dhammapadatthā, I, p. 85 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 195); Mahāvastu, II, p. 198-200; Lalitavistara, ch. XVI, p. 237-243 (tr. Fouscault, p. 205-209); Buddhacarita, ch. X (tr. Johnson, p. 141-148); Fang kouang ts’ang king, T 187 hiu mo ho ti king, T 191, k. 5, p. 947c-948a; Fo so hing ts’ang, T 192 (no. 10), k. 3, p. 19-20; Ken pen ch’ou p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 4, p. 118b-119a (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 27).

The stanzas cited here depart somewhat from the old tradition attested by the complete agreement between the Suttanipāta and the Mahāvastu:

Suttanipāta, v. 422-423: Ujji janapade rāja... na kāme abhījāthayan.
Mahāvastu, II, p. 199: Nijājanapade rāja... na kāmān abhījāthaye.

"At the side of the Himavat, O king, there live a people endowed with wealth and energy, the inhabitants of Kośala. They are of the solar race in lineage, Śākyu by birth. From this family I have gone forth, having no attraction for the sense pleasures."
All the teachers who teach (upadeśācarya) are attached to the system that they know. In the same way, every person loves his homeland. Even having gone forth from home (pravrajita), they still want it. It is to repay the benefits of the country of his dharmakāya that the Buddha often stays at Rājagṛha. A stanza says:

[?7c] The Buddhas of the past and the future
And the Buddhas of the present
Honor (ājaya) their dharmakāya
And pay homage (vandana) to it and venerate (gurukāra) it.
Since the dharmakāya prevails over the body of birth (janamakāya), it is at Rājagṛha that the Buddha resides more often.

2. Furthermore, [the Buddha stays more often at Rājagṛha] because the Tsuo chan (caityas) and the Tsing chō (vihāras) are more numerous there than elsewhere.

Thus Rājagṛha has five vihāras:

i. Tchou yang (Venuvana)[331]

b. Moreover, according to the rules of the anchorites (pravrajita-dharma), it is forbidden to have access to one's relatives, for attachment to relatives (bandhātāga) is like a fire (ṣeṣa) or a snake (ṣarpā). If the disciples of the brāhmīns staying at home (grhaṣeadhikāna) are unable to dwell in their native land during their training (śikṣā), what then can be said of the śrāmapās who have gone forth from their home (pravrajita-trāṇaṇa)?

c. Furthermore, Kapilavastu is not as big as Śrāvasti, which has 90,000 households.330 If the Buddha stayed there only seldom, he could not have saved many people. This is why he stayed there often.

d. Furthermore, in Kapilavastu, the Buddha's native land, the inhabitants had practiced (caryā) for a long time, their roots of good were ripe (paripakvaśaśamāmā) and their wisdom keen (tiṣṇaprajñāhū). The Buddha stayed there only a short time to preach the Dharma. He did not have to stay there long and, once his work of salvation was done, he went away. But at Śrāvasti, some inhabitants had just started to practice, others had practiced for a long time; among some, the roots of good were ripe, among others they were not; some had sharp faculties (tiṣṇendriya), others did not. Many of them, by the study of treatises of all kinds, had crushed their minds while trying to sharpen them and had entered into the stream of all kinds of wrong views (nānāmādyādṛṣṭiyāpi); they had served all kinds of teachers (ācārya) and venerated all kinds of gods (āleva). People of mixed practice (mitrācaryā) were numerous (amongst them). This is why the Buddha stayed among them for a long time.

If a physician (vaidīya) who is caring for an ulcer (ganda, visṣhota) determines that the ulcer is already ripe (paripakva), he breaks it open, extracts the pus (pīṣa) and, having given a medication (bhāsaṣṭiṣya), he goes away. If the ulcer is not yet ripe, he stays for a long time to smear it with ointment (āluṣa). The Buddha acts in the same way. If his disciples have roots of good that are ripe, he converts them by means of his Dharma, then he goes elsewhere. But the disciples whom he must save have unripe roots of good, he must remain with them for a long time. If the Buddha appears in the world (prādurbhavat), it is precisely to save beings and lead them to the element of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇadātu), to safety (yogāṣeṣa) and to the blissful abodes (sukhavihāra). This is why he frequently resides in Śrāvasti and rarely in Kapilavastu.

e. The Buddha attained supreme perfect enlightenment (amuttā samyakabodhi) and took on (sannuvaṅgata) the dharmakāya in the kingdom of Mo k'ie tō (Magadha) on the banks of the river Ni lien cha (Nairāñjana) in the village of Wou leou louo (Urvivāla). This is why he frequently resides in Rājagṛha.

BUDDHA'S PREFERENCES FOR RĀJAGRHA

Question. - Now we know the reasons why the Buddha often stayed in Rājagṛha and Śrāvasti. But of these two cities, why did he reside more often in Śrāvasti?

Answer. - 1. It is out of gratitude for the benefits of his native land that he stayed in Śrāvasti frequently. All beings think about their birthplace. A stanza says:

[85x400]i. Tchou yang (Venuvana)[331]

330 See also below, k. 9, p. 125c. According to Buddhaghosa, Śrāvasti had 57,000 homes (Samantapādākā, III, p. 614) and its population was 18’crore’ (Suttanipāta Comm., I, p. 371).

331 Actually Rājagṛha had many other stopping places. Besides those cited here, the Śilavana, the Ambavana of Jivaka, the Pippalagālu, the Udumbarakāla, the Moraṇivāpa with its Paribbajikākāla, the Tapodārāna, the Lathivāna, the Madhukacchi, the Sup̣utticchātira, the Pālasakasārīya, the Sumagadhi pool (See Malasekera, s.v.).

The Venuvana, or Bamboo Park, was given to the Buddha by king Bimbasā (Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 45, p. 860c-861b; Beal, Life of the Buddha, p. 199). The Buddha stayed there only seldom, he could not have saved many people. This is why he stayed there often. It is to repay the benefits of the country of his dharmakāya that the Buddha often stays at Rājagṛha. A stanza says:

[?7c] The Buddhas of the past and the future
And the Buddhas of the present
Honor (ājaya) their dharmakāya
And pay homage (vandana) to it and venerate (gurukāra) it.
Since the dharmakāya prevails over the body of birth (janamakāya), it is at Rājagṛha that the Buddha resides more often.

2. Furthermore, the Buddha stays more often at Rājagṛha because the Tsuo chan (caityas) and the Tsing chō (vihāras) are more numerous there than elsewhere.

Thus Rājagṛha has five vihāras:

i. Tchou yang (Venuvana)
ii. Sa to pan na k'ieou ho (Saptaparṇaguhā) 332,
iii. Yin t'o che lo k'ieou a (Indraśilaguhā) 333,
iv. P'i p'o lo po nou (Vaibhāravana),

v. Sa po chou houen tche kia po p'o lo (Surapisudakapārābhāra) 334.

The Venuvana is located on the flat plain.

There are not as many vihāras in the other places:

a) At Śrīvastrī there is a stopping-place called Tche houan txing chō (Jetuvanavihāra). 335 There is another called Mo k'ie lo mou t'ang (Māgūratmārpaṇḍa). 336 But there is no third stopping-place.

b) In the region of P'o lai nai sseu (Vāraṇasī), there is only one stopping-place, the vihāra of Lou lin (Mogadiva) called Li che p'an t'o na (Rajapatana). 337

332 The monastery of Māgūra (Jetavana) was offered to the Buddha by Anāthapindika when he visited the Buddha. The story is attested by the Sanskrit fragments (Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke, I, p. 70, l. 15).

333 The Vaibhāra was one of the five mountains surrounding Rāja-yāga. At its foot was the Cave of Seven Leaves, Saptaparṇaguhā, in Pāli Sattapunijha, where the first Council was held. The Sanskrit reading Saptaparṇaguhā is attested by the Mahāvīra, I, p. 368.

334 The reading Indraśilaguhā, ‘cave of the Indraśila [deer]’, has, as evidence, the Pāli form Indrasilaghā, the inscription at Bhūkhā (2nd century B.C.) idealaghā, the inscription of Tāñcā a hān Tāñ, k. 10, p. 626c, Yin t'o so to k'ou. - On the other hand, the reading Indraśilaghā, ‘Indra's rock cave’, is attested by the Sanskrit fragments (Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke, p. 61, n. 2), by the Chinese transcriptions and translations Yin t'o so to che (Tching a hān, Tāñ, k. 33, p. 632c29), Yin t'o so to che (Ho iuun, Tāñ, k. 9, p. 925b4), Ch'ou Chou (Fa hien, in Tāñ, k. 6, p. 476a).

335 According to Waldschmidt, the Pāli form Indasaḷa should be the proper reading, and Indraśila would be a faulty Sanskritization. Waldschmidt also mentions the reading Sālābhoda of Indraśila in Tibetisches Lebensbeschreibung, transl. by Schletter, p. 255, where the two variants saḷa and sāla are juxtaposed. This combined reading is probably a new invention and was already known to Buddhaghosa who explained that the cave was between two mountains and an indasaḷī tree grew at its entrance (Samaṅgāla, III, p. 697: a dīvanam pabhāsānam...sākham gātā).

336 When the Buddha was in this cave, Sakkkā (Indra) came to ask him a series of questions that are recorded in the Sakkhāpathasutta. We have several versions: Sanskrit version in Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke, p. 58-113; Pāli version in Dīgha, II, p. 263-289; Chinese translations in Tāñcā a hān, Tāñ (no. 14), k. 10, p. 626b-626c, Taching a hān, Tāñ (no. 134), k. 33, p. 632c-633c; Ti che so sōng king, Tāñ, k. 15; Tsao pao tiang king, Tāñ (no. 73), k. 6, p. 476a-476b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 53-69). The Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave found fragments of the Sakkapāthasutta engraved on the rock: Fa hien, p. 180, Watters, Travels, II, p. 173. - The visit of Indra has been represented on the monuments at Bhūkhā (Cunningham, Bhūkhā, pl. XXVII, 4), at Śnācī (Ferguson, Tree and Serpent Worship, pl. XII, XXIX, 1); at Bodhgaya (Coumatassy, Bodhgaya, pl. XI, XLV, 1); at Gāndhāra (Foucher, Art Grecō-bouddhique, I, fig. 246, 247; Hallack, Compositions plastiques, pl. XXI, XXII, XXIV, 140; at Mathār (Vogel, Mathār, pl. LO, l. LII b).

337 The reading Indrasilaghā is a conjectural form. Only the Pāli reading is attested: Sāpaparoṇādhāra. The Tsā a hān, Tāñ, k. 99 (no. 252), k. 9, p. 60c, translated Che t'ëou jen (142 and 5; 181 and 7; 46 and 29) or ‘slope of the Serpent’s Head’. It is a large cave located in the Sītāvana near Rāja-yāga (Dīgha, II, p. 116; Samyutta, IV, p. 4). According to Buddhaghosa (Sārāvatthī, II, p. 368) it was called thus because it resembled the hood of a snake (sappaphūlāsasattatī evam laddhanām pabhārano).

338 The Jetavana was offered to the Buddha by Anāthapindika who had first bought it from its owner, Jeta, for the price of its surface covered in pieces of gold. The story of the gift is in the Vinaya, II, p. 158 sq. (tr. Rh. D. - Oldenberg, III, p. 187-188); Wou fen chou in Tāñ, k. 1421, k. 25, p. 167b; Senu fen chou in Tāñ, k. 1428, k. 50, p. 935b-c; Che song chou in Tāñ, k. 1435, k. 34; 244c; Ken pen chou, p'o song chou, Tāñ, k. 1450, k. 8, p. 139v; Nidānakathā, p. 92-93. - It is represented at Śnācī (south torana, left abutment), at Bhūkhā (Cunningham, Bhūkhā, pl. LVII), at Gāndhāra (Foucher, Art Grecō-bouddhique, I, fig. 239). - The Buddha stayed there for nineteen days (Dhammapadātha, I, p. 31) and when the Māgūratmārpaṇḍa was built, he stayed at Jetavana and at Māgūratmārpaṇḍa alternately, spending the day at one and the night at the other (Sūtaṭṭha Commentary, I, p. 336). - The Jetavana was visited by Fa hien (tr. Giles, p. 31 sq) and Huan tsang (Watters, Travels, I, p. 382) who found it in ruins. - On the actual state of the site, see P. Vogel, Excavations at Si-Hei-Mahat, AR Arch. Surv., 1907-1908, p. 81 sq.

339 The monastery of Māgūratmārpaṇḍa was built in the Pāvārāmīa, east of Śrīvastrī by Viśākhā, daughter-in-law of Māgūra but her mother-in-law in the Buddhisthrama. - The visit of Indra has been represented by the Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave. - The visit of Indra has been represented by the Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave. - The visit of Indra has been represented by the Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave. - The visit of Indra has been represented by the Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave. - The visit of Indra has been represented by the Chinese pilgrims who visited this cave.
c) At P'i ye li (Vaisali) there are two stopping-places: the first is called Mo ho p'an (Mahavana) and the second Mi ho po d'an ugan (Markathavadatta).338

d) At Kiou cham mi (Kusinâb) there is a stopping-place called K'iu che lo yuan (Ghośîrâma).339

In all these regions, there was either a stopping-place having a vihâra or an empty (śāna) forest. But Râjagaha had many vihâras suitable for meditators (āhāryâs), and since these stopping-places were in safe (yogakṣema) areas, the Buddha stayed there frequently.

There is a legend explaining the name Migadivâ: "Two deer-kings led a herd of 500 deer. One of these kings was the Bodhisattva. The king of the country wanted to go hunting, so the two deer-kings begged him on bended knees to be content with two deer daily which they would send him for his kitchen. The agreement was made, and it was turned into a pregnant hind to go to her death. Filled with compassion for her, the Bodhisattva, in the form of one of the deer-kings, presented himself in her place at the palace. The king of the country, ashamed to be less generous than a deer, forbade hunting in his kingdom and gave this forest to the deer under the name 'Deer Park'" (Chavannes). This legend occurs with some variants in detail in Pâli Ñàatakâ, I, p. 145 sq.; Mahâvastu, I, p. 359-366; Liou ou ti king, T 152 (no. 18), p. 12013a (cf. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 66-71); Ta tchang yen loun king, Y 201 (no. 69), p. 14, p. 353a-339a (tr. Huber, Sûtrânskrîpiâ, p. 411-416); Tâi-yü king, T 207 (no. 20), p. 32a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 35-37); Hsuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 7, p. 906-b (tr. Beal, II, p. 50-51); Watters, II, p. 54-55).

338 Vaiśālavâ is the present-day Basrâch on the Ganges, in the district of Muzaffâpur in Tîhût (cf. Y. Smith, JRAS, 1957, p. 267; J. Marshall, AR Arch. Surv., 1903-1904). Its main monastery was the Kâltâgârâlî Hall of the Belvedere", described at length in Samatâalâ, I, p. 310; Puâpâla, II, p. 267. But whereas the Pâli texts locate it in the Mahâvana "Large Forest", the Sanskrit texts place it on the Markathavadatta "Shore of the Monkey Pool". Thus, when a Pâli sutta begins with the phrase: Bhagavad Vaiśālayâ mahâvâna kâltâgârâlîyâ, the corresponding Sanskrit sûtra (known by the Chinese Âgâma) begins with Bhagavâde Vaiśālîvâ tamârîtyâ viharât markathâvâdattâ kâltâgârâlîyâ. (Compare, e.g., Pâli Sâmûyuttâ, I, p. 29, with the Sanskrit Sâmûyikta in T 99 (no. 1274), k. 48, p. 359a, and T 100 (no. 272), k. 14, p. 296c, and T 100 (no. 34), k. 2, p. 34b). The same indication Markathavadatta is also found in the post-canonical texts: Mahâvastu, I, p. 300(Divyâlalâsa, p. 136, 200; Avadisseastâ, I, p. 8, 279. However, in some cases, the Mppi says nothing about the Kâltâgârâlî, mentions only the stops at Vaiśālavâ from the Himalaya (Samatâalâ, I, p. 309) and in the Markathavadatta. This pool is thus called because it had been dug out by the Buddha for the monkeys. Hsuan tsang, who visited it (Si yu ki, T 207, k. 7, p. 908b; tr. Beal, II, p. 68; Watters, II, p. 65) tells us that to the south of the pool there is a stupa commemorating the offering of honey to the Buddha by a monkey. This episode is told in the Têng houng a T 26 (no. 32), k. 8, p. 471a; Ken pen chou - yao che, T 1448, k. 18; Ken pen chou - p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 12, p. 163c; Mo ho seng k'i liu, T 1425, k. 29, p. 296a; Hsüan tsang, T 207, p. 906b; tr. Beal, II, p. 68; Watters, II, p. 69).

339 Ghośula (in Pâli Ghośaka) and the 500 ascetics of the Himavat whom he maintained had gone to Śrîvaistâvî to visit his monks. The construction of Ghośûlî at Pâli, Ghośîrâma. Cf. Dhammapadatthâ, I, p. 207-208 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 280); Puâpâla, II, p. 390.

340 For Pâtuâ and the heretic teachers, cf. B. C. Law, Six heretical Teachers in BS, III, p. 73-88; Baran, History of Pre-Buddhist Philosophy, Calcutta.

341 Dirghanâkha has already been mentioned. - The conversion of Vatsagotra is recounted in detail in the three Vacchagottasuttas in the Majjhima (no. 71-73), I, p. 481-497. The last two may be found in the Chinese Samyûkta, Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 962 and 964), k. 34, p. 245b sq. In the Sûnyûkta, all these sûtras are located at Râjagaha, in the Kâlandakavenukas, which confirms the assertion of the Mppi according to which Vatsagotra lived in Râjagaha. On the other hand, in the Pâli Majjhima, the related sutras on the same individual are located respectively at Vaiśālavâ, Śrîvaistâvî and Râjagaha. - Kokanadâ is a parivârîkâ or who debated with Ândana on the eternity of the world and the other reserved points. A Kokanadâsutta has been discovered in central Asia by Grünwedel, published by R. Pischel, Bruchstücke des Sanskritkramons des Buddhâsten aus Idyâkutsari TP, SPAW, XXV, 1904, p. 820. Very close, the Chinese version of Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 967), k. 34, p. 248b (cf. S. Lévi, Le Samûyûkâgama sawarit et les feuilles de Grünwedel, TP, 1904, p. 297-309). The corresponding Pâli sutta is in Anguttara, I, p. 196.

342 Sûryâkha, brother-in-law of Jîyotika and disciple of Pâtuâ. To avenge his teacher who had been ridiculed by Jîyotika, he invited the Buddha and his monks to dine, prepared poisonous food, and had a dish dug filled with fire and then threw his wife, Jîyotika's sister, into a dungeon. Disregarding the warnings of the devas, the Buddha accepted this invitation. Under his feet, the fire-filled dish was changed into a pool covered with lotuses. Sûryâkha freed his wife and asked her to intercede with the Buddha, then he came himself and asked for pardon. The Buddha reassured him and ordered the monks to chant the samâyâlîtâ which renders poisonous food harmless. Sûryâkha is well known to the Sanskrit and Chinese sources: Avadhânapalûtâ, ch. VIII, (T i, p. 258-270); Tsjeng yi ahan T 125, k. 41, p. 773c; Ta tchang yen loun king. T 201 (no. 67), k. 13, p. 327a-333a (tr. Huber, Sûtrânskrîpiâ, p. 361-366); T'ou hou tang chi king, T 545, vol. XV, p. 840 sq. (Tibetan correspondent: Djap ibos, Mad XVI, 17; Cosma-Feer, p. 262; OKC, no. 883); Che song liu, T 1435, k. 61, p. 46b: Ken pen chou - mû t'u kai, T 1435, analyzed fully by S. Lévi, Le Sûtrânskrîpiâ et ses sources, 14, July-Aug. 1908, p. 154-158; Hsuan tsang (tr. Beal, II, p. 151); Watters, II, p. 150; Yi tsing (tr. Takakusu, p. 39). - In the Pâli sources, Sûrgotâ is a lay devotee, filled with devotion to the Buddha and scorched by the Ngûraga. It is his friend Garudhâna who offers to the Buddha the poisonous food described above; cf. Dhammapadatthâ, I, p. 434-447 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, II, p. 92-99); Mûlipû, p. 350.

343 The traps laid for the Buddha by Ajattarâ and Sûryâkha are well known. It suffices here to refer to the handbook: Kern, Histoire, I, p. 186; Manual, p. 38; Thomas, Life of Buddha, p. 132; T. W. Rhys-Davids, Devadatta, in ERE, IV, p. 675-677.
He is laughed at by all.

If it is against the tigers (vīḍghra), wolves

And other ferocious beasts

That he roars so powerfully,

He is valued by the experts.

The teaching masters are like the ferocious tigers,

But, in their midst, [the Buddha] fears nothing.

These great sages have seen much, heard much (bahiśrūta),

But amongst them [the Buddha] is foremost.

Since these great sages (mahāpandita) and great learned one (bahiśrūta) live at Rājaγhrā, the Buddha often stays there...

4. Furthermore, king Piṇḍo so lo (Bimbisāra) had gone to Kīye ye sseu chō (Gayaṣṭhā) to see the Buddha and his followers, the 1000 Kīe fa (Jātis) who [had become] arhats. Then the Buddha preached to the king who attained the state of Suā ḍho āuka (srotapanna, entry into the stream). After that, the king invited the Buddha in these words: "I would like the Buddha and his community (sangha) to come to my city of Rājaγhrā and accept, for their lifetime, the clothing (cīvara), leather (carman), food (āhāra), beds and seats (sayaṃsāna) and medicines (bhūṣaja) that I will furnish for them." The Buddha accepted his invitation and that is why he frequently resides at Rājaγhrā.344

5. Furthermore, of the four directions (dīś) in Yen feou tī (Jamādāvīpa), the east (pārvā dīk) is the foremost because the sun rises there; next are the south (dakṣinā dīk), west (paścinā dīk) and north (antarā dīk). In the west, the country of Magadha is the most powerful. In any case in the other lands. This wealth is the result of three causes:...

6. Furthermore, at Rājaγhrā there are many intelligent people (medhāvīn) learned and wise, which is not the case in the other lands.

7. Furthermore, some men, before attaining the Path, wait for the time, the place and the wished-for individual. The Buddha knows in advance that Che ro houn an yen (Sakrēdevendra) and 80,000 devas should attain the Path at Magadha in the Rock Cave (śailagāthā).346 That is why he often stayed at Rājaγhrā.

8. Furthermore, this land is wealthy; when one begs for one's food, one obtains it easily. This is not the case in the other lands. This wealth is the result of three causes:

i. King Bimbisāra had given orders that food always be provided near his palace for 1000 bhākas.347

ii. Chou rî k'ie (Iyōṣṭa), born among humans, nevertheless possessed the wealth of a god.348

iii. A po lo lo (Apāḷā), king of the nāgas, was converted because of a good thought (kuṭalacittā) and became a disciple of the Buddha. To prevent famines (durbākas), he caused an unceasing beneficial rain to fall. That is why this country is wealthy.349 went to the Ganges, the gate through which he left the city and where he crossed the Ganges received the names of Gauṇatadvāra "Gautama's gate" and Gauṇatsadhita "Gautama's ford" respectively (Vinaya, i, p. 226-230; Dīgha, ii, p. 84-89); Udāna, VIII, 6, p. 85-90; Chinese versions of Mahāparinibbānasūtra, T 1, k. 2, p. 12; T 5, p. 162b-c; T 6, p. 177c; Ken pen chou... tsa che, T 14, k. 36, p. 384c; Rockhill, Life, p. 127. - Pāṭaliputra soon supplanted Rājaγhrā and became the capital of Magadha under king Uddiyān or Uddiyāhādri, son of Ajitasatru, the Kunika of the Jain sources (Vinaya, tr. Rh. D. - Oldenberg, II, p. 110). In any case, Muṇḍa, grandson of Ajitasatru, made Pāṭaliputra his residence (Anguttara, III, p. 57; Tieng yi a han, T 125, k. 24, p. 679a). However, according to Hiuan tsang, tsa kō, T 2087, k. 8, p. 891a it was a certain Aksa (Kāliṣṭhaka?), great-grandson of Bimbisāra, who changed the capital of Magadha from Rājaγhrā to Pāṭaliputra. - Shortly after Kāliṣṭhaka, the throne of Magadha passed to the Nanda dynasty, then to that of the Mauryas. Megasthenes, ambassador of Seleucus in the service of Chandragupta, about 305 BC, has left for us a description of the city of Palimbothra (= Pāṭaliputra). "This city extends, on each side, in its greatest length, 80 stades (15 km.); in width, 15 stades (7 km.); a most surrounds the entire city 6 plethres (180 m.) in width, 20 cubits (15 m.) in depth. The surrounding wall has 570 towers and 64 gates" (Arrián, X, 6, 6. P. Charrtain, Les belles Lettres, p. 37). These dimensions hardly agree with the information given by the Mppī which attributes to Pāṭaliputra a circumference of one yojana.346

346 This is the Indraṣalaguhā, see above.

347 See above.

348 For the story of Iyōṣṭa and a description of this wealth, refer to the Dhammapadathā, p. 207-221 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, III, p. 319-331); Divyāvādāna, XIX, p. 228-299 (tr. H. Zimmer, Karma, ein buddhistischer Legendenkurs, München, 1925, p. 105-174); Fo wou pui tiau, T 199 (no. 17), p. 195; Chou rî k'ie king, T 540, vol. XIV, p. 825; Ta pu mien p'ai king, T 375, k. 28, p. 780b; Rockhill, Life, p. 65-70, 94-95.

349 Evidently this is the serpent Ačchāla, protector of Magadha. The story of his conversion is told in the Pośa sa p'ing king, T 155, k. 2, p. 116a-119a, and summarized in Hsūlyqin, Akāsava, p. 10, in the following words: The pool of Yoju lien, near Rājaγhrā, is the home of a dragon named Sundara which destroyed the crops in the Magadha. A brahmin subdued it by means his magic and the population rewarded him with gifts, but when the Buddha was about to establish Rājaγhrā, his beneficial activity sufficed to repress the activity of the dragon and the people stopped offering gifts to the brahmin. Irritated, he vowed to become a dragon along with his wife and two children; to be assured of the realization of this vow, he acquired the merit of offering a meal to the Buddha's four great disciples. Then he took the place of the 351 Similarly, the Hsiang nan t'o p'o nan t'o long wang hsiung king dragon Sundara and began to ravage the crops, of which he left only the straw, hence his name Palūli "Without straw"; his wife, changed into a dragon, received the name Pi chou ni, and one of his sons, the name K'i chou ni. King Ajñatadatta asked the Buddha for help; aided by Vajrapāni, who split the mountain with his thunderbolt, the Buddha subjugated the dragon, his wife and children, and all the dragons and demonic creators of illnesses were saved in the neighboring kingdom of Vaiśālī. - A somewhat different story, but also located in Magadha, is told in a commentary on the Ekottaragāma, the Fen pie kong tō louen. T 1507, k. 5, p. 359. The brahmin Fan che, who had taken birth in the form of the dragon Apalāli and ravaged the crops in Magadha, was transported to the north-west of India: the Mppi, below at k. 9, p. 126b, tells us that the Buddha went to north-western India to the land of T'ye t'o and there subjugated the king of the dragons, Apalāli. A large number of texts tell this legend of the north-west of India: Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 20, p. 202c.

352 A short sūtra, the Pili original of which is reproduced in its entirety by Buddhaghosa in his Visuddhimagga, II, p.398-401 (title in Jñaka, V, p. 126, l. 22), translated into Chinese by the Scythian Teche K'ien, under the title Long wang hsiung ti king, T 597, vol. XV, p. 131, and into Tibetan under the name Khri byung po dbang bo nor dbang bshad bshad mdo, Mdo XXX, (Cosma-Feur, p. 289, OKC, no. 755, p. 228). The Buddha along with 500 bhikṣus went to the Trasinyarśa heaven which overhangs the palace of the nīla king, Nandopananda. Angry, the latter wrapped himself seven times around Mount Meru to hide it from the Buddha's sight. Kṣitigarbha and Bhādegāra requested the Buddha to overcome him, but it was Mādajālaśāna who was charged with this task. A terrible struggle ensued. The nīla finally tried to fight but, pursuing and being brought back by Mādajālaśāna, he changed himself into a young brahmān who took refuge in the Buddha. - The conversion of Nandopananda, which bears a striking resemblance to that of the dragon Apalāli, is told or simply mentioned in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 28, p. 703b sqq.; Saddharmapundarakāra, p. 4, l. 11; Divyavādāna, p. 307, 329, 395; Legend of Akiokā (in Przyucki, Akiokā, p. 257). - Below, the Mppi, k. 32, p. 306b-c, has Nanda and Upananda, two brothers, who want to destroy Śrāvasti.
wanted, like the Buddha, to enter nirvāṇa. In early morning (pūrvāhṇa), having taken his bowl and his cloak (patravacaramālā), he entered Rājaγraha to beg (rājaγrahaṁ piṇḍaśaḥ prāviktakat). Then he 353 The nirvāṇa of Mahākāśyapa, on which the Pāli sources are silent, is related in a whole series of texts in greater or lesser detail: Tseng y:i a han, T 125, k. 44, p. 789a; Mo ho ye ye kāṇha, T 553, k. 2, p. 101b; Mi lī hai litā tu tīrīṅg fo kāṇha, T 456, p. 433b; Divyadrāmā, p. 61–62 (= Ken pen choo... uno cho, T 1448, k. 6, p. 254b; Ken pen choo... tea cho, T 1451, k. 40, p. 408c; 409c; (tr. J. Przyłuski, Le Nord-Ouest de l’Inde, JA, 1914, p. 522–528); Ti yō cha, T 1545, k. 20, p. 99b, and especially k. 135, p. 698b; Kūsa, VII, p. 120; A yu wu tschouan, T 2042, k. 4, p. 114a–116b (tr. Przyłuski, Aikosa, p. 327–340); A yu wu wu, T 2043, k. 7,8, p. 152 a; Fa hien tschouan, T 2085, p. 863c (tr. Legge, p. 92–93), Hiuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 919b–c (tr. Beal, II, p. 142–144; Watters, II, p. 143–146). - Because of their precision, here is a translation of two of these sources:

T 456, p. 433b: At that time, Maitreya with his disciples went to the Gaṇḍakūṭaparvata. Having come to the foot of the mountain, peacefully and with slow steps he climbed the Lang tiu mountain (94 and 7; 157 and 6; probably Kukkutapada, 'Wolf-track Mountain'). Having come to the summit, he tapped the mountain with his toes. Then the great earth shook... the mountain 'cock's foot' (pratigāyaṁ), and, with his palms of his hands pressed together (adijasīlam parayanu), he took the samghatī of the Buddha Śīkāmyuni [of which he was the holder] and offered it to Maitreya, saying: "The great Teacher Śīkāmyuni, tathāgata, arhat samyaksaṃsuddha, when he was about to enter into nirvāṇa, entrusted me with this religious robe to offer to you, O Venerable One." Then the great assembly asked Buddha Maitreya: "Who is on the summit of this mountain, this man with the head of an insect, tiny, ugly, carrying the robe, who made offerings to the Venerable One?" Then the great Maitreya said to his great disciples: "Do not scorn this man... it is Mahākāśyapa." Vīhbāla, T 1545, k. 135, p. 698b: At the time of nirvāṇa, why does the Buddha not keep the body of emanation (nirmanakāya)? In order to continue to preach the Dharma and benefit beings after his nirvāṇa? Why, on the other hand, does the ughāvita Mahākāśyapa, after his parinirvāṇa, keep his body and remain for a long time? The ughāvita Mahākāśyapa had gone to Rājaγraha to beg his food and after he had eaten, he climbed the mountain of Kirou (172 and 10; 157: Kukutapada). This mountain had three peaks and looked like a cock's foot. The ughāvita penetrated to the middle and, seated with crossed legs (parinayakṣam buddhaḥ), he made the following declaration: "I wish that my body with my patched robes (pāṇīsākāla), my bowl (pāṇītra) and my staff (danda) may remain for a long time, for 57 kotis and 60 hundred thousands of years, without decaying. When the Tatthaγraha Maitreya, the fully enlightened arhat (samyaksaṃsuddhaḥ) will appear in the world (pradīpaḥbhūta), I will give him [this robe] that belonged to the Buddha." Having made this vow, he entered parinirvāṇa and then the three peaks of the mountain closed into one over the ughāvita who remained in perfect posture. When the Buddha Maitreya will appear in the world, he will lead numberless men and gods to the summit of this mountain and say to the assembly: "Do you want to see the great disciple Kāśyapa who was foremost among all the disciples of Śīkāmyuni who practiced the rules of strict austerity (atīkṣācaram)? The assembly will answer: "We would like to see him." Then the Tatthaγraha Maitreya will strike the summit of Kuṭṭakaγraha with his right hand and the peak will separate again into three parts. At that moment, Kāśyapa with his patched robes, his bowl and his staff will rise up into space (ākāśa). The immense crowd of gods and men, seeing this miracle (pārāvṛtiḥ), will cry out at the miracle (aḥkbhaddhaṁ) and their hearts will be moved. The Bhagavat Maitreya will preach the Dharma as is proper and all will be able to see the truth.

354 He ascended Gaṇḍakūṭaparvata and still more precisely, according to most of the sources (T 1545, p. 409b; T 1545, p. 409b; T 2042, p. 114c; T 2085, p. 863c; T 2987, p. 919b) the mountain 'cock's foot' (kakkaγraha), probably a mountain chain making up part of the Gaṇḍaparvata massif, at least this is what may be inferred from the passage from T 456, p. 435b, translated above. Fa hien placed it 100 li east of the Mo ho river (T 2087, p. 919b), and Yi tsing, near the bodhi tree (Chavannes, Rōga kaikō, p. 47). - We know from Hiuan tsang and Yi tsing (i.c.) that this mountain was also called Gunpūdha, the mountain of "Teacher's foot." - In the place of the reading 'cock's foot' (Ki tou: Kukkutapada), three sources at least (T 383, p. 101b; T 456, p. 433b; T 1861, p. 276c) read "Wolf-track mountain" (Lang tiu). Watters, Travel, II, p. 144, followed by Demiéville, Origine des sectes bouddhiques, MCB, I, 1931–32, p. 30, propose Kokkutapada as the Sanskrit equivalent. I [Lamotte] would assume that the three Chinese versions translated by Lang tiu an original Sanskrit having by mistake Kukkutapada, 'Dog's-foot, in place of Kuṭṭakaγraha, 'Cock's-foot.' - Finally we note that two sources, apparently among the oldest (T 125, p. 789b; T 453, p. 422b) locate the nirvāṇa of Kāśyapa at the village of Pi tiu (81 and 5; 64 and 9; Vaiśeṣa in the country of Mo kuś) (Magadhā).

355 In the Samyutta, II, p. 221 (tr. Rh. D., Kindred Sayings, II, p. 149; tr. Geiger, II, p. 284), Kāśyapa tells Ānanda how he exchanged his robe of patches of material (paratīkākāram saṃghāti) for the tattered used rags (daññāni pāṇīsākālam nibbāsam) of the Buddha. - The same sūtra occurs in the Chinese version of the Sāṃyakūṭaṁgama, T 99 (no. 1144), k. 41, p. 403b; T 180 (no. 119), k. 6, p. 418c. - On the other hand, in Hiuan tsang, T 2087, k. 9, p. 919b, the robe which Kāśyapa had to give back to Maitreya was the monastic robe of the Buddha, all embroidered with gold, a gift of his aunt.
became one single body again. From the upper part of his body there came forth fire (agni), while from the lower part there came forth water (udala): then from the upper part there came forth fire, while from the lower part there came forth fire. And he repeated the same phenomenon in the directions of the south, the west and the north. The community felt disgust for the world (lokasanuga) and all its members rejoiced. Then Mahākāśyapa with his robe, his bowl and his staff made the following vow on the summit of Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata: "I wish that my body will not rot. When Miśā (Maitreya) becomes Buddha, my skeleton (saṁsihaṅghāta) will reappear and with him I will save beings." Having reflected in this way, he penetrated right into the rock forming the mountain summit as if entering soft mud; and after he had penetrated into it, the mountain closed up once more. In future generations, the human lifespan will be 8,000 years and a man's height 80 feet. When the Buddha Maitreya comes, the height of the Buddha will be 160 feet, his face will measure 24 feet and his halo (vyanma) will be 10 li. Then, when beings learn that the Buddha Maitreya has appeared in the world (prākāṛabhātā), all together will embrace the religious life (pravṛtti) to follow the Buddha. When the Buddha will proclaim the Dharma in the assembly (sangha) for the first time, 99 prabheda of human beings will attain the state of arhat and will be endowed (saṁvanvagata) with the six superknowledges (abhijñā); in the second great assembly, 96 prabheda of human beings will attain the state of arhat; in the third there will be 93 prabheda. These in turn will save innumerable men. At that time, people will often be lazy (kūśala) and the Buddha Maitreya, seeing men in that state, will strike Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata with his fingers; then the skeleton of Mahākāśyapa, clothed in his sanghati, will appear and prostrate at the feet of Maitreya, rise up into space and [once more] manifest the transformations (parāśama) described above. Then the disciples of Buddha Maitreya, full of astonishment, will ask: "Who is this man? We say 'man' but he is so tiny. He is dressed in monk's robes and can accomplish the transformations." The Buddha Maitreya will reply: "This man is a disciple of the past Buddha Śākyamuni. He is called Mahākāśyapa. He is the foremost of the bhikṣaus who dwell in the forest (araṇyaśāstī), who have no desire (alpapcca), are content [with little] (saṁsāra) and follow the strict observances (dātānugamaśādāna). He is a great arhat who possesses the six superknowledges (abhijñā) and the deliverances (vīriyakāla). During his time, the human lifespan was 100 years; births were rare and deaths were frequent. If, with his minuscule body, Mahākāśyapa was able to accomplish such great things, why do you not accomplish such miracles with your great bodies and your sharp faculties (tīkṣaṇendriyā)?" Then the disciples, shamefully, will experience great disgust (sanyega) [for the world] and the Buddha Maitreya, conforming with the directions of the assembly, will preach all the truths (dharma). Some will become arhats, non-returners (anāgāmin), once-returners (sakṛdāgāmin), enters into the stream (srotasāpanna); others will plant the roots of good (kuśalamālā) [which will make them] prayetkabadhās; others will acquire the patient acceptance of unborn dharmanā (anuttatādharmanātā) and will become irreversible bodhisattvas (avijñatādānātā) finally, others will be reborn among gods and men (devam安东ya) and enjoy all kinds of happiness. From that we know that the Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata is a blessed and propitious place. The āryas love to reside [79b] there. The Buddha, the chief of the āryas, frequently resides on the Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata.

Moreover, the Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata is the residence of Buddhas of the past (aṭṭha), the future (anāgata) and the present (pratyutpanna). Thus it is said in the Fou leou na mi ti li ti nes king (Pūrṇamaityaputrasastra)360: "The Buddha said to Pitāma: "When the trichilīcomagacūcoṣōn (trīśaśasaṁmahāsaṁgharājadhātu) will be burned up [at the end of the kalpa], I will return and will always stay on this mountain. But weighed down by their fetters (saṁyojanaśālīgata) and unable to see the qualities (gūna) of the Buddha, beings will not see me."

4. Moreover, the Gṛdhraṅkāṭaparvata is pure and fresh. It welcomes the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the three times. No place is equal to that. It is why the Buddha stays there often.

356 In other words, Kāśyapa, according to the words of T 2042, p. 1143a, accomplished the 18 parāśama: these are the abhijñākarmanis of the Mahāyānputta, no. 210 sq. In mentioning the multiplying and then the reducing to a single one of Mahākāśyapa's body, the Mpp is referring to the sixth and seventh abhijñākarman: eka bhāva bhāḥkā, bhāḥkā bhāḥāva bhāvīkā bhāvī. - As for the phenomenon of emitting fire from the upper part of the body and water from the lower part and vice versa, this is known as the twin miracle (saṁyakapratīkhyā). The Buddha accomplished this on several occasions (cf. Nidānakathā, p. 77, 88, 193; Sumaṇaputra, I, p. 57; Mahāvastu, III, p. 115; Divyāvadāna, p. 161, 378) and the saints often produced it at the moment of their entry into nirvāna (see above, the nirvāna of Gavakṣaputra). On the mechanism and meaning of this miracle, see Dhāmmapadāṇa, III, p. 214-215 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, III, p. 45-47): Pi p'o cha, T 1545, k. 135, p. 698c., 3

357 According to some sources, when the rock closed up over Kāśyapa, he at once entered into nirvāna (Mūlasarvanīvān Vinaya, T 1451, k. 40, p. 409a; Legend of Aśoka, T 2042, k. 4, p. 115a; Viṃśaliṇī, T 1545, k. 135, p. 698b; Huisang, T 2087, k. 9, p. 910). - According to other sources, and the Mpp is one of these, Kāśyapa is merely slumbering or in nirvānapānti and will enter nirvāna only after having given the Buddha's robe back to Maitreya (Eknottadhana, T 125, k. 44, p. 780a; T 456, p. 433b).

358 According to the numerical system adopted by the Mpp (below, k. 5, p. 94b), want, in Sanskrit prabheda, is equivalent to 10,000. - In other sources, the three assemblages of Maitreya are of different numbers: Tsk yi a ha, T 125, k. 44, p. 978a, attributes to them 96, 94 and 92 kūṭas of members [the kūṭa, in Chinese ye, equals 10,000,000]. These are also the numbers in Maitreyavākāraṇa, v. 77080 (ed. S. Lévi, Maitreya le consolateur, ML, Paris, 1932, II, p. 388: praṭhamaṃ saṃsihaṁ tva... maṁkūṭāṁ śūntacetaśveñā).
5. Moreover, the Mahāyāna sūtras were most often preached at the Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata, rarely elsewhere.

Why? Because this place is pure and constitutes a marvelous retreat. The Buddha of the three times and the bodhisattvas of the ten directions praise (saṃsāra vaddanti) and honor (piṭṭhati) this place. The devas, nāgas, yakṣas, garudas, gandharvas, kinnaras, mahoragas and other very powerful deities protect (piṭṭhati), honor and venerate (sattvavanti) this place. A stanza says:

This Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata
Is the residence of the Buddhas,
The refuge of the aya:
It protects them all.
Suffering is abolished there,
Alone, it keeps the true Dharma.

6. Finally, it is there that the innumerable bodhisattvas of the ten directions, wise, marvelous and very powerful, come to see the Buddha Śākyamuni, greet him, pay their respect to him and listen to his Dharma. This is why the Buddha preaches the Mahāyāna sūtras so often on the Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata. The Prajñā is the most important of these sūtras and, since he wishes to preach it today, why should it not be on the Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata?

We have just explained in summary (saṃsaḷatā) why the Buddha resides on the Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata.

---

CHAPTER VI: THE GREAT BHĪKṢU SĀṂGHĀ

Text commented on in this chapter (Cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 4; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 2-4):

Mahātā bhikṣuṣammghena sāḍhāṃ paṭiccaṃdāvair bhikṣuṣasahasraśaṇaḥ (1) sarvair arhadbhīh (2) kṣīṇaṃdāvair (3) nīkṣēśaḥ (4) svimuktaṇciṇaḥ svimuktapraṇāṅkair (5) Aḍḍeyair (6) mahādīpāghaḥ (7) kṛtayeyair (8) apaḥṛtbhāvaḥ bhūtrasaḥ (9) anuprāptaṃvavakāhā (10) pariśītabhavasamyojanaḥ (11) saṃyogājīhauśivimuktaṃ, ekapudgalam śīlaṣṭayeṣā yad utṣaṃsantam ānandaṃ śaikṣaṃ srotaṇam.361

"The Buddha was accompanied by a great samgha of five thousand bhikṣus; all were arhats, who had destroyed the impurities, were free from the afflictions; their minds as well as their wisdom were tamed; they were great 'nāgas'; they were accomplished and complete;362 they had laid down the burdens but were capable of bearing it; they had assured their own personal benefit; they had completely broken the fetters of existence; they were completely freed by perfect knowledge with the exception of Ānanda who, being of the śaikṣa level, had [merely] entered the stream."

Sāṭha: Accompanied by a great samgha of bhikṣus (mahātā bhikṣuṣammghena sāḍhāṃ).

Sāṭham 'accompanied by' indicates the identity of place (deśa), time (kāla), mind (citta), discipline (ilā), views (drṣṭi), path (mūrga) and deliverance (vimokṣa).363

MAHAT

Mahat, in the language of the Ts'īn, means 'great', numerous (sambhala), or superior (īreṣṭha).364

1. This samgha is great because it surpasses all the others, because it has broken all the obstacles (āvarana) and because the gods (dvāra), kings (vījan) and other great individuals respect it (svatvavanti).

2. This samgha is numerous because there are five thousand members.

3. This samgha is superior because it is able to refute the teachings (iṣapadeśa) of the 96 heretical sects (read vai tao = tīrthika).365

---

361 We may notice that this formula departs from the traditional text at certain points: three epithets are omitted, namely, vaśābhīṣṭaiḥ, āryatantraiḥ and sarvacetoṣaṃsūprasasāṃsūpratitaḥ; on the other hand, bhūtrasahaḥ occurs here only.

362 Rather free translation of kṣīṇaṃdāvair which means 'having accomplished what had to be done'.

364 Cf. ibid., p. 35: Mahatā ti gunamahattena pi mahatā saṅkhūmahattena pi. Sa hi bhikkhuṣamgho guṇehi mahāh ākṣesi apicchatidigunavasatasamamogustvātām, saṃbhāṣa pi mahāḥ paṭiccasasamvāditvātām.
What is a bhikṣu? The bhikṣu is a mendicant. He is called bhikṣu because of his pure means of livelihood (pariṣuddhījīva). Thus it is said in a sūtra:366

“Śāriputra entered the city to beg his food; when he had obtained it, he sat down against a wall (kaññya nirāya nyāṣajātā) to eat. Then a brahmacarī named Tīzing mou (Śucumukhī) came to see Śāriputra and asked him:

1. Ekaṃ suṣumyaṃ aṣayam Śāriputto Raṭṭhage viharatī YeHVane Kalamakarātāpe.
3. Aha kha Śucumukhī parībhājitaṃ yeHVasaṃyaṃ Śāriputto tempasuṭikāhaṃ. upasukhaṃbhītvā aṣayasaṃnāṃ Śāriputtaṃ etad avaccha.

4-7. Ken na kha samana adhomuko ... ubbhamuko ... diṣumuko ... vidiṣumuko bhūjalita. Na krohaṃ bhagīni adhomuko ... ubbhamuko ... diṣumuko ... vidiṣumuko bhūjalita.

5. Kathācarati samana bhūjalita.
6. Ye ki keci bhagīṇī samanabhūdanaṃ vattavijāya tiracchānaśrīyaṃ mācchāryaṃ jīvitaṃ kappenti, ime vuccanti bhagīṇī samanabhūdhanaṃ adhomukhā bhūjalita.
7. Ye ki keci bhagīṇī samanabhūdanaṃ dīkṣayapatikhaṃgamanaṃyoṣa mācchāryaṃ jīvitaṃ kappenti, ime vuccanti bhagīṇī samanabhūdhanaṃadhomukhā bhūjalita.
8. Ye ki keci bhagīṇī samanabhūdanaṃ dīkṣayapatikhaṃgamanaṃyoṣa mācchāryaṃ jīvitaṃ kappenti, ime vuccanti bhagīṇī samanabhūdhanaṃ diṣumukhā bhūjalita.

10. So kāmuṃ na bhagīṇī vattavijāya ... na kankhatavijāya ... na dīkṣayapatikhaṃgamanaṃyoṣa ... na atīgavesṭaḥ tiracchānaśrīyaṃ mācchāryaṃ jīvitaṃ kappemi. Dhammena bhikkham parīyetsi dhammena bhikkham parīyetsivā bhūjalita.
11. Atho kha Śucumukhī parībhājitaṃ Raṭṭhage raṭṭhajāya raṭṭhajāya sāṅgahāsakaṃ upasukhaṃbhītvā evam āroveś. Dhammikam samanāṃ sakupatīyaḥ dāharaṁ dāhrenti unesuṣamaṃ samanāṃ sakupatīyaḥ dāharaṁ dāhrenti dhetu samanāmaṃ sakupatīyaṃ samāṇāṃ. The Chinese version of the Tsu a han follows the Pāli text closely but at the end adds an interesting detail which the Mpp does not mention: “At that time, some tīṭhīkha pravṛtikakas heard the tīṭhīkha Śucumukhī who was praising the īnaṃgas, sons of the Śākyas. Out of jealousy, they killed the tīṭhīkha pravṛtikak Śucumukhī. After her death, she was reborn among the Tuśita gods because she had faith (āṣuddhījīva) in the venerable Śāriputra.”

The main differences that we notice between the various redactions of the Sūtra of Śucumukhī oblige us to recognize that the Mpp has borrowed its quotation from a canonical collection departing considerably from the tradition represented by the Pāli Saṃyuttaṇikāya and the Chinese Saṃyuktāgama.
2. Furthermore, bhi means to cut (bhid) and kṣu means afflictions (kṣud = kleśa). The person who has cut the afflictions is called bhikṣu.367

3. Furthermore, the [monk] who has gone forth from home (pravrajita) is called bhikṣu. It is like the eastern (Hou), Chinese (Han) and Tibetan slaves who each have their name.

4. Furthermore, the one who says, from ordination (aprasampada) onward: "I, the bhikṣu so-and-so, will observe the precepts (śīla) for my whole life."368

5. Furthermore, bhi means to frighten (bhit) and kṣu means ability (kṣam). The one who has the power to frighten Māra and his followers has bhikṣu. When the monk goes forth from home (pravrajita), shaves his head, puts on the saffron robe (kāṣṭha) and receives the precepts (śīla), Māra is frightened because he thinks: "This man will definitely enter into nirvāṇa in time." It is as the Buddha said: "The man who shaves his head, puts on the saffron robe (kāṣṭha) and resolves (ekacittena) to accept the precepts, will know how gradually to cut the bonds (bandhana) and decrease suffering: he will enter into nirvāṇa."

SAṂGHĀ

What does saṃgha mean? In the language of the Ts'in, saṃgha means assembly. The gathering together of many bhikṣus in one place is called saṃgha. In the same way, a group of large trees is called a forest (vana). Taken separately, the trees do not make up a forest, but if they are cut down one by one, there is no longer a forest. In the same way, taken separately, the bhikṣus do not make up a saṃgha, but if they are removed one by one, there is no longer a saṃgha. The bhikṣus must be gathered together to constitute a saṃgha.369

There are four types of saṃgha: 1) the assembly having shame (hrūṇa), 2) the shameless saṃgha (āhrīkṣa), 3) the assembly of dumb sheep (edamākā), 4) the true saṃgha (bhūna).371

367 Bhinnakleśavatod bhikṣu is a traditional etymology; cf. the commentaries of the Vīhāra, p. 328, the Vimānavatthu, p. 29, 214, and the Petavatthu, p. 51; Mahāyutpatti, no. 8753; Kosha, IV, p. 97. - More detailed, the Mahānīlado, p. 70, which proposes: sattanam dharmam na bhinnakleśa bhikkhu.

368 This is the monk who has received the usual ordination by the fourfold action of public declaration (jihapaticcharakarammapasampanno bhikṣu). Cf. Che song liu, T 1435, k. 1, p. 269 (= Mahāyutpatti, no. 8754). - The Jihapaticcharakammapa is described in the Vīyua, I, p. 56, 317 sq.; II, p. 89; III, p. 136; IV, p. 152.

369 According to Buddhaghosa and the Pāli commentators, the saṃgha assumes a commonality of views and precepts; cf. Suraṅgala, I, p. 230: ditthihaipassambhitena saṁghabho e saṁgho.

370 The Chinese translation Ye yang is an imaginative interpretation of the Sanskrit edamākha 'deaf-t mute', where the word eda 'deaf' has been combined with eda 'sheep'. Cf. Houboltin, dvo, pp. 45, 45.

371 The Ti tieng chu louni king, T 411, k. 3, p. 740c; also distinguishes four types of saṃgha:

1) s. in the true sense (paramādhamāka), 2) s. in the ordinary sense (samurrencakha), 3) s. of mute sheep (edamākha), 4) shameless s. (Wou ts'an khei = āhrīkṣa). The definitions that it gives correspond to those of the Mppi. - The same division of the saṃgha, increased by one point, is repeated by Samghhabuddha in his Chouen tscheng li loun T 1562, k. 38, p. 557c.

PAŅCAMĀTRA BHIḴṢUSAHASRA

Śūtra: [The assembly] was very numerous; a section of five thousand [men].

Śāstra: What is meant by very numerous? We call a [sum] which increases and rarely decreases very numerous. In a numerous assembly, if a group is taken out, there is a 'section'. Here in an assembly of ten thousand bhikṣus, a section of five thousand men is taken. Hence the expression 'section of five thousand men'.

1. ĀRHAṬ

Śūtra: All were arhats.

Śāstra: What does arhat mean?

1. Ava means enemy (ari) and hat means to kill (han). He who has destroyed all these enemies that are called the afflictions (kleśa) is called an arhat.

2. Furthermore, the arhats who have destroyed all the impurities (kṣetrapravrajita) deserve (arhanti) veneration (pūjya) by the gods and men of all the universes (loka).

3. Finally, a designates negation and raḥat designates birth. He who will never again be reborn in future generations is called arhat.

2. KŚEŅĀŚRAVA

1) āḥryaṣaṃgha, 2) edamākhaṣaṃgha, 3) s. of partisans (P' ong tänd seng = pakṣaṣaṃgha), 4) samurrencaḥṣaṃgha, 5) paramādhamāṣaṃgha. - Similar division in a commentary on the Sarvēśvara-vīra Vīyua, T 1440.k. 2, p. 513b: 1) edamākhaṣaṃgha, 2) āḥryaṣaṃgha, 3) bhinnasamgha, 4) viśudhasaṃgha, 5) paramādhamāṣaṃgha.
Sūtra: They have destroyed the impurities.
Śāstra: They are called nīkṣekā because they have destroyed all the fetters (samyojana), the attachments (upādāna), the bonds (bandhana), the obstacles (nīvarana), wrong views (dyṣṭi) and the envelopment of desire (paryavasthāna).

3. NIŚKEŚA
Sūtra: They were free of the afflictions.
Śāstra: They are called nīkṣekā because they have destroyed all the fetters (samyojana), the attachments (upādāna), the bonds (bandhana), the obstacles (nīvarana), wrong views (dyṣṭi) and the envelopment of desire (paryavasthāna).

4. SUVIMUKTACITTĀ, SUVIMUKTAPRAJĀṆA
Sūtra: Their mind was completely liberated as well as their wisdom.
Śāstra: Question. - Why are they suvimukttacitta and suvimuktaprajāṇa?

Answer. - 1. The heretics (tīrthikā) who have renounced pleasure (visrutha) acquire liberation of mind (cetojñānā) by a twofold path: the path of seeing the truths (saityadarśanāmārga) and the path of meditation (bhāvānāmārga); this is why they are called suvimukttacitta. As for the Saṅghas, while they have acquired deliverance of mind, they are not yet completely liberated because they still retain a residue of the fetters (samyojana).

2. Furthermore, the arhats have acquired liberation of mind (cetojñānā) by a twofold path: the path of seeing the truths (saityadarśanāmārga) and the path of meditation (bhāvānāmārga); this is why they are called suvimukttacitta. For the Saṅkhaśas, while they have acquired deliverance of mind, they are not yet completely liberated because they still retain a residue of the fetters (samyojana).

3. Furthermore, the dharmas auxiliary to the path (mārgapādikādharma) are not complete in the heretics (tīrthikā). They seek the path by cultivating one single quality (guna) or two qualities but they are unable to find the path. According to them, the person who is seeking purity (visuddha) by alms-giving (dāna) alone or by sacrificing to the gods (devayajña) can escape from grief (daurnamaya) and be reborn in a land of eternal bliss (nityasukha). Others speak about an eightfold path (mārga) to go to purity: 1. individual insight (āvāsavodihā), 2. tradition (jīrati), 3. study of the texts (stērādyāvyana), 4. fear of inner suffering (ādhyātmika-kāśabha), 5. fear of suffering inflicted by great beings (mahāsvātavadhikāśabha), 6. fear of suffering inflicted by the gods (devadhikāśabha), 7. the acquisition of a good teacher (śrīcāryalābha), 8. generosity practiced on a grand scale (mahādāna). They say that only the eighth method [namely, generosity] merits the name of the path of purity (visuddhindārgha).

Finally, some heretics consider only alms-giving (dāna) and discipline (śīla) as pure; others, alms-giving and dhyāna; yet others, alms-giving and the pursuit of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā). All these paths are incomplete. The person who calls the absence of any quality or just a few qualities purity (visuddha) will be able to attain liberation of mind (cetojñānā) to a certain degree but he will not be completely liberated (suvimukta), for in him the path of nirvāṇa is not complete (paripūrṇa).

[80c] A stanza says:
The man who lacks qualities will be unable to cross
The ocean of birth, old age, sickness and death.
The man endowed with a few qualities will not be able to do more.

The Path of good practices has been proclaimed by the Buddha.

Here the Sūtra on the tenth king (Subhadrabrāhmaśristīma) is cited:

"The brahmacharī Subhadra, 120 years old and possessing the superknowledges (abhiṣikṣā), was on the shore of lake A na po tu to (Amaravatī). During the night in a dream he saw everyone without eyes, with bodies naked and deep in shadow; the sun had disappeared, the earth dried up and Sumeru toppled over by wind-storms. He woke up frightened and said to himself: 'What does this mean? My life has reached its end since the teachers of heaven and earth are about to fall.' Perplexed, he could not understand why he had had this bad dream. Formerly, he had a goddess friend (kalāyānmūradeva)...

372 The conversion of Subhadra, to which the Mppi will return later (k. 26, p. 250a) is told in full in a series of texts: Dhīka, II, p. 148-153 (tr. Rh. D., 164-169; Franke, p. 239-242); Chinese versions of the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra: T 1 (no. 2, k. 4, p. 25b-25c, T 5, k. 2, p. 171-172a; T 6, k. 2, p. 187b-c; T 7, k. 2, p. 203b-204b; Ta pan nie yen king, T 337, k. 36, p. 850c sq.; Ta pan y a h, T 99 (no. 979), k. 35, p. 253c-254a; Ten y a han, T 125, k. 37, p. 752; Ken pen choo.. T sa cho, T 1451, k. 38, p. 396 (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 138); Avadānānātaka, I, p. 277-240 (tr. Feer, p. 151-159); Suan tsi po yu an king, T 200 (no. 37), k. 4, p. 220b-221b; Hsuan tsang, Sī y a li, T 2087, k. 6, p. 903c (tr. Beal, II, p. 35-36; Watters, II, p. 30-34); Dhammapadathā, III, p. 375-378 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, III, p. 130).

373 In most sources, Subhadra is a citizen of Kuśinagara; the Mālāsārūṣativiśudha (T 1451, k. 38, p. 396a) has him living on the shore of Lake Mandikīni; according to the Mppi and the Tibetan Lebensbeschreibung (tr. Schieffner, p. 291), he lived in the north near Lake Anurātapa.

374 In a previous existence when Subhadra was the bhikṣu Asoka, this deity friend already had informed him of the imminent nirvāṇa of the Buddha Kāśyapa (cf. Avadānānātaka, I, p. 238).

375 In the Mālāsārūṣativiśudha (T 1451, k. 38, p. 396a, it is a fig tree that warned Subhadra: At that time, there was in Kuśinagara a decrepit heretic parivṛjñāka called Subhadra, 120 years old. The citizens of Kuśinagara respected him, venerated him and paid homage to him as to an arhat. Not far away, there was a large lotus lake called Man t'o te chul (Mandikīni) on the shore of which there grew a Šūwa tan fo tree (Uddhbara or Ficus glomerata). Once, at the time when the Bodhisattva was dwelling among the Tujīta gods and had descended into his mother's womb in the form of a white elephant, that tree began to produce a flower bud. When he came into the world, the flower bud took on a more and more brilliant color. When he was an adolescent, it began to open up. When he was filled with disgust for old age, sickness and death and withdrew into the mountainous forests, it grew a little and took the shape of a crow’s beak. When he devoted himself to asceticism, it seemed to wither. When he gave up asceticism, it came back to life. When he took nourishment, it recovered its former enlightment, it expanded. When the god Brahmap invited the Buddha to turn the wheel of the Dharma at Benares, the fig tree and its flower shone brilliantly and its marvelous perfume...
The next day, Subhadra went to the forest of Kusinagara. He met Ananda and said to him: 'I have heard that your teacher teaches a new path to nirvana and today, during the [last] watch of the night, he is going to undergo cessation (niruddha). I feel some doubts (kāṭikā) and I would like to see the Buddha so that he can dispel them.'

Ananda replied: 'The Bhagavat is on the point of death. If you question him, you will tire him out.'

Subhadra repeated his request three times, but Ananda answered him in the same way each time.

The Buddha heard this conversation from a distance and he ordered Ananda: 'Let the brahmacharins Subhadra come here and question me freely. That will be my last talk. He will become my disciple shortly.'

Subhadra retired to Kuśinagara. He met Ānanda and said to him: 'I have heard that your teacher teaches a new path to nirvana and today, during the [last] watch of the night, he is going to undergo cessation (niruddha). I feel some doubts (kāṭikā) and I would like to see the Buddha so that he can dispel them.'

Since I left home
More than fifty years have passed.
In pure morality, dhyāna and wisdom
Heretics have no share in these.

Having not the slightest share,
How then would they be omniscient?

In a system where the eighthfold noble path (āryāṣṭāṅgika marga) does not occur, the first, second, third and fourth fruits (phala) are missing; in a system where the eighthfold noble path is found, the first, second, third and fourth fruits are present. O Subhadra, in my doctrine, there is the eighthfold noble path and consequently the first, second, third and fourth fruits are present. The other systems, whose of the heretics (tīrthika), are all void (tāna): they contain neither the Path nor the fruits nor the [true] dhamma. Therefore in my great assembly there is the true lion's roar (simhāndā).'

Having heard this doctrine (dharma), the brahmacharin Subhadra immediately attained the state of arhat. He said to himself: 'I must not enter nirvana after the Buddha.' Having had this thought, he sat down opposite the Buddha with crossed legs (parayankam abhyujyata) and then, by means of his miraculous power (ṛddhibala), he emitted fire from his body which consumed it entirely. Thus he attained his cessation (niruddha)."
The arhats susceptible of regression (parihāṇadharman) obtain [only] an occasional liberation (samayavimukti); they cannot find salvation.

The Buddha has said: "When all the qualities are complete, one is able to save disciples." In the same way, a lesser physician (vaid̄ya) who has only one or two kinds of medicine (bhāṣajya) at his disposal is unable to cure serious sicknesses (garuvyadāhī), whereas a great physician who has all the medicines can cure all the sicknesses.

Question. - If it is by elimination of all the afflictions (kleśa) of the threefold world (trīśālālāhata) that the mind finds liberation (vimukti), why did the Buddha say that the mind finds its deliverance by elimination of grasping (trṣaṇa)?

Answer. - a. Grasping (trṣaṇa) is capable of fettering the mind according to its great power. This is why the Buddha spoke about it without saying anything about the other afflictions (kleśa). When grasping is cut, the other afflictions are also cut by the same fact.

b. Moreover, when it is said: "The king has arrived!", we know that he is necessarily accompanied by his retinue (parivṛtta). It is the same for grasping. Or again, when the head (diva) is seized, the rest of the body follows. It is the same for grasping. When it is cut, we know that all the other afflictions are also cut.

c. Finally, all the fetters (samoyogana) depend (apokṣaṇe) on craving (trṣaṇā) or on wrong view (dyṣṭa). The afflictions (kleśa) that depend on grasping fetter (dvīrviranta) the mind (citta); those that depend on wrong view fetter wisdom (prajñā). And so, when grasping is eliminated, all the fetters dependent on it are also eliminated and one attains deliverance of mind (cetoṭvīmkṣṭi); when ignorance (avidyā) is eliminated, all the fetters dependent on wrong view are eliminated and one attains deliverance of wisdom (prajñātvīmkṣṭi).

4. Furthermore, these five thousand arhats are irreversible (aparīṭhārhadharmam) and have attained the knowledge relative to non-production of dharmas (anupāḍā jihāna); this is why it is said that their mind is completely liberated as well as their wisdom (suvimukta citta, suvimuktaprajñā), for they do not regress.

The arhats susceptible of regression (parihāṇadharman) obtain [only] an occasional liberation (samaññavimukti); thus Kī'ū raśā (Godhika), etc., although they attained liberation, were not completely liberated (suvimuktī), as a result of the possibility of regression (parihāṇadharmam). 382

5. ĀJĀNEYĀ 383

Sūtra: Their minds were tamed.

Sūtra: 1. Their minds remain even (sama) and indifferent (ananya) to marks of [81b] respect (arcanā) and worship (ṣujjā), as well as to hatred, curses and blows. Whether precious jewels or paving stones are thrown at them, they consider them as absolutely the same. Whether their hands and feet are cut with a knife or their body anointed with sandalwood (candaṇa), it is the same and indifferent to them. 384

2. Furthermore, their minds are tamed because they have cut passion (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), pride (abhīmāna) and delusion (moha) at the root.

3. Finally, these arhats do not like what is pleasant, do not hate what is hateful, are not deceived by what leads to error. They are watchful over their six sense organs. This is why their minds are tamed. A stanza says:

The man who watches over the six sense organs
Is like a well-trained (ā-dānca) horse.

This true sage
Is honored by the gods.

On the other hand, fools (bāla) do not know how to watch over the sense organs. Not having cut wrong views (dyṣṭa) inspired by passion (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha), they are untamed like a bad horse. That is why the arhats are called ājāneya.

6. MAHĀNĀGA 385

382 Godhika made futile efforts to attain arthaathood. He obtained only occasional deliverance of mind (samaññavimukti) from which he fell six different times. In his disgust, he committed suicide, obtained the state of arhat at the moment of death, and thus attained nirvāna. Cf. Sanyutta, I, p. 120-122 where the expression zāmaññikā cetovimukti which occurs several times should be corrected to samaññikā cetovimukti; Dhammapadātuṭta, I, p. 431-453 (tr. Burlington, Legends, II, p. 99-111); Tsa a bā, T 99 (no. 1091), k. p. 286a-b; Y 100 (no. 30); k. 2; p. 382c-383a; P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 60, p. 312b; Kośa, VI, p. 262.

383 As will appear from the explanations which follow, ājāneya (from the root ā + jā) is given here linked with the root ā + fidh. This is also the explanation of Buddhaghosa and the Pāli commentators, cf. Śīkha, I, p. 181; Dhammapadātuṭta, IV, p. 4.

384 See Hobogirin, Byodo, p. 272.

385 According to the Dhammapadātuṭta, mahānāga means karivaṭsambhūlī mahādānīthūne.
Sūtra: They were great 'nāgās'

Śāstra: 1. Mahat means snake or elephant. Among the innumerable other arhats, these five thousand arhats are extremely powerful; this is why they are compared to a snake and an elephant.

In the water, the snake is very strong; on earth, the elephant is very strong. - A great elephant (mahat) is a dangerous and heavy creature, while a great snake is also a difficult and dangerous creature. This is why they are compared to a snake and an elephant.

2. Furthermore, the afflictions (kāya) of these arhats are extremely powerful; this is why they are compared to a snake and an elephant.

3. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they have obtained the good dharmas (ṣātra): 1) those that depend on craving (kāma), discipline (śīla), and equanimity (upeksa), concentration (samādhi), etc.; 2) those that depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭipa), which are of two kinds: 1) those that depend on craving (kṛṣṇa), discipline (śīla), and equanimity (upeksa), concentration (samādhi), etc.; 2) those that depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭipa).

4. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they have the cut the afflictions depending on craving; they are kṛta because they have cut the afflictions depending on wrong views.

5. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they see clearly the material dharmas (rūpādharma); they are kṛta because they see clearly the non-material dharmas (ārūpādharma). It is the same for the other pairs of dharmas: visible (sanādānapa) and invisible (ānudānapa), offering resistance (saprutiṣṭha) and not offering resistance (aṇupratīṣṭha), etc.

6. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they have cut the bad (ākula) and the morally undefined (avyākṛta) dharmas; they are kṛta because they meditate on the good dharmas (kulaśādharmanamaśādāra).

7. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they are endowed with the wisdom that comes from hearing (irutamayā praṇāh) and the wisdom that comes from contemplating (cintamayā praṇāh); they are kṛta because they are endowed with the wisdom that comes from meditation (bhāvanamayā praṇāh).

8. Furthermore, they are kṛta because they have obtained liberation of mind (cetojñāna); they are kṛta because they have obtained liberation of wisdom (praṇāja).

9. They are kṛta because they have obtained the good dharmas (ṣātra), etc. - Having these two types of [good] dharmas in full, they are called kṛta because they have assured the interest of others (agnipriyā). The five skandhas are extremely powerful; this is why they are compared to a snake and an elephant.

10. They are kṛta because they have obtained the path of the aspirants (śākṣāmāra); they are kṛta because they have acquired the path of the masters (ṣākṣāmāra).

11. They are kṛta because they have cut the afflictions depending on wrong views (dṛṣṭiṣṭha); the second, the name and the thing (ṣātra); that is why they are called burden (bhāra). Thus the Buddha said: "What is the burden? The five skandhas are the burden."387 The arhats are said to be apahṛtabhāra because they have set down this burden.

386 The first praṇāh has as its object the name (nāma); the second, the name and the thing (artha); the third, the thing alone. Those who possess them can be compared to three men who are crossing a river: the one who cannot swim does not abandon the swimming apparatus for every moment; the one who can swim a little sometimes holds onto it, sometimes lets go of it; the one who can swim crosses without any support. - For these three praṇāh, cf. Dhīgha, III, p. 219; Vīhāra, p. 324-325; Visuddhimagga, p. 439; Pāli Thu, p. 42; Çāk, p. 134.

387 Bhāra karmahat? pawarpadānānakṣādāra; please taken from the Sūtra on the burden and the beater of the burden (Bhāra or Bhārābhārāśāstra), of which there are several versions: Pāli version in Sanskritta, III, p. 25-26; Sanskrit version in Kosā, IX, p. 256; Kosāvākiyā, p. 706; Tatvasaṃgraha, I, p. 130 (cf. Schayer, Kamalaśīla Kritis des Pudgalavāda, RO, VIII, 1932, p. 881). Chinese translations in Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 73), k. 3, p. 19a-b; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 17, p. 631a-632a. - This sūtra is frequently quoted: Śrīśālākā, XVIII, 103, p. 159; Visuddhimagga, II, p. 479, 512;
The arhats are also bhārasaha, able to bear the burden:

1. In the Buddhadharma, two burdens of qualities must be borne: that of the interest of oneself (svakārtha) and that of the interests of others (parārtha). The interest of oneself is destruction of all the impurities (sāvādayavacanasya), [82a] definitive deliverance (vimukti) and other similar qualities (guna). The interest of others is faith (sūradhā), discipline (śīla), equanimity (upekṣā), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā) and other similar qualities. The arhats are called bhārasaha because they are capable of bearing their own burden and that of others.

2. Furthermore, just as a vigorous ox (go-) can carry heavy loads, so these arhats who have acquired the faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), an awakening (avabhodha) and a path (marga) that is free of defilements (anāsrava) can bear the heavy load of the Buddhadharma. This is why they are called bhārasaha.

9. ANUPRĀPTSAVĀKĀRTHA
Śūtra: They have assured their personal interest.

Śāstra: What is meant by personal interest (svakārtha) and personal disadvantage?

1. Personal interest is the practice of the good dharmas (kaisaladharma-caryād). Personal disadvantage is the opposite, irreligion (adharma).

2. Furthermore, faith (sūradhā), discipline (śīla), equanimity (upekṣā), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (prajñā) and the other qualities (guna) surpass all wealth (dhanas), win present, future and eternal happiness (iha-pararājanya-yashūkha), and lead to the city of immortality (aniyantamagara). For these three reasons, they are called personal interest. Thus it is said in the Sin pūrṇa (Śraddhālāvarga):388

The person who acquires faith and wisdom
Possesses the foremost of treasures.

All the other wealth of the world
Is not equal to this treasure of the Dharma.

3. Furthermore, the attainment of present happiness (ihasukha), future happiness (parasvavasukha) and the eternal happiness of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇa-nityasukha) is called personal interest. The rest is personal disadvantage. A stanza says:

Nyāyvādāntālo (Bibl. Ind.), p. 342. – Europäische Interpretationen. L. de La Vallée Pousin, JRA, 1901, p. 308, JA, 1902, p. 266; Opinions, p. 83 sq.; Nirvāṇa, p. 36; Mangiayeff, Recherches, p. 225, E. Hardy, ITAS, 1901, p. 573; Keith, Buddhist Philosophy, p. 82; S. Schayer, Ausgewählte Kapitel aus den Prasannapadā, Crakow, 1932, p. X.

388 The Śraddhālāvarga is one of the chapters of the Dharmapada. The stanza cited here is missing in the Pāli Dharmapada but occurs in the Sanskrit Udānavarga, X, p. 116: ye jñātālaka labhante śraddhāhāṃ... ayasya dhanam. This also occurs in the Tibetan Udānavarga, X, p. 36: mnēkas gati lātko bahi kyij ren na ... de yi nor gīs phel bar zin

10. PARIKŚEŅABHAVASAṂYOJANA
Śūtra: They had completely broken the fetters of existence.

Śāstra: There are three types of existence (bhava): existence [in the world] of desire (kāmabhava), existence in the world of form (rūpabhava) and existence in the formless world (ārūpyabhava). By virtue of actions belonging to the domain of the realm of desire (kāmadhūracaraka-rūpa), one will be reborn later in this realm to undergo the retribution of these actions (karman-pāka): this is what is called kāmabhava, existence [in the world] of desire. [Mutatis mutandis], it is the same for the rūpa- and ārūpyabhava. That is what is understood by existence.

The arhats have broken the fetters (parikṣetabhasamyojana) [of existence]. These fetters (samyojana) are nine in number: attraction (anuṇaya), aversion (pratigūra), pride (māna), ignorance (avidyā), doubt (vicikīrtā), wrong view (dyey), unjustified esteem (pariśmartā), avarice (matsarya) and envy (dhyā).389 These samyojanas encompass all of existence and this existence encompasses all the samyojanas. Hence the expression parikṣetabhasamyojana.

Question. - The fetters have indeed been broken in the arhats for they have eliminated all the afflictions (kleśas), but their existence (bhava) cannot be cut. [82b] Indeed as long as they are not nirvanized, they are still furnished with the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatanas) and the eighteen elements of existence (dhātu).

Answer. - This is not a difficulty, for by mentioning the result [the suppression of existence] here, we mean to speak of the cause [the suppression of the fetters].

Although the Buddha said: "By giving food, the generous patron (dānapati) gives five things: life (ājīva), color (varṇa), strength (bala), pleasure (sukha) and intelligence (pratihāna)."390. Food does not necessarily give these five things: there are well-nourished people who die, others who are insufficiently nourished 389 See Kośa, V, p. 81-84.

When the fetters and afflictions fill the mind,
How could one find the pure path in one single glance?
If one glance sufficed to attain the path,
Of what use would wisdom and the treasury of the qualities be?
It is wisdom and the qualities that lead to purity;
To seek for purity by one glance is not reasonable.
This is why it is said that the arhats are completely liberated by perfect knowledge (samyagijjādā).

WHY THE ARHATS SURROUND THE BUDDHA

Question. - The arhats who have done what is needed to be done (kṛtaṇya) should have no need to look for company. Why then are they always near the Buddha and not elsewhere, so that they save beings?

Answer. - 1. If all beings of the ten directions without exception should honor the Buddha, the arhats, from gratitude for the benefits they have received, should [82c] honor him doubly. How is that? These arhats have received immense qualities (upramatānugama) from the Buddha: knowledge (jñāna), destruction of the fetters (samyojñanacheda), increase in the mind of faith (pratītyasamutpāda), and virtue (sattaviriya). This is why these very virtuous arhats stay close to the Buddha, to taste the blissful taste of the qualities (ganasukha[rasa]), to converse with (piṭayati), serve him (sattaviriya) and recognize his benefits. Because they surround the Buddha, their buddha-qualities increase.

2. The Brahmapārśuṇādevas surround Brahmā deva[rja], the Śivastrīmūḍa vegavas surround Śakra devendra, the ascetics surround their gods Vaśitārāma, the minor kings surround the noble cakravartin king, the sick and the convalescents surround the great physician (mahāvaidya); in the same way, the arhats keep close to the Buddha and, because they surround him and venerate him, their buddha-qualities increase.

Question. - The arhats who have done what needed to be done (kṛtaṇya) and assured their personal interest (umaprajñapavakarīthi) have no need to listen to the Dharma. Then why is the Buddha accompanied by five thousand arhats when he preaches the Prajñāprājñā?

Answer. - Although the arhats have done what needed to be done, the Buddha wants to put them to the proof with the doctrine of profound wisdom (gambhirupajñā). Thus: "The Buddha said to Sāriputra: 392

- In the Po lo yen king (Pāṭīyana), in the question of A k'i t'o (Ajitapalihā), it is said (Suttanipāta, v. 1038):

There are all kinds of aspirants (āśīkṣa) who nevertheless live. [Usually] food is the cause of the five benefits given; this is why the Buddha said that by giving food, five things are given. A stanza says:

By withdrawing all food, death is certain.

But even if one eats, death is always possible.

This is why the Buddha has said:

By giving food, five things are given.

Thus also a man can eat "five pounds of gold": although gold is not edible, by means of its power of purchase, it is the cause of food. This is why one says "eating gold".

The Buddha also said that women are defilers of morality (śīlaśāla). Actually, women are not the defilers of morality; rather, they are the cause (hetu) of defiling (śīlasāla) morality and this is why it is said that they are the defilers of morality.

If a man falls from on high, even before he has reached the ground, it is said that he is dead. Although he may not be dead [at the moment when he falls], we know that he will die; that is why it is said that he is dead.

In the same way when the arhats have broken their fetters (samyojana), we know that their existence (bhava) also will necessarily be broken. That is why it is said that they have completely broken the fetters of existence (parikṣītahavasanasamyojana).

11. SAMYAGĀJÑASUVIMUKTA

Sūtra: They were completely delivered by means of complete knowledge.

Sāstra. - Compare the brahmācārin Mo kien ṛ ṛ (Māgandika). His disciples were carrying his corpse (kunapā) on a litter (khatrī) through the city (nagara). While they were walking (hatta) through the crowd, they proclaimed: "Those who see the body of Māgandika with their eyes will all obtain the path of purity (viśuddhimārga), all the more so those who will venerate (vandamī) and honor (piṭayamī) it." Many people believed their words.391 Having heard of this, the bhikṣus addressed the Buddha: "Bhagavat, what is this about?" The Buddha replied with these stanzas:

To seek for purity in the contemplation of an abject individual
Is neither knowledge nor the true path.

391 The Anguttara, III, p. 276-277; gives a list of religious orders contemporaneous with the Buddha: Ājīvika, Nigantu, Māyādīśhāka, Jātikāka, Purāṇakāla, Māgandika, T⇓enṭikā, Avīrupa, Gotamaka and Devabhikṣumika. T. W. Rhys-Davids has studied this list and has succeeded in identifying most of these congregations (Dialogues of the Buddha, I, p. 220-221; Buddhist India, p. 145). With regard to the Māgandikas, he says: "This name is probably derived from the name of the founder of a corporate body. But all their records have perished and we know nothing of them otherwise." The present passage of the Metta tells us that these Māgandikas, one of whom are known, are the disciples of the brahmācārin Māgandika who promenaded the corpse of their teacher and promised salvation to those who contemplated it.

And people who have experienced the truth (saṃkhyātadharma).
The doctrine practiced by these people,
I would like that you to tell it to me precisely.

First, what is an aspirant (śaṅka) and what is a person who has experienced the truth (saṃkhyātadharma)?
But Śāriputra remained silent. Three times the Buddha asked him the same question, three times Śāriputra remained silent. Then, to prompt him to the right answer, the Buddha said to Śāriputra:
- That which arises (bhūtāna idam)....
Śāriputra continued:
- Bhagavat, that which arises... that which arises must also perish (yad bhūtāna tad niruddhārman iti). He who practices the teaching of the arising [and the destruction] of the conditioned (saṃskṛta) is called śaṅka. But the one who has found the teaching of the non-production of things (anusāsana dharma) by means of wisdom is called Šāṇkhyātadharma.

This sūtra has been cited at length here.

2. Furthermore, the arhats stay close to the Buddha and listen to his doctrine because those who have not already attained the impure or pure dhyāna (śānta-dhyāna) wish to attain them, and those who have already attained them wish to deepen them.

3. Furthermore, [the arhats surround the Buddha] to enjoy the bliss of his presence (ākāśadhatuśāla). Thus, in the Nāma ēśa kia king (Nandakasūtra),393 it is said: "Just now I am listening to the Dharma."

4. Furthermore, the arhats who stay close to the Buddha can never get their fill of listening to the Dharma. Thus in the P'ī lou rī kia king (Pīlotikasūtra), Śāriputra says [83a] to Pīlotika:394 "In my Dharma, one never gets enough of listening to the doctrine."

5. Furthermore, if the Buddha, the great teacher (mahādātā) himself listens attentively to the Dharma preached by his disciples, it is not necessary to ask why the arhats, quite perfect (śīriṣṭa) though they may be, in turn listen to the Dharma [preached by the Buddha]. If a satiated person starts to eat again when he finds exquisite food, how could a famished man not eat it? This is why the arhats, although they have done what needed to be done (kṛṣṭaśruti), always stay close to the Buddha to hear the Dharma.

6. Finally, the Buddha as well as the arhats dwell (vihāra) in the state of deliverance (vimukti-dharma). Endowed with these dharmas of dwelling (vihāradharmasamanvayaka), they are surrounded (parivṛttvadāna) and mutually adored (alamkaraṇāntara). Thus it is said in the Tchan t'an p'ī yu king (Candapanasūtra)395

When there is a forest of candana (sandalwood), the eraṇḍas (Ricin) surround it; When there is a forest of eraṇḍas, the candanas surround it. If there are candanas, the candanas are considered to be the forest; if there are eraṇḍas, they serve as the entourage (parivṛttvā).396 It is the same for the Buddha and the arhats. The Buddha abides (vihārat) in the good dharmas (kṣaśadharma) and in deliverance (vimukti) and so do the arhats. Endowed with the dharmas of abiding (vihāradharmasamanvayaka), they surround and adorn one another mutually. The Buddha surrounds the great assembly (mahāvṛtta) like Sumeru, king of the mountains, is surrounded by ten precious mountains, like the white king of the elephants in rut (pāndaragandhahastin) is surrounded by white elephants in rut, like the king of the lions (sīnuhr) is surrounded by lions. In the same way the Buddha, a field of merit (lokāṇātara), is surrounded and accompanied by his disciples.

WHY ĀNANDA IS NOT AN ARHAT
Sūtra: Except for Ānanda who, being on the level of the saṅkṣāra, was [just] a stream-enterer (ekapūjakulamaññāsaddhamma) and has not yet eliminated desire (vitāraṇa).

Ānanda: Question. - Why does it say "except for Ānanda"?

Answer. - Because Ānanda is not among the arhats whom we have just praised above. Why? He is of the rank of śaṅka and has not yet eliminated desire (vitāraṇa).

Ask. - The venerable Ānanda is the third patriarch (śākyā), head of the great assembly,397 for numberless kalpas he planted the seeds of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇa bhiṣma); he always stays near the Buddha; he is the keeper of the baskets of the Dharma (dharmaśāla). How is it that this venerable one, who has with sharp faculties (śīlokapārami) has been able to come so far without having eliminated desire and is not yet a saṅkṣāra?

Answer. - 1. The venerable Ānanda, from the beginning, had made the following vow: "I wish to be the foremost (aggra) of those who have heard much (bhāra)."398 On the other hand, because of their buddha-dharmas, the arhats who have done what needed to be done (kṛṣṭaśruti) can no longer serve or venerate anyone. Having accomplished the ‘grand business' in the Buddha- dharma, [namely] the 393 Probably this is the Nandakasutta of the Saṁyutta, V, p. 398-399; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 833), k. 50, p. 215c-214a; Nandaka, a minister of the Licchavis, was listening to a sermon of the Buddha in the Kūṭāgārālāyaparipāsīya Vaidūrya when it was announced that his bath was ready. He answered: "Enough of outer baths! I will be content with this inner bath which is the goodness of the Blessed One" (alam dāni etena... idam Bhagavat pariṣode). The parivṛttvajjana Pīlotika was a declared supporter of the Buddha. He appears in the Cullavatthipadopama-suttas: Majjhima, I, p. 175; Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 146), k. 36, p. 656a.

394 The parivṛttvajjana Pīlotika was a declared supporter of the Buddha. He appears in the Cullavatthipadopama-suttas: Majjhima, I, p. 175; Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 146), k. 36, p. 656a.

395 There is a Tchan t'an chou king (Candapanasūtra), T 805, vol. XVII, p. 750, translated by an anonymous author during the eastern Han dynasty (25-220 AD) but the phrase cited here does not occur there.

396 An obscure comparison the intention of which is to show how the Buddha and the arhats, without distinction of rank, are gathered in the forest. Cf. Sūtraśālakāra, tr. Hober, p. 26: "In the thick forest, there are campakas and eraṇḍas growing, although as trees of unequal height, they are equal as members of the forest. In the same way, among the monks, old or young, distinctions should not be made."

397 Before his death, Śākyamuni entrusted Kāḷīyapā to watch over his doctrine; later, Kāḷīyapā transmitted the Dharma to Ānanda. For these patriarchs, see Przyłuski, Kāla, chap. II, p. 44-53.

398 According to the Āṅguttara, I, p. 24, and the stories of the first Council (Przyłuski, Concile, p. 39, 210, 225, 229). Ānanda became the foremost of those who have heard much.
destruction of the afflictions (kleśaprahāṇa), they remain seated with the Buddha on the palanquin of deliverance (vimuktiśīlā). 2. Furthermore, the sthavira Ānanda, who has listened, retained and meditated on all kinds of sūtras,\(^3\) has vast wisdom (prajñā), whereas his concentration of mind (cittasamādhi) is average. Yet both of these qualities are necessary to obtain the state [of arhat which consists of] destruction of the impurities. This is why the sthavira Ānanda is [still] just a stream-enterer.

3. Furthermore, out of love for the Buddha's service, Ānanda was his servant (apurṣṭhāya)\(^4\), and he said to himself: “If I should attain the state that involves the destruction of the impurities (āsaravakṣaya) [when the time comes].” With this motivation, he was not in a hurry [to become an arhat].

\(^3\) The repository of the holy words, Ānanda received and retains the totality of the sūtras (cf. Pṛṣyulki, Concile, p. 39-40). According to the Theragāthā, v. 1024, p.92, he had learned 82,000 dharmas from the Buddha and 2,000 from his colleagues.

\(^4\) We have seen above how Ānanda became the apurṣṭhāya of the Buddha.

4. Furthermore, [the conditions] of place, time and individuals not having come together, where and how could he have compiled the Dharma? The thousand arhats [who must constitute the Council] were not on the Gṛdhukāṭaparvata, the place fixed [for the Council]; the time of the Bhagavat's death had not yet come, the sthavira P'o k'i chosa (Vṛjiputra) was not present. This is why the sthavira Ānanda does not destroy his impurities. In order that Ānanda be able to destroy them and [thus participate in the Council], three conditions were necessary: the Bhagavat must die, the assembly that is to be entrusted with compiling the Dharma must be assembled, and Vṛjiputra must address [to Ānanda] the official exhortations (āharmanīvāda).\(^4\)

5. Finally, the venerable Ānanda is in no way comparable to other men in his disgust (samvega) for the things of the world (lokadharma). From birth to birth, Ānanda is of royal lineage (rājasaṃjaya).\(^4\) His beauty (sautara) is incomparable (anupama) and his merits (puṇya) are immense (apramāna). A close relative of the Bhagavat, he always accompanied the Buddha as servant (apurṣṭhāya). Inevitably he said to himself: “I am the Buddha's servant, I know the precious baskets of Dharma (āharmanīvāda). I am not afraid to let to let go of the destruction of the impurities (āsaravakṣaya) [when the time comes].” With this motivation, he was not in a hurry [to become an arhat].

\(^4\) According to the Apadāna, p. 53, in the course of his lifetimes, Ānanda was a king fifty-eight times: Aṭṭhaśaṭṭhakakhatu ca cakkavatā... mahāyā kārayavatā. He actually appears as a king in a series pf Jātakas, the list of which may be found in Mulāsūkara, I, p. 267.

\(^4\) According to the Vihārā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 892a, and the Kośa, IV, p. 228, the ancient Śākyamuni was the first Buddha whom the present Śākyamuni venerated. − At that time, the latter was a potter named Prabhāsa, cf. Kośāvākyā, p. 432: Prabhāsaṁmadda... pramūrdhānam kyām. − The Mahāvīra, I, p. 47, also is aware of a buddha Śākyamuni who lived an infinite number of numberless kalpas ago, also from Kapilavastu, and who received the generosity of the present Śākyamuni, then a merchant (teṣāḥ).

\(^4\) For more details, see k. 12, p. 150b: "The buddha Śākyamuni, then in his first production of the mind of enlightenment (pratiharmatātipāda), was the king named Konag ming (Prabhāsa); he was seeking buddhahood and practiced generosity. When he was reborn, he was the potter who gave some bath utensils and honey syrup to the buddha Śākyamuni and his discipes. Then, when he was reborn, he was the wife of a great śrēṣṭhin who offered a lamp to the buddha Kūo kek'em jo (Kauṇḍinya). All of these are what is called the lesser gifts of the bodhisatvā."
2. Why did his parents give him the name Ānanda?

Once there was a king of the solar clan (āditagotra) named Che tseu (Suddhodana). This king had four sons: 1) Tsing fan (Śuddhodana), 2) Po fan (Suklodana), 3) Hou fan (Droodana), 4) Kan lou wei (Amritrasa).

King Śuddhodana had two sons: 1) Fo, the Buddha, 2) Nant'o (Nanda).

[83c] King Śuddhodana had two sons: 1) Po r (Bhadrika), 2) Yi cha (Tisyā).

King Droodana had two sons: 1) Yi p'o ta ts (Devadatta), 2) A nan (Ānanda).

King Amritrasa had two sons: 1) Mo ho nan (Mahānīman), 2) A ni lou t'eo (Anirudda).

As for his daughter, Amritrasa, she had a son called Che p'o lo (Dūnapāla).

Then the bodhisattva Si t'a ro (Śiddhārtha) grew up; renouncing the state of cakravartin king, he went forth from home (pravrajita) in the middle of the night and went to the country of Ngeou leou pö lo (Uruvilvā) on the banks of the river Ni lien chan (Nairātājana) where he practiced asceticism (dukaracarya) for six years. But King Śuddhodana, who loved his son, regularly sent messengers to ask about him and bring back news of him. "Has my son attained the path? Is he sick? Is he dead?" The king became grieved greatly.

Today or tomorrow will be the end of him. The king experienced great sadness at these words; he plunged into the ocean of grief: "My son has renounced becoming a cakravartin king and now he will not succeed in becoming buddha. Is he then going to die without attaining anything?" The king grieved greatly.

405 Here the Mppi adopts the genealogy of the Mahāvastu I, p. 351.13, 355.19: Rājōto Sīmhaṁmapa Suyavāvato cāvāvī paṭut dāvātī cū Śuddhodana Suatōdano Amedotano Anīmati ca dāvātī. - The Fo pen hing ti king, T 190, k. 3, p. 678a gives the same information. - On the other hand, the Mīlasaṁvātādī vīna y (Ken pen chao ... p. seng che, T 1450, k. 2, p. 195a; Rockhill, Life, p. 13, attributes four sons and four daughters to Sīmhaṁmapa: Śuddhodana, Suklodana, Droodana, Amritrasa, Suddhā, Śūkī, Dronā, Anīmati. - According to the Sīngalese chronicles (Dīpavaṃsa, III, 45, p. 29; Mahāvaṃsa, II, 20, p. 14), Śihalau had five sons and two daughters: Śuddhodana, Dhotodana, Suklodana, Amritrasa, Amedot, Pannya. - The genealogy proposed by the Che ed yeu king, T 195, p. 146c requires the greatest stretch of the imagination.

406 Śuddhodana had two main wives: Māyā who gave birth to the Buddha and Mahāprajñāpati who bore Nanda.

407 This genealogy is to be compared with that of the Mīlasaṁvātādī vīna y (T 1450, k. 2, p. 105a):

Śuddhodana had two sons: the Bhagavat and Nanda.

Suklodana had two sons: Tisyā and Bhadrika.

Droodana had two sons: Mahānīman and Aniruddha.

Amritrasa had two sons: Ānanda and Devadatta.

Śūkī had one son: Suprabhadha.

Dronā had one son: Cheng li (Chinese).

Anīmati had one son: Mahāhala.

408 From the Mahāvastu II, p. 207-209 and the Dulwa (Rockhill, Life, p.28-29, we know that Śuddhodana sent messengers to his son every day to gather news about him.

But the bodhisattva, renouncing asceticism, partook of the milk soup (pūṣyasu) of a hundred flavors, and his body recovered its strength. Having bathed in the waters of the Nairātājana river, he went to the Bodhi tree, sat down on the diamond seat (vaśīrāsana) and proclaimed the following oaths: "I will remain seated with crossed legs until I realize omniscience; until I have attained omniscience, I will not rise from this seat." Then king Māra, at the head of a troop of eighteen kōts of warriors, came to the Bodhisattva and tried to bring about his ruin. But by the power of his wisdom (prajñāhāla), the Bodhisattva destroyed Māra's army. Māra retired, vanquished, and said to himself: "Since the Bodhisattva is invincible, I will torment his father." He went to king Śuddhodana and said to him slyly: "Your son died today in the second part of the night (pașicīme yāme)." At these words, the king was stunned and collapsed on his bed like a fish on hot sand. Weeping miserably, he uttered this stanza:

Ajiṭṭhā like [sin his predictions],
The good omens are no longer verified.
But my son had the propitious name Śiddhārtha
But none of these goals has been realized.

Then the deity of the Bodhi tree (bodhiyikvadeatasi), Ta houn hī (Ānanda) by name, came to king Śuddhodana holding a celestial flower, and said the following stanza to him:

409 This was offered to him by one or several maidens of the village of Semāpāri or Señūni. Some texts mention only one maiden, Sujātī (Niddiānanī, p. 68; Dhammapadī, I, p. 80; Mahāvastu, II, p. 203-206), or Nandā (Buddhacarita, XII, v. 109; T 189, k. 8, p. 639). - In other sources, the offering was made by two maidens, Nandā and Nandābā (T 184, k. 2, p. 405c-470c; T 190, k. 25, p. 779c; Ken pen chao ... p. seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 121e; Rockhill, Life, p. 30; Divyāvadāna, p. 392). - In the Lalitavistara, p. 267 aq., Sujātī is accompanied by nine friends.

410 The words of this oath are given in many sources: Niddiānanī, p. 71: Kāman taci ca nabhāw ca asthi ... pallaṃkam hindīssāvī. - Buddhacarita, XII, v. 120: Bhūnātami tāvat nanat ... yāvat kṛtārdvitāt. - Lalitavistara, p. 289: Ihauna suṣyutu me sarīyataṃ ... sarīvātāम kāya ati ca sākyata. - The oath is not mentioned in the Aṣṭaiparyayasaṃsutta (Majjhima, I, p. 160-175) where Sākyamuni himself relates the efforts he made to attain enlightenment; on the other hand, we find them in the corresponding sūtra of the Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 504), k. 56, p. 771a12.

411 In the Mahāvastu, II, p. 207-209 and the Niddiānanī, p. 67, it is said that the messengers (or the gods) seeing the Bodhisattva deep in ānḍhāna meditation and not breathing, thought that he was dead and announced his death to Śuddhodana. But the king refused to believe them. - The Mppi represents a different tradition here.

412 The same comparison in the Sanskrit Udāgīsamānahāra p. 10, which compares the unfortunates to fish cooked in hot water (māṇya vātipā samāyandhārā).

413 In the Pi p'o cha, T 1545, k. 125, p. 655b, the deity of the Bodhi tree is called Ti jv (Sāvaka?); she seduced king Puyamitra who was persecuting Buddhism. - In the Lalitavistara, p. 278, the bodhiyikvadeatasi are four in number: Venu, Valgu, Sumanas and Ojitupi. In the same place, there is a detailed description of the bodhi tree. The anecdote telling how Śuddhodana, deceived by Māra who announced the death of his son to him, has a parallel in a passage from the Mīlasaṁvātādī vīna y, of which the following is a translation:

Your son has attained the Path,
He has scattered the army of Mara.
His brilliance is like the rising sun
He lights up the ten directions.

The king replied: "First a god came to tell me that my son was dead, and now you come to tell me that he has conquered Mara and attained the Path. These two pieces of news are contradictory; whom should I believe?"

The deity of the tree answered: "This is the truth (satya), it is not a lie (myādīvā). The god who previously came to tell you the lie that you son was dead was Mara; full of jealousy (trśā), he came to make you grieve. Today all the devas and nāgas offer [your son] flowers (psuppa) and perfumes (gandha); they are hanging silk cloths from the sky (ākāśa). Your son's body emits a brilliant light that fills heaven and earth."

At these words, the king was freed from all his sadness and said: "Although my son may have renounced becoming a cakravartin king, today he has become the king who will turn the wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakrapravartaka). He has attained great joy (ānanda). At that moment a messenger arrived from the palace of king Dronodana to say to king Sudhodana: "Your noble brother has had a son." The king's mind felt great joy. He said: "This day is highly propitious; it is a day of joy", Addressing the messenger, he said: "This child should be called Ānanda."

That is why his parents called him Ānanda.

3. How does this name rest on good reasons?

Ānanda was handsome (abhīrlāpa) and graceful (vīmatikā) like a clear mirror (ākāśa). His body was pure. When women saw him, their passions (kāmacitta) were aroused.\(^{414}\) This is why the Buddha ordered Ānanda to wear a covering over his shoulders (amaśuvatva).\(^{415}\) As he gazed at the mind (citta) and the eyes (cakusā) of all who saw him, he was called Ānanda, 'Great joy'.

On this subject, the Tsao loun chò tsan (Śāstrakṛṣṭutī) says:

His face is like the full moon,
His eye like a blue lotus flower.
The water of the ocean of the Buddha's Dharma

Flows in the mind of Ānanda.

\(^{195}\) Conus, III, p. 136; Ken pen chou... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 124c; Rockhill, Life, p. 32; Ta tche tou louen, T 1509, k. 17, p. 182b.

\(^{196}\) Conus, III, p. 136; Ken pen chou... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 124c; Rockhill, Life, p. 32; Ta tche tou louen, T 1509, k. 17, p. 182b.

\(^{414}\) When the palace women were invited by Prasenajit to choose a preacher amongst the eighty disciples of the Buddha, they unanimously chose Ānanda (Jītaka, I, p. 382).

\(^{415}\) We know that the Buddhist monks had their right shoulder uncovered. Cf. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 270, who takes as proof the Sītrāḷākāra, tr. Huber, p. 65-66.
He brings forth great joy
In the minds and to the eyes of those who see him.

Those who come to see the Buddha

He introduces without any flaw in ceremonial.

Thus although Ānanda could have attained the state of arhat, he did not destroy the impurities in order [to continue] to serve and honor the Buddha. Because of these great qualities (guru) and although he himself was not aśāṅkṣa, he dwelt among the aśāṅkṣas; although he had not eliminated desire, he resided among those who had eliminated it (vibhūṣaṇa). Also, since among the five thousand members of the assembly, he was not really an arhat, the text says that [all were arhats] except for Ānanda.

Sūtra: The Buddha was also accompanied by five hundred bhikṣus (nuns), five hundred upāsakas (lay men) and five hundred upāsikās (lay women); all had seen the holy truths (pratītyasamutpāda) all had lived the holy life (sīla) and renounced worldly activities (lokākarman), their wisdom is deficient. This is why there are only five hundred bhikṣus who have attained arhathood (arhat). - In the two lay assemblies, [upāsakas and upāsikās] who live at home and are busy there, those who have found the Path are rare (cf. the variant: tō tao chō chao). Each of them consists also of five hundred members.

Question. - Why does the sūtra not praise these three communities as it has the five thousand arhats?

Answer. - Because the praise of the great assembly [of bhikṣus] is also valid for the others. Moreover, if the three communities were praised separately, the heretics (dīrghika) would ask why the bhikṣus [in particular] were praised and would slander them. If the lay people were praised, they would say it was to flatter them. That is why the sūtra does not praise them.

Question. - In other Mahāyānasūtras, the Buddha is accompanied by a great assembly of bhikṣus numbering eight thousand, sixty thousand or a hundred thousand. Yet this Mahāprajñāpāramitāsūtra is the... most important of the sūtras. Thus it is said in the Tchou lei p’in (Parīndanāparivarta):417 “Losing the other sūtras as a whole is a light sin (āpatti), but losing a single word (pada) of the Prajñāpāramitā is a very grave sin.” From this, we know that the Prajñāpāramitā is the most important sūtra. A very numerous assembly would be needed at this most important sūtra; why is the number of its auditors (sīvāska) restricted to five thousand bhikṣus and to the groups of five hundred each of bhikṣuṇīs, upāsakas and upāsikkhas?

Answer. - 1. If the size of the crowd of listeners is restricted, it is because the sūtra is very profound (gaṇadhūtra) and hard to fathom (dārvigādhyā). In the same way, when a king (rājan) possesses real jewels (rāmaṇa), he does not tell this to ordinary people (gyrhaṇaṇa), but he does announce it to great individuals, his confidants. When a king holds council, he deliberates with his ministers, his confidants, his experts, but he does not admit the lesser officials.

2. Furthermore, 6500 individuals [who make up the audience of the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra]418 have all attained the Path; although they do not understand all of the profound Prajñāpāramitā, nevertheless they believe in it and are able to acquire the fourfold faith of pure knowledge (andaśrāvāvavyuprāśādā).419 In other sūtras, the auditors (sīvāska) are more numerous, but not all have obtained the Path.

[84c] Finally, we have praised the ten million arhats amongst whom the five thousand best were selected. It was the same for the bhikṣuṇīs, the upāsakas, and upāsikkhas. Being difficult to find (durlabha), these ‘victorious ones’ (jina) are not numerous.

CHAPTER VIII: THE BODHISATTVAS

THE PLACE OF THE BODHISATTVAS IN THE ASSEMBLY

Sūtra: The Buddha was also accompanied by bodhisattva-mahāsattvas (bodhisattvān mahāsattvas ca).

Śāstra: Question. - If the order of seniority is followed, the bodhisattvas come first, then the bhikṣus, the bhikṣuṇīs, the upāsakas and the upāsikkhas, for the bodhisattvas come right after the Buddha. If the reverse order were followed, first would be placed the upāsakas, then the bhikṣus, the bhikṣuṇīs and finally the bodhisattvas. Why are the bhikṣus mentioned first here, then the three assemblies [bhikṣuṇī, upāsaka, upāsikā] and then, last, the bodhisattvas?

Answer. - 1. Although the bodhisattvas come right after the Buddha, they have not destroyed all their afflictions (kleśa); this is why the arhats are spoken of first. In the arhats, wisdom (prajñā) is small, but they are already ripened (paripakṣa); in the bodhisattvas, wisdom is rich, but they have not destroyed their afflictions. That is why the arhats are spoken of first.

There are two kinds of Buddhist doctrine, the esoteric (abhisaṃdhīadharmas) and the exoteric (prakṛtiadharmas). In the exoteric, the Buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and [85a] arhats are all fields of merit (punyakṣetras) because their afflictions (kleśa) have been destroyed without residue. In the esoteric, it is said that the bodhisattvas have obtained acquiescence in the teaching of the non-arising of dharmas (anupattikādharmasambhānti), that their defilements are destroyed, that they possess the six superknowledges (abhiṣiktā) and that they work for the benefit of beings. It is from the esoteric point of view that the sūtra places the arhats before the bodhisattvas.

2. Furthermore, by the power of skillful means (upāya), the bodhisattvas appear, enter into the five destinies (gati), experience the five passions (pañca kāmagnas) with the view of influencing beings.420 If they were placed above the arhats, gods and men would be worried and have doubts. This is why they are mentioned after the arhats.

Question. - That is the reason they are placed after the arhats. But why are they placed after the upāsakas and upāsikkhas?

Answer. - 1. Although the four assemblies have not completely destroyed their impurities (kiṃśravā), they will destroy them without further delay; this is why they are presented under the name of auditors (sīvāsakasmṛgabha).

---

417 The Parināmaparivarta or ‘Chapter of the Final Will’ is the 98th and last chapter of the Pañcaviṃśati, T221, k. 20, p. 146b-c; T223, k. 27, p. 423c-424a.

418 Namely, 5000 bhikṣus plus the three groups of 500 people in the other assemblies.

419 Faith relating to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha and the moralities dear to the saints (cf. Kośa, VI, p.292).

420 For the salvation of beings, the bodhisattvas assume diverse forms of existence; they assume emanation bodies (niroṣṭākṣa) to work for the benefit of all. See references in Saṃ, raha, p. 42.
To place the bodhisattvas among these four assemblies would be unsuitable. Thus the bhikṣus, who have received innumerable disciplinary rules (samanvaya), should come after the arhats (sīrṇaṃśareṇa); however, as the Buddha did not bestow any ceremonial on them, they come after the novices. It is the same for the bodhisattvas: they should be placed at the head of the three classes of śaikṣas, but as that would not be suitable, they are placed at the tail end.

2. Furthermore, some claim that, because of their wisdom (prajñā) and their qualities (goṇa), the bodhisattvas surpass the arhats and prayākebuddhas and for this reason they are mentioned separately.

Question. - In the sūtras of the śrāvakas [i.e., the Lesser Vehicle], four assemblies only are spoken of. Why is an assembly of bodhisattvas added here separately?

Answer. - There are two types of Path (marga): that of the śrāvakas [Lesser Vehicle] and that of the bodhisattvas [Greater Vehicle]. The four assemblies, bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, upāsaka, upāstūkā, form the path of the śrāvakas; the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas form the path of the bodhisattvas. For this reason, in the texts of the śrāvakas, the beginning of the sūtra does not say that the Buddha was dwelling in such and such a place with such and such bhikṣus; it simply says that the Buddha was dwelling in such and such a place with such and such bhikṣus: for example: "The Buddha was dwelling in Vārāṇasī with five hundred bhikṣus", "The Buddha was dwelling in Śrīvastī with five hundred bhikṣus". This is the way all their sūtras begin; they never say that the Buddha is accompanied by any number of bodhisattvas whatsoever.

Question. - There are two kinds of bodhisattvas: those who have gone forth from the world (pravrajita) and those who stay in the world (ghrastha). The ghrastha bodhisattvas are usually cited among the bhikṣus and bhikṣuṇis. Why does the sūtra cite them separately here?

Answer. - Although they are usually ranked in the four assemblies, it is fitting to cite them separately. Why? Because if the bhikṣus are necessarily included in the four assemblies, the four assemblies do not necessarily include the bodhisattvas. Why is that? They include the śrāvakas, the prayākebuddhas, people who seek to be reborn among the gods, others who seek to enjoy their life: these four kinds of people are not ranked among the bodhisattvas. Why? [88b] Because they have not produced the mind (of bodhi) nor do they wish some day to be Buddha.

2. Furthermore, the bodhisattvas, having obtained faith in the doctrine of non-arising of dharmas (anuṣṭānīkādharmaṃśeṇa), have suppressed all these names and conventions (svanamānaketana) that characterize samsāra and have left the three worlds; [thus] they are not ranked in the number of beings (sattva). If the śrāvakas who have become arhats and are nirvāṇized are not counted in the number of living beings, what can be said about the bodhisattvas? Thus in the Po lo yey (prājñās) to the Question of Yeou po che (Upāstāvarapāpecchā), a stanza says: 422

421 For the monastic precepts, see Kern, Histöre, II, p. 121-125; Oldenberg, Bouddha, p. 415-419, and above all the comparative study of E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣuniprājñāsikas, Leipzig, 1926.

422 Suttaññàta, V, 6; Upāstāvarapāpecchā, v. 1075-1076:
Upāśiva. Athangato so udu vā so vā so na tā hi ... tathā hi te vidīto esa dhammo.

After cessation (nirodha), is it impossible to reappear?
He who has disappeared is not reborn?
Having entered into nirvāṇa, does one remain there always?
May the great Sage tell me the truth!

The Buddha answered:
He who has disappeared cannot be defined;
He escapes from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), from names and characteristics (nāmalakṣaṇa).
He has gone beyond the way of all speech (survivudapatha).
In one moment he disappears like an extinguished fire.

If the arhats have destroyed all names and conventions (samanvaya), all the more so are the bodhisattvas able to destroy all dharmas. Do they not destroy them by knowing their true nature (bhūtāvakāsa) and by attaining the dharmakāya? This is why the Mahāyāna mentions the bodhisattvas separately from the four assemblies.

Question. - At the beginning of the Mahāyāna sūtras, why are two assemblies mentioned, bodhisattvas and śrāvakas, whereas at the beginning of the sūtras of the śrāvakas, only the assembly of bhikṣus is mentioned and not that of the bodhisattvas?

Answer. - 1. It is in order to distinguish the two Vehicles, the Vehicle of the Buddhhas (budhavāṇa) and the Vehicle of the listeners (śrīvākṣikya). The Śrīvākṣikya is narrow (śīkha), the Buddhavāṇa is broad (vipula); the Śrīvākṣikya is that of personal interest (svakārtha), action for oneself; the Buddhavāṇa is that of benefit for all.

2. Furthermore, the Śrīvākṣikya teaches in particular the emptiness of the individual (sattvaśānti) whereas the Buddhavāṇa teaches both the emptiness of the individual and the emptiness of dharmas (dharmashānti).

These are the differences that distinguish the two Vehicles. The Mahāyāna sūtras speak of the two assemblies, śrīvaka and bodhisattva. Thus it is said in the Tsan mo ho yen kie (Mahāyānastra tregatā):
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Are able to bring joy to all;
They bring benefit by means of the true Dharma
And cause the supreme Path to be found.
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Have compassion for all.
They give their head and their eyes
And sacrifice them like a wisp of straw.
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Observe the pure precepts (śīla).
Like the plow-ox that loves its tail
But has no cares about its own life.
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Have attained supreme patience (kṣānti).
To slash their body
To their eyes is like cutting grass.
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Cultivate innumerable samādhis.
Abhijñās, the aryamārga and balas.
They have acquired the pure vaśītas.
The practitioners of the Mahāyāna
Discern the characteristics of dharmanas;
They do not destroy true wisdom
When they are endowed with it.
Their knowledge is inconceivable,
The power of their compassion is immense.

Without entering into distinctions,
They consider all dharmanas in the same way.
The carts of the ass, horse, camel and elephant
Although similar, are not comparable;
In the same way, the bodhisattva Vehicle differs from that of the śrāvaka:
The one is great, the other is small.
Great loving-kindness (maitrī) is its axle-tree'
Wisdom (prajñā) is its two wheels,
Energy (vīrya) is its steed,
Discipline (śīla) and the samādhis are its nails.
Patience (kṣānti) and shame (lajjā) are its timbering,
The dhāranīs are its reins.
The Vehicle of the Mahāyāna
Can cross over anything.

Question. - At the beginning of the sūtras of the śrāvakas, only the assembly of the bhikṣus is spoken of. In the sūtras of the Mahāyāna, why is not the assembly of bodhisattvas the only assembly spoken of?

Answer. - It is because the Mahāyāna is broad (vipulya) and all the Vehicles enter into it, whereas the Vehicle of the śrāvakas is narrow and does not contain the Mahāyāna. Thus the Ganges does not contain the great ocean because it is narrow, whereas the great ocean can receive all the rivers because it is vast. It is the same for the Mahāyāna. A stanza says:

The Mahāyāna is like the sea,
The Hīnayāna is like the water contained in the hoofprint of an ox (gopada udakam).
The small cannot contain the great:
This comparison is applicable here.423

DEFINITION OF BODHISATTVA424

Question. - What do the words bodhi and sattva mean?

423 The water contained in the hoofprint of an ox (gopada udakam) is compared to the immense waters of the ocean (mahāsamudro 'parimitajaladharaḥ) in the same way that the smallest is compared with the greatest. Cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 102; Milinda, p. 287; Sandhyāniṃcana, p. 207-208; Divyāvadāna, p. 397.
424 For this entire section, see the excellent article Bosatsu in Hobogirin, p. 136-142.
He made the vow to become Buddha,
He has surpassed all the universes
And is worthy to be venerated (pūjā) by men.

He is called Bodhisattva during the interval [of time] starting from the first production of mind (prathamaćittotpāda) up to the ninth uninterrupted path (ānantarāyā) when he enters into the diamond concentration (vajrasāmādhi).426

REGRESSING OR NON-REGRESSING BODHISATTVA

There are two kinds of bodhisattvas, with regression (varvatika) or without regression (avatvatika) as is the case for the arhats who are susceptible of falling back (parihānadharmar) or not susceptible of falling back (aparihānadharmar).428

The non-regressing bodhisattvas are called the true bodhisattvas for they are it truly; the others, the bodhisattvas susceptible of falling back, are called bodhisattva [by extension]. In the same way, those who have found the fourfold Path (sattvādhā mārga)429 are called the true assembly (saṃgha) for they are really it; the others, those who have not found the Path, are called assembly [by extension].

Question. - How do we know whether a bodhisattva is with regression or without regression?

Answer. - In the Pāṇḍavaśīstra, in the chapter of the A pi po tche (Avatvarīka-pārīvartita),430 the Buddha himself defined the characteristics (laksana): regression has such and such characteristics, non-regression has other characteristics.

425 The ninth ānantarāyā causes the abandonment of the ninth category of afflictions of the bhāvagṛha; as it breaks all the anumānas, it receives the name 'concentration like a diamond' (vajrāpanīsamādhi) - The vajrāpanīsamādhi is attained by the bodhisattva in the tenth bhūmi, at the end of the stage of meditation (bhūmikāśūkṣma); he cuts the last obstacles (āvarana) on the path. Immediately following it (hence its name ānantarāyā), the bodhisattva undergoes the revolution of the support (āyaśappūrabhūti), realizes mahānirvāna and mahābodhi and enters onto the Buddha level. On this subject which demands lengthy development, I [Lamotte] will limit myself to providing a few references: Kośa, IV, p. 231; VI, p. 190, 228-229, 264, 300; VII, p. 62, VIII, p. 192, 195; E. Obermiller, Doctrine of P. P., p. 44; Uttaratantra, p. 223; Bodh. bhūmi, p. 403; Sīkṣāmākāra, XIV, v. 45; Madhyāntavibhaṅga, p. 83, 157; Saṃghāra, p. 273; Siddhi, p. 3, 162, 563, 611, 653, 667, 685.

426 This subject will be taken up again later, k. 74, p. 579c.

427 See Kośa, VI, p. 253.

428 The Path is of four types: preparatory path (prayogā), uninterrupted path (ānantarāya), path of deliverance (vimutti) and path of excellence (vīrvasā). See Kośa, VI, p. 277-278.

430 This is one of the chapters of the Pañcaviṃśatikā entitled Pāve tōṇi schonā p'īn in Hsuang tien's translation, chap. 53 (T 220, k. 448, p. 260b-264a), in Wei yue tche p'īn in Moksha's translation, chap. 56 (T 221, k. 12, p. 80a-87c), Pāve tōṇi in Kumārajīva's translation, chap. 55 (T 223, k. 16, p. 339-341b). Very close, chap. 17 of the Aṣṭasāhasrikā, entitled Aṣṭasāhasrikāyañuśāstraṁāṇinātipārīvartita, the original Sanskrit of which may be found in the edition of R. Mitra, p. 323-340.
1. If the bodhisattva practices or meditates on one single dharma, he is called a non-regressing bodhisattva. What is this one single dharma?

It is the continual and resolute accumulation of good dharmas (kusaladharmasamuccaya). It is said that by resolutely (ekacittena) accumulating good dharmas, the Buddhas have attained supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamayaksambodhi).

2. Furthermore, the bodhisattva who possesses one single dharma is without regression. What is this one single dharma? It is right effort (vīrya). Thus the Buddha asked Ānanda: “Ānanda, are you speaking about effort?” “Yes, Bhagavat.” “Ānanda, are you praising effort?” “Yes, Bhagavat.” “Ānanda, one must practice, cultivate and remember effort until one leads men to the attainment of supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamayaksambodhi).”431 And so forth.

3. Furthermore, the bodhisattva who possesses two dharmas is without regression. What are these two dharmas? Knowing that all dharmas are empty (śūnya) and never abandoning beings. The person who does that is a non-regressing bodhisattva.

[86c] 4. Finally, the bodhisattva who possesses three dharmas is without regression: 1) Resolutely (ekacittena) he has made the vow (prāṇidhāna) to become Buddha, and this resolution is unshakeable (ucala) and intransigent (ahṛya) like diamond (vīrya). 2) His compassion (karunacita) for all beings penetrates his bones (asthi) and marrow (majjī). 3) He has attained the samādhi of wisdom (parijñāsamādhi) and sees all the Buddhas of the present (pratyanupanna). Thus he is called non-regressing bodhisattva.

---

431 The Mppūkhan, when his sermon is finished. On the other hand, in the version followed here by the Mppūkhan, the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Are you speaking of the mind of awakening called effort?” Ānanda replied: “Yes, I am speaking of the mind of awakening called effort.” The Buddha asked the same question three times, and Ānanda made the same response three times. Then the Buddha arose from his seat and said to Ānanda: “There is nothing that people who love and practice effort cannot attain; without fail they will succeed in attaining Buddhahood.”

At k. 15, p. 173c: When Ānanda was preaching the seven minds of awakening (kīrīṭa) to the bhikṣus and had come to the mind of awakening called effort (vīrya), the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Are you speaking of the mind of awakening called effort?” Ānanda replied: “Yes, I am speaking of the mind of awakening called effort.” The Buddha asked the same question three times, and Ānanda made the same response three times. Then the Buddha arose from his seat and said to Ānanda: “There is nothing that people who love and practice effort cannot attain; without fail they will succeed in attaining Buddhahood.”

At k. 26, p. 249c: One day the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Proclaim the Dharma to the bhikṣus; my back aches, I would like to lie down.” Then the Bhagavat folded his upper garment (uttarasāyana) in four, spread it on the ground, and with his cloak (saṃghīṭa) as pillow (binbhohana), he lay down. Then Ānanda preached the seven meanings of awakening (kīrīṭa) and never abandoning beings. The person who does that is a non-regressing bodhisattva.

432 The corresponding Sanskrit formula which differs by only one word, is known to the Sūtra tradition (e.g., Dārmapriyāvy āharaṇavājīṣyatantra; the Buddhist tradition states that the correct Sanskrit formula which differs by only one word, is known to the Boddhisattva tradition). By expressing himself in this way, Ānanda was doing nothing other than repeating a phrase that appears in all the sūtras (e.g., Dīgha, III, p. 237, 268, 285; Majjhima, II, p. 92, 128; Sūnyatva, V, p. 197 sq.; Aṅguttara, I, p. 117, 224-246; II, p. 250 sq.; III, p. 2, 11, 65, 152 sq.; IV, p. 3, 110, 153 sq., 234, 352-353, 357; V, p. 15, 24, 27-28, 90-91; Udāna, p. 36). The corresponding Sanskrit formula which differs by only one word, is known to the Sūtra tradition (e.g., Dīgha, III, p. 237, 268, 285; Majjhima, II, p. 92, 128; Sūnyatva, V, p. 197 sq.; Aṅguttara, I, p. 117, 224-246; II, p. 250 sq.; III, p. 2, 11, 65, 152 sq.; IV, p. 3, 110, 153 sq., 234, 352-353, 357; V, p. 15, 24, 27-28, 90-91; Udāna, p. 36).

In the Abhidharma, the disciples of King Chakravarti say: Who is called bodhisattva? He who has awakened himself and then awakens others is called bodhisattva; he who necessarily will become Buddha is called bodhisattva. Boddhi is the wisdom (prajñā) of the saint who has destroyed the impurities (āsāsā). The person born from this wisdom, protected by the sages and served by the sages, is called bodhisattva.

---

THE BODHISATTVA IN THE ABHIDHARMA SYSTEM

1. Definition

In the Abhidharma, the disciples of King Chakravarti say: Who is called bodhisattva? He who has awakened himself and then awakens others is called bodhisattva; he who necessarily will become Buddha is called bodhisattva. Boddhi is the wisdom (prajñā) of the saint who has destroyed the impurities (āsāsā). The person born from this wisdom, protected by the sages and served by the sages, is called bodhisattva.
They also say that he is called bodhisattva as soon as he has produced the non-regressing mind (avivartitācittā).

They also say that he must have eliminated five dharmas and gained five dharmas in order to be called bodhisattva. What are these five dharmas?

1) He is freed from the three unfortunate destinies (durryāt) and is always reborn among gods (deva) and men (mānaṇaya).
2) He escapes from poverty (dārīdvya), from commoners (nītakula) and always belongs to a noble family (uccakula).
3) He is never a female (strībhava) but always a male (punabhava).
4) He is free of physical defects and weaknesses (vāstikula); his organs are complete (avakalendṛya).
5) He never has lapses of memory (sampramāsa) but remembers his past existences (jatiśrama).

Which served as his garment and spread out his long hair as a mat; prostrating thus, he pronounced the solemn vow.

2. Actions producing the thirty-two marks

They also say that he is called bodhisattva starting from the moment when he has accomplished the actions producing the thirty-two marks (dvātirnīlallakasakarman).433

Question. - When does he accomplish the actions producing the thirty-two marks?

Answer. - After the three incalculable periods (asaṃkhyeyakalpa).436

Question. - How long is an asaṃkhyeya?

Answer. - An asaṃkhyeya is a number so great that divine or human calculators cannot comprehend it.437

Thus:

434 These five points are also found in the Viśalākṣaṇa of the Kośa, IV, p. 222: *sūgucalukṣa pumāṃ jātātmasa vīret, and repeated in Saṃghabhadra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 590b.

436 The career of the bodhisattva in all these sources is three asaṃkhyeyakalpas plus one hundred supplementary kalpas.

- The Pāli sources generally count four asaṃkhyeyas and a hundred thousand kalpas: Cariyāpāṭhaka, I, v. 1; Āṭṭaka, I, p. 2; Viśuddhimagga, I, p. 302. - The Mahāyāna hesitates between three, seven and thirty-three asaṃkhyeyas, which it connects with the progress of the bodhisattva before and during his stay in the bhūmī. Madh. vṛtti, p. 431; Saṃghabhadra, p. 209-211; Siddhi, p. 731-733; Āloka, p. 988.

437 For the method or methods of calculating the asaṃkhyeya, see the plentiful but confused notes of de La Vallée Poussin in Kośa, III, p. 188, IV, p. 224. Four ways of calculating are explained in the Mahāvīryapattī; the first two (chap. 246 and 247) are taken from the Buddhāvatamsaka, T 278, k. 29, p. 586; T 279, k. 45, p. 237; and in Sanskrit in the edition of the Gandavyūha of D. T. Suzuki, Kyoto, 1914, I, p. 133. - The third computation (Mahāvīrya, chap. 248) is taken from Lalitavistara (ed. Lefmann, p. 147-148). - The fourth (chap. 149) is taken from the Kośa, I, p. 190; it also occurs in Bu ston, I, p. 120-121.

The numbers used in southern Buddhism have been studied by W. Kiefl, Kosmographie des Indien, p. 356. Below at k. 5, p. 94b-c, the Mppī will give an extract from the Acintyasaṅgī ( = Gandavyūha) containing a long list of numbers increasing each time by one zero starting from ten.

\[
\begin{align*}
1 & + 1 = 2 \\
2 & \times 2 = 4 \\
3 & \times 3 = 9 \\
10 & \times 10 = 100 \\
10 & \times 100 = 1,000 \\
10 & \times 1,000 = 10,000 \\
1,000 & \times 10,000 = 10,000,000 \text{ or one koṭi} \\
10 \text{ million koṭis} & = 10 \text{ nyāya} \\
10 \text{ million nyāyas} & = \text{ one bimbara} \\
10 \text{ million bimbaras} & = \text{ one gata} \end{align*}
\]

Beyond the gata is the asaṃkhyeya.

This is how the asaṃkhyeya is calculated. When one has passed over the first asaṃkhyeya, one passes through the second; when one has passed through the second, one passes through the third. According to the rules of arithmetic (gaṇaṇa), one counts from one to a hundred and when the hundred is finished, one returns to one. In the same way, after one asaṃkhyeya, the bodhisattva returns to one.

During the first asaṃkhyeya, the bodhisattva does not know if he will become a Buddha or not. - During the second asaṃkhyeya, he knows that he will be Buddha but does not dare to proclaim: "I shall be Buddha." - During the third asaṃkhyeya, he knows confidently that he will be Buddha and he dares to proclaim fearlessly (bhaya): "Later I shall be Buddha."438

For Buddha Śākyamuni, the first asaṃkhyeya goes from the ancient Buddha Śākyamuni to the Buddha La ma che ū (Ratnāśākīn).439 From that time on, the Bodhisattva was free of all female births. - The second asaṃkhyeya goes from the Buddha Ratnāśākīn to the Buddha Jan tān (Dīpaṃkara). That was when the Bodhisattva offered seven blue lotus blossoms (nīlalotpala) to the Buddha Dīpaṃkara, laid out his garment of antelope skin (ajinañcalva) and spread out his hair (keśa) to cover the mud (kardama). On that occasion, the Buddha Dīpaṃkara made the prediction: "Later you will be Buddha under the name Śākyamuni."440

438 Passage taken from the Viśalākṣaṇa, T 1545, k. 176, p. 886c.

439 During the first asaṃkhyeya, Śākyamuni venerated 75,000 Buddhas; during the second, 76,000, during the third, 77,000. The Buddhas venerated at the end of these three asaṃkhyeyas were, respectively, Ratnāśākīn, Dīpaṃkara and Vijayāśī. Cf. Viśalākṣaṇa, T 1545, k. 178, p. 892c; Kośa, IV, p. 227; Saṃghabhadra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 391b.

440 This legend is one of the oldest in Buddhism: A young student (brahmavacara) or novice (mūdra) named Sumedha. Megha or Sumati, according to various sources, bought from a maiden five of the seven blue lotus flowers which she had. He threw them as an offering to the Buddha Dīpaṃkara who was passing by, and the lotuses remained suspended in the air around the Buddha's head. Converted by this miracle, the young man then laid out on the muddy ground the antelope skin which served as his garment and spread out his long hair as a mat; prostrating thus, he pronounced the solemn vow...
The third asaṃkhyeya goes from the Buddha Dīpamkara to the Buddha Piʻi pʻo che (Vipaśyin). - After these three asaṃkhyeyakalpas, the Bodhisattva accomplishes the actions producing the thirty-two marks.441

Question. - In what place are the actions producing the thirty-two marks accomplished?

Answer. - They are mental actions and not bodily or vocal actions. Why? Because mental action alone is capable of discernment (vikalpa) or in the formless realm (drūpyadāhānā). Of the five destinies (gati) of the desire realm, they are accomplished in the human destiny (manusyagati). Of the four continents (caturdhīpika), they are accomplished in Jambudīpī. The Bodhisattva accomplished them as a male (jumānī) and not as a female. He accomplished them in the epoch in which the Buddhas appear, not in an epoch when there are no Buddhas. He accomplished them with the view of Buddhahood and not with any other goal.442

Question. - Are the actions producing the thirty-two marks bodily actions (kūryakaran), vocal actions (vākārman) or mental actions (manaskarman)?

that he would also become Buddha. Then Dīpamkara predicted that he would one day become Buddha under the name Śākyamuni.

This legend is attested by a large number of sources. Here are some of the main ones:

Question. - Which mark is set in place first?

Asaṃkhyeya: 1. the Buddha Piʻi pʻo che (Vipaśyin).

2. The third asaṃkhyeya goes from the Buddha Dīpamkara to the Buddha Piʻi pʻo che (Vipaśyin). - After these three asaṃkhyeyakalpas, the Bodhisattva accomplishes the actions producing the thirty-two marks.441

441 The Bodhisattva accomplishes these actions in the course of the hundred cosmic ages that follow the three asaṃkhyeyas: Kośa, IV, p. 224; Samghabhādra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 590c. But these hundred kalpas are often neglected and then it is said that the state of Buddhahood is attained at the end of three asaṃkhyeyas.442

442 Same details in the Viśhālā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 887c; Kośa, IV, p. 223-224; Samghabhādra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 590c.

Answer. - They are mental actions and not bodily or vocal actions. Why? Because mental action alone is capable of discernment (vikalpa), because first it is necessary to be well established in order that the other marks be profitable.443

Question. - Mental action (manaskarman) concerns the six consciousnesses (viśālāna). Are the actions producing the thirty-two marks accomplished by the mental consciousness (manovīśālāna) or by the other five consciousnesses?

Answer. - They are accomplished by the mental consciousness and not by the other five consciousnesses. Why? Because the five consciousnesses are incapable of discernment (vikalpa). This is why they are accomplished by the mental consciousness.444

Question. - Which mark is set in place first?

[87b] Answer. - According to some, it is the mark that consists of having the feet well set together; so how could the feet well planted be the first?

[88a] Answer. - According to others, it is the mark that consists of having deeply set black eyes and conditions (hetupratyaya). Of the five destinies (gati) a mark fixed first is that which consists of having deeply set black eyes (abhitīmcarera), for it is with an eye of this kind that the One with great loving-kindness (mahāmaitri) looks upon beings. These two opinions, whatever may be said about them, are incorrect; When the causes and conditions (khetprayasya) of the marks are gathered, there is a first realization [for all the marks together]; so how could the feet well planted be the first?

Question. - Are the actions accomplished by one volition (cetasī) or by several volitions?

Answer. - Thirty-two different volitions accomplish the thirty-two marks by reason of one volition for each mark. But each mark taken separately, is endowed (manovikāra) with a hundred merits (puṇya).445

Question. - What is the extent of each of these merits?446

441 Cf. Viśhālā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 887b: What is the nature (vāsabhāva) of the actions producing the marks? Are they actions of body, speech or mind? - They have the nature of these three actions, but mental action is the main one (adhipati). Some say that they are only mental actions and not bodily or vocal. Why? Because mental action is sharp (ūkṣa), whereas bodily and vocal actions are dull (dūṣa). Do the actions that produce the marks belong to the sphere of the manas or to the five consciousnesses (viśālāna)? - They belong to the sphere of the manas and not to the five consciousnesses. Why? Because mental action is endowed with concept (vikalpa) and functions after examination (nirūpandī), on the contrary, the five consciousnesses are without concept and arise as a consequence of the manas element (manoadhātu).

444 Of the six consciousnesses, the mental consciousness alone is endowed with the two special vikalpas called examination (nirūpandī) and memory (manavaram). The other five consciousnesses (the visual, auditory, olfactory, gustatory and tactile consciousnesses) lack them. In other words, the visual consciousness knows blue, but it does not know “It is blue”. Only the mental consciousness is capable of this operation. Cf. Kośa, I, p. 60; Samgha, p. 39.445 The Kośavyākyā (cited in Kośa, IV, p. 226) and Samghabhādra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 590c) count a hundred volitions and consequently a hundred merits for each mark to be realized.

446 There are several opinions on the extent or measure of each merit of the Bodhisattva: here the Mppi will mention seven: the Viśhālā (T 1545, k. 177, p.889c. sq.) mentions eleven; the Kośa (IV, p. 227) mentions only three; Samghabhādra (T 1562, k. 44, p. 591a) limits it to five.
Answer. - According to some, each merit is equivalent to that which assures the cakravartin king power over the four continents (caturvrajāsaka). A hundred merits of this kind would realize one single mark.

According to others, each merit is equivalent to that which gives Che t'i houan yin (Śākredvendra) mastery (vaiśālī) over two classes of gods.\footnote{Śākra commands two lower classes of gods of kāmadhātu: the Caturmahājīrakas and the Trīṣayārimūs (cf. Beal, Catena, p. 93).}

447 The Paranirmitavaisavartins are the higher gods of kāmadhātu; their leader, called Vaśavartin in Dīgha, I, p. 210; Mahāvīra, I, p. 263; II, p. 360, is none other than Māra (see below, k. 10, p. 134c; Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 123; Huber, Sūriśāmākara, p. 110).

448 The Paranirmitavaisavartins are the higher gods of kāmadhātu; their leader, called Vaśavartin in Dīgha, I, p. 210; Mahāvīra, I, p. 263; II, p. 360, is none other than Māra (see below, k. 10, p. 134c; Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 123; Huber, Sūriśāmākara, p. 110).

449 In these one hundred kalpas during which normally the Bodhisattva accomplished the actions producing the marks, Śākyamuni, thanks to his effort (vīrya), skipped over nine. Therefore his effort lasted only 91 kalpas instead of 100. Cf. Mahāvīra, III, p. 249: vīryaśānya saṃpanno... navā kalpaśānya śāhayaśānya puravattamānāḥ. - Viśhālā, T 1545, k. 177, p. 890b; Kośa, IV, p. 225; Samghabhadra, T 1562, k. 44, p. 591a; Fu ti king louen, T 1539, k. 7, p. 327a; Kouan fo san mei hai king, T 643, k. 7, p. 679b (tr. Przyłuski, Les neuf Kalpa qu'a franchi Śākyamuni pour devenir Maitreya, TP, 1928, no. 1, p. 17-21).

450 This story is told in the Avadānaśataka, no. 97, II, p. 175-177 (tr. Fener, p. 412-414; Fu ti king louen, T 1539, k. 7, p. 327a; Kouan fo san mei hai king, T 643, k. 7, p. 679b (tr. Przyłuski, Les neuf Kalpa qu'a franchi Śākyamuni pour devenir Maitreya, TP, 1928, no. 1, p. 17-21).

451 The Bodhissatva in question sometimes appears under the name of Puṣya (Mañjuśrīvasa, III, p. 240; Avadānaśataka, T 190, T 200; Tibetan version of the Kośa where shar rgyal translates Puṣya), sometimes under the name of Tiṣya (T 1530; T 1562; Chinese translations of the Kośa by Paramādā and Hsiao tsang). Tiṣya is not, however, synonymous with Puṣya. In the Mahāvīra (III, p. 240-243), the Buddhas Śākyamuni and Maitreya appear 95 kalpas before Śākyamuni and makes the prediction to Puṣya; the latter appears 92 kalpas before Śākyamuni and gives the prophecy to Vipākśī. These facts are more or less confirmed by T 190 (Beal, Romantic Legends, p. 14) where Tiṣya and Puṣya precede Śākyamuni by 95 and 94 kalpas respectively. Tiṣya (variant Puṣya) is also the name of a lunar mansion (Cancri). 452 In most sources, the miracle took place in a jewel cave (ratnaśīla); the Viśhālā specifies a cave of vaśāliya. T 200 locates the scene under a tree.

453 T 1530 and T 1562 confirm this type of concentration adopted by Puṣya. This tejodhānāsādhi, concentration on the fire element, also called josthānavasādhi, concentration on the brilliance of fire, consists of considering the element fire and, by the power of this examination, making one's body incandescent and emitting flames and smoke. It is often followed by nirvāṇa. Cf. Mahāvīra, I, p. 556; Divyāvadāna, p. 186; Udāna, 9, p. 93; Przyłuski, Ak śāla, p. 26; Concile, p. 10, 31, 66, 116 (the nirvāṇa of Gānāmatī).
Standing erect on one leg, his palms joined towards the Buddha, he considered him attentively. Without blinking his eyes, for seven days and seven nights he praised the Buddha with one single stanza:

Either in heaven or on earth, there is no equal to the Buddha.

In the universes of the ten directions, there is no-one comparable to him.

If one considers all the beings in the universe, No-one is like the Buddha.

For seven days and seven nights, he contemplated the Buddha thus without blinking his eyes. This is how he freed (pratyuddhāvartata) nine kalpas and reached supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksambhūti) in ninety-one kalpas. 454

Question. - The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni, intelligent (muddhāvit) and well-learned, was capable of composing all sorts of marvelous stanzas. Why then does he praise the Buddha with one single stanza for seven days and seven nights?

Answer. - The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni valued his mental intentions and valued the fact of not changing. If he had praised the Buddha with still more stanzas, his mind would now and then have been distracted (vikalpiṇcita). This is why he praised the Buddha with the same stanza for seven days and seven nights.

Question. - Why was the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni's mind impure whereas that of his disciples was pure? Why was the mind of the Bodhisattva Maitreya impure whereas that of his disciples was pure?

Answer. - The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni was totally preoccupied with the good of beings (sattrahasha) and but little with himself, whereas the Bodhisattva Maitreya preoccupied himself much with his own person and little with other beings.

Answer. - The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni valued his mental intentions and valued the fact of not changing. If he had praised the Buddha with still more stanzas, his mind would now and then have been distracted (vikalpiṇcita). This is why he praised the Buddha with the same stanza for seven days and seven nights.

Question. - How does the Bodhisattva fulfill (paripuṣpa) the virtue of generosity?

Answer. - He gives everything unrestrictedly, and when he has given even his body, his heart feels no regret, for example, king Che p’i (Śibi) who gave his body to the pigeon (kapota). 455

455 The ‘gift of the flesh’ for the ransoming of a pigeon [along with the ‘gift of the eyes’ and the ‘gift of the flesh to receive a teaching’] is one of the deeds of the famous king Śibi. Sanskrit sources: It has been wrongly claimed that we have no Indian Buddhist version of this ransoming of the pigeon. The Kalpaṃāndudṛkṣī, p. 181, contains fragments, unfortunately very mutilated, of this episode. - The Avadānaśātaka, II, v. 109 (vol. I, p. 49) alludes to the gift of the eyes, but also to the ransoming of the pigeon: śiśuyamāna cānidaḥyā dattam… kapotastēnasakal. Its chap. LV (vol II, p. 119-135) tells how king Sarvamādā (Śibi’s surname?), at the price of his flesh bought a pigeon claimed by Indra who was disguised as a hunter. - Finally, the Lākūṭāvatāra, p. 251, contains a faithful summary of the episode in its traditional form: Indvandpy ca devāḥitrastam… abhimahatālambhitā. “Even Indra, who has acquired sovereignty over all the gods, had to take the form of a vulture because of his evil habit of eating meat in his past existences. Pursued by this vulture, Vīśvakarman, who had assumed the form of a pigeon, got up onto the scales. In order [to save him], king Śibi, who had compassion for the innocent, had to suffer great sorrow.”

[Note: Chavannes (Contes, IV, p. 85), in error, attaches the Jātaka no. 2 and the Piḷḷi Jātaka no. 499 to ‘the gift of the flesh’. These texts deal only with ‘the gift of the eyes.’] Chinese sources: Lienou tou king, T 152 (no. 2), k. 1, p. 1b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 7-11); Prou sa pen hing king, T 155, k. 3, p. 119a24-25; Pen cheng man loun, T 160 (no. 2), k. 1, p. 33b-33a; Ta tchouaung yen-loung king, T 201 (no. 64), k. 1, p. 321-323 (tr. Huber, Śrīśrīmālākārā, p. 330-341); Hien-yu king, T 202, k. 1, p. 35c (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise and der Thor, p. 16-20); Tchang king, T 208 (no. 2), k. 1, p. 531c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 70-72); King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 25, p. 137c-138a.

Brahmanical sources: S. Lévi, in JA, 2908, p. 246 refers to the Mahābhārata, III, 139-131; III, 195; XIII, 32 (where the hero is Śrīsadhvaja); Kathāsaritgāthā, I, 7: Vyabhacāravatūpajñā, I, 3, v. 83.

Jain sources: Karnāravajyayuda, where the name of the hero is Vajyayudha (cf. Winternitz, Literature, II, p. 548).

The stūpa of ‘the gift of the flesh’, situated near the village of Gīra in the boundary between the districts of Dvaravati and Bounar, was visited by Fa hien T 2085, k. 5, p. 102c-15 (tr. Chavannes, BEFEO, III, p. 427) and by Hsuan-tsang, T 2087, k. 3, p. 86c-14 (tr. Bee Æl, I, p. 252). Watters, I, p. 234.

Iconography: Gandhāra (L. D. Barnett, Antiquities of India, London, 1913, pl XXII); Mathurā (Vogel, Mathurā, pl XXII); Amaravati (A. Foucher, Les sculptures d’Amaravāti, RAA, V, 1928, p. 15, pl. VIII, fig 1); Nāgarjunikonda (L. P. Vogel, Excavations at Nāgarjunikonda, An. Bibl., V, 1930 and pl. IIb); Central Asia (Grönwedd, Buddha. Kultstätten, fig. 130 and 251); Barabudur (Foucher, Beginnings of b. art, pl. XXXVI, 2).

During the ninety-one kalpas from the Buddha P’i p’o che (Vīśvakarman) to the Buddha Kṣitigarbha (Kāśyapa), the Bodhisattva [Śākyamuni] accomplished the actions producing the thirty-two marks and, when he had accumulated (spacica) them, his six virtues (pāramitā) were perfected (paripūra).
This pigeon, this little bird,
Has taken refuge in him as in its nest.
That is the mark of a bodhisattva.
He will be Buddha before long.

Then the falcon, perched on a nearby tree, said to king Śibi: "Give me my pigeon." [88b] The king answered: "It is I who took it first, it is not yours. Since I have produced the Great Mind, I welcome all beings (sattva) and I wish to save all beings." The falcon said: "O king, you want to save all beings; am I not part of them? Why should I be the only one not to enjoy your compassion? Would you deprive me of my daily food?" The king replied: "What do you eat?

I have made the vow to protect every being that takes refuge in me. What food do you need? I will give it to you." The falcon answered: "I need fresh meat." The king began to think: "That is difficult to find without killing animals. Must I then kill something to give it to him?" Reflecting thus, his decision remained firm and he spoke this stanza:

The flesh of my own body
Subject to old age, sickness and death,
Will start to rot before long.
I will give it to him.

Having had this thought, he called a servant to bring a knife, cut the flesh of his thigh and gave it to the falcon. The falcon said to the king: "O king, you are giving me fresh meat, but in all fairness, you should give me a weight of flesh equal to the weight of the pigeon. Make no mistake!" The king said: "I will use my scales (nāla)." He placed [the piece] of flesh on one side and the pigeon on the other, but the pigeon was heavier than the flesh of the king. Then he ordered the servant to cut his other thigh, but that too was still too light. In turn he cut his two feet, his rump, his two breasts, his neck and his back. He sacrificed his whole body, but the pigeon was still heavier than the flesh of the king. Then his ministers and his family put up a curtain (stāna) and sent away those who were present, because the king could not be seen in that state. But king Śibi said to them: "Do not send the people away, let them come in and watch", and he added these stanzas:

May the gods, men and asuras
Come and contemplate me.
A great mind, an extreme resolve is necessary
To attain Buddhahood.
Whoever is seeking Buddhahood
Must bear great suffering.
If one cannot maintain one's resolution
One should give up the vow [of bodhi]. Then the Bodhisattva, with bloody hands, took the scales and wanted to climb up on them: he maintained his resolve to balance the weight of the pigeon with his whole body. The falcon said to him: "Great king, that is very difficult. Why are you doing that? Rather give me the pigeon." The king answered: "The pigeon has taken refuge in me, I will never give it to you. If I sacrifice my whole body, it is not to gain treasure or out of concern. At the price of my body, I want to attain Buddhahood." With his hands, he took the scales, but as his flesh was exhausted and his muscles torn, he could not make his way there and, trying to climb up [onto the scales], [88c] he fell down. Reprimanding his own heart, he said: "You must be strong and not anxious. All beings are plunged into an ocean of suffering. You yourself have sworn to save them all. Why be discouraged? The pain [that you are suffering] is small; the sufferings of hell [naraka] are great. If they are compared, yours do not make up a sixteenth part. If I who am wise, full of energy, disciplined and meditative, if I suffer such pain, what about people without who are plunged into hell?" Then the Bodhisattva, resolutely trying to climb up, took the scales and gave the order to his servant to help him. At that moment, his resolve was strong and he regretted nothing. The devas, nāgas, asuras, piśacás, mañjusayas praised him greatly. They said: "To act in this way for a little pigeon is extraordinary (aḍāḥsūtra). Then the great earth (prthvī) trembled six times, the great sea (samudra) swelled its waves (varutīga), the dead trees began to blossom, the gods caused a perfumed rain to fall and threw flowers. The goddesses sang his praises: "He will surely become Buddha." Then the devaśri came from the four directions [to praise him], saying: "This is a true Bodhisattva who will soon become Buddha." The falcon said to the pigeon: "The test is finished; he has not spared his own life. He is a true Bodhisattva" and added this stanza:

In the garden of compassion,
He has planted the tree of omniscience.
We must pay homage to him;
He should not be caused any more pain.

Then Viśvakaśrama said to Śakradevendra: "Devendra, you who possess miraculous power, you should make this king in whole body again." Śakradevendra replied: "It need not be me. The king himself is going to swear that his great heart was joyful [when] he sacrificed his life and gave it so that all beings could seek Buddhahood." Śakra then said to the king: "When you cut off your flesh and you were suffering so cruelly, did you feel any regret?" The king answered: "My heart was joyful (ānanda). I felt no irritation or regret." Śakra said to him: "Who could believe that you did not feel anger or irritation?" Then the Bodhisattva made this vow: "When I cut my flesh and when my blood flowed, I felt neither anger nor irritation. I was resolved (oka/itva) and without regret, for I was heading to Buddhahood. If I am speaking the truth, may my body become as it was before." Hardly had he pronounced these words than his body became as it was before.

At this sight, men and gods became very joyful and cried out at this miracle: "This great Bodhisattva will surely become Buddha. We must honor him whole-heartedly and wish that he will become Buddha soon. We will protect us." Then Śakradevendra and Viśvakaśrama returned to the heavens. It is by acts of this kind that the Bodhisattva fulfills the virtue of generosity.

Question. - How does the Bodhisattva fulfill the virtue of discipline (ātāpārāmitā)?

Answer. - By not sparing his life when it is a question of keeping the pure precepts (māyāprākara). Thus the king Śūrātra said to the pigeon: "The test is finished; he has not spared his own life. He is a true Bodhisattva." Then Śūrātra made this vow: "When I cut my flesh and when my blood flowed, I felt neither anger nor irritation." Then the Bodhisattva made this vow: "When I cut my flesh and when my blood flowed, I felt neither anger nor irritation. I was resolved (oka/itva) and without regret, for I was heading to Buddhahood. If I am speaking the truth, may my body become as it was before." Hardly had he pronounced these words than his body became as it was before.
Kalmāṣapāda, carrying the king, traveled through space (dīkāhā) and came to his home where he set Sutasoma down amidst the ninety-nine kings [whom he had already captured]. King Sutosoma began to weep. Kalmāṣapāda said to him: “Great kṣatriya king, why are you crying like a baby? Every man must die; everything composite must decay.” King Sutosoma replied: “I am not afraid of death, but I am afraid of not fulfilling my promises. From the time that I was born, I have never lied (mṛṣāvivāda).” This morning, as I was leaving the gates, a certain brahmī came to me to ask for alms and I promised to return to give him charity. I do not doubt impermanence (anityatā), but if I dispoint this [brahmī] in his expectation, I am committing a sin (āpatti) of deception. That is why I am weeping.” Kalmāṣapāda said to him: “Your wish will be satisfied. Since you are afraid to break your promise, I allow you to return [home]; you have seven days in which to give alms to the brahmī; after that time, you will return here. If you have not come back in that time, by the power of my wings, I will easily bring you back.”

King Sutosoma was able to return to his native land and give alms to the brahmī as he wished. He set the crown prince (kumāra) on the throne. Calling his people together, he excused himself in these words: “I know that I have not settled everything; my governing was not [always] according to the Dharma. I recognize your loyalty. If I am not dead by tomorrow, I shall return directly.” Throughout the whole country, his people and his family struck their foreheads to the ground trying to keep him, saying: “We wish to return to our country, his people and his family. We will build an iron castle (āgaravīga) surrounded by choice soldiers. No matter how powerful Kalmāṣapāda is, we are not afraid of him.” But Sutosoma, who disagreed, spoke this stanza:

Faithfulness to one’s word (satyavivāda) is the foremost of the commandments;

The man of his word ascends the stairway to heaven.

The man of his word, no matter how small, is great;

The liar goes to hell.

familiar under the name of Kalmāṣapāda, which certain Chinese sources translate as Po toow (187 and 6; 157), Pan toow (96 and 6; 157), i.e., ‘Speckled Foot’ (cf. T 202, p. 425b; T 245, p. 830a); according to the Hien yu king (T 202, p. 425b), this surname was given to him because, born of a liones s, he had feet marked with spots like a lion’s fur. In his Samāṇaṭtīvānī, II, p. 483, Buddhaghosa proposes another explanation: “When the anthropophagous king, banished by the cultured, took flight, an acacia spine pierced his foot, and this wound left a scar like a speckled piece of wood (ussa kira pāda ... hariṇi-rāhī).” The village where this man-eater was tamed was called Kalmāṣadānmya (in Pāli, Kamnāṣadānmya). It is situated in the land of the Kurus, and the Buddha preached several important sūtras there. Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 55; 290; Majjhima, I, p. 55; II, p. 26; Suttaṭṭha, II, p. 92; Tevārang a han, T 1, k. 10, p. 60u29; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 24, p. 578b; Divyavāḍana, p. 515, 516.

In T 202 (p. 426a) and T 243 (p. 830b), it was 999 kings whom Kalmāṣapāda had captured.

I wish to keep my promise today.

Rather lose one’s life than break it.

[80b] My heart feels no regret.

Having reflected in this way, the king departed and returned to Kalmāṣapāda who, seeing him from afar, rejoiced and said to him: “You are a man of your word who does not break his promises. Every man seeks to save his own life. You had the chance to escape from death, but you came back to fulfill your promise. You are a great man (mahāpuruṣa).”

Then Sutosoma praised faithfulness to one’s word: “The one who keeps his word is a man; he who breaks it is not a man.” He praised truth (satyavivāda) in every way and disparaged falsehood (mṛṣāvivāda). Listening to him, Kalmāṣapāda said: “I have spoken well; in return I will release you; you are free. I grant you also the ninety-nine kings, your co-prisoners. May they return, each as he will, to their own countries.” When he had spoken thus, the hundred kings returned [to their homes].

It is in Jātakas such as this that the Bodhisattva fulfills the virtue of discipline.

Question. - How does the Bodhisattva fulfill the virtue of patience (kṣaṇīpāramītā)?

Answer. - When people come to insult him, strike him, beat him, throw off his skin, cut him to pieces and take his life, his mind feels no hatred (dvāsas). We will build an iron castle (āgaravīga) surrounded by choice soldiers. No matter how powerful Kalmāṣapāda is, we are not afraid of him.” But Sutosoma, who disagreed, spoke this stanza:

Faithfulness to one’s word (satyavivāda) is the foremost of the commandments;

The man of his word ascends the stairway to heaven.

The man of his word, no matter how small, is great;

The liar goes to hell.

460 In T 202 (p. 426a) and T 243 (p. 830b), it was 999 kings whom Kalmāṣapāda had captured.

461 The Mppi tells the story of the bhikhu Kāṇṭi in the following way: In a great forest, Kāṇṭiṇīsi was cultivating patience (kṣaṇī) and practicing loving-kindness (maitrī). One day, King Kali along with his courtesans entered the forest to walk about and disport himself. Having finished his meal, the king stopped to sleep a little. The courtesans, walking about in the blossoming forest, saw the rāja, paid their respects to him (vandana) and sat down at his side. Then the rāja praised patience and loving-kindness; his words were so fine that the women could not get enough of listening to him and stayed with him for a long time. King Kali woke up and, not seeing his courtesans, seized his sword (āgaravīga) and followed their footsteps. When he found them around the rāja, his haughty jealousy overflowed; with furious eyes, brandishing his sword, he asked the rāja: “What are you doing there?” The rāja replied: “I am here to practice patience and cultivate loving-kindness.” The king said: “I am going to put you to the test. With my sword, I will cut off your ears (karnas), your nose (nasā), and your hands (hasta) and feet (pāda). If you do not get angry, I will know that you are cultivating patience.” The rāja answered: “Do as you wish.” Then the king drew his sword and cut off his ears, his nose, then his hands and feet and asked him: “Is your mind disturbed?” The rāja answered: “I cultivate patience and loving-kindness; my mind is not disturbed.” The king said: “There lies your body without any strength; you say that you are not disturbed, but who would believe you?” Then the rāja made this oath: “If I am truly cultivating loving-kindness and patience, may my blood (āgaravīga) become milk (kāla).” At once his blood changed into milk; the king, astounded, departed with his courtesans. But then, in the forest, a naga-king (nāgaraṇa), taking the side of the rāja, caused lightning and thunder and the king, struck by lightning, perished and did not return to his palace.

This anecdote is often told to illustrate the patience of the Bodhisattva (represented here by the bhikhu Kāṇṭi) and the wickedness of Devadatta (here, the evil king).
Question. - How does the Bodhisattva fulfill the virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitā)?

Answer. - When he possesses great exertion of mind, he always tries to act in the manner prescribed by the Buddha (avasthitā). The bodhisattva who is a prince, if he put himself at the disposal of all his friends, swore to empty the water of the ocean until it was completely dry, and his resolve was firm.462 Here again, the Bodhisattva praised the Buddha Puya for seven days and seven nights standing on one leg without blinking his eyes.463

Chinese sources: Lieou tou ti king, T 142 (no. 9), k. 1, p. 4.5a-b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 89-91); Hien yi yi, T 202, (no. 40), k. 8, p. 404b-406b (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, p. 227-252); King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 9, p. 47b-88a. The theme of the man who tried to empty the water of the ocean is met again in an anecdote of the Mahābhārata which was sumarized by Senart in the following way: “Once king Chhādha, seated under a tree, had no in- (āśī) or out- (apāna) breath. A bird came and laid her eggs in his top-knot which was in the form of a conch (śaitkhaśikā); the bhūpadattvā remained motionless (acala) until the fledglings flew away.464

Question. - How does the Bodhisattva fulfill the virtue of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā)?

Answer. - When his great mind reflects (manasikaraṇi) and analyzes (vibhānaka). Thus the brahmin K’iu p’iu t’o (Govinda), the great minister (mahāmātāya), divided the great earth (mahāpṛthivī) of Jambudvīpa into seven parts; he also divided into seven parts a determined number of large and small cities (nagura), of villages (ṅigama) and hamlets (antarāpana).465 Such is the virtue of wisdom.

462 The story of Mahābhārata will be told at length at k. 12, p. 151-152. It is also found in the Mahāvastu, II, p. 89-91; Lieou tou ti king, T 142 (no. 9), k. 1, p. 4.5a-b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 89-91); Hien yi yi, T 202, (no. 40), k. 8, p. 404b-406b (cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thor, p. 227-252); King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 9, p. 47b-88a. The theme of the man who tried to empty the water of the ocean is met again in an anecdote of the Mahābhārata which was sumarized by Senart in the following way: “Once king Chhādha, seated under a tree, had no in- (āśī) or out- (apāna) breath. A bird came and laid her eggs in his top-knot which was in the form of a conch (śaitkhaśikā); the bhūpadattvā remained motionless (acala) until the fledglings flew away.464

463 The Mppk, k. 17, p. 188a-b, tells this anecdote as follows: Śākyamuni at one time was a rāja named Chhādha (śaitkhaśikā) with a top-knot in the shape of a conch (śaitkhaśikā). He always practiced the fourth dhyāni, interrupting his breath (āśī); seated under a tree, he remained immobile. A bird, seeing him in this posture, mistook him for a motionless (āśī) or out- (apāna) breath. A bird came and laid her eggs in his top-knot which was in the form of a conch (śaitkhaśikā); the bhūpadattvā remained motionless (acala) until the fledglings flew away. The case of a bird is exceptional: “We know that the yogin in the old legends remained immobile on one leg: the birds made their nests in their hair” (Lav., Dogme et Philosophie, p. 183). The King liu yi siang (Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 308-312, and in the Cheng king, T 154 (no. 3), k. 1, p. 75b-76a).

464 See above.

465 The Mppk, k. 17, p. 188a-b, tells this anecdote as follows: Śākyamuni at one time was a rāja named Chhādha (śaitkhaśikā) with a top-knot in the shape of a conch (śaitkhaśikā). He always practiced the fourth dhyāni, interrupting his breath (āśī); seated under a tree, he remained immobile. A bird, seeing him in this posture, mistook him for a motionless (āśī) or out- (apāna) breath. A bird came and laid her eggs in his top-knot which was in the form of a conch (śaitkhaśikā); the bhūpadattvā remained motionless (acala) until the fledglings flew away. The case of a bird is exceptional: “We know that the yogin in the old legends remained immobile on one leg: the birds made their nests in their hair” (Lav., Dogme et Philosophie, p. 183). The King liu yi siang (Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 308-312, and in the Cheng king, T 154 (no. 3), k. 1, p. 75b-76a).

466 Extract of a passage from the Mahāvastu which was summarized by Senart in the following way: “Then the prince of the Bhārata race, the lord Gvinda, had a golden crown and a gold sword. When the latter died, he followed the advice of his son, prince Renu, and replaced Gvinda by Govinda’s son, Štāgula, who was called Mahāvindra. The six kṣatriya royal ele - (dakṣaśivā), on the death of Dālāpati, assured his succession to Renu by promising to distribute the kingdom amongst the seven of them. When the time came, it was Mahāvindra who took charge of this division of the land, assigning to each his capital; he remained in charge of all their affairs; at the same time he taught seven thousand brahmmins and seven hundred nādalata.”
This is how the Bodhisattva fulfills the six virtues.

The Buddha became a disciple under the Buddha Kuś hypers, he had to be reborn in that place.

2. Furthermore, at a level (bhūmi) lower than that, the fetters (samyujana) are too (89c) heavy; in a higher level, they are too light. In the heaven of the Tuṣitas, the fetters are neither too heavy nor too light, for there, wisdom (prajñā) is safe (yogākṣema).

3. Furthermore, the Bodhisattva does not want to miss the time when he is to become Buddha (buddhāpravardhbhuvakāśa). If he were born in a lower level where the lifespan (dyus) is short (brahma), his life would be over before the time of his coming as Buddha; if he were born in a higher level where the lifespan is long (ādhyā), his life would be prolonged beyond the time of his becoming Buddha. But among the Tuṣita gods, the span of life coincides with the period when Buddhas appear.467

4. Finally, the Buddha always dwells in a middling destiny (madhyamapratipadda), practically identical with the human life in the world of men (upapattihātā).

What is examination of family? The Buddhas are born into two kinds of family, either the kula or the dharmiyas, including the Buddha (cf. Samatāgala, I, p. 173; Atanatharūkī, p. 336).

468 The Madhyadeśa in question here is vañner than the Madhyadeśa of the old brahmanical literature. The latter is practically identical with the Avijayata whereas the Madhyadeśa of the Buddhist texts includes fourteen of the sixteen Mahājānapadas. For its precise limits, see Malalasekera, II, p. 418-419. Madhyadeśa is the birthplace of noble individuals (purivāṇiyā), including the Buddha (cf. Sumatāgala, I, p. 197; Atanatharūkī, p. 336).

The sources are not in agreement on the number of the Bodhisattva's vilokanās:

1. Four vilokanās: Examination of time (kalavilokana), ii) examination of place (devanāvīkalanā), iii) examination of family (kulavilokana), iv) examination of mother (upapattihātā).

2. Five vilokanās: examination of mother or parents is added (matrīvatī), including the Buddha (cf. Sumatāgala, I, p. 197; Atanatharūkī, p. 336).

3. Eight vilokanās, adding to the previous five the examination of the period of gestation (īṣṭa), the month of birth (māsa) and the date of leaving (nivedkālam). Millinda, p. 193.

470 According to the Dīgha, II, p. 27-7, the duration of the human lifespan was 80,000 years under Vipāsīya, 70,000 under Sākyin, 60,000 under Vaitūlīya, 40,000 under Krakuchanda, 30,000 under Kuśanamuc, 100 under Śākyamuni. See Rhyds Davids, Dialogues of the Buddha, II, p. 6. - These numbers are confirmed by various texts: Tá-han a han, T 1, 1, 1, 1, 1; Tá-fu king, T 2, 2, 150; Tá-fu fou mou sing teng tus king, T 4, 4, 159; Tung yi a han, T 125, k. 45, 490 [under Vipāsīya, the human lifespan is 84,000 and not 80,000 years]; Tá-fu yao king, T 212, k. 2, p. 615b. - Vībhāṣā, T 1545, k. 135, p. 706c ad Kośa, III, p. 193, have established that the Buddhas appear during epochs of decrease of the lifespan, when the duration of life decreases from 84,000 to 100 years.

Bodhisattva was born in Madhyadeśa 'Central land'.468 It was in the middle of the night that he came down from heaven (avatāra); it was in the middle of the night that he left the land of Kuśa (p'i lo p'eo) (Kapilavastu) and after having traveled the Middle Path (madhyama pratipada), he attained supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamyaksaṃbodhi); it was the Middle Path that he preached to men; finally, it was in the middle of the night that he entered nirvāna without residue (nirupadhiṣṭhamārvatā). Because he loved these 'middles', he was born in the intermediate heaven [of the Tuṣitas].

5. The four vilokanās and the entry into the womb.469

When the Bodhisattva had taken birth in Tuṣita heaven, he examined the world of men in four ways: 1) examination of time (kalavilokana), ii) examination of place (devanāvīkalanā), iii) examination of family (kulavilokana), iv) examination of mother (upapattihātā). What is the examination of time? There are eight periods in which Buddhas appear: When the human lifespan is 84,000, 70,000, 60,000, 50,000, 40,000, 30,000, 20,000 and 10 years.470 The Bodhisattva says to himself: 'The duration of the human lifespan is one hundred years; the time of appearance of the Buddha has arrived.' This is the examination of time.

What is the examination of place? The Buddhas are always born in Madhyadeśa, for it abounds in gold and silver, precious substances, foods, picturesque places, and its ground is pure.

What is examination of family? The Buddhas are born into two kinds of family, either the kṣatriyas or the brahmīnīs, for the kṣatriyas have great power (prabhāvīna) whereas the brahmīnīs have great wisdom (prajñā). It is there that the Buddhas are born according to the need of the times.

468 The Madhyadeśa is a geographical and cultural region in India. It is now known roughly as the central regions of India, including the present-day states of Madhya Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh, and Bihar, and some parts of Rajasthan. It was considered to be the central land from which the majority of the Buddha's discourses were given.

469 The four vilokanās are the examination of time, place, family, and mother. They are significant because they help the Bodhisattva choose the best moment and place for his rebirth to continue his spiritual activities. The examination of family includes the examination of mother, which is considered the most important.

467 The Tuṣita gods live 4,000 years, but the days that constitute these years are each equal to 400 ordinary years (Cf. Atuguttara, I, p. 214; Kārifel, Kosmographie der Inde, p. 194).
What is the examination of the mother? The bodhisattva asks himself who is the mother who will be able to bear a bodhisattva as strong as Nārāyana. When this examination is finished, he determines that only the family of king Śuddhodhana, residing in Kapilavastu in Madhyadeśa, is capable of conceiving the Bodhisattva. Having thought thus, he descends from Tuṣita heaven and enters the womb of his mother (mātrikā) without loss of his full-mindedness.

[90a] Question. - Why do all the Bodhisattvas in their last birth (paśicīna punarbhava) come from heaven and not from among men?

Answer. - 1. Because they have climbed up to the supreme destiny (agragati) and, of the six destinies (gati), that of the gods is the highest.

2. Furthermore, coming from heaven, they possess all kinds of beauty (saundaryā) and miracles (adbhuta) which they would not have at their disposal if they were to come from a human destiny.

3. Finally, because men venerate (sakurvanti) the gods.

Question. - All people have a disturbed mind (samalacīta) at the moment of reincarnation (pratisandhi) when they enter the womb of their mother (mātrikā). Why then is it said that the Bodhisattva has an undisturbed mind when he enters his mother's womb?

Answer. - 1. According to some, at the moment of reincarnation (pratisandhi), all beings have a disturbed mind (viparītasaṃsārā); but since the Bodhisattva has no loss of mindfulness (adhisthit bodhisattvayo mustñā smṛthi), it is said that he enters his mother's womb with an undisturbed mind. When he is in the intermediate existence (antarbhava), he knows that he is in the intermediate existence. - When he is in the stage of the Ko lo lo (kalala), he knows that he is in the kalala stage, i.e., when seven days after conception, the semen and blood (turaśoṇita) coagulate (saṃmūrčaitanta). - When he is in the stage of the Nge fou e’lo (arbuda), he knows that he is in the stage of arbuda, i.e., two weeks after conception, he resembles an ulcer. - When he is in the stage of the Woe p’ao (peśin), he knows that he is in the peśin stage. - When he comes into the world, he knows that he comes into the world.

And so, as he has no loss of mindfulness (smṛtihāti), it is said that he enters his mother's womb with correct mind.

6. Birth and the thirty-two 'lakṣaṇas'

At the end of ten months, with correct mind and without loss of mindfulness, the Bodhisattva left his mother's womb, took seven steps and uttered these words: "This is my last birth" (paśicīna punarbhava). King Śuddhodana asked the experts in marks (laksanāpratigraha): "Look and see if my son has the thirty-two marks of the Great Man (dvārtiṃsad mahāpuruṣa-lakṣaṇa). If he has these thirty-two marks, he will have two possibilities: if he stays at home (grhastra), he will be a cakravartin king; if he goes forth from home (pravrata), he will be a Buddha." The experts said: "The crown prince (kumāra) really does have the thirty-two marks of a Great Man; if he stays at home, he will be a cakravartin king; if he leaves home, he will be a Buddha." The king asked: "What are the thirty-two marks?" The experts replied:

1. Supratisthāpādaṭā. "The soles of his feet are well set down." The soles of his feet are set down on the ground without a gap, not even a needle, could be inserted.

2. Adhastā pādakālayed vātre jāte sahasreṇa sandhikī sunumike nyāḥkārapuruṣīṃ. "On the soles of his feet are two wheels with a thousand spokes, a hub and a rim and [90b] having three perfections." He has obtained this mark spontaneously (svatāt); it was not made by an artisan. The divine artists like Viśvakarman are not able to make such a perfect mark.

Question. - Why could they not make it?

Answer. - Because these divine artists such as Viśvakarman do not achieve the depth of wisdom (prajñā). This mark is the reward for good actions (kuśalakarmavipak). Although the divine artists have obtained their knowledge [technique] as a reward of their life, this mark of the wheel comes from the practice of the roots of good (kuśalāmālācaryā) and wisdom (prajñā). The knowledge of a Viśvakarman is 471 Nārāyana is the one who has nārāyanabhūta, the strength of the seventh term of a series beginning with the elephant in which each term is ten times the preceding one. See Pi l i ch’u, T 1545, k. 30, p. 155a; Kośa, VII, p. 73-74.

472 Cf. Saṃgāraha, p. 55.

473 It is thanks to the vijñāna that the semen and blood coagulate to form the embryo. For this saṃmūrčahan, see Saṃgāraha, p. 13-14.

474 The Mppā does not enumerate the five embryonic stages in the traditional order: kalala, arbuda, peśin, ghana, pralabdhi, which are found, e.g., in Saṃyutta, I, p. 206; Milinda, p. 125; Mahāyūtputti, no. 4007-4071; Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 1300), k. 49, p. 337c; Kośa, II, p. 255; II, p. 58; IV, p. 119. - Here the Mppā omits the pralabdhi stage which is also omitted in Milinda, p. 40 and Visuddhimārga, p. 236. - Some texts have eight embryonic stages: 1-5. kalala ... pralabdhi.

the result of one single existence, but this mark of the wheel comes from a wisdom extending over innumerable kalpas. This is why Viśvakarman could not make it and, still less, the other divine artisans.

3. Dirghāṅgurha: "He has long fingers." His fingers are slender and straight; their arrangement is harmonious and the joints are accentuated.

4. Āyatupāda: "He has a broad heel."

5. Jātaṅgaliḥastapādaḥ: "The digits of his hands and feet are webbed." He is like the king of the swans (hansat: when he spreads his fingers, the webs show, when he does not spread his fingers, the webs do not show."

6. Mrudurasamapāṇīpādaḥ: "His hands and feet are soft and delicate." Like fine cotton cloth (sākṣam karupākṣamahām), these members surpass the other parts of his body.

7. Utvasagavaranam: "He has a prominent instep." When he treads on the ground, his foot neither widens nor retracts.

476 But in Sanskrit, jāla does not mean 'web', and Burnouf, reluctant to place the Buddha "in the class of palmipeds", understands: "The digits of his hands and feet are reticulate." Foucher (Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 306-312) adopts this interpretation and sees in these notes the lines of a hand "which always have played a chiromancy and, in our day, are used in judicial identification." Moreover, he establishes that, in representations of the Buddha, "the Gandharan sculptors showed only detached hands and hands separated from their sculptures, and did so only when constrained by the special needs of the construction." This opinion is held by J. N. Banerjea, The webbed fingers of Buddha, IIQ, VI, 1930, p. 717-727. W. F. Stutterheim, Le jālākāraṇa de l'image du Bouddha, Act. Oc., VII, 1928, p. 232-237, referring to a passage of the Sakuntali, claims that jāla means the red lines of the hand held up to the light of the sun. A. K. Coomaraswamy, The webbed finger of Buddha, IIQ, VII, 1931, p. 365-366, accepts Stutterheim's translation in the original meaning of jāla and explains, along with Foucher and Banerjea, the semantic shift of jāla, in the sense of membrane, as a misinterpretation of the sculptures. Answer of J. N. Banerjea, The webbed fingers of Buddha, IIQ, VII, 1931, p. 654-656.

Nevertheless, the texts are explicit. Without saying anything about the stereotyped Tibetan translation: phyang don'i tbls dra bas bhröl pa, "his hands and feet are attached by a membrane", the old translators and commentators agree in attributing to the Buddha hands and feet like "the king of the swans", and Smart, Legende du Bouddha, p. 145, was perhaps correct to understand 'membrane'. Here are some references:

Dīgāḷagama, third mark (T 1, p. 5b): His hands and feet have a netted membrane (wang mar: 120 and 8; 120 and 11) like the king of the geese (ngo wang). - Madhyāṃgikāgama, T 26, p. 686b: His hands and feet have a netted membrane (wang mar) like the king of the geese (yen wang). - Mālāvatsarvāvīdān Vinaya, sixth mark (T 1450, p. 108c): His hands and feet have a netted membrane (wang mar). - Lalitavistara of Divākara, thirtieth mark (T 577a): The digits of his hands and feet all have a membranous net (wang mar: 120 and 8; 177 and 7). - Abhinīkananāsəttra, seventh mark (T 199a, p. 692c): The space between the digits of the Kundal's hands and feet is netted (ilo wang). - Pulacaśimāṭi, third mark (T 220, vol. 6, p. 967b): between each of the digits of the Bhuṣavat' s hands and feet there is a netted membrane (man wang) like in the king of the geese (yen wang). - Daiṣaḷāḥirasā, p. 108: tenya hastapādaṃ jālāṃ avaṇṭadhāṇī śālāṃ devaṃ amṛtraprāṇamūrī nāsi. - Vībhavā, sixth mark (T 1543,p. 888a): His hands and feet are marked with a netted membrane (wang mar), that is to say, between the digits of the Buddha's hands and feet there is a net-membrane like the digit of the king of the geese (ngo wang). - Alokā, p. 918: rājāhaṃvaravajālāvamadāṅgulipāṇīpādaṃ.

The soles of his feet (pādatāla) are like a red lotus (padma) in color; between the toes there is a membrane; the ends of his feet are the color of real coral (pravādā); the toenails (nābha) have the color of polished red copper (āṇveṇa); the upper side of his feet are golden in color (soavarnavana) and the hairs (roha) covering it are the azure of lapis-lazuli (vādīrāya). These colors are marvelous; one would say an assortment of jewels, a varicolored necklace.

8. Aṅkeṣṇāgacchāya: "He has the limbs of an antelope." His legs taper gradually (amupārātamanaka) as in Aiṇeyya, the king of the antelopes (megaraḍā).

9. Suhīnavatānājānapramabāhāyaḥ: "Standing upright without bending over, his arms reach down to his knees." Without bending or straightening up again, he can touch his knees with the palms [of his hands].

10. Koṣaṅgavatāsaghyāyaḥ: "The secret part of his abdomen is concealed within a sheath" as in an elephant of good birth or a high-bred horse (taduṣṭāh varagotra dhāṇyena hastyā, dhāṇyena vātuḥ).

Question. - Then why did his disciples see his secret parts when the Bodhisattva attained supreme complete enlightenment (anuttarasamayusamābodhi)?

Answer. - He showed them his sexual organs to save beings and dissipate the doubts of the crowd. Besides, according to some, the Buddha manifested (nimimite) an elephant or a well-bred horse and said to his disciples: "My sexual organs are like that."477

477 On this subject, the Mppā will make the following comments later (k. 26, p. 251c):

"The Buddha showed the mark of his tongue and his cryptorchidy. Some people had doubts about these two characteristics of the Buddha's body; they should have been able to attain the Path but because of these doubts, they did not. That is why the Buddha showed them these two marks. He put out his tongue and it covered his whole face: although his tongue was large, it was bent back easily into his mouth. Some people, seeing the Buddha put out his tongue, may have felt contempt because putting out one's tongue is the mark of a small child. But when they saw him put his tongue back in and preach the Dharma without any difficulty, they felt respect and cried out at the wonder. Some people had doubts about the cryptorchidy of the Buddha, an invisible mark; then the Bhagavat created a marvelous elephant or a wondrous stallion and, showing them, he declared: "My cryptorchidy is an invisible mark quite like that." Some even say that the Buddha took out his sex organs and showed them to someone to suppress his doubts. Teachers (ispadeśākhyāya) say that [by this action] the Buddha shows his great compassion for, if a man sees the Buddha's cryptorchidy, he can accumulate roots of merit (kasośaṅkam) and produce the mind of anuttarasamayusamābodhi."
11. [Nyagrodha] parimaṇḍalaḥ: Like the nyagrodha tree, the Buddha's body is rounded and is of the same size on all four sides.

12. Āvīvalaṃghrayaḥ: "His hair rises up." On his body his hair curls upwards (tasya käye keśarottamā āvīvalaṃghrayaṃ dukṣāṣṭidēṇāṃ).

13. Ekaikakāraḥ: From each of his pores there arises a single hair (tasyaikakaṃkārasya evakākāraṃ rūmāṇī jītāṃ); his hairs are not disarranged (avīksiptāṃ; they are blue-black (niśāṇā), of the color of lapis lazuli (vaidūyā), curbed to the right (pradaksināvarāntā) and standing up (āvīvalaṃghrayāṃ).

14. Savarnavarnah: "He is golden in color."

Question. - What is this golden color?

Answer. - Placed beside gold (savarana), iron (ayu) has no brilliance. The gold of today compared to the gold of the time of a Buddha has no brilliance. The gold of the time of a Buddha compared to the gold of the river Jambi (jambhinaudasaṃvarana) has no brilliance. The gold of the river Jambi compared with the golden sand of the great ocean (mahāsamudra), on the path of a cakravartin king has no [90c] brilliance. The golden sand compared with the golden mountain has no brilliance. The golden mountain compared with Sumeru has no brilliance.

The gold of Mount Sumeru compared with the gold of the Trīyāstraṃśa gods' necklaces (kṣetra) has no brilliance. The gold of the Trīyāstraṃśa gods' necklaces compared with the gold of the Yāma gods has no brilliance. The gold of the Yāma gods compared with the gold of the Tuṣita gods has no brilliance. The gold of the Tuṣita gods compared with the gold of the Nirmāṇarati gods has no brilliance. The gold of the Nirmāṇarati gods compared with the gold of the Paranīmitaśāvaṃśtvina gods has no brilliance. The Paranīmitaśāvaṃśtvina gods compared with the gold of the Bodhisattva's body has no brilliance. Such is this mark of the golden color.

15. Vidyadhāraḥ: "He has an aura the breadth of an armspan." He has an aura the breadth of an armspan (vyāma) on all four sides. In the center of this aura the Buddha has supreme beauty; his splendor is equal to that of the king of the gods (devarāja).

16. Sīkyāmucāryaḥ: "He has fine skin." Dust does not adhere to his body (tajo 'yu käye nivārasitaḥ); he is like the lotus leaf (upala) that holds neither dust nor water. When the Bodhisattva climbs a mountain of dry earth, the earth does not stick to his feet. When the wind blows up a storm to destroy the mountain which becomes dispersed as dust, not a single dust grain sticks to the Buddha's body.

17. Saptosudakāḥ: "The seven parts of his body are well-developed." Seven parts of the body: the two hands (hasta), the two feet (pāda), the two shoulders (aṃsa) and the nape of his neck (grīva) are rounded, of fine color and surpass all other bodies.

18. Cidantarāṇyaḥ: "The bottom of his armpits are well-developed." They are without bumps or hollows.

19. Sthūlapravārāhamukhaḥ: "The front part of his body is like that of a lion."

20. Bhadṛjukāyaḥ: "His body is broad and straight." Of all men, his body is the broadest and the straightest.

21. Sasanvarttakasankuḥ: "His shoulders are completely rounded." He has no peer amongst those who straighten their shoulders.

22. Cāvāriṃśāpanasūryaḥ: "He has forty teeth", neither more nor less. Other men have thirty-two teeth; their body consists of more than three hundred bones (aṣṭhi) and the bones of their skull (aṣṭhyākāshi) are nine in number. The Bodhisattva has forty teeth and his skull is a single bone. In him, the teeth are numerous but the bones of the skull are few; among other men, the teeth are few but the skull bones are numerous. This is how the Bodhisattva differs from other men.

23. Avīvalaṃghrayaḥ: "His teeth are closely spaced." No coarse (sthitā) or fine (sīkṣma) material can get in between his teeth. People who do not know the secret mark of his teeth say that he has but one single tooth. One could not introduce a single hair (roman) between them.

24. Śuklaṃghrayaḥ: "His teeth are white"; they surpass the brightness of king Himavat.

---

Man except for two. He hesitates about these two, he doubts and does not have conviction or certainty (saṃkhaṭi viśīvatti na saṃvādāṇaḥ), namely, the abnormal arrangement of my sex organ and the huge size of my tongue. Then the Bhagavat created in his own image a magical apparition (tathākārayam idsāhāsmanakāram abhāsāmākaśāṃ) so that the brahmī saw his sex organ enclosed in a sheath. Then the Bhagavat, putting out his tongue, touched and patted (amānaṣi paṭimaṇa) his two ears (kamavātra), his two nostrils (nāsakasati) and covered his whole forehead with his tongue (kevalam pā naśāmaṇḍalam jīvāya chādāsi).

Such an exhibition shocked Menander deeply: in the Milindapātha (p. 167 sq.), he asks Nagasena how the Buddha was able "to show his cryptorchidy (kūśohita vaṭṭhaguhya) to the brahmī Sela in the midst of the four assemblies, in the presence of gods and men." Nagasena answers that the Bhagavat did not show his secret parts but rather showed a magical phantom (na Bhagavat gahase gahasa desesi, idsāhā ya pana cāvāra desesi). And by adding modesty, Buddhaṃṣa, in Samaśgala, l. p. 276, thinks it is proper to add that the apparition thus created was fully clothed in his undergarment (nvīsmanoanurātauha), girded with a belt (aṭṭhabhadbanabuddha), covered with a robe (ciرارaṇaṭā), and that it consisted solely of spectral substance (aṭṭhabāgīdānasattā).

But we ask in vain with Rhys Davids (Dialogues of the Buddha, l. p. 131, n. 1) how Ambhata and others could have seen the Buddha's cryptorchidy in a fully clothed phantom. This is why it may be preferable to accept the explanation proposed here in the Mppī and believe that the Buddha created a magical elephant or stallion, saying to his disciples "My sex organ is like that."
25. Simhanahanaḥ: "He has the jaw of a lion." Like a lion, king of the beasts, his jaw is straight (sama) and broad (vipula).

[91a] 26. Rasavasāgragraprāṭṭhaḥ: "He has the best of all tastes." Some say: When the Buddha puts food into his mouth (mukha), all foods take on an exquisite flavor (rasāgra). Why? Because in all these foods there is the essence of exquisite flavor. People who do not possess this [26th] mark cannot give off this essence and as a consequence do not have this exquisite taste. - Others say: When the Buddha takes food and puts it in his mouth, the ends of his throat (gula) secrete ambrosia (aṃra) which concentrates all flavors (rasa). As this food is pure, we say that he possesses the best of all tastes (rasānām rasāgraḥ).

27. Prabhāsājīviharaḥ: "He has a broad tongue". When the Buddha sticks his great tongue out of his mouth, it covers all the parts of his face up to the top of his hair (sarvaṃ mukhamandalam avacchādavyai keśaparyantum). But when he puts it back in, his mouth is not filled up.

28. Brahmanavaraḥ. "He has the voice of Brahmā." Five kinds of sounds come from the mouth of Brahmā, king of the gods: i) deep as thunder; ii) pure and clear, able to heard from afar and delighting the listeners; iii) penetrating and inspiring respect; iv) truthful and easy to understand; v) never tiring the listeners. These are also the five intonations from the mouth of the Bodhisattva. - [Other marks] "He has the voice of a sparrow (kalavikutāhātān):" his voice is pleasant (manoṣṭha) like the song of the kalavīkta bird.

"He has the voice of a drum (dandaḥśivasara):" his voice is deep and powerful like that of a great drum.

29. Abhinandanetraḥ: "His eyes are deep blue" like a beautiful blue lotus (nilōtpala).

30. Gopāksameretraḥ: "His eyelashes are like those of an ox." Like the king of the oxen, his eyelashes are long (dṛgha), beautiful (abhirūpa) and well-arranged (āvṛksipta).

31. Uṣṇīṣajñānīyaḥ: "His head is crowned with a protuberance." The Bodhisattva has a bony chignon like a crown.

32. Īruṇā: "He has a tuft of white hairs." A tuft of white hair grows between his eyebrows (ūrṇā śāya bhūvat madhye jātā), neither too high nor too low. It is white (śivād), woolly to the right (pradaksināvād), growing easily and at the height of five feet. 483

The experts in marks added: "In earth and heaven, the yong prince (kumāru) possesses the thirty-two marks of the Great Man (mahāpurasalakṣana) which all Bodhisattvas possess."

480 According to T 261, k. 4, p. 883, everything that the Tathāgata consumes, drinks, solid food, fish, is transformed into ambrosia in contact with his four canine teeth.

481 For these five, eight ten and sixteen qualities of the voice of Brahmā, cf. Hobogiriin, Bonnos, p. 133-134.

483 For the īruṇā, see Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 288-289.

Question. - The cakravartin king also possesses these thirty-two marks. In what way are those of the Bodhisattva different?

Answer. - The marks of the Bodhisattva prevail over those of the cakravartin king in seven ways: they are i) very pure, ii) very distinct (vibhaktā, iiii) ineffaceable, iv) perfect, v) deeply marked, vi) conforming with the practice of wisdom (prajñācaryāyasthātin) and not conforming to the world (lokāṇusārin; vii) lasting (delesātha). The marks of a cakravartin king do not have these qualities.

Question. - Why are they called marks (lakṣana)?

Answer. - Because they are easy to recognize. Thus water, which is different from fire, is recognized by its marks.

Why does the Bodhisattva have thirty-two marks, neither more nor less? 484

Some say: The Buddha whose body is adorned (alamkāra) with the thirty-two marks is beautiful (abhīrūpa) and well-arranged (āvṛksipta). If he had less than thirty-two marks his body would be ugly; if he had more than thirty-two marks he would be untidy. Thanks to the thirty-two marks, he is beautiful and well-arranged. Their number cannot be increased or decreased. The bodily marks [91b] are like the other attributes of the Buddha (buddhadharma) which cannot be increased or decreased.

Question. - Why does the Bodhisattva adorn his body with marks?

Answer. - 1. Some people have attained purity of faith (viddādhisśvadīdha) by seeing the bodily marks of the Buddha. 485 This is why he adorns his body with marks.

2. Furthermore, the Buddhas triumph (abhillāhavantī) in every way: they triumph by means of their physical beauty (kālyārisa), power (prabhāvā), clan (gōtra), family (jāti), wisdom (prajñā), abhūtau, deliverance (vinuśtri), etc. But if the Buddhas did not adorn themselves with marks, these superiorities would not be as numerous.

3. Finally, some say that supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasamannyaṣambodhi) resides in the body of the Buddha but that if the corporeal marks did not adorn their body anuttarasamannyaṣambodhi would not reside in them. Thus when a man wishes to marry a noble maiden, the latter sends a messenger to him to say: "If you wish to marry me, you must first decorate your house, remove the filth and the bad smells. You must place in it beds, covers, linen, curtains, drapes, wall-coverings and perfumes so as to decorate it. Only after that will I enter your house." In the same way, anuttarasamannyaṣambodhi sends wisdom (prajñā) to the Bodhisattva to say to him: "If you want to attain me, first cultivate the marvelous marks and adorn your body with them. Only after that will I reside in you. If they do not adorn your body, I will not reside in you." 486 This is why the Bodhisattva cultivates the thirty-two marks and adorns his body with them, to attain anuttarasamannyaṣambodhi.

484 See the reply of Pārāśekha to this question in the Viśhū, T 1545, k. 177, p. 889a.

485 This was the case notably for Ambhaṭṭa, Brahmāluṣ and Sela. See above.

486 This prosopoeia of the Buddha and anuttarasamannyaṣambodhi is characteristic of the Prajñāpāramitā literature which tends to make out of prajñā the Mother of the Buddhas; cf. T 220, k. 306, p. 558b: All the Tathāgatas depend on the
7. Enlightenment and Buddhahood

Then the Bodhisattva grew up gradually and, having seen an old man, a sick man, he experienced disgust (nirveda) for worldly things. At midnight, he left his home (abhīnamāraṇa) and practiced asceticism (dakṣaracarya) for six years. Then he ate some sweetened milk-broth (pāyasa) of sixteen restorative qualities offered to him by the brāhmaṇa Nandī (Nandi) and, under the tree of enlightenment (bodhiśāka), he defied Māra's army of 18,000 kōris of warriors and attained supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarārāmaśambhūti).

Question. - What qualities must he to attain in order to be called Buddha?

Answer. - 1. He is called Buddha when he has acquired the knowledge of cessation (ksayajñā) and the knowledge of non-arising (anupādajñā).

2. According to others, he is called Buddha when he has acquired the ten strengths (daśa balāṇa), the four fearlessnesses (caturviśvādāya), the eighteen special attributes (aṣṭādaśeṇakāś Buddhadhārmanāḥ), the three knowledges (tīrū vidvāḥ), the four penetrations (caturāra pratimasvādāḥ), the three smṛtyupasthānas or equanimities (i. When one listens to the Dharma and one respects it, the Buddha feels no joy. ii. When one does not listen to the Dharma and one scorns it, the Buddha feels no sadness. iii. When one both respects and scorns the Dharma, the Buddha feels no emotion), great loving-kindness (mahāmaitrī) and great compassion (mahākaruṇa), the thirty-seven auxiliaries to enlightenment.

The practitioners of the Mahāyāna say: The disciples of Mahākātyāyanaputra are beings [immersed] in samāpāra; they do not recite and do not study the Mahāvihāra; they do not recognize the true nature (sūnālakṣaṇa) of dharmas. By means of their keen faculties (tīkanendriya) and their wisdom (prajñā), they have theories about the Buddhadhāma: they define the fetters (sānyāsana), cognition (prajñā), samādhi, the faculties (indriya), etc. If they commit errors in these various subjects, what would happen if they were to give us a theory (upadeśa) regarding the Bodhisattva? If a weak man who wants to jump across a little brook does not succeed in crossing over, what would he do if he comes to a great river except to sink and drown and be lost?

Question. - How is he lost?

Answer. - 1. Actions producing the thirty-two marks

The practitioners of the Mahāyāna say: The disciples of Mahākātyāyanaputra are beings [immersed] in samāpāra; they do not recite and do not study the Mahāvihāra; they do not recognize the true nature (sūnālakṣaṇa) of dharmas. By means of their keen faculties (tīkanendriya) and their wisdom (prajñā), they have theories about the Buddhadhāma: they define the fetters (sānyāsana), cognition (prajñā), samādhi, the faculties (indriya), etc. If they commit errors in these various subjects, what would happen if they were to give us a theory (upadeśa) regarding the Bodhisattva? If a weak man who wants to jump across a little brook does not succeed in crossing over, what would he do if he comes to a great river except to sink and drown and be lost?

In the Śrāvakā system, the disciples of Mahākātyāyanaputra define the Bodhisattva in the way that we have just described.

THE BODHISATTVA IN THE MAHĀYĀNA SYSTEM

- The practitioners of the Mahāyāna say: The disciples of Mahākātyāyanaputra are beings [immersed] in samāpāra; they do not recite and do not study the Mahāvihāra; they do not recognize the true nature (sūnālakṣaṇa) of dharmas. By means of their keen faculties (tīkanendriya) and their wisdom (prajñā), they have theories about the Buddhadhāma: they define the fetters (sānyāsana), cognition (prajñā), samādhi, the faculties (indriya), etc. If they commit errors in these various subjects, what would happen if they were to give us a theory (upadeśa) regarding the Bodhisattva? If a weak man who wants to jump across a little brook does not succeed in crossing over, what would he do if he comes to a great river except to sink and drown and be lost?

Question. - How is he lost?

Answer. - 1. Actions producing the thirty-two marks

The practitioners of the Mahāyāna say: The disciples of Mahākātyāyanaputra are beings [immersed] in samāpāra; they do not recite and do not study the Mahāvihāra; they do not recognize the true nature (sūnālakṣaṇa) of dharmas. By means of their keen faculties (tīkanendriya) and their wisdom (prajñā), they have theories about the Buddhadhāma: they define the fetters (sānyāsana), cognition (prajñā), samādhi, the faculties (indriya), etc. If they commit errors in these various subjects, what would happen if they were to give us a theory (upadeśa) regarding the Bodhisattva? If a weak man who wants to jump across a little brook does not succeed in crossing over, what would he do if he comes to a great river except to sink and drown and be lost?
hold of him, he killed himself with his knife (śastra); a brick wind began to blow and brought them to the shore. \[489\] Who would dare to deny that this was an act of great compassion (mahākārākāra)?

When he had finished the second asamkhyeya and not yet entered into the third, the Bodhisattva received from the Buddha Dipamkara the prophecy (vyūkarana) that he would be Buddha. Then he rose up into the sky (ākāśa), saw the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśaśiśuddha) and, standing up in space, he praised the Buddha Dipamkara. \[490\] The Buddha Dipamkara had said to him: "In one asamkhyeya, you will be Buddha with the name Śīkyumuni." Since he did indeed receive this prophecy (vyūkarana), could one say, without committing a grave error, that he was not already Bodhisattva?

\[92a\] The disciples of Kātyāyaniputra have said that, during the three asamkhyeyas, the Bodhisattva did not possess the marks (ākṣara) of the Buddha and did not yet accomplish the actions producing the thirty-two marks (dvārakāraśakānkarman). [If this is so], how would they know that he is Bodhisattva? Everything must first manifest its characteristic marks; it is only then one can recognize its reality. If it has no marks, one does not recognize it.

We Mahāyānists say: Receiving the prophecy that one will be Buddha, rising up into the sky, seeing the Buddhas of the ten directions, these are not the great marks. What was predicted in the Buddha Dipamkara was that one will act as a Buddha. The fact of acting as Buddha is the great mark. You ignore this mark and you adopt the thirty-two marks [of the Great Man]. But the cakravartin kings also possess these thirty-two marks. \[491\]

\[489\] This story is told in the Mahāvastu, III, p. 354-355: Bhikṣaṅgūra bhikṣavo aditam adhitvame chandaśu vānijjakā ... sarvasvānavāṇa anuvāpayastā. The same story in the Tibetan Karmāṇatuka, 28, II, 13 (tr. Peer, p. 49-51), where the sārthāvāha has the name Dhyāg du (Vasumandana) and, as in the Mahāvastu, his companions were saved by holding onto his floating corpse.

\[490\] In the Hiṃyu king, T 202 (no. 56), k. 10, p. 42c-422b, the sārthāvāha, who lived at the time of Bhuddadatta, king of Benares, is called La mā chē ye (Ratnājaya). - In the Liou tou ti king, T 152 (no. 67), k. 6, p. 36b (tr. Chavannes, Comtes, I, p. 245-247), he is brought back to life by Śakra. - Other details may be found in the Ta pei king, T 380, k. 4, p. 96b.

\[491\] This phenomenon of levitation is mentioned, among other sources, in the Mahāvastu, I, p. 239: Samanaturo satyakāya... Dipamkaranava Megho manus... saptatālā abhyudgatah. - The frieze of Sīkri, in the Lahore Museum, which shows the Bodhisattva four times in the same panel, places him, the last time, at the top of the frieze above the Buddha Dipamkara (cf. Foucher, Art Grécæ-Boudhique, I, p. 275).

\[492\] Nanda had thirty marks. At k. 29, p. 273a, the Mppē will be more explicit: "Other individuals than the Buddha possessed the marks... Thus Nanda, from one lifetime to the next, obtained the adornment of the physical marks; in his last lifetime, he left home, became a monk (śramaṇa) and, when the saṃgha saw him at a distance, they mistook him for the Buddha and rose to meet him." This is an allusion to the Sāvāvatvādī Vinaya, Che song liu, T 1435, k. 16, p. 130 (cf. the Tokhariian fragment of the same Vinaya in Hoerlile, Romains, P. 369). "The Buddha was dwelling in Kapilavastu. At that time, the līyāṃvat Nanda, the younger brother of the Buddha who had been born to a sister of the Buddha's mother, had a body quite like the Buddha's with thirty marks and four inches shorter than the Buddha. Nanda had a robe the same size as the Buddha's. When the bhikṣus were gathered together either at meal time or in the afternoon, if they saw Nanda coming at a distance, they ase to go and greet him: 'Here is our great leader coming!' When they came near, they saw that it was not the Buddha..." The same story occurs in the other Vinayas, especially in the Pāli Vinaya, IV, p. 173, where there is no mention of the thirty marks. But this detail is known to the Khn pen choo... u che, T 1451, K. 56, p. 912b.

\[493\] Bīvārī had three marks. The Mppē, k. 29, p. 273a, will return to this individual, but the passage presents difficulties.

\[494\] Devadatta had thirty marks as the Mppē says: When Kāṣapa was a lay person, he had a teacher named Po po lī (Bīvārī), who had three marks: the ūṇā, the tongue covering the face and the crypторhidy. I [Lamotte] rather would understand it as: "When Maitreya was a layperson, he had a teacher named Po pō lī (Bīvārī), who had three marks: the ūṇā, the tongue covering his face and the crypторhidy." This translation is called for not only by the Mppē, k. 4, p. 92a, which attributes three marks to Bīvārī, but also by the Pāliya (Suttanipata, v. 1909) which recognizes in him the same quality: vimmavattasatam duḥ... vedanāpamargā. "He is 120 years old, in his family he is Bīvārī; he has three marks on his body; he is learned in the three Vedas." Bīvārī is especially known to the Vatthugāchas, a few other sources, such as the Rāṣṭrapāla, for example, first mention some marks (a few less than the Buddha). But it does not say how many; there are also other marks that are not the great marks.

\[495\] Devadatta had thirty marks as the Mppē will say later (k. 14, p. 164c28). This detail is known to Hiuan tsang (Si yu ku, T 207, k. 6, p. 900a), which has him say: "I have thirty marks, a few less than the Buddha; a great assembly follows him." - According to the Tsa pī yū king, T 207, p. 524b-525a (tr. Chavannes, Comtes, II, p. 14-20); Po po lī's king, T 190, k. 45, p. 862b. - The Apudalā, II, p. 578-584a, dedicates a chapter to the therī Bhaddā Kālāli; it tells her earlier lives and her last lifetime and mentions, in v. 58, her marriage to Kāśyapa: gahañakegamahavena... viṣṇuceva me. - See also the comm. on the Therīghāthā in Rh. D., Psalms of the Sisters, p. 47-48, and Mānitartha, I, p. 375-376.
one or two of these marks, such as deep black eyes (abhinīlanetra), long arms (dīrghabāhu), the upper part of the body like a lion (śīvapāravīrlabdhyā), etc. These various marks are encountered more or less frequently. So why do you attach so much importance to them?

In what situation is it said that the Bodhisattva does not accomplish the actions producing the marks during the three asamkhyeyaakalpa? Nan To (Nanda) had given a bath to the Buddha Pr p/o che (Vipaśyin) and wished to obtain pure beauty (saundarya). On the stūpa of a pratyekabuddha he had painted a wall blue, and while drawing the image of the pratyekabuddha, he made the vow (pranābhaṇa): "I wish to obtain the mark of the golden color (sauvanavarṇa) always." Finally, he built the steps on the stūpa of the Buddha Kāśyapa.496 As a result of these three merits (puruṣa), he enjoyed happiness in all his lifetimes and favorable complex of conditions and time, they bear fruit for their creator (na praṇavatam karmiś ca kalpakotiśātaś api, sūmarīty prāpya kālānu ca phalantī bhātal dehitih). a. Ninety-one kalpas ago, when the human life-span was 80,000 years, there appeared in the world the Buddha Vipaśyin, tathāgata, arhat, completely enlightened (saṃyaksambuddha), endowed with the knowledges and the practices (vidhiḥbharamanopama), thus-come (sugata), knower of the world (lokavid), without superior (anuttara), leader of those to be converted (parasādambhavatikā), teacher of gods and men (āāśi devasamayānāśin), buddha, bhagavat. Accompanied by 62,000 bhikṣus, he traveled amongst men. He reached the city of Yün howei (Bandhumati), a royal residence, went to the forest and dwelled there. This Bhagavat had a half-brother, very attached to pleasures, whom Vipaśyin, tathāgata, arhat, completely enlightened (saṃyaksambuddha), had drawn on the image of the ocean of samāra and had made him leave the world (pravrajita) to place him happily in ultimate nirvāṇa. At that time, the king of the land was called Yün t'ūn (Bandhumati): he governed his people justly; his estates were prosperous, opulent, abundant, happy and peaceful; there were no quarrels, no discard, no troubles, no misdeeds, no sickness; the buffalo, the cattle, the rice and the sugarcane were plentiful. But the half-brother of the king was very carried away by pleasure. Hearing that the Buddha and his community were staying in the Bandhumati forest, the king ordered the princes, his relatives, his servants, ministers and ladies of the harem to go as a retinue to the Buddha. Prostrating at the feet of the Buddha, they withdrew and sat down at one side. But the king's brother, deep in his pleasures, did not want to go with the others. Then the ministers' sons and other friends went to him and said: "Good friend, don't you know that the king, the princes, the whole court, ministers and people have gone to the Buddha Vipaśyin in their respects, and by hearing the precious Dharma, they have obtained excellent deliverance! The human condition is very rare, but now you have obtained it. Why do you want to give yourself up to your pleasures without wanting to free yourself?" Hearing these reproaches, the king's brother was filled with shame; bowing his head, he joined his companions and they went together. At that time, the bhikṣu who was the Buddha's brother saw these friends who had gone together and asked them: "Gentlemen, why are you going with this man?" The friends gave the reason. The bhikṣu said to them: "I am the Buddha's brother; once when I was living in the world of āryavarta, I also was very attached to pleasures; fortunately, the Great Teacher [my brother] forced me to abandon them and made me find peace (śramaṇa) and ultimate nirvāṇa. There are still such fools as I was at one time. These kind friends who are leading him away with them are doing really a great service to him. You can go to the great Teacher who has no equal. When you are near him, have deep faith." The companions came to the Buddha who, considering their faculties and their earnestness, preached the Dharma to them. [The king's brother] arose from his seat and, throwing his upper garment over one shoulder (āśītasam uttarāsāgam kyā), he joined his palms to the Bhagavat (yena Bhagavān tenādiṣā prānapana) and said: "Bhagavat, I would like to invite the great teacher and his noble assembly to come tomorrow to take a bath in my pool!" The Buddha accepted by way of silence, and the young man, having understood that the Buddha accepted, bowed down to the Buddha's feet, took his leave and went away. Then he went to [his brother] the king, paid his respects and said: "Great king, I have gone to the Buddha. I have heard the Dharma, I have faith and I feel disgust (samsavāyuca) for pleasures. I have asked the Buddha and the samgha to come tomorrow to take a bath in the pool. The Tathāgata, the Great Teacher, has kindly accepted. The Buddha is entitled to the respect of gods and men; it would be fitting if the king would have the streets cleaned and the city decorated." The king said to himself: "The Buddha is going to come to the city; I should have it decorated. My brother's taste for pleasure is incorrigible; it is truly extraordinary (adhibhūta) that the Buddha should have subdued it." [Addressing himself to his brother], he said: "Good, you may go and prepare the things necessary for the bath (āṇāpikaraṇa); I will decorate the city in the best possible way." Very happy, the king's brother took his leave and went away. The king then said to his ministers: "Proclaim everywhere the following edict: Tomorrow the Bhagavat will be within our walls. All of you needy people and strangers must decorate the city, clean the streets and come before the Great Teacher with perfumes and flowers." The ministers obeyed and had the royal edict proclaimed everywhere. At once, in the entire city, the crowd began to remove the dirt, spread perfumes, burn aromatics, hang banners and strew flowers; the city was like the pleasure palace (śaṅkunirūpa) of Sakra, king of the gods. However, the king's brother had prepared hot water and perfumed oils, decorated the bath and set out beds. When the Buddha Vipaśyanī was about to enter the city, the ministers, the crown prince, the queen, the palace people, the courtesans and the citizens went out to meet him, prostrated at his feet and returned to the city following him.

Then the king's brother led the Buddha into the bath filled with perfumed water. He saw that the Buddha's body was golden in color, adorned with the 32 major marks and the 80 minor marks (ānurājamārga); at this sight, he felt great joy and deep faith. When the bath was finished and the Buddha had put on his garments again, he prostrated at the feet of the Bhagavat and made the following vow (pravakṣṇā): "I have had the great good fortune today of meeting an eminent field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) and rendering him a small service. In reward for this good action, I would like my body, in future lifetimes, to be golden in color like that of the Buddha. The Buddha has already drawn his own brother from the pleasures to which he had been attached and has placed him in safety and definitive nirvāṇa. I would also like later to be the brother of a Buddha and have a golden colored body, and if I delinquent in karmas, I would like the Buddha to force me to come out of the deep river of impure desire and lead me to nirvāṇa and the safety of peace (hemapada).

The Buddha added: Have no doubts, O bhikṣu. He who was then the pleasure-loving brother of king Bandhuma is the present bhikṣu Nanda. It is he who once invited the Buddha Vipaśyanī to take a perfumed bath in his bath-house and who, with pure heart, wished for the reward I have said. Today he is the Buddha's brother and has a golden body in color; as he delighted in pleasures, I have forced him to go forth, renounce desire and leave home to reach nirvāṇa and the safety of peace.

b. Then the bhikṣus, having another doubt, asked the Bhagavat: "Bhadanta, what action did the bhikṣu Nanda once perform to have his body now adorned with the thirty mahāparīnirvāṇa?"
The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: That is the result of actions that he accomplished... (as above). Once in a village there was a rich śrīśārī who had many material goods, great wealth and vast and extensive possessions. He had a garden (udāna) full of flowers and fruits, with springs and pools, woods and hills, able to serve as shelter for monks. At that time, there were pratylekabuddhas who appeared in the world and settled in retreats out of compassion for beings; there was no Buddha in the world; these pratylekabuddhas were the only field of merit (puṇyakṣetra) at the time. One day a venerable pratylekabuddha, traveling among men, came to the village and, looking about the area, stopped in the garden.

Seeing him, the gardener said: "Sugata, rest here from your weariness!" The venerable one settled in that place and during the night, entered into the concentration on fire (tejāyopahāramādhī). Seeing this, the gardener said to himself: "This Bhaddanta has accomplished extraordinary things." Then in the middle of the night, he went to his master and said: "Master, from now on you may rejoice. A Bhaddanta has come to spend the night in your garden; he is endowed with marvellous powers and possesses the abhiññā; he emits great rays of light (śīvakā) that light up the whole garden." At these words, the śrīśārī hastily went to the garden and, prostrating at the feet of the venerable one, said to him: "Noble One, it is great happiness for me that you have come here to beg your food. Stay here in this garden; I will always give you your food." Seeing his enthusiasm, the pratylekabuddha accepted. He stayed in the garden where he penetrated the 32 major marks and the 80 minor marks (anuvyājana). Then the śrīśārī took his corpse, cremated it with aromatics and extinguished the funeral pyre with creamy milk. He gathered the ashes, placed them in a new urn, built a stūpa and hung it with parasols (chattra). Filled with respectful faith, he anointed [the stūpa] with thirty kinds of perfumed waters and made the vow (pravakṣṇā) to seek the marks (of the Great Man).

The Buddha added: "Have no doubts, O bhikṣu. The śrīśārī is now Nandana. As a result of such faith and respect he has now acquired as reward the thirty marvellous marks."

Then the bhikṣus had another doubt and asked the Bhagavat: "Bhadanta, what action did the bhikṣu Nanda formerly perform in order that, in the case that he did not leave home (pravrajita) and reject pleasures, that he would definitely have played the part of a powerful cakravartin king?"
The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: This is the result of actions that he accomplished, etc... (as above) Once, during the good kalpa (bhuvanakalpa) when the human lifespan was 20,000 years, the Buddha Śākyamuni appeared in the world. Endowed with ten appellations (tathāgata, arhat, etc.), he was staying in Vīrāṇavīra at Rṣipatana, in the Mrgadāvī. At that time, the king of the city, Kīrtikēn (Kritheka) governed the people justly as a great king of Dharma. The king had three sons, the eldest, the second and the youngest. When the Buddha Śākyamuni had finished his ministry, he entered into nirvāṇa like a flame which has been extinguished. The king took the Buddha's corpse, cremated it with aromatic sandalwood (śāradana), etc., and extinguished the funeral pyre with perfumed milk. He gathered the ashes (śūra), placed them in a golden urn, erected a great stūpa made of four jewels, one yojana long and wide and one-half yojana in height. At the time of circumambulation, the king's second son placed a parasol (chattra) on top. The Buddha added: Have no doubts, O bhikṣu. He who was then the second son of the king is today Nanda. It was he who, out of respect, offered a parasol which he placed on the top of the stūpa. As a reward for this good action, for 2500 lifetimes he has been a powerful cakravartin king, reigning over one continent (śipada) and in this actual lifetime, if he had not left home (pravrajita), he would also have been a powerful king with the wheel and would have acquired great sovereignty (arāṇya)."
The Mahāyānists. - From the first production of the mind of bodhi (prathamacittotpāda), the Bodhisattva knows that he will be Buddha. Thus, when the [92b] bodhisattva Aśoka-lo (Acala)497, in the presence of the Buddha Tathāgata cheu (Dhīrapāla?), first produced the mind [of bodhi], he attained the diamond seat (vajrātman) and immediately acquired buddha-hood; errors (vipāyāsya) and impure thoughts (avatītavāca) do not arise in him. The four bodhisattvas of the Cheu lāng yen san mei (Sārvāgamasamādhi) received the prophesy (vyākaranasa): the first received the prophesy without having produced the thought of bodhi; the second received the prophesy at the moment when he was about to produce the thought of bodhi; before the third one received it, the others all knew [that he would be Buddha], but he himself did not know it; before the fourth one received it, the others and he himself knew it. Then why do you say that in the course of the second asamkhīyakalpa the Bodhisattva knows the prophesy but does not dare to proclaim [that he will be Buddha]? - Besides, the Buddha has said that for innumerable kalpas the Bodhisattva realizes the qualities (guna) in order to save beings. In these conditions, why do you speak of [only] three asamkhīyakalpas, which are finite and limited?

The disciples of Kātyāyanputra. - Although it is a matter of these numbers asamkhyeyas in the Mahāyānasūtras, we do not believe in them entirely.

The Mahāyānists. - That is a grave error, for [the Mahāyānasūtras] are the true Buddha-dharma (saddharma) coming from the very mouth (kanyākhala) of the Buddha. You cannot reject them. Moreover, you derive your origin from the Mahāyānists,498 how can you say that you do not entirely believe it?

You [disciples of Kātyāyanputra] also say: "The Bodhisattva accomplishes the actions producing the thirty-two marks in the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and not in the form realm (rūpadhātu) or in the formless realm (ārūpyadhātu)." [Without a doubt], in the ārūpyadhātu there is neither body (kāya) nor form (rūpa) and, as these thirty-two marks are bodily adornments, it is not possible to accomplish the actions that produce them in the ārūpyadhātu. But why could they not be accomplished in the rūpadhātu? In the rūpadhātu there are the great Brahmārājas who usually invite the Buddhas to turn the wheel of the Dharma (dharmacakra). Wise and pure, they are capable of seeking Buddha-hood. Why do they not accomplish the actions producing the thirty-two marks?

You also say: "The Bodhisattva accomplishes these actions in his human births (manuyagati) and not in the other destinies." But he can accomplish them equally in animal or other destinies. Thus So k'e k'io long wang (read So k'é'lo long wang too = Sāgaramārgadṛṣṭiḥ), the daughter of Sāgara, king of the nāgas, is a bodhisattva of the tenth level (dusamād bhūmi);499 the nāga king A na po ta to (Anavatapatanāgarāja) is a seventh-level bodhisattva (saptama bhūmi)500, and the king of the asuras, Lo heu (Rāhu) is also a great 497 Acala, or Acalānātha, is well-known in Vajrayāna Buddhism and the Shingon sect; he is one of the five vidyādāras, protectors of the Dharma. He is closely connected to Vairocana and Prajñāpāramitā with whom he forms a trinity. He is shown bearing a sword and surrounded by flames. Cf. Grünwedel, Mythologie d. Budd., p. 162; W. De Visser, Ancient Buddhism in Japan, Leiden, 1935, p. 144 sq.; Glansenap, Budd. Mysteries, p. 80, 84, 98.

498 Historically the Greater Vehicle is later than the Lesser Vehicle but its practitioners often claim an origin at least as old for it. The well-known stanza śūla atitī avyākaranam of the Sūtrakūṭa, ed. Lévi, p. 3, repeated in Siddhi, p. 176, affirms that the Greater Vehicle is the "essential word of the Buddha" because "from its beginning, it coexists in the Lesser Vehicle (samaprasvatītṛaḥ), and the commentary explains: sāmakālaṃ ca śrīvāyuṣyena Mahāyānasya pratyutpattihāt vajra-cakravatā pada ca." - According to some Mahāyānists, the scriptures of the Greater Vehicle, like those of the Lesser Vehicle, must have been compiled after the Buddha's death, and the Mpp, k. 100, p. 756b, seems to confirm them: "There are those who say: Whereas Mahākāśyapa, at the head of the bhikṣus, compiled the Tripiṭaka on Gedratarkaparvata immediately after the Buddha's nirvāṇa, the great bodhisattvas, Mahāprajñā, Mahāprajñā, etc., taking Ananda with them, compiled the Mahāyāna. Ananda knew how to measure the extent of the aspirations and conduct of beings; that is why he did not preach the Mahāyāna to the śrāvakas [whom he judged to be unable to understand this teaching]." For this compilation of the Greater Vehicle which took place on Mount Vimalasvabhāva, south of Rājagṛha, see also the quotations gathered by Bu ston, II, p. 101.

499 Cf. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, p. 263-265 (tr. Burnout; Lotus, p. 160-162; Kern, p. 251-253). - Although female and only eight years of age, the daughter of Śāgara, king of the nāgas, had acquired anuttararāmasamākhandhi, which constitutes the state of Buddha. As the bodhisattva Prajñāpāramitā and Śīlaputra refused to believe that a woman could attain this high rank, she suppressed the signs indicating her sex in herself, showed herself endowed with male organs and transformed herself into a bodhisattva who went to the south. In this part of space there was the universe Vimala; there, seated near the trunk of a bodhi tree made of the seven precious substances, this bodhisattva appeared in the condition of perfectly accomplished Buddha, bearing the thirty-two marks of the Great Man, having the body adorned with all the secondary emitters which spread in the ten directions and teaching the Dharma. Here is the Sanskrit text of this passage: Sāgaramārgadṛṣṭiḥ... sat strīdravyānti anatārāṃ bhūmi... aṣṭaputritvā dharmadevalānāṃ kārūṃva. - According to the previous indications, the Mpp is quite correct in making the daughter of Śāgara a tenth level bodhisattva, the ultimate stage of the career of the Bodhisattva and immediately preceding the attainment of Buddhahood.

In telling the story of Śāgara's daughter, the Mpp is referring to the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka; Kumāralāva, the translator of the Mpp, therefore was familiar with this story. This is worthy of note, for the passage referring to Śāgara's daughter was originally missing from the translation of the Sūtra made by Kumāralāva in 406; it was inserted only later, in the time of the Sōrei, in the form of a special chapter entitled Devadatta (cf. T 262, k. 4, p. 34b-35a). A tradition claims that the chapter originally appeared in Kumāralāva's version, but was removed at Thān-ūan. However that may be, the Devadatta chapter is old since its contents appeared as early as 286 AD in Dhamarakṣa's translation of the Sūtra (cf. T 263, k. 6) and was circulated at the end of the 5th century in Serindia and China independently of the rest of the Sūtra. On this question, see the P. Demélévile's note in Bibliographie Bouddhique, VII-VIII, 1937, p. 95-96 on the work of K. Fuse (in Japanese).

500 The Mpp will return to this individual later (k. 30, p. 344a): Among the beings immersed in the animal destinies, some do and others do not obtain Buddhahood; thus Anavatapatanāgarāja, Sāgaramārgadṛṣṭi, etc., obtain Buddhahood. - Anavatapata is one of the eight great nāga-kings; he lives in the Anavatapata pool from which flow the four great rivers of the world (see below, k. 7, p. 114a, k. 8, p. 116a). According to the T'ou-lang a hæn, T. 1, k. 18, p. 117a, he does not have the three misfortunes of the other three dragon-kings, which are: (i) wind and hot sand burn their skin and bones; (ii) a violent wind blows in their palace and uncoveres it; (iii) the ganu bird torment them in the midst of their play. According to the Jou lâi hing hien king, T 291, k. 2, p. 602e, the rains that emanate from his body make Jambudvīpa fertile. - For more details, see Hobgōrin, Anuladatas, p. 33. - Whereas the Mpp makes Anavatapata a bodhisattva of the seventh level, Hiuan tsang (Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 1, p. 869b) claims that he was a bodhisattva of the eighth level before taking on the form of a nāga.
bodhisattva.501 Why do you say that the Bodhisattva cannot accomplish the actions producing the thirty-two marks in destinies other than the human destiny?]

You also say: "The Bodhisattva accomplishes them in the human destiny and in Jambudvīpa." It is reasonable to say that he cannot accomplish them in Yu tu lan (Uttarakuru), for there men are without individuality (?) (F: personalité), attached to pleasure (raja) and without sharp faculties (ākṣendraśya). But why could they not accomplish them in the other two continents, K'i'ran ni (Godānyā) and Fou p'o 'I (Pūrvavideha) where merit (puṇya), wisdom (prajñā) and duration of life (āyur) are much greater than in Jambudvīpa?502

You also say: "A volition (catuṣṭādī) is necessary to accomplish each mark." But in the time of a finger snap, the mind (citta) arises and ceases sixteen times; in one thought, there is neither duration (shāhī) nor parts (vibhāgū).503 How could it accomplish a mark of the Great Man? [On the other hand], a mark of the Great Man cannot do without a mind for its accomplishment. Therefore [only] the [92c] coming together of many volitions (bahucetānāṃnayogā) can accomplish one single mark. In the same way, in order to carry a heavy load, one single man is not enough; the united strength of several men is necessary. Similarly, in order to accomplish a mark, a great mind is necessary and to this effect, the joining of many volitions is indispensable. Therefore it is called 'the mark of one hundred merits' (śiṣṭapunyatākūṣaṇa). It is impossible that a single volition could accomplish a determined mark. If other things cannot be accomplished by a single volition, what can be said of the mark of one hundred merits?

Why do you say that the mind of the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni was impure whereas that of his disciples was pure? Where was that said? We cannot find anything like that in the Tripitaka or in the Mahāyāna. This statement is your imagination. You believe that only the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni saw the Buddha Puñya in his cave of precious stones and praised him with one single stanza for seven days and seven nights. But the Bodhisattva Maitreya also praised the Buddha Puñya in every way. The A po t' o na king (Avadānasūtra or the Avadānasūtaka) is the only one that does not say anything about it. If you do not know that, that is not a sufficient reason. Then you add that the mind of Maitreya's disciples was pure; that is a complete contradiction.

501 Rāhu, personification of the eclipse, appears in two well-known suttas in the Śānyutta, the Candimasutta and the Suryasutta, which the Mppī will reproduce later (k. 20, p. 136b). The palace of Rāhu is described in the Te̕ch'ang a han, T 1, k. 20, p. 129b. - Rāhu has a city called Kousung ming, four parks, four wives called Jου ying 'Shadow', Tēhōu hsiang 'Perfume', Miao lu 'Marvelous Forest' and Chong to 'Eminent Virtue'; his lifespan is 5,000 years when each day equals 500 human years (Hisoginrin, Ashura, p. 42).

502 These four continents are described in Kośa, III, p. 145.

503 Sixteen mind moments arise and cease in the time that a material dharma lasts. "It is better to consider as a self this body made up of the four great elements rather than the mind. We see that this body lasts one year ... one hundred years and more. But that which bears the name of mind (citta), spirit (manas), consciousness (viśיתdvā) by day and by night is born as one and dies as another. In the same way that a monkey grasps one branch, lets it go, takes another..." (Śānyutta, II, p. 94-95: Tsu a han, T 99, k. 12, p. 81c). - "Like a mountain river... there is no khana, lāya, mūhātra where it rests, but it flows on... the life of men is short... That which arises cannot cease." (Anguttara, IV, p. 137).

2. The six virtues

You say: "[By the virtue of generosity], the Bodhisattva gives everything without feeling regret, like king Śibi who, to save the pigeon, gave his flesh to the falcon without feeling any regret."

To give wealth (āmśadāna) is a lesser gift (ātihadāna); to give one's body (ākṣayadāna) is a middling gift (madhyadāna); to give anything whatsoever, provided that the mind is detached (mīsadvāga) is the highest gift (agradāna).504 [By telling the story of the gift of the body by king Śibi], why do you praise the middling gift as if it were the complete perfection of the virtue of generosity (dānāpāramitāpāramitū)?

Although its intention (citta) may be lofty and full of loving kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuna), this [middling] generosity may or may not involve wisdom (prajñā). [King Śibi] is like a man who would sacrifice his body for his parents, his family or his teacher. Since he knows that he is sacrificing his life for a pigeon, his generosity is middling.

The disciples of Kātāyaniputra. - The Bodhisattva [sacrifices himself] for all beings, for his parents, for his teacher, or for all people. This is why [if we accept your definition of highest generosity where detachment plays the essential part], the gift of the body will [never] constitute the complete virtue of generosity.

[The Mahāyānins]. - Although he sacrifices himself for all beings, his mind (citta) is impure (avasādāna), for he does not know that he himself is non-existent (anatmadā); he does not know that the one who receives his gift (pratīghātaka) is not a person, is not his teacher; he does not know that the thing given by him (ādhyātavasa) is in reality neither the same as (eka) or different (anyā) from him. Since his mind (citta) is attached (saṭkavā) to the three concepts [of donor, recipient and thing given], it is impure (ātihadāna). It is in this world (lokadhātā) that he will receive the reward of his merit (puṇyatāpaka); he will not be able to go directly to Buddhahood. Thus it is said in the Prajñāpāramitā that the three things [donor, recipient and the thing given] are non-existent (anupalabhdha)505 and that he should not be attached to them. This is applied to the virtue of generosity but it is valid also [for the other virtues] up to and including the virtue of wisdom. [According to the disciples of Kātāyaniputra], to divide the great earth, the cities, towns and villages and to make seven parts of it is the perfection of the virtue of wisdom (93a) (prajñāpāramitāpāramitū). But the virtue of wisdom is immense (vāṃśadāna) and infinite (ananta) like the water of the ocean. To divide the earth is only ordinary mathematics (ganana); it is a modest part (ātihadāna) of conventional wisdom (śam Ayāppajñā); like one or two drops of water (binda) in the ocean.

504 The highest generosity which constitutes, properly speaking, the virtue of generosity (dānāpāramitū) rests in essence on knowledge free of concept (nyāyadhyātavasa) which makes it truly pure (śam Ayāpparipaliadāna); it consists of making no distinction between the thing given (ādhyāya), the donor (ādhyātā) and the recipient (pratīghātā). Cf. Pučhvamisāti, p. 264; Śatasāhasrikā, p. 92; Bodhicaryāvatāra, IX, p. 168; Puṣṭikā, p. 604; Uttaratantra, p. 120, 254; Samgraha, p. 185, 225; Siddhi, p. 629 n.

The true prajñāpāramitā is called the 'mother of the Buddhas' (buddhamātṛi) of the three times (tryadhvan); it reveals the true nature of all dharmas (sarvadharmasatyalakṣana). This prajñāpāramitā has no point of coming or point of going; it is like a magic show (māyā), an echo (pratirūpā), the moon reflected in water (udakasundra) which one sees and which immediately disappears. Out of compassion and, although this wisdom has but a single nature (ekalakṣana), the āryas define it using all kinds of conventional expressions (nānasamketa) as being the precious treasure of the wisdom of the Buddhas (buddhaprajñāpatramokṣa).

You are speaking grave errors.

3. The time of appearance of the Buddhas

You speak of the four examinations (vikāraṇa) made by the Bodhisattva: 1) examination of time (kālavikāraṇa), 2) examination of place (deśavikāraṇa), 3) examination of clan (kalavikāraṇa), 4) examination of mother (upapatitābhāsavikāraṇa). You add that if the Buddha appears in the world (pratidurbhavati) when the human lifespan (āyus) is 80,000, 70,000, 60,000, 50,000, 40,000, 30,000, 20,000, 100 years. But if the Buddhas always have compassion (anukampa) for beings, why do they appear only at these eight times and not at others? Just as a good medicine (osadhi) once swallowed, cures the sickness (vyādhī), so the Buddha-dharma does not depend on time.

[The disciples of Kātyāyantputra]. - Although the Bodhisattva has compassion for beings and although the Buddhas do not depend on time, when the lifespan surpasses 80,000 years, long-lived people (ārdhagāraṇa) revel in pleasures (sukha); their fetters, lust, desire, etc. (ājñātadharma) are heavy (sthitā) and their faculties are weak (mṛdvedīvyā). This is not the time to convert them. On the other hand, when the lifespan is less than 199 years, people have a short life (āldadhyāya) and are overcome with suffering (dubkha): their fetters, hatred, etc. (avēsādharma) are thick (sthitā). This period of pleasure [when the lifespan is more than 80,000 years] and this period of suffering [when it is less than 199 years] are not times favorable to finding the Path (mārgalabdha). This is why the Buddhas do not appear [at those times].

[The Mahāyānistins]. - 1. The lifespan of the gods is more than 10,000 years; that is because of their previous life (pārvavajman). Although they have plenty of pleasures (sukha) and their sensual desires (ājñātadharma) are heavy (sthitā), they are able to find the Path (mārga). What could be said then of people who are not happy and whose thirty-two impurities are easily corrected, [except that they find the Path even more easily than the gods]? This is why, even when the human lifespan is greater than 80,000 years, the Buddhas must appear in the world. At this time, people are not sick and their minds are joyful; consequently, their faculties are keen (vikṣintāvyā) and they are virtuous. As a result of their virtues and their keen faculties, they can easily find the Path.

2. Furthermore, under the Buddha Che tsue kou yin wang (Sīmādhumudhāvibhavatīrīya), the human lifespan is 100,000 years; under the Buddha Šad pang wang (Ālokārīya), it is 700 asamkhāyakālpa; under the Buddha A mi r’o (Amiṭābha), it lasts innumerable asamkhāyakālapas. How can you say that the Buddhas do not appear when the human lifespan is longer than 80,000 years?

[93b] [The disciples of Kātyāyantputra]. - These teachings are in the Mahāyānaṣūtras, but in our system it is not a question of the Buddhas of the ten directions (dasaśīlāyabuddha) but only of the one hundred Buddhas of the past (attābuddha), Śākyamuni, K’iu tch’en jo (Krakucchanda), etc., and the five hundred Buddhas of the future (anāgatābuddha), Maitreya, etc.

[The Mahāyānistins]. - In the Mahāyānaṣūtras, we speak of the Buddhas of the three times (tryadhvan) and the ten directions (dasāśīlāyā) for various reasons. In the universes (lokadhātu) of the ten directions, all the torments range: old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhī) and death (marana), lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha), etc.; this is why the Buddhas must appear in these regions. It is said in a stanza: "If old age, sickness, death and the afflictions (kleśa) did not exist, the Buddhas would not appear." 507 Furthermore, wherever there are many illnesses (vyādhīra), there should be many physicians (adhivāya).

In one of your Śrīvaka texts, the Tch’ang a han (Dīrgāhāma), king P’i cha men (Vaiśravāna) addresses the following stanza to the Buddha:

I bow before the Buddhas, past, future and present;
I take refuge (śīrāṇa) in the Buddha Śākyamuni. 508

506 For the number and names of the past and future Buddhas, refer to Mahālakṣaṇa, II, p. 295 and Hobogirin, Budha, p. 195-197.
507 Cf. Aṅguttara, V, p. 144: Tyoṣo bhikkhave dharmāṁ loke na satyajīṣyeyum. ... Śati ca jāra ca mamaruchchat ca.
508 The same passage of the Dīrgāhāma will be cited later at k. 9, p. 126a.

In the Dīrgāhāma, the sūtra says: There was a king of the asuras, guardian of the northern region; along with many hundreds of kṣatas of asuras, he went to the Buddha during the last watch of the night and, having prostrated to the Buddha, he sat down at one side; emitting pure light, he illuminated the entire Jetavana with a great light. Joining his palms together, he praised the Buddha with these two stanzas:

Great hero, I take refuge in you!
Buddha, the greatest among those who walk on two feet.
What you know by means of your wisdom-eye
The gods are unable to understand.
Whether they are past, future or present,
I bow before all the Buddhas.
Thus today taking refuge in the Buddha,
I also pay homage to the Buddhas of the three times.”

This passage is the beginning of the Āśāṅgāsūtra of which two versions exist. The first has a proof: 1) the Sanskrit text found in central Asia and published by H. Hoffmann, Bruchstücke des Āśāṅgāsūtra, Leipzig, 1939, p. 33; 2) the Chinese translation by Fa hiien, entitled P’i cha men’tien sang king, T 1245, p. 217a; 3) the Tibetan translation of the Bhaḥ bhgyur, entitled Kun la rgya bu’u kyi kyi rad yu bu ma yin pa dunes lab pa mdo (cf. Csoma-Fcesso, p. 327). In this version, the sūtra takes place in Śrīvaka in the Jetavana, and Vaiśravāna addresses two stanzas to the Buddha. - The second version has as proof: 1) the Pāli Āśāṅgāsuttavatana of the Dīghanikāya, III, p. 194; 2) the Tibetan translation of the Bhaḥ bhgyur, entitled Lhan la can gho phu brtan gi mdo (cf. Csoma-Fcesso, p. 288). In this second version, the sūtra is located at Rājagṛha on Gedhukāluravatara, and Vaiśravāna does not address any stanza to the Buddha. The extracts given here by the Mppi are taken from the first version. To be convinced of this, a glance at the Sanskrit text published by Hoffmann, I.e., p. 33 is sufficient: evam mayā ērūtaṃ. ekasamayam bhagavāṃ śrīvakaśṭun vīharati ima jetavanem... velīyūnā gūthām bhūtabhūte.
In this sūtra of yours, it is said that the king bows down before the Buddhas of the past (atīta), the future (antarīta) and the present (pratītyapuṇna) and that he takes refuge in Buddha Śākyamuni. Thus we know that, in the present, there Buddhas other [than Śākyamuni]. If the other Buddhas did not exist, why would the king first bow down before the Buddhas of the three times, then afterwards take refuge specially (pratītya) in Śākyamuni? This king had not yet renounced all desire (avairārga), but he was at the side of Śākyamuni and, as a result of the affection and respect he had for him, he took refuge in him. As for the other Buddhas, he bowed down before them.

4. Place of appearance of the Buddhas

[The disciples of Kātyāyānīputra]. - The Buddha said: "Two Buddhas do not appear simultaneously in the same world (ekaṃsimlokaḥbhūta), just as two cakravartin kings do not appear simultaneously in the same world."

509 Therefore it is wrong that presently there are other Buddhas [than Śākyamuni].

-namāstā te mahāvīra

Instead of indicating the title of the sūtra, the Mppā, citing this passage twice, refers only to the collection, the Dīghaṇkara. The Dīghaṇkara which it uses is not the Pāli Dīghanikāya of the Theravādin-Vibhajyavādin since the Ānāṭālosatatrāna found there does not contain the stanza spoken by Vāśyārama in honor of the Buddha. Neither is it the Dīghaṇkara translated into Chinese about 412-413 by Buddhayāsa under the name TeVang a han (T 1) and which actually belongs to the Dharmaguptakas (cf. the arguments of Watanabe, Przyłęski and Waldschmidt, Brushestīcī budhī. Sūtras, Leipzig, 1932, p. 229); indeed, this collection does not contain the Ānāṭālosatāra. We have noticed several times already that the Mppā, citing 'the Vinaya' without any more precision, almost always is referring to the Chinese text (T 1435), the Sarvaḥvita-viśnu. We may therefore assume that the Dīghaṇkara which is being used here also belongs to the Sarvaḥvita-viśnuschool. The Sarvaḥvita-viśna had a collection of eighteen 'great sūtras' of which the sixth, the Aṭṭa na kiw (in the Pāli language: 'Sūtras of the council of the demonic spirits') is none other than the Ānāṭālosatāra (cf. the Chinese text, T 1435, k. 24, p. 174b; translation in S. Lévi, Sur la récitation primitive des textes bouddhiques, JA, May-June 1915, p. 419). Four of these 'great sūtras' have been found at Chotsho in central Asia, in a small anthology of sūtras ed. by E. Waldschmidt, Brushestīcī budhī. Sūtras, Leipzig, 1932: these are the Mahāasadāna, the Śākyavāna, the Bimbāsāra and the Mahāśāmājīsātāra. This anthology is indisputably of Sarvaḥvita-viśna provenance (cf. Waldschmidt, p. 228).

509 A phrase which the Mppā will return to later, (k. 9, p. 125a) which is found in several sūtras.

a) In Pāli, e.g., in Anūttara, I, p. 27-28: ādhamanum etam bhikkhau asravāslo yathā · acarāmān aṣṭaṣṣajyāmin n’etam phānan vihājī.

b) In Sanskrit, e.g., in Kośyasānyāki, p. 338: ādhamanum asravākkadā yad āpaṇāvīkaranam dvāv tathāgatau lokā atpaṇāvīkaraṇam.

c) In mixed Sanskrit, e.g., in Mahāvastu, III, p. 199: ādhamanum khaṇe etam asravākkām · lokā atpaṇāvīkaraṇam.

We know from the Kośyasānyākā that asravākā is referred to the present and asravākkā to the future. Thus it may be translated: "It is impossible that in the present, the two Tathāgatas appear in the same world without one preceding and the other following."

The phrase appears in many sūtras, e.g., Dhīha, II, p. 225; III, p. 114; Majjhima, III, p. 65; Anūttara, I, p. 27; Milinda, p. 236; Mahāvastu, III, p. 199; TeVang a han, T 1, k. 5, p. 31ka; k. 12, p. 79a; TeCongo a han, T 26, k. 47, p. 724a. - The great [The Mahāyānīnī].

The Buddha means that two Buddhas do not appear simultaneously in the same triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinā (or triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinas' of the trichiliomegachilocosm); he does not say that in the universes of the ten directions (daśāṇāmlokaḥbhūtā) there are not actually [several] Buddhas. Thus, two cakravartin kings do not appear simultaneously in the same caturādhipiṣṭaka (or universe of four continents), for these very powerful beings have no rival in their domain. Consequently, in one caturādhipiṣṭaka there is one single cakravartin only. In the same way, two Buddhas do not appear simultaneously in one triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinā. Here the sūtra puts the Buddhas and the cakravartin kings on the same level. If you believe that there are [other] cakravartin kings in the other caturādhipiṣṭakas, why do you not believe that there are [other] Buddhas in the other triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinās? 510

2. Furthermore, one single Buddha cannot save all beings. If one single Buddha could save all beings, there would be no need for other Buddhas and only one single Buddha would appear. But the qualities of the Buddhas (budhādharmas), who save beings to be converted (vaiśṇaya), persist so as they arise (āṣṭamātra nirābhīyante) like the flame that is extinguished when the candle is used up; indeed, conditioned dharmas (samskāra-dharmas) are transitory (anitya) and empty of self nature (svabhāvabhūtā). Thus, in the present, there must be yet other Buddhas. 511

[The disciples of Kātyāyānīputra]. - It is said in the sūtra that the Buddha appears from age to age after a number of years as immense as the flower of the Ngešo t’an p’o lo (Udumbara) tree which appears once at regular times. 512 If the ten directions were full of Buddhas, the Buddha would appear easily, he could easily be found and we would not say that it is difficult to meet him.

- It is said that two Tathāgatas and two cakravartins do not arise (simultaneously in the same world). According to some, the world in question is a trichiliomegachilocosm if it concerns Tathāgatas, but a universe-of-four-continents if it concerns the cakravartins. According to others, in both cases it is a matter of a universe-of-four-continents." The Kośyasānyākā, p. 338, also mentions this two-fold explanation: "What should be understood by this 'same world'? By 'this same world' one should understand either one single caturādhipiṣṭaka or one single triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinā.

512 The interpretation given here by the Mahāyānīnīs is recorded in the Mahāyānāvibhūtīga, p. 152: tathāgatayoci ca kṛṣṇaviṃśati ... api caturādhipiṣṭaka evety apare. - Tr. : "The [sūtra] says that two Tathāgatas and two cakravartins do not arise (simultaneously in the same world). According to some, the world in question is a trichiliomegachilocosm if it concerns Tathāgatas, but a universe-of-four-continents if it concerns the cakravartins. According to others, in both cases it is a matter of a universe-of-four-continents." The Kośyasānyākā, p. 338, also mentions this two-fold explanation: "What should be understood by this 'same world'? By 'this same world' one should understand either one single caturādhipiṣṭaka or one single triśiṁhramahābhūtadaksinā."

511 In several places (p. 272-273, 284, 328-329), the Sangrāhā shows how there must be one and many Buddhas at the same time.

512 The post-canonical texts repeat ad nauseam that the appearance of a Buddha is as rare as the appearance of a flower on the Udumbara tree (Ficus religiosa) which bears fruit but does not have visible flowers: - Lalitavistara, p. 105: tadvātād udumbarapāpasam ... loka atpaṇāvīyante. Tr. "Just as in the Udumbara flower very rarely appears in the world, in the same way very rarely, in the course of many nayutas of kotis of kalpas, do the Buddha Bhagavats appear in the world." - Sūkhāvītāvīya, v. 2: tadādutādudumbara-apatāmād loka ... sudurlabhāḥ prādūravītā. Tr. "Just as, in the world, the appearance of the
[The Mahāyānists]. - No! It is in one single mahāsāhasralokadhātu that the Buddha usually appears after an immense number of years. It is not a question of the ten directions. Because sinners do not know how to honor him and do not seek the Path (mārga), we say that the Buddha appears from age to age after an immense number of years. Moreover, as punishment for their sins (āpatti), these beings fall into the evil destinies (durgati) where, for innumerable kalpas, they do not even hear the name of Buddha pronounced and still less see one. Due to these people, the appearance of the Buddha is said to be rare.

[The disciples of Kātyāyanaputra]. - If there really are numerous Buddhas and bodhisattvas in the ten directions, why do they not come to save all beings from sin (āpatti) and suffering (dukkha)?

Udumbura flowers are very rare, in the same way the appearance of the Tathāgatas who desire the interest, who desire the good, who are full of compassion, is very rare." Suddhārmapundarīkā, p. 39: tādayatpūpi śūnā udumburapuṣpadam ... dharmaśaśānasūta kathayati. Tr. "Just as the Udumbura flower appears only at certain times and in certain places, so are the times and places rare where the Tathāgata teaches the Dharma." - Sūtraśānti, tr. Huber, p. 396. "The Buddha is like the Udumbura flower which is very hard to find." - The Mppi will return twice to this comparison at k. 9, p. 125c.

By glancing at these post-canonical and late works, many other examples of this comparison may be found. On the other hand, it does not occur in the Pāli sutta. Moreover, the Mppi is explicit: "It is said, in the sūtra, that the Buddha appears from age to age like the Udumbura flower." Having found nothing comparable in the Pāli canon, I [Lamotte] have turned my search towards the fragments of Sanskrit sūtras discovered in central Asia where the Sarvāstivādin influence was dominant. Here the comparison in question has been found in a fragment of the Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, published by E. Waldschmidt, in his Beiträge zur Textgeschichte des Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, Nachrichten v. d. gesell. der Wissens. zu Göttingen, Philol. Hist. Klasse, Band II, Nr. 3, 1939, p. 58 as note. In the Pāli Mahāparinirvānasuttaṃ (Dīgha, II, p. 155-156), the last moments of the Buddha are described in the following way: The Buddha asked the monks if they have any doubts concerning the Buddha, the Dharma and the Samgha; on Ānanda's negative reply, he answered: Now, O monks, I have just this to say: All that is composite will decay; work tirelessly. These were the last words of the Tathāgata. - But the fragment of the Mahāparinirvānasūtra in Sanskrit is more detailed. Having reported the negative response of Ānanda, the text continues: asta bhagavat uttarāṇaṅgam ekānte viśeyā ... satra tathāgatyasya paścimā vācā. Tr. "Then the Bhagavat lifted his undergarm on one side and said to the monks: Look, O monks, at the body of the Tathāgata. Look well, O monks, at the body of the Tathāgata. Why? The Tathāgatas, saints, the perfectly enlightened ones, are as rarely seen as an Udumbura flower. Well then, O monks, be tranquil! Everything compounded is perishable. Those were the last words of the Tathāgata." The Mppi is therefore quite right when it tells us that the comparison with the Udumbura flower occurs "in a sūtra". As E. Waldschmidt comments, it also occurs in the Chinese versions of the Mahāparinirvānasūtra:

T 1, k. 4, p. 20b: "The Tathāgatas appear in the world from age to age like the Udumbura flower which appears once in an epoch."

T 6, k. 2, p. 188b: "Usually it is difficult to meet a Buddha. There is on earth an Udumbura tree which does not flower but which bears fruit; if it produces a flower, then there is a Buddha in the world."

T 5, k. 2, p. 172c: "In Jambudvipa there is a venerable king of the trees called Udumbura; it has fruits but no flowers. When it has flowers, then there is a Buddha in the world."

Previously we have seen that the flower of the Udumbura that grew north of Lake Mundākāṇṭī blossomed at the same time as the Buddha Śākyamuni and died at the same time he did.

[The Mahāyānists]. - These beings [have accumulated] faults (āpatti) and very serious taints (mala) for innumerable asaṃkhyaśakalpas. Although they have accrued all sorts of other merits (puṇya), they do not possess the qualities (puṇya) required to see a Buddha. Thus they do not see any. Some stanzas say:

When the reward for merits is far off,
When sins (āpatti) are not erased,
For that time, one cannot see
The Bhadanta, the man endowed with power.
Among the ārya bhadanta (i.e., the Buddhas)
Their intentions are unchangeable:
Out of loving kindness (maitrī) and compassion (anukampā) for all men,
They want to save them at all times.
But it is necessary that the merits (puṇya) of beings be ripe,
That their wisdom (prajñā) and their faculties (indriya) be keen,
That they thus fulfill the conditions of salvation
In order they may then attain deliverance.
In the same way that the great rāga king
Makes the rain fall in accordance with wishes,
So it is in accordance with his former actions, sins or merits
That each man is recompensed

[The disciples of Kātyāyanaputra]: [According to you], the Buddha is able to save men full of merits (puṇya) and endowed with wisdom (prajñā) but does not save men deprived of merits and wisdom. If that is so, men full of merits and endowed with wisdom do not derive their salvation from the Buddha.

[The Mahāyānists]: These merits and this wisdom do indeed derive their origin from the Buddha. If the Buddha did not appear in the world, the bodhisattvas would teach as Path (mārga) the ten good causes (dakśinaśāntasāna), 513 the four limitless ones (catvāry apramāṇāni) 514 and the various causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) that assure the retribution of sins and merits (āpatti) in the course of rebirths (punarbhava). If there were no Bodhisattva, this is the admonition found in all kinds of sūtras:

"The person who practices this doctrine carries out meritorious actions."

513 The ten wholesome paths of action (kṣīdalakarṇapatha) will be described below, k. 8, p. 120b.

514 Loving kindness (maitrī), compassion (karunā), joy (mudrī) and equanimity (upekṣā). See bibliography in Saṃgraha p. 52.
CHAPTER IX: THE MAHĀSATTVAS

The Sūtra says: Mahāsattva. What is a mahāsattva?516

Answer. - 1. Mahā means great, satva means being or bravery. The person who is able to accomplish a great work without regretting or turning back in his bravery is called mahāsattva.

2. Moreover, he is called mahāsattva because he is the chief of many beings.

3. Furthermore, he is called mahāsattva because he feels great loving kindness (mahāmaitri) and great compassion (mahākaruṇā) for many beings; he establishes them (avasthāpayati) in the Greater Vehicle, he travels the great Path (mahādṛṣṭa) and attains a very high place.

4. Furthermore, he is called mahāsattva because he is endowed (samamāyata) with the marks of the Great Man (mahāpurasalakṣaṇa).

The characteristics (lakṣaṇa) of the mahāsattva are described in the Tsun fo ke (Buddhastotragathā):

Only the Buddha is the unique man, the foremost,
Father and mother of the threefold world, the omniscient one,
Among all beings he has no peer,
Honour to the Bhagavat who is unequaled!
Am ong all beings he has no peer,
Only the Buddha is the unique man, the foremost,
Homage to the Bhagavat who is unequaled!
Common people practice loving kindness in their own personal interest.
They seek a reward by making gifts.

[94b]The Buddha, in his great loving kindness, has no such goal.

He is as beneficent towards his enemies as towards his friends.

5. Furthermore, he is called mahāsattva because he must preach the Dharma and destroy the great wrong views (māyāyātā) and the afflictions (kleśa), such as great craving (mahātṛṣṇa), pride (abhīmāna), great attachment to the self (ātmaśeyha), etc., in all others as well as in himself.

6. Finally, like the great ocean (mahāsamudra), beings (sattva) are without beginning and without end (apāvṛtāmābhyāvacaranā). A skillful teacher of arithmetical (gaṇanākārya) who would keep track for numberless years would not reach the end of them. This is what the Buddha said to the bodhisattva Wou tsio yi (Aksayamati): "If all the universes (lokadhātu) of the ten directions to the ends of space (ākāśa) formed a single body of water, and innumerable and incalculable beings came, each with a hair, and took away one drop of it, there would still remain an incalculable number of beings. If by thus removing a drop on the end of a hair they succeeded in completely emptying this great body of water, the number of beings would still not be exhausted. This is why the number of beings is limitless (ananta), immense (aprataśca), innumerable (asamabhilaya) and inconceivable (acintya). The bodhisattva wishes to save them all, free them all from suffering and establish them all in the happiness of unconditional safety (asamkṣerayogakṣeramsakṣa). He is called mahasattva because he has made this great resolution to save these numerous beings.

515 Aṅguttara, I, p. 87: Dee 'me bhikkhuno paccayā sammādītihiyā yamiso ca manisākāro. - Cited also in Kolāvyālīkā, p. 188 and Samgraha, p. 65. - The Nettipakaraṇa, p. 8, explains that the wisdom coming from meditation (bhāvanāyaṇī paññā) is the knowledge (dūṣa) produced parato ca ghnena paccattasamuttītena ca yonisomanaskāreṇa.

Thus, Ngeu čhi na yeou p'o yi (Āśā, the upśikā) 519 said to the bodhisattva Siu tu na (Sudhana) in the Pon k'o tsan yi king (Acintyaśrīta).

517 That the number of beings is infinite (sattakāya ananta) is an old teaching. In his note on Le Buddha éternel, Siddhi, p. 807-808, Le Vallée Poussin has brought together a few references:

Kośa, III, p. 10: Even if no new being were to appear, even if innumerable Buddha came to make innumerable beings attain nirvāṇa, the beings of the innumerable universes would never be exhausted.

Mahāvīra, p. 10: But, Śākyamuni, if so many Buddhas exist and a single one leads an infinite number of creatures to nirvāṇa, soon they would lead all beings there.

Kāśyapa answers by means of the immense number of prthagjana which exist following the statement of the Buddha.

Cheou tsang loun, T 1657, p. 305b: Each of the Bhagavata who appear in the world lead an incalculable number of beings to nirvāṇa. Nevertheless, beings are not exhausted because they are infinite, like space. This is the teaching of the bodhisattva Vasubandhu.

518 The name of this upśikā, Āśā 'Hope' in the original Sanskrit, is transliterated in a bizarre fashion in all the Chinese translations. There is Ngeu čhi na (85 and 11; 135 and 2; 163 and 4) in the Mppś, k. 4, p. 94b14: - Heou čhi (9 and 4; 64 and 8) in T 278, k. 47, p.697c7, and in T 279, k. 63, p. 342c21-22. - Yi čhi na (9 and 4; 135 and 2; 163 and 4) in T 293, k. 7, p. 693b21.

Sudhana was addressed by Śūraṇavajra in the following words:

a. Gaudarāja, p. 99: gaecho kalapatøheoch ... bodhisattvaaravāydayā skitayayam. - Go then, O son of noble family! Here in the Dakhan there is a region called Samudra-vatīdi; there is a park called Samanatavyā, east of the city of Mahāprabha; there dwells the Buddhist laywoman, Āśā, the wife of prince Suprabha. Go and find her and ask her how the bodhisattva should exert himself in the practice of the bodhisattva.

Instead of Samudra-vatīdi, Mita, Nep. Budd. Lit., p. 91, reads Samudravelatı 'Shore of the Ocean'.

b. T 278, k. 47, p. 697c: Here in the Dakhan, there is a region called Hai teh'kou (85 and 7; 85 and 12: 'Flow of the Ocean'), where there is a park (nuyāna) called Pon tschoung yen (Samanatavyā); it is there that the upśikā called Heou čhi (9 and 8; Āśā) lives. Go and find her and ask her, etc.

c. T 293, k. 7, p. 693b: Go south from here. You will come to the region of Hai teh'kou (85 and 7; 85 and 12: 'Flow of the Ocean'). It has a large city called Tsoum man kousung (41 and 10; 85 and 10 and 4) Mahāprabha. That city has a king called Miao yoon kousung (38 and 4; 31 and 10; 4; 10 Suprabha). East of this city there is a park called Pon tschoung yen (Samanatavyā). The king has a wife called Yi čhi na (9 and 4; 135 and 2; 163 and 4; Āśā); she is an upśikā, she lives in this forest and is engaged in the practices of a bodhisattva. Go there and find her and ask her, etc.

519 Acintyaśrīta, i.e., the Gaudarājāśrīti, a section of the Avatamsaka. The passage quoted here occurs: i) in the Sanskrit text of the Gaudarāja, Ed. D. T. Suzuki-H. Idzumi, Kyoto, 1934-1936, p. 195-110; ii) in the version by Buddhachara, T 278, k. 47, p. 698c25 sq.; iii) in the version by Śūraṇa, T 279, k. 64, p. 344b sq.; iv) in the version by Buddhabhada, T 278, k. 47, p. 698c25 sq.}

“The bodhisattva-mahāsattvas do not produce the thought of supreme perfect enlightenment to save just one man alone (na kha śaktisamāhāsanātyatā bodhisattvamānā mahāsattvamānām samyaksambodhau cito samaptaye), nor to save just two, three, etc., up to ten. Nor to save just 100 (pu samatā), 1,000 (tisam samatā), 10,000 (ṇaṃ samatā), 100,000 (kuśa samatā), 1,000,000 (kuśa samatā), 10,000,000 (sūtra samatā), 10,000,000,000 (hem samatā), 1,000,000,000,000 (pu samatā), 1,000,000,000,000,000 (pu samatā), 1,000,000,000,000,000,000 (pu samatā), 1,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 (pu samatā) and up to 121 zeros.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi just to save a number of beings equal to that of the atoms (paramāṇa) contained in one country, or in two or three up to ten, or one hundred, a thousand, ten thousand, one koti, one ayuta, one nayuta up to anabhidhipyānabhidhipa countries.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi just to save a number of beings equal to that of the atoms contained in Jambudvīpa, or in Godāna, Uttarakuru and Pūrvadvīpa.

[95a] They do not produce the thought of bodhi just to save the number of beings equal to that of the atoms contained in one sāhasra-citdika-lokadhātu (small chilicosm), or in one dvīshāsa-madhya-lokadhātu (dichilicosm, medium universe), or in one triśāhasra-mahādhāsa-lokadhāmu (trichilicosm, large universe), or in two, three, up to ten, a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand, one koti, one ayuta, one nayuta and up to anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of triśāhasramahāshāsa-lokadhātu.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi just to serve and honor (puṣpapathamānam) just one Buddha, or a number of Buddhās equal to that of the number of atoms contained in one country, or even a number of Buddhās equal to that of the atoms contained in anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of triśāhasramahāshāsa-lokadhātu.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to purify just one single buddhafied (ekabuddhakṣeraparīśodhana) or even a number of buddhakśetras equal to that of the number of atoms contained in anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of triśāhasramahāshāsa-lokadhātu.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to assure just one single teaching of the Buddha (ekatathāgatasānasamāhāranā) or even a number of tathāgatasānas equal to that of the atoms contained in anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of tris....

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to prevent the cessation of one single lineage of Buddhās (ekabuddhaśvamīniśuddhiśvarī), or even a number of buddhāvannā equal to that of the atoms contained in anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of tris....

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to know in detail just one single vow of Buddha (ekabuddharpadhināvihārañāsīkāparipāra), or even a number of buddhāvannā equal to that of the atoms contained in anabhidhipyānabhidhipā number of tris....

Of Prañā, T 293, k. 8, p. 695c1 sq. The quotation of the Mppś does not reproduce any of these four versions exactly. The long list of numbers has been abridged in the three Chinese versions; that of the Sanskrit text does not correspond exactly with the list found here. The Mppś thus uses a special version of the Gaudarājā which has not come down to us.
They do not produce the thought of bodhi to adorn one single buddhafield (ekabuddhakṣetravyūhāvataraṇa), or even a number of buddhakṣetra equal to that of the atoms contained in an anahārāvipāyāḥālaya of tris....

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to know in detail one single Buddha assembly (ekabuddharparsanmandalavibhaktavyātaraṇa), or even a number of buddharparsananda equal to that of the atoms contained in an anahārāvipāyāḥālaya of tris....

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to remember one single preaching of the Buddha (ekabuddhaṇaṃaṃgadharmaṃkarmanāharāṇa), or even a number of buddhaṃgadharmaṃkarmaś equal to that of the atoms contained in an anahārāvipāyāḥālaya of tris....

They do not produce the thought of bodhi to cognize (avataraṇa) the thoughts of one single being (ekasattvatacita), or the faculties of one single being (ekasattvamāya), or the succession of the cosmic periods (kalaviparānya) in one single trisharasmālaḥthasaralokaḥdhatu.

They do not produce the thought of bodhi in order to destroy the afflictions of just one single being (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāra), or even a number of beings (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāraś) equal to the atoms contained in an anahārāvipāyāḥālaya of tris....

But here are the aspirations (pranidhiṇā) of the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas. The bodhisattvas produce the thought of bodhi and realize supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasaṃyaksa) [for the following ten purposes]:

1) in order to convert the beings of the ten directions (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāra) into the ten directions

2) in order to serve and honor all the Buddhas of the ten directions (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāravartanā),

3) in order to firmly purify all the buddha fields of the ten directions (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāra),

4) In order to retain firmly all the teachings of the Buddhas of the ten directions (anavatāsaṃsattvaparipāra),

5) in order to know in detail all the buddha fields (sarvasattvaṃaṃgadhya),

6) in order to know in depth all the buddha assemblies (sarvasattvaparipāra),

7) in order to know in detail the minds of all beings (sarvasattvasthānamāyātā),

8) in order to cut through the afflictions of all beings (sarvasattvasthānamāyātā),

9) in order to know in depth the faculties of all beings (sarvasattvasthānamāyātā).

These headings are the main ones (pramukhā); they summarize the hundred, thousand, ten thousand, ten millions of asamkhyeya rules relating to the Path (mārgadharmaparyāya) which the bodhisattva must know and penetrate. By means of this wisdom (prajñāḥ) and knowledge (jñāna) the bodhisattvas adorn all the buddha fields."

Āśā [also] said: "O son of noble family (kalaputra), thus would I like to have a universe (lokadhātu) where all beings are completely pure (vīśuddha) and where all the afflictions (kleśa) are cut through (sannuṣcchitām)."

Sudhana asked: "What is deliverance (vimokṣa)?"

Āśa answered: "It is the banner of freedom-from-grief and of safety (aṅkoyakṣaṃkaṇhāya). I know this single gate of deliverance (ekavimokṣa), but I am unable to understand these bodhisattvas; their great mind is like the ocean for they are in possession of all the buddhadharmas (ete bodhisattvāḥ sādgaravasamacittattāḥ sarvabuddhādharmanāmsrameratāhanātāyāḥ); their mind is unshakeable like Mount Sumeru (merukalpaścittattāḥ); they are like the king of physicians for they are able to cure all the sicknesses of the afflictions (bhūsājarajopāpanāḥ sarvakleśavahādhāpramokṣaṇātāyāḥ); they are like the sun for they are able to scatter all the shadows [of ignorance] (adityakalpaḥ sarvādhiṃdhārāvidhāhanātāyāḥ); they are like the earth for they are able to support all beings (dhārtvātmāḥ sarvasattvātīrārayapratisṛṣṭihābhāhātātāyāḥ); they are like the wind for they can strengthen all beings (mārutasadārāḥ sarvajagadakarhāhanātāyāḥ); they are like fire for they can burn away the afflictions of all the heretics (tejokalpaḥ sarvatīrthikleśadāhanātāyāḥ); they are like cloud for they can make the rain of all the Dharma (meghopamād dharmavarāpavaranātāyāḥ) fall; they are like the moon for the rays of their merits light up everything (candropamāḥ punyavarnamālāḥ sarvakālanātātāyāḥ); they are like Sakravedendra for they protect all beings (sakropamāḥ sarvajagadātāśrīpattipanātāyāḥ). The practices of the bodhisattvas (bodhisattvācārya) are very profound (gambhiṛa); how could I be known them all?"

---

520 Monier-Williams: avataraṇa = descending, translation.
CHAPTER X: THE QUALITIES OF THE BODHISATTVAS

Text of the sūtra commented on in this chapter (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 4; Śatāsthasūtra, p. 4-5):

Bodhisattvaṁ tāḍāhām sarvāṁ (1) dhāraṇīpratilābhaṁ (2) samādhi-pratilābhaṁ śānti-nimittāntarpitihoccariḥ (3) samatākṣaṇāntarpitihoccariḥ (4) asamgādhārāntarpitihoccariḥ (5) paścādhījihocarī (6) āgyayavacāriḥ (7) akṣudārī (8) apagata-lābhāyaiścittaiḥ (9) nirūmāsādhrāmarājaiḥ (10) gambhīrāhṛdāmsūntāntarpitaiḥ (11) vaśārādhāyāścittaiḥ (12) mārakarnamsamātikāntaiḥ (13) karmaśvarasaprapratiranārdhāhaṁ (14) pratītyasaumapanaśaddhanāṃśadānaiṣakaiḥ (15) asamkhyeyakulaprapratidhānāsamsārdhāhaṁ (16) sūmisakhaṁ pārābhīlāpābhī (17) mahāparysammādyai vaitārādyasamanvīgataiḥ (18) antanakaṣṭapattīdharmānirādiṣanāsākhaiḥ.

He was accompanied by bodhisattvas who possessed the dhāraṇīs, who composed in the concentrations of emptiness, signlessness and wishlessness, who possessed the equalities and the patience. (Survair dhāraṇīpratilābhaṁ śānti-nimittāntarpitihoccariḥ).

Śāstra: Question. - Why does the sūtra then praise the bodhisatta-mahāsattvas by means of these three points?

Answer. - 1. In order to emphasize the real qualities (guṇa) of the bodhisattvas, the sūtra must praise them. It praises that in which one ought to have faith in order that one may believe in it. It praises the bodhisattvas because all beings do not believe in their profound (gamabhūta) and pure (veśuddha) qualities.

2. Furthermore, in the beginning the sūtra mentioned the bodhisatta-mahāsattvas because they possessed the dhāraṇīs, the concentrations (samādhi), the patience (ksūnti) and the other qualities (guṇa).

Question. - We understand the reason for the order followed here, but what is it that is called a dhāraṇī?

Answer. - 1. In the Ts’i language, dhāraṇī means 'capable of holding' (dhāraṇa) or 'capable of preventing' (vidhāraṇa).

a. 'Capable of holding': Joining all sorts of good dhāmas (kusala-dhāma), dhāraṇī 'holds' them (dhāraṇī) so that they are not dispersed or lost.²⁵³ It is like a good vessel (bhadājana) filled with water from which the water does not leak out.

b. 'Capable of preventing': Detesting the roots of evil (aksai-lāmaita), dhāraṇī prevents them (vidhāraṇī) from arising. It prevents the committing of evil by those who would want to commit it. That is what is called dhārāni.

This dhāraṇī is associated with mind (cittasaṃprayaśa) or dissociated from mind (cittaviprayaśa), impure (śārava) or pure (andarava), nonmaterial (ārūpya), invisible (ādārāma), not offering resistance (apratītya), it is contained in one element (dhiṭa), one basis of consciousness (dhyāta) and one aggregate (skandha), namely, dharmaḥ, dharma-dhātā, dharma-dhātana and sansārakāśakaḥ.²⁵⁴

Nine knowledges (jñāna) cognize it [Note: it is outside the knowledge of destruction of the afflictions (kṣaya-jñāna)]. One single consciousness (viśuddha) is aware of it [Note: the mental consciousness (manoviśuddha)]. According to the Abhidharma, this is the definition of dhāraṇī.²⁵⁵

2. Furthermore, the bodhisattva who possesses dhāraṇī, (smitībala) is able to retain and not forget all the teachings that he has heard (śrāvatāna) by the power of his memory.²⁵⁶

3. Furthermore, dhāraṇī accompanies the bodhisattva always. Like a chronic fever, it never leaves him; like an agnī, it always follows him. It is like the good and the bad disciplines (śravanta).

Question. - How many types of dhāraṇī are there?

Answer. - There are many types.²⁵⁷

²⁵² This is the usual translation for āpāramitā. Monier-Williams gives for pravṛttiḥ : 'directed towards, committed, resolved, determined, fixed upon, intent upon, one who has his thoughts concentrated on one point', etc.

²⁵⁴ For these categories, see Kośa, I, p. 50.

²⁵⁵ Among the various types of dhāraṇī, we may note:

b. Śrūta-, vibajjālāna- and phujapraśaadāharānas fully defined here and to which the Mppī will return at k. 28, p. 268.

d. The twelve dhāraṇīs of the Mahāyūtpatti, no. 747-758.
1) The first is called śrutadharadhāraṇī. The person who possesses this dhāraṇī never forgets the words and the teachings that he has heard with his ears.

2) There is also the vibhajyajñadhāraṇī. The person who possesses it knows in detail the qualities of beings, how tall they are or how short they are, how beautiful or how ugly they are. A stanza says:

- Among elephants, horses and metals
- Among wood, stones and garments,
- Among men, women, and waters,
- There are all kinds of differences.

Individuals [of the same species] bear the same name
But their values differ.

The person who possesses this dhāraṇī
Can always distinguish them.

3) Finally there is the ghoṣapravesadhāraṇī. The bodhisattva who possesses it hears all kinds of words and neither rejoices nor is irritated by sounds. For kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gangānadivalukopamakalpa) all beings may slander him and abuse him, but he would feel no irritation.

Question. - The impurities (ātivaya) are not destroyed (kśīna) in the bodhisattva: how then can he withstand this evil treatment for kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges?

Answer. – 1) We have said that here it is a matter of the bodhisattva who has acquired this dhāraṇī [and not of all bodhisattvas indiscriminately].

2) Furthermore, although he has not destroyed his impurities, the bodhisattva possesses great wisdom (mālahāna), keen faculties (dīṣṇendriya) and is able to be attentive (manasikāra). He chases away any angry thought by saying to himself: "If my ear (śrōtendriya) did not perceive sounds at such a great distance, to whom would these insults reach?"

3) Moreover, if he hears insults, he passes them by. Who would be irritated by what he does not distinguish? It is the ordinary person (prthajana) who is attached to the self and who develops hatred (āveṣa) by distinguishing "yes" and "no".

4) Moreover, the person who knows that words perish as soon as they arise (jitāmaṁrā nirādyante) and that 'before' and 'after' are not joined, feels no anger. He knows that dharmas have no inner guide; [under these conditions] who insults, who is irritated?

The person who hears various words from different sides [considers] some as good and others as bad. But if good and bad are indeterminate (anityata), one does not get irritated when one is insulted. The person who knows that words are indeterminate (i.e., neither good nor bad) feels neither anger nor joy. If his friends insult him, he is not angry insulted though he may be; but if his enemies slander him, he feels animosity. If he has to undergo wind or rain, he goes back into his house or takes his coat; if the ground is thorny, he puts on his shoes; if it is very cold, he makes a fire; when it is hot, he looks for water. He looks for a remedy (pratikāra) for all these troubles without getting irritated about them. [The bodhisattva] acts in the same way with regard to insults and nastiness. It is only by loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) that he puts an end to them; he never experiences anger.

5) Furthermore, the bodhisattva knows that all dharmas are non-arising (anatmanna), unceasing (anuddhāti) and empty of self-nature (svabhāvavātya). If anyone hates him, insults him, strikes or kills him, he considers that as a dream (svapna), as a [magical] metamorphosis (nirāmāna): "Who then gets angry, who is insulting?"

6) Finally, if, during kalpas as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gangānadivalukopamakalpa), beings praise him and offer him robes (cīvara), food (dāhāra), flowers (puṣpa), perfumes (gandha) and necklaces (kēyūra), the bodhisattva who has acquired this dhāraṇī (read t'o lo ni instead of jen) feels no emotion, no joy, no attachment.

Question. - Now we know all the reasons why the bodhisattva does not get angry [when he is insulted], but we do not know why he feels no joy (muditā) when his qualities (guṇa) are praised.

Answer. – 1) The bodhisattva knows that all offerings and all tributes (sakāra) are transitory (anitya). If today there are reasons why people come to praise and honor him, tomorrow there will be others who will expose him to hatred, blows and death. This is why he is not joyful [when he is praised].

2) Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: "They come to praise and honor me because I have qualities (guṇa) and wisdom (prajñā). It is my qualities and not my person that they praise. Why should I be joyful?"

3) Furthermore, "If this person praises my activity (kārīra) and my qualities (guṇa), it is out of desire for a reward (phalavipaśā) rather than out of admiration for me. Thus, when a man plants seed-grain, waters it and cultivates it, the earth feels no joy."

4) "If someone honors me and I welcome him joyfully, my merit (punya) will be slight and his also will be of little value." This is why he does not rejoice.

5) Finally, the bodhisattva considers all dharmas as a dream (svapna) or an echo (pratīrūkṣa). He asks himself: "Who is praising me? Who is rejoicing? I have not found deliverance (vimokṣa) in the threefold world (trīdīnāka); my impurities (ātivaya) have not been destroyed (kśīna); I have not attained Buddhahood. Why should I rejoice in obtaining praise? If anyone should rejoice, it is only the Buddha, the unique man (eka pudgala), for all qualities (guṇa) are perfected (paripūrṇa) in him." This is why the bodhisattva feels no joy in receiving all sorts of praise, tribute or offerings.

These are the characteristics of the ghoṣapravesadhāraṇī. There are yet other dhāraṇīs:

Tāi me t'o lo ni (śantiḥāraṇī), Wou pien t'o lo ni (anantāhāraṇī), Souei ti kouan t'o lo ni (bhūmyanupaiānāhāraṇī), Wei t'o lo ni (anubhāvadhāraṇī), Houa yen t'o lo ni (padmavyādhāraṇī), Yin tung t'o lo ni (gaganasūrisuddiḥāraṇī), Hiu k'ong tung t'o lo ni (gaganagarbhāhāraṇī), Hai tung t'o lo ni (śāgaragarbhāhāraṇī), Fen pie tchou fa t'i t'o lo ni
2. SAMĀDHIGOCARA

The three concentrations (samādhis) are those of emptiness (śūnyatā), wishlessness (aprāṇihita) and signlessness (ānīmita).527

1) Some say: Śūnyatā is seeing that the five aggregates (skandha) are not the self (anūtman) and do not belong to the self (anūtman). - Aprāṇihita is, within the śūnyatāsamādhi, not producing the three poisons (trīvaśa, namely, passion, aggression and ignorance) in the future.528 Anīmita has for its object (ālambana) the dharma free of the following ten marks (daśānimittarahita): a) the five dusts (rajas, namely, color, sound, smell, taste and touch); b) male and female; c) arising (upūṣa), continuance (sīhi), cessation (bhāvāga).

2) Others say: Śūnyatāsaṃdhi is the concentration in which one knows that the true nature of all dharmas (sarvadharmasatyavakṣaṇa) is absolutely empty (atyaṃtāśūnya). - When one knows this emptiness, there is aprāṇiṣṭhāna.

What is aprāṇiṣṭhāna? It is not considering dharmas to be empty (śūnya) or non-empty (aśūnya), existent (sat) or non-existent (asaṣ), etc. The Buddha said in a stanza from the Fa ku (Dharmapada):

When one considers existence, one is afraid;
When one considers non-existence, one is also afraid.
This is why this should not be attached to existence.

526 Except for the anumāna and the padma-vāja-sādhāraṇi cited in the Mahāyāna-paṭṭim, no. 751 and 753, the restoration of the Sanskrit terms is conjectural.
527 The three samādhis are not always cited in the same order or defined in the same way:
   ii) Śūnyatāsaṃdhi, aprāṇihitasaṃdhi, ānīmitasaṃdhi in most of the Sanskrit and Chinese sources: T'ang-t'ang a han, T 1 (sa. 9), k. 8, p. 50b, Tseng yī p. han, T 125, k. 16, p. 63b, Pī l' p'o cha. T 1545, k. 104, p. 538a, Śūrañjana, XVIII, 77, ed. Lō, p. 148; Bodhi, bhūmi, p. 276, which has good definitions.
528 In śūnyatāsaṃdhi, one knows that whatever is conditioned (sārūpya) is not the self, does not belong to the self, that it is empty (śūnya) without self nature (svabhāva) or virahita. As a result, in the next samādhi, the aprāṇihitasaṃdhi, one does not feel either prāṇiṣṭhāna or aprāṇiṣṭhāna towards them or, in the words of the Māṇḍ, one does not feel passion (rṣaṇa), aggression (ādvesa) or ignorance (moha) towards them. Aprāṇihita thus consists not of producing the three poisons towards future conditioned phenomena. Cf. the definition of Bodhi, bhūmi, p. 276: aprāṇiṣṭhānasamādhi katamah īka bodhiṣṭhāna... ity ucyate.

Or to non-existence.
This is apraṇiṣṭhānasamādhi.
What is ānīmitasaṃdhi? All dharmas are free of marks (anūtman). Not accepting them, not adhering to them is ānīmitasaṃdhi. A stanza says:

When words (vāda) are stopped
The functioning of the mind (cittaprayāti) also ceases.
This is non-arising (anupūṣa), non-cessation (anirodha)

The similarity with nirvāṇa.
3) Furthermore, śūnyatā is the eighteen emptinesses (asāṇadalaiśūnyatā).529 Apraṇiṣṭhānasamādhi is not searching for any kind of bhāva or existence. (Note: the five gati, apapattihāva, pārvakālaḥ, maraṇaḥ, antarāḥ, karmabhāva; cf. Kūd., III, p. 117). Ānīmitasaṃdhi is suppressing all the marks of the dharmas (sarvadharmaranīmīti) and not paying attention to them (amanuṣkāra).

Question. - There are dhīyas and attainments (samāpatti) of all sorts. Why talk here only about these three concentrations (samādhis)?

Answer. - In these three samādhis, the attentiveness (manavākāra) is close to nirvāṇa; as a result, the mind of the person is neither too high nor too low, but evened out (mūla). This is why we speak here only of these three samādhis.

As for the four dhyānas (samādhis), they are called samāpattis, they are also called the three samādhis, for these three samādhis are the true samādhis. The other samāpattis also have the name 'samāpatti'. Moreover, except for the four principal dhīyas (mauladhyāna), the concentrations from the adāgama up to the bhīvāgara [97a] are called samāpatti and also samādhi, but not dhīya. As for the four dhīyas, they are called samāpatti or also dhīya or also samādhi. The other concentrations as well are called samāpatti or also samādhi: for example, the four apruṣṭa-pāṭhas, the four pratiṣāma-pāṭhas, the six abhiṣiṣṭas, the eight vīyakṣas, the eight abhiṣiṣṭas are the nine anupūṣa-samāpattis, the ten kṣetra-yuktanas and the other samāpattidharmas.

Some say that there are twenty-three kinds of samādhi; others say sixty-five, still others say five hundred. But as the Mahāyāna is great, there are innumerable samādhis, such as:

Pien fa sing chouang yen san mei, Neng tchoa yi te'se san che fa to san mei, Pou fen pie tche kouan fa sing ti san mei, Jou wou ti fo fa san mei, Jou hieu k'ong wou ti wou pien chiao san mei, Jou lai ti houng kouan san mei, Fo wou wei tchouang yen bi p'o'en chen san mei, Fa sing men siuan tsang san mei.

529 List and definition of the 18 śūnyatās in Pālcavimśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 24, 195-198; commentary in Māṇḍ, k. 31, p. 285b-296b.
The bodhisattvas have acquired the equalities (samatā) and the patiences (kṣānti). Further,more, in the Prajñāpāramitā, in the Mo ho yen yi chapter (Mahāyānārtha)350, the 108 samādhis are enumerated as a whole (samsātā: the first is the Hiu k'ong pou tche pou jan san mei (Śūrangaṃasamādhiḥ) and the last is the Hiu k'ong pou tche pou jan san mei (Ākāśagamnavikrutinirupapramādhiḥ). If they were to be enumerated in detail, there are innumerable samādhis. This is why the stūtra says that the bodhisattvas have acquired the concentrations (sāmaṭṭhtrapratilabdha) and course in emptiness, wishlessness and signlessness (śīlāyattrapratihāṭinimittagocara).

Question. - The stūtra says first of all that the bodhisattvas have obtained the concentrations (sāmaṭṭhtrapratilabdha); why does it then say that they course in emptiness, wishlessness and signlessness (śīlāyattrapratihāṭinimittagocara)? [Is that not a tautology?]

Answer. - First the stūtra speaks about samādhi but says nothing about its characteristics. Now it wants to speak about its characteristics and it enumerates emptiness, wishlessness and signlessness. When someone courses in emptiness, wishlessness and signlessness, it can be said that they have acquired the true samādhi (bhātālakṣaṇasamādhi). Some stanzas say:

He who observes the purity of the precepts (śīlavisuddhi)
Is called a true bhikṣu.
He who contemplates emptiness (śīlāyatā)
Has truly obtained the samādhi.
He who demonstrates zeal (vīrya)
Is called a true devotee.
He who has attained nirvāṇa
Is called truly blessed.

3. SAMATĀKŚĀNTIPRATILABDHA

530 This chapter, dedicated to the Meaning of the Mahāyāna and where the 108 samādhis are enumerated, is part of the Pañcavimśati. It is entitled Mo ho yen p'in (Mahāyānaparipāra) in Moksha's version, T 221, chap. XIX, k. 4, p. 22c-24c; - San mei p'in (Samādhīparipāra) in Dharmarākṣa's version T 222, chap. XVI, k. 6, p. 188c-193a; - Wen t'eh'ong (Yinaparipṛcchā) in Kumārajīva's version, T 223, XVIII, k. 5, p. 250a-253b. - A Sanskrit list of the 108 samādhis occurs in the Pañcavimśati, ed. N. Dutt, p. 142-144; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 506-623.

The bodhisattvas have acquired the equalities (samatā) and the patiences (kṣānti).

Question. - What are the equalities and what are the patiences?

Answer. - There are two kinds of equalities (samatā): equality toward beings (sattvasamatā) and equality toward dharmas (dharmanasamātā). There are also two types of patiences (kṣānti), patience toward beings (sattvakṣānti) and patience toward dharmas (dharmanākṣānti). 1) What is sattvasamatā? This is to share one's thoughts (citra), memories (smṛti), affection (anumaya) and benefits (arthakriyā) equally with all beings.

Question. - By the power of loving-kindness (maitri) and compassion (karuṇa) one grants an equal part in one's memories to all beings, but one cannot consider all in the same way. Why?

[97b] The bodhisattva follows the path of truth (satyanārāga), is free of error (viparyāsa) and is in accord with the nature of phenomena (dharmanākṣaṇa). How could he consider the good person and the evil person, the great man and the small man, a human and an animal (tiryuha), as identical (sāna) and equal (sama)? In the evil person there is really an evil nature (ākāśalakṣaṇa); in the good person there is truly a good nature (ākāṣalakṣaṇa); the same for the great man and the small man. The specific nature of the cow (golakṣaṇa) occurs in the cow and that of the horse (āvaiyalakṣaṇa) occurs in the horse. The specific nature of the cow does not occur in the horse and that of the horse does not occur in the cow, for the horse is not the cow. Each being has its own specific nature. Would not the bodhisattva be making a mistake in considering all as identical and equal?

Answer. - If the good nature and the evil nature truly existed, the bodhisattva would be making a mistake [in confusing the good person and the evil person], for he would be misconstruing the nature of dharmas (dharmanākṣaṇa). But phenomena are non-real: the good nature is not real, the evil nature is neither many nor rare. That which is not a human is not an animal. [Among phenomena] there is neither identity (ekatva) nor difference (prakāśa). This is why your objection is not valid. Some stanzas define the nature of dharmas as follows:

Non-arisen (anupattra), non-destroyed (aniruddha),
Unceasing (anacchima), non-eternal (ajāti),
Neither identical (sāna) nor different (sama),
Without coming or going,
Dharmas resulting from causes (pratītyasamutpāna)
Escape from all vain prolixity (prapuñcha).

The Buddha is able to define them;
I pay homage to him.

Furthermore, in regard to beings, [the bodhisattva] is not attached (nābhiniviśate) to a nature (laksana) of any kind of nature; beings are empty of characteristics (laksanatāmya); from this point of view, they are identical (eka), equal (sama), without difference (ananyu). Seeing this is sattvasamātā. The person who maintains an unfettered equality of mind (cittasamātā) toward them enters directly into the absence of regression (avinivartana); he is called samatākṣāntipratilabdha. The bodhisattva who has acquired the equalities and the patience experiences no hatred or anger toward beings. He loves them like a loving mother loves her son. A stanza says:

To consider sounds as echoes (pratīrūpta)

And bodily actions as reflections (pratibhāna);

The person who sees things thus,

How could he not be patient?

This is what is called sattvasamatākṣānti.

2) What is dharmasamatākṣānti? [The bodhisattva] is established in the doctrine of non-duality (advayadharmaparyāya) and the doctrine of the true nature (satyalaksanadāharmaparyāya) in respect to all dharmas, good (kṣīla) or bad (aksīla), impure (dvārava) or pure (androva), conditioned (samikṣyu) or unconditioned (asamikṣyu), etc. Then when he has penetrated deeply into the true nature of dharmas (dharmanāmin satyalaksanam), his patience of mind (cittakṣānti) enters directly into the elimination of controversy (nīrbandha) and the absence of obstacles (andvarāṇa). This is what is called dharmasamatākṣānti. A stanza says:

Dharmas are non-arisen (anuppanna) and non-destroyed (aniruddha),

Neither unborn nor non-destroyed,

Both non-arisen and non-destroyed, neither non-arisen nor non-destroyed,

Both neither non-arisen nor non-destroyed, nor arisen nor destroyed.

[97c] Those who have acquired deliverance (vimoksaprati labdha) [Note: deliverance is the suppression of wrong views] reject all vain prolixity (prapañca). When the path of discourse (vīdamārga) is suppressed (samucchinna), one penetrates deeply into the Buddha's Dharma. The mind is penetrating, free of obstacles (andvarāṇa), immoveable (acala) and non-regressing (avinivartana). This is what is called anupattikādharmaśānti. This is why it is said that the bodhisattvas are samatākṣāntipratilabdha.

4. ASAŅGADHĀRANIPRATILABDA

Śūtra: These bodhisattvas have obtained the dhāraṇī without obstacles (asaṅgadhārani pratilabdha).

Śūtra: Question - The sūtra has already said that the bodhisattvas have obtained the dhāraṇī (dhūraṇi pratilabdha); why does it repeat here that they have obtained the dhāraṇī without obstacles (asaṅgadhārani)?

Answer. – 1) Because the asaṅgadhārani is very important. Just as the samādhī called 'King of Samādhīs' is the most important of all the samādhis in the way that a king is relative to his subjects; just as the 'Deliverance without Obstacles' (asaṅga vimoksya) [Note: this is the deliverance acquired when one reaches Buddhahood] is the most important of all the vimoksas, so the asaṅgadhārani is superior to all the dhāraṇī.

2) Furthermore, the sūtra says first that the bodhisattvas have acquired the dhāraṇī, but we do not know what kind of dhāraṇī. There are small dhāraṇīs such as those obtained by the cakravartin kings, the rṣis, etc.: for example, the śrutadharadhārani, the satyaprabhadhārani, the namahṣaṇālamparītyagdhārani. Other people can likewise possess the lesser dhāraṇīs. This kind. But this asaṅgadhārani cannot be obtained by heretics (tīrthika), śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas and [even] the beginning bodhisattvas (āśākārikābhūta),. Only the bodhisattvas full of immense merit (apravāṇaparānyya), wisdom (prajñā) and great power (mahāphala) are able to possess it. That is why it is spoken of separately here.

3) Finally, these bodhisattvas who have assured their own interest (asaṅgadhārani) have the lesser dhāraṇīs (asamucchinna) identical (adyatparināma). These bodhisattvas have obtained all the five superknowledges (śāstra) as the following stanzas say:

A. What is rddhi or magical power?\(^{[534]}\)

1) There are four kinds of guman or movement:\(^{[535]}\) i) to go by flying like a bird (yastāt laksanā pakti) without encountering any obstacles (śvarāna); ii) to change distance into proximity

\(^{[533]}\) The sources for these abhiññas are numerous. See Rhy's Davids-Stede, s.v. Abhiñña; P' I p'o cha, T 1545.p. 727b; Koša, VII, p. 97-126; Mahāvyutpatti, np. 202-209; Dharmaśāstra, ch. XX; Pañcitāntika, 83-88; Daśabaliśā, p. 34-37; Madh. Āvatara, p. 56 (tr. Lāv., in Mason, 1907, p. 301); Siṣkāsamuccaya, p. 243; Paljikā, p. 428; Śūrīnālakṣra, ed. Lāv., VII, 1,XXI, 48; Bodd. blūni, p. 58; Uttarāntara, p. 148, 180, 199; A' p' ta no tā tā long, T 1665, k. 7, p. 691b; A' p' ta no tā tā long, T 1660, k. 14, p. 759c; - Among the works, we may mention: P. Deméville, La mémoire des existences antérieures, BEFEQ, XXVII, 1927, p. 283-298; L. de La Vallée Poussin, Le Roudhāô et le Abhijñā, 1931, p. 335-342; S. Lindquist, Siddhi and Abhijñā, eine Studie über die klassischen Wunder des Yoga, Uppsala, 1933.

\(^{[534]}\) The main source is the Śūtra of the Rddhyabhūta, the Pāli text of which is in Diḍha, I, p. 78; Majjhima, I, p. 34; Āṭātuttara, III, p. 280; and the Sanskrit text in Pañcatīṃiti, p. 83; Kośāvyākhya, p. 654; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 211-230.
and thus to arrive without going;\(^{537}\) iii) diving and emerging (nimajjanaunmajjana); iv) moving in one moment (ekakṣuṣaṅgamanas).\(^ {538}\)

2) Nirūpā or creation consists of making small what is large, making large what is small, multiplying what is singular and creating all kinds of objects (dravya). The creations of heretics (tīrthika) do not last longer than seven days whereas the mastery of creation (nirūpavasāśi) of the Buddha and his disciples has unlimited duration.

3) The āśrayadāhi or noble magical power consists of purifying unpleasant and impure substances (aprayūtāvīśudhavastu) constituting the six classes of outer objects (bāhūdyutana) by means of a glance: color, sound, etc., or also making pleasant and pure substances (pRAYAṆVIVUṢUDHAVASTU) impure. Only the Buddha has this āśrayaiddhi.\(^ {539}\)

Buddha-bhijñā is the result of the development (bhāvanā) of the four bases of miraculous power (āddhiṣṭana).\(^ {540}\) Having a material object (vipālaṇahana), āddhiṣṭanā and abhiṣṭā are produced successively and cannot be acquired simultaneously.

A. Abhiṣṭā of the divyacakṣus or divine eye. A pure form (vipākapratisāka) derived from the four great elements (catutramahābhūtabhaṭhakhaṇa) that occurs in the eye is called divyacakṣus. It is able to see beings (satva) and substances (dravya) that occur in the six destinies (saṅgaṭṭi) of its own level and of lower levels. The divine eye is never incapable of distinguishing between a nearby (saṃvihakṣaṇa) and a distant (vipākavīṣṭa) form (rūpa), between a coarse (ahāla) and a subtle (āstikā) form. There are two kinds of divyacakṣus, the one that comes from retribution (vipākahalaṅgha) and the one that comes from practice (bhāvanālaṅgha). In so far as it makes up part of the five abhiṣṭās, the divyacakṣus come from practice and not from retribution. Why? Because it is acquired by continual attentiveness (saṭātamanasikāvāra) to all types of lights (āloka). Furthermore, some say that the bodhisattvas who have acquired acquiescence in the doctrine of non-arising (anupattikadharmaṃkāṇi) are not limited to the six destinies (saṅgaṭṭi). It is solely in order to convert beings by virtue of their dharmaṇī that they appear in the ten directions (dasaṭī). In the bodhisattvas of the threefold world (trīdhiṣṭhaḥ) who have not yet attained the dharmaṇī, the divyacakṣus results sometimes from practice and sometimes from retribution.

Question. - The qualities (guna) of the bodhisattvas surpass those of the arhats and the pratyekebuddhas. Why praise their divine eye of lesser quality which is shared with ordinary people (prīhagana) and not praise their eye of wisdom (prajñākakas), their Dharma eye (dharmaṃkakas) or their Buddha eye (budhacakas)?\(^ {541}\)

Answer. - There are three kinds of gods (deva): i) the metaphorical gods (saṃmatideva), ii) the gods by birth (upapattideva), iii) the pure gods (visuddhideva).\(^ {542}\) The cakravartin kings and other mahārājas are called saṃmatideva. The gods of the catumāraka-dakṣyaka heaven up to those of the bhāvagrā are called upapattideva. The Buddhas, the dharmaṇī bodhisattvas, the pratyekebuddhas and the arhats are called visuddhideva. These obtain the divine eye by practice and this is called the divyacakṣusabhiṣṭā. This eye of the Buddhas, the dharmaṇī bodhisattvas and the visuddhideva cannot be acquired by ordinary people (prīhagana) who lack the five abhiṣṭās, nor can it be acquired by the śrāvakas and the pratyekebuddhas. Why? The lesser arhats see a sāhasrāloka-dakṣyā who is intelligent is small, a dvīśaḥsāhasrāloka-dakṣyā if their intellect is great. The higher arhats see a dvīśasaḥsāhasrāloka-dakṣyā if their intellect is small, a triśaḥsāhasrāloka-dakṣyā if their intellect is great. It is the same for the pratyekebuddhas.\(^ {543}\) - Such is the divyacakṣusabhiṣṭā.

C. What is the abhiṣṭā of the dvīyaśrotra, or the divine ear? It is a subtle form (vipākas) derived from the four great material elements (catutramahābhūtabhaṭhakhaṇa) which occurs in the eye and which allows all the [98b] sounds (ākṣaṇa) and words of the gods, men and beings in the three unfortunate destinies [the hells, the pretas and animals] to be heard. How is the dvīyaśrotraabhiṣṭā obtained? It is obtained by practice (bhāvanā), by continually reflecting on all kinds of sounds. Such is the dvīyaśrotraabhiṣṭā.

D. What is the abhiṣṭā of the pūrvanāvinsaṃmuṭṭi, or memory of previous lifetimes? It is the faculty of going back in memory over the course of days, months and years as far as the period of the gestation in the \(^ {537}\) The Kośa knows of only three movements: movement of transport, movement of adhikosa, rapid movement like the mind.

\(^ {538}\) See explanations of Visuddhimagga, p. 396.

\(^ {539}\) This is done by the power of resolve (adhiṃsika). - Patissambhidhi, II, p. 209, cited in Visuddhimagga, p. 401: Sace so iddham cetanāsaptapati brhamamokam gantakāmo hoti dare pi santoke adheṭāti. Transl.: If this magician who has acquired mastery of mind wants to go to the world of Brahmā, the Resolved does adheṭa so that what is far away becomes close at hand: “May it be close at hand” and it becomes close.

\(^ {540}\) This displacement rapid as thought (manavajñā) belongs to the Buddha; cf. Kośa, VII, p. 115.

\(^ {541}\) Dīgha, III, p. 112, has already distinguished iddhi sāvāra su-spāṭhāl “no arjī” ([the iddhi of miracles]) from iddhi vāra ṣaṭāmud̐ḍhā “sidhā” ([which is equanimity (upokāśa)]) This distinction is repeated in Kośa, VII, p. 285.

\(^ {542}\) These three types of gods to which the Māṣṭā will return later, k. 7, p. 112b, have already been mentioned in the canonical literature: Cullavādāvī, p. 307; Vībhāṅga, p. 422: Taya devā: sammatideva, upapattideva, visuddhideva .... arahanto vuccanti.

Later, at k. 22, p. 227c, the Māṣṭā will explain that there are four kinds of gods. "The nominal gods, the gods by birth, the gods of purity and the gods of native purity. The nominal gods are, for example, the king who is called Tian tuva (Son of god, or dvaputra)." According to Lévi, Despautre, JA, Jan-Mar. 1934, p. 11, this is an allusion to the Kusāna dynasty whose princes Kaniska, Huvika, Vissadeva, have always taken the title of dvaputra. This fact is worth remembering in the matter of dating the Māṣṭā.

\(^ {543}\) Kośa, VII, p. 124. The mahārāvikkas, wishing to see by the divine eye, put forth a great effort, see a dvīvāhāra mahāvāhana lokadāhi. The pratyekebuddhas see a triśaḥsāhasrāloka-dakṣyā. The Buddha bhagavat sees the asamkhyā lokadāhi; he sees whatever he wishes.
They preach the Dharma in the great assemblies,
But as a result of their lack of good faith (chanda)
Nobody believes them.
The person who desires vast renown (ming wen = yulas)
And wishes to believed by people
Should therefore show straightforwardness
And avoid frivolous discourse (sambhānāpratilāpa).

6. ĀDEYAVACANA

Śāstra: Their words are worthy of faith (ādeyavacanādā).\(^{546}\)

Śāstra: The devas, manusyas, nīgas, asuras and all great men accord faith to their speech and this is the reward (viśālā) for their language that is free of frivolity (asambhānāpratilāpa). The punishment for those of frivolous speech\(^{547}\) is that nobody believes them even if they speak the truth. Some stanzas say:

They fall among the pretas,
Flames shoot out of their mouth.
On all sides, they utter loud cries:
This is the punishment for their sins of speech.

They have heard much (bahuśūrata) and seen much (bahuḍrya).

544 Koṭa, VII, p. 103: the practitioner who wishes to remember previous lifetimes begins by seizing the nature (nimittāvat udghāya = cittavāśāyam paricchidya) of the mind which is about to perish; from this mind, he goes back by considering (manasakurvan) the states which immediately succeed one another in the present existence back to the mind at conception (pratitamālīcitā). When he reaches a moment of mind of the intermediate existence (antarābhava), the abiṣkṛti is realized.

545 Koṭa, VII, p. 102: The practitioner who wishes to know others' minds first considers [his own mind] in its arising (ātpīḍā), its duration (śīhi) and its destruction (bhanga). By ceaselessly reflecting on it (satutamaṇānīkāra) he succeeds in discerning in others the signs (nimitta) of joy (niruddhā), of hatred (dveṣa) and of fear (bhaya, viṣāla). Having seen these signs, then he knows the mind.\(^{547}\) This is the first gate of the knowledge of others' minds.

We have finished the explanation of the five abiṣkṛtis.

They have heard much (bahuśūrata) and seen much (bahuḍrya).

546 Ādeyavacanātā was one of the qualities of Āśīraŋghidhāra; cf. Vinaya, II, p. 158. - This virtue is described in Bodh. bhūti, p. 28-29: yat punah ādaṁkṣaya bhavanti ātmicāyitum... iṣvam ucayate ādeyavacanātā.

547 Frivolous speech (asambhānāpraitāpa) is one of the ten akusālakarmāṇītā; cf. below, k. 8, p. 120b.

7. AKUSĀDA

Śāstra: They were without laziness (akusādiḥ).

Śāstra: In householders (grhaṭha), laziness (kausālā) ruins wealth (dhana) and merits (puṇya); among monastics (pravrajīta), it ruins celestial happiness (svargasukha) and the bliss of nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasukha); in both, one's good name (puṇya) is lost. Even great culprits and great thieves avoid laziness. A stanza says:

Laziness ruins good minds.
The shadows of ignorance replace the light of wisdom.
All good resolutions disappear.
Great works also are doomed to failure.
This is why the bodhisattvas are said to be akusāla.

8. APAGATALĀBHAYAŚAŚCITTA

Śāstra: Apagatalābhayaśācitātā; they have renounced greed (lābhacittā) and ambition (ṣācitācittā).\(^{548}\)

Śāstra: Greed is like a thief; it destroys the root of the qualities (gунāmāla). Just as a heavy frost destroys the five grains, so greed and ambition destroy the young shoots (bīja) of the qualities (guna) and prevent them from prospering. The Buddha made the following comparison (apamāna): "Just as a horse-hair rope 548 There are eight lohaharmas with which a person may be especially preoccupied and which lead to his ruin: gain (lābha) and glory (yula) are among them. Cf. Dīgha, III, p. 260; Anguttara, IV, p. 156 sq.; Tseng yi a han, T. 125, k. 40, p. 764b. The canonical scriptures many times note the dangers of gain and honors (lābhasākāra: cf. Vinaya, II, p. 196; Itivuttaka, p. 73), of gain, honor and fame (lābhasaśākāroloka: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 192; Samyutta, II, p. 227, 237; Anguttara, II, p. 73; II, p. 343, 377).

Who was lost out of greed.550

This is why the bodhisattvas are said to be apagatalābhayaśaśhcitta.

9. NIRĀMIŚADHARMADEŚAKA

Sūtra: They preached the Dharma disinterestedly (nirāmiśadharma-deśakaṁ).

Śāstra: It is out of loving-kindness (maitri) and compassion (karuna) that they preach the Dharma to beings, without greed for robes (cīvara), food (āhāra), fame (vasai) or power (prabhāva). If they preach the Dharma, it is with great loving-kindness and great compassion because their minds (citta) are pure (vīluddha) and because they have attained acquiscience in the doctrine of the non-arising of phenomena (anupattikadharmaksānti). Some stanzas say:

The learned preacher, rational, skillful in speech,
Who preaches the Dharma well and stimulates people's spirits
But who transgresses against the doctrine and commits wrongdoings
Is like a cloud that thunders but cannot produce any rain.

The accomplished person, learned and wise,
But reticent, clumsy in speech and not eloquent,
Cannot reveal the precious treasure of the doctrine:
He is like a small shower without thunder.

The undisciplined person without wisdom
Who preaches badly and lacks good behavior
Is an evil teacher without shame:
He is like a little cloud with no thunder and no rain.

The learned person, wise and eloquent,
Who preaches the Dharma skillfully and stimulates people's spirits,
Who observes the doctrine fearlessly with an honest heart,

550 Devadatta is the archetype of those destroyed by their greed and selfish preoccupations. See Anguttara, IV, p. 160: Aṭṭhahi asaddhammehi abhibhūto .... etc.
Is like a great cloud that thunders and rains abundantly.\textsuperscript{551}

The great leader of the doctrine, guardian of the mirror of the doctrine,
Who illuminates the Buddhadharmas, treasury of wisdom,
Who, guardian and propagator of the sayings, who rings the bell of the doctrine,
Is like an ocean-going ship that assures to all the crossing of the sea.

\textsuperscript{[99a]} Like the king of the bees gathering nectar
He preaches according to the counsel and intentions of the Buddha.
He helps the Buddha, illuminates his doctrine and saves beings:
Such a teacher of the doctrine is very difficult to find.

10. GAMBHIRADHARMAMŚAṬTIPĀRAṀGATA

Śūra: They have crossed over to the other shore of the patience relating to the profound dharmas (gambhiradharmamśatipāramgataḥ).
Śāstra: What are the profound dharmas (gambhiradharmas)?

1) The twelve causes and conditions (dvādasaḥahatuprayatāya) are called gambhiradharmas. Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: "The twelve causes and conditions (or pratyayasamopāda) are profound (gambhīra), difficult to probe (durviśāgya) and difficult to understand (duranubodha)."

2) Also, we call gambhiradharmas the breaking of the thread (jīla) of the sixty-two wrong views (dṛṣṭīgata) relating to the past (aitta) and the future (anāgata). Thus the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: "The foolish ignorant person (bālo 'trusva) who wants to praise the Buddha finds only meager praises. In order to praise the Buddha truly, one should praise the purity of the precepts (līlasuddhi), renunciation of desire (vairāgya), the profound doctrine (dharma gambhīra), difficult to sound (durviśāgya) and difficult to understand (duranubodha)."\textsuperscript{552}

\textsuperscript{551} These first four stanzas seem to be a verisimilitude of a passage of the Anguttara, II, p. 102 (cf. Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 18, p. 635a) devoted to the four types of rain-clouds (vaśīkha). The person who speaks and does not act (bhāsita no katu) is compared to a cloud that thunders and does not rain (gajjita no vasāti); the person who speaks but does not act (katu no bhāsita), to a cloud that rains but does not thunder (vasāti no gajjita); the person who does not speak and does not act (nesa bhāsita no katu), to a cloud that neither thunders nor rains (nesa gajjita no vasāti); the person who speaks and acts (bhāsita ca katu ca), to a cloud that both thunders and rains (gajjita ca vasāti ca).

\textsuperscript{552} Brahmajālīṣāṣā in Diṅgha, I, p. 12 (Tchang yi a han, T 1, k. 14, p. 89c18-21; Fan wang lieou che nur kiem king, T 21, p. 266a): Idam kho tam bhikkhave appamattākam ... saññā vadāmananā vadeyyam. "Such, O monks, are the trifles, the

Here the Fan wang king (Brahmajālīṣāṣā) should be discussed fully.

3) The three gates of delivery (vinokṣyamukha) are also called (gambhiradharmas) as the Buddha said in the Prajñāpāramitā. The gods praised him, saying: "O Bhagavat, this doctrine is profound", and the Buddha replied: "This profound doctrine has as its meaning (artha) emptiness (śūnyatā), wishlessness (aprayaṇhitā) and signlessness (anātmanatī)."

4) The explanation of the nature of all dharmas (sarvadharmalakṣanamarocana) is also called gambhiradharmas: the true (satya) nature, indestructible (aṣaya) and immutable (aṣṭaya), etc. It is the same for the mind: By the activity of conceptual knowledge, the soul (ātman) finds various natures in dharmas. Seeing that the true nature of dharmas is neither empty (śūnyā) nor non-empty (aśūnyā), neither existent (sa) nor non-existent (asa), and penetrating deeply into this doctrine without deviations or blockage, this is what is called "having crossed over to the other shore of the acquiescence relating to profound dharmas" (gambhiradharmamśatipāramgata). Pāramgata (in Chinese, tou) means "having obtained" the gambhiradharmas. When [this acquiescence] is full, complete and without obstacle (asanga), one has "reached the other shore" (pāramgata).

11. VAIŚĀRADYAPRĀPTA

Śūra: They have obtained the fearlessnesses (vaśīradhyaprāptā).
Śāstra: The bodhisattvas are endowed with the four vaśīradhyas.

Question: - The bodhisattvas have not 'done what had to be done' (ekatakyo) and have not acquired omniscience (sarvajñatā); how can the śūtra say that they have acquired the four vaśīradhyas?

\textsuperscript{275} 276
Question. - What are the four vaiśāradyas of the bodhisattva?

Answer. - The vaiśāradyas, the fearlessnesses, are of two types: the vaiśāradya of the Buddha and the vaiśāradya of the bodhisattva. These bodhisattvas do not possess the vaiśāradyas of the Buddha but they have acquired those of the [96b] bodhisattva. This is why they are called vaiśāradyaparipūpta.

2) Furthermore, in the Prajñāpāramitā, in the chapter on Kīo mo (Mārvabodhaparivarta), the Buddha spoke of the activities and the works of Māra. When one has completely gone beyond the activities and works of Māra, one merits the epithet mārakarmasamatikrānta.

3) Furthermore, rejection of the true nature of dharmas (sarvadharmasatyatākṣana) and the other destructions of this kind are called māra as well.

4) Finally, the afflictions (kleśa), the fetters (samyojana), the bonds of desire (kāmabhānda), the outburst of attachment (tāgāparavyavasthāna), the aggregates, the bases of consciousness and the elements (sankhyāyatanaadhisthāta), the god Māra (māradева), Māra's people (mārakāyi), Māra's servants (mārajana), etc., are also called Māra.

Question. - Where is it that the bonds of desire (kāmabhānda) and other fetters (samyojana) are called māra?

Answer. - In the Tsa tsang king (Kṣudraka), the Buddha addressed the following stanzas to king Māra.

12. MĀRAKARMASAMATIKRĀNTA

Śrāva: They have passed beyond the works of Māra (mārakarmasamatikrānabhi).

Śāstra: 1) There are four kinds of māras: a) the affliction-māra (kleśamāra), b) the aggregate-māra (skandhamāra), c) the death-māra (mṛtyumāra), d) the son-of-god-māra (devaputramāra), chief of the parinirmatavaśavartin gods. By attaining the state of bodhisattva, these bodhisattvas have destroyed the kleśamāra; by acquiring the dharmakāya, they have destroyed the skandhamāra; by being always one-pointed (ekacittā), by not adhering to any (heavenly) sphere and by entering into the immoveable concentrations (acalasamādhāni), they have destroyed the parinirmatavaśavartin devaputramāra. This is why it is said that they have passed beyond the works of Māra.

553 The vaiśāradyas of the Buddha are listed in the Mahāvyutpatti no. 131-134; those of the bodhisattva, ibid., no. 782-785. See also Sāgarahā, p. 59, for a short bibliography of the vaiśāradyas.

554 These four māras are mentioned in Mahāvāca, III, p. 273, 281; Madh. vṛtti, p. 442; Dharma saṃgraha, ch. LXXX, Śūkṣamucayya, p. 198. - The late Pāli sources recognize a further māra, abhisamādhāma-māra; cf. Malalasekera, II, p. 611-613.

555 This chapter dedicated to Māra is in the Pañcasūmāra. It is entitled Kīo mo p’īn (Mārvabodhaparivarta) in Moṣkaḷa’s version, T 221, chap. XLVII, k. 10, p. 72c-74b; - Mō che p’īn (Mārakarmaparivarta) in Kumārajīva’s version, T 223, chap. XLVI, k. 13, p. 318b-320b. The Mārakarmaparivarta, chap. 21 of the Astāṣāhāraśri, ed. R. Mitra, p. 385-396, is very similar.

556 S. Lévi, Les seize Arhats protecteurs de la loi, Extract of JA, 1916, p. 32 sq., shows how the Chinese translators rendered the name Kṣudraka ādīma by the words Tsa tsang ‘mixed collection [piṭaka] in order to distinguish it from Tsa a hau, the traditional designation for the Sanyūṣa ādīma. But I [Lamotte] doubt whether Tsa tsang king restores an original Kṣudrakādīma, because the Mppī is familiar with only four ādīmas, namely, Ekottara, Madhyama, Dīgha and Sanyūṣa (cf. Mppī. T 1509, k. 2, p. 69c; k. 33, p. 306c), in contrast with Pāli Buddhism which knows five Nikayas, namely, Dīgha, Majjhima, Sanyūṣa, Anguttara and Khuddaka. If it then cites a Kṣudraka, it cannot be under the title of ādīma, but only under the name of a sūtra or group of separate sūtras. This is why, in the manner of the Kusavīkkhāyā, p. 33 (Arhavagyāyīsīdārā Ködrukā pathiyante), I [Lamotte] have translated Tsa tsang king only as “kṣudraka”.

557 These stanzas occur, with a few differences, in the Suttanipāta, v.436-439, 443-445, 449, and Lalitavistara, p. 262-263, the texts of which follow: Suttanipāta: Lalitavistara:

436) Kāmama te paṭhamam sena... Kāmī sa te paṭhamama sena... catutthā tanhaq pauvocatī]* tryānī sena carurthīti/*

437) Paticcanti thānāmnādihān te... Paticcanti sthānāmnādihān te... makkho samahāra te atathāmaso... kruhamuṣyaksa tathātāma/ī*/

438) lābho sīlakho sattārī... Lābhalaṃkha ca sattārī... pare ca svaṇijānī... yati ca vai dhūnusyata pariśi/ī/*

439) Edd. Namuci, te sena... Eedh bij Namucchi sena... jelā ca labhate sakhīn... krayaṃbandho pratiṣplān/ī/*

440) Esa maṭjaṃ parihae... krayaṃbandho pratiṣplān/ī/*

441) Yāke ko pariṣṭite... Yāke ko pariṣṭite... Aṭṭhaviṣāqābhā dīyuṣante

* 436) catutthā tanhaq pauvocatī (Tumālaṇa): tryānī sena carurthīti (Tumālaṇa).
By cultivating concentration and wisdom, I will smash your army, O Mara, like a clay pot (āmapātra).

With a mind solely cultivating wisdom I will save the world.

My disciples, full of energy, Ever mindful, will cultivate wisdom.

Following my example, they will progress in accordance with the Dharma
And will certainly reach nirvāna.

Even though you do not want to let them, They will go where you cannot go.

Then king Māra, on hearing this, Angry and confused, departed; And the evil army of māras Also disappeared and vanished.

Such is the māra of the fetters (sāmyojana).

Question. - Where are the five aggregates (skandha), the eighteen elements (dhūla) and the twelve bases of consciousness (dhyata) named māra?

Answer. - On Mount Mo kiū lo (Makula), the Buddha taught [the following] to the disciple Lo ṭo (Ṛdhā),

The forms aggregate (form, tattva) named Māra appear in the 46 suttas of the Rāhulasāṃyutta (Sānnyutta, III, p. 180-201) and in the sūtras no. 111-129 of the Tsa a han, T 99, no. 311, k. 11, p. 54b, and no. 215, k. 8, p. 54b, and k. 13, p. 54b.

Two questions arise: Where is Mo kiu lo? Is there a connection between Mo kiu lo and Śrīvastu?

There is a Nāgārjuna-buddha in the Comm. of Buddhavamsa, p. 3, and a Mahāvīra or Manu lákārāma in the legend of Pīlma. The traditions relating to this individual are found in Majjhima, III, p. 267-270 (tr. Clahmers, II, p. 307-308); Sānnyutta, IV, p. 60-63 (tr. Woodward, Kindred Sayings, IV, p. 34-36); Tsa a han, T 99, no. 215, k. 8, p. 54b, and no. 311, k. 13, p. 54b; Dīvyāvadāna, p. 24-55 (tr. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 199-245); Ken pen chhoo, yao che, T 1448, k. 1, p. 7c-7a; Theroṭṭhā Comm., in Rh. D., Brothers, p. 70-71; Karmavīhāra, p. 63-64; Pāpācaudānī, V, p. 85-92;
(saṃskāra) and consciousness (vijñāna) are also māra.\(^{559}\) Wishing to create for oneself a material existence (rūpaṃ māra) and consciousness (vijñāna) are also māra.\(^{559}\)

\[^{559}\text{Cf. Saṃyutta, III, p. 195: Rūpaṃ kho Rādha Māro vedanā .... viññānam Māradhammo.}

But then why does the Sāṅkhāyana Samyutta say that there are three kinds of obstacles (gaṅgāyukhāna, atīṭhaṭṭha, anāgatāṭṭha)? The epithets of Kūṭa Gāthās (Kūṭa Gāthās, III, p. 188) tell us that there was regular traffic between Śrāvastī or vice versa.

\[^{562}\text{A detailed study of these three obstacles may be found in Kośa, IV, p. 202-205.}

Question. - Why is he called Māra?

Answer. - He is called Māra because he carries off (harati) the āsāvatāra and because he destroys the good root of the dhārans of the Path and of the qualities (guṇa). The heretics (tīrtha) call him Yu dharmakṣara, Houa tsien (Karṇāṭkāya) or also Houa tsien (Pālāyudha).\(^{560}\) In the Buddhist texts, he is called Māra because he destroys all good works.

His actions and works are called māra-karma.

Question. - What are the works of Māra?

Answer. - 1) They are defined in the chapter of the Kīlo no (Mārāvahoddhaparivartī).\(^{561}\) 2) Furthermore, if people have had to undergo happiness and misfortune in the course of successive lifetimes, the causes are the fetters (saṃyojana). 3) Māra has three types of actions: a) play (līlā), laughter (hāsya), idle chatter (ālaṃkāra), singing (ghāṭa), dancing (nṛtya), and everything that provokes desire (rāga); b) iron fetters (bandadhana), beating (ghattana), whipping (kaśa), wounds (prahṛduḍana), spikes (kantuka), knives (śastra), slaughtering (santsādhanā) and everything that is caused by hatred (dvesa); c) [demented mortifications] such as burning, being frozen, tearing out one’s hair (keśīla-hakaṇa), starving, jumping into the fire, throwing oneself into the water, falling onto spears and everything that results from stupidity (moha).

Finally, the great hindrances (doṣa) impaire attachments to the world, that is all the work of Māra. Hatred of the good, scorn of nirvāṇa and the path to nirvāṇa are also the work of Māra. Plunging into the ocean of suffering without ever awakening and innumerable errors of this kind are all the work of Māra. When one has rejected and abandoned these, one is māra-karmaṃ nātikīrtītā.
Answer. Of these three obstacles, action is the greatest. Once accumulated (upacitta), actions last for hundreds of kṣot of kalpas without being lost, changed or deteriorating; they produce their fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) without loss of time; when these long-lasting actions meet the favorable complex [of conditions] and time (sa, rūp prāpya kālam ca), they produce their fruit of retribution.\(^{563}\)

They are like rice grains (śūlīṣṭa) that have fallen on the ground which, at the proper time, germinate without being lost or deteriorating. That is [the teaching] of the omniscient (sārvasattva) buddhas worthy of respect by all. If Sumeru, king of the mountains, cannot reverse his actions, what can be said about an ordinary person (prthujīna)? Some stanzas say:

The wheel of transmigration (samsāraratna) drags man along
With his afflictions (kleśa) and his fetters (samyojana).
Very powerful, it turns freely;
Nobody can stop it.

Actions carried out during previous lifetimes
Change into all kinds of forms.
The power of action is very strong;
It has no equal in the world.
The actions of previous lifetimes are the masters
Forcing a person to undergo their retribution.
The wheel turns by the power of actions,
It turns in the sea of samsāra.
The waters of the ocean can dry up,
The earth of Sumeru can be exhausted,
But the actions of previous lifetimes
Are never used up, never exhausted.

Actions accumulated (upacitta) for a long time
Follow their creator.

Like a creditor
Relentlessly following his debtor.\(^{565}\)
Nobody can escape
The fruit of the retribution of action;
There is no place to escape it;
One cannot escape it by asking for pardon.

[100b] Action relentlessly pursues
The beings of the threefold world.
It is like the K'o li lo t'ch'a.\(^{566}\)
This action was defined by the Buddha.
Wind does not penetrate into solids,
The waves do not turn back in their course,
Space suffers no harm,
Neither does non-action.

Actions have tremendous power
Which is never ineffectual.
When the time of retribution has come
One cannot escape from it, one cannot avoid it.
From the earth [one can] rise up to the sky
From the sky, one can penetrate the Himalayas,
From the Himalayas, one can plunge into the ocean:
Nowhere will one escape from action.\(^{567}\)

---

\(^{563}\) Action accomplished (kṣetu) and action accumulated (upacitta) must be distinguished. Action is said to be 'accumulated' because of its intentional nature (samanantatā), its completion (samāptatva), absence of regret (kasāryam) and counteragent (pratipakṣa), its accomplishment (paripūrṇa) and retribution (vipāka). See Kośa, IV, p. 243-244.

\(^{564}\) Paraphrase of a well-known stanza endlessly repeated in the Vinaya and the Avadānas, such as the Divya, the Avadānālakāta, etc.: na pramāṇānti ... khalo dehitam. "Actions do not perish, even after hundreds of millions of cosmic periods. Meeting the desired complex [of conditions] and time, they ripen for the spirit."

\(^{565}\) An allusion to a theory of the Śāntīśvalya on the mechanism of retribution: good or bad action perishes as soon as born, but it deposits in the series (samanāna) of the agent a certain entity called aviprasaha comparable to the page on which debts (sthaṇiṣṭha) are recorded. See Madh. avadāna, p. 317-323 (tr. Lamotte, in MCB, IV, 1935-36, p. 276-280).

\(^{566}\) K'o li lo t'ch'a is the name of a tree according to the Bukkyo daijiten, p. 212a.

\(^{567}\) Cf. the stanza of Divyāvadāna, p. 352, 561, and the Sanskrit Udānahavāpa, p. 98: naivaṁtarikaṁ na samādhyakaṁ ... yatra sthitam na pravahaṁ karmā//
It has its Pāli correspondent in Dhammapada, no. 127: na antalikhe na samaddhamājī ... yuttatthiṁ kho viyuttaṁ pāpakammaṁ//
2. From avidyā there arise actions (karman) which realize fruition in a universe (lokadhātu). These are the saṃskāras, formations.

3. From saṃskāra there arises a defined mind (samalacitā), initial cause of the [present] existence. Because it is aware in the way that a calf (vātus) is aware of its mother, it is called viññāna, consciousness.

4. This viññāna produces both the four formless aggregates (arūḍhakāya) [perception (saṃjñā), feeling (vedanā), volition (saṃskāra), consciousness (viññāna)] and form (bhūta) which serves as base them. This is name and form, nāmarūpa.

5. From this nāmarūpa there arise the six sense organs, eye, etc. (cakaprādyinādiṇī). These are the saḍāyatana, the six [inner] bases of consciousness.

6. The meeting (saṃsāpta) of organ (indriya), object (visaya) and a consciousness (viññāna) is called sparīṇa, contact.

7. From sparīṇa there arises vedanā, sensation.

8. Within vedanā there arises an adherence of mind (tacchulina) called craving or thirst, tresṇā.

9. The tendency caused by tresṇā is called upādāna, grasping, attachment.

10. From this upādāna comes action (karman) which brings about the new existence (panarabhavahetupratyaya) which is called bhava, the act of existence.

11. As a consequence of this bhava, one reassumes the five aggregates (skandha) of the new lifetime (panarūpa). This is called jāti, birth.

12. The decay of the five skandhas coming from this jāti is called jārāmarana, old-age-and-death. Jārāmarana gives rise to dissatisfaction (daurmanasa), sorrow (bhūdaśā) and all kinds of worries (soka); and thus the mass of suffering (dubhaksandhasamudaya) accumulates.

If the purity of the true nature of dharmas (dubhaksandhapratyayā), ignorance (avidyā) vanishes. When avidyā has disappeared, the formations (saṃskāra) also vanish and, as a result, all persons of prattyasamutpāda disappear one after the other until the entire mass of suffering (dubhaksandhasamudaya) vanishes. The person who, by means of these soteriological means (upāyā) and by not being attached to wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭā), is able to teach people, is said to be skillful (kusala). Also said to be skillful is the person who, examining these twelve causes and-conditions, rejects any system and refuses to adhere to it so as to understand only the true nature [underlying the prattyasamutpāda]. Thus, in the Prajñāpāramitā in the chapter entitled Pos ko tvin (Ākṣiyaparvarta), the Buddha says to Subhūti: "Avidyā is indescribable (akṣaya) like space; the saṃskāras are indescribable like space and similarly [all the members of prattyasamutpāda] and the mass of suffering (dubhaksandhasamudaya) are indescribable like space. The bodhisattva should know that the person who understands that cuts off the head of ignorance without falling into it. The person who sees the

---

It is often quoted in the Visuddhimagga, cf. Dharmapalas, T 1435, k. 36, p. 2608; Ken pen chou.../P. Seung Che, T 1450, k. 18, p. 192c.

568 In the third chapter of the Kośa, p. 60-138, there is a complete explanation of the problems related to prattyasamutpāda, along with an abundant bibliography. The monograph of L. de la Vallee Poussin, Théorie des douze causes, Gand, 1913, is still very instructive.

570 ibid., p. 68.

571 ibid., p. 69.
twelve-membered prattiyasamatpada in that way will sit on the throne of bodhi (bodhimanda) and will become omniscient (sarvaajihita).\footnote{572 This passage of the Asamkhya section occurs in the Pañcavimsati, Mulasutra's transl., T 221, ch. LXVIII, k. 15, p. 106a26-106b8; - Kumara's transl., T 222, ch. LXVII, k. 20, p. 364b10-24; - Hiuan-tsang's transl., T 220, k. 458, p. 315c3-22.}

15. ASAMKHYYAUKALPAKAPRAJIDHAANUSAMARADBHA

Sutra: They have formulated the vows since incalculable periods ago (asamkhya-yakalpa-prajidhaanusaumara-dha).

Sutra: The meaning of the word 'asamkhya' has already been explained above in the chapter on the Bodhisattva. As for the word 'kalpa', the Buddha defined it by the following comparisons:

"Suppose there is a rocky mountain (sailaparpata) four thousand li [in size] to which a venerable monk (dwa颣tri) comes once every hundred years (varsaivatasatyayena), brushing against it with his silk robe (kālika vastra): this great rock mountain would be worn out before a kalpa passes."\footnote{573 } "Suppose there is a great city (nagara) of four thousand li, full of mustard seeds (sasupa), unsorted and not leveled out, and that a venerable monk comes once every hundred years and takes away one seed: the mustard seeds would have disappeared before a kalpa would have passed."\footnote{574}

During innumerable kalpas of this kind, the bodhisattva has formed the great vow to save all beings. This is what is called the vow of the Great Mind. In order to save all beings, the fetters (samyogana) must be cut through and supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttara samayaksa) must be realized. This is what is called vow.

16. SMITAMUKHAPURVARBHILAPIN

Sutra: They speak with a smiling face (smitamukha-purvara-bhila-pihiti).

Sutra: Because they have uprooted hatred (dveṣa), chased away envy (bhya), and always practice great loving-kindness (mahāmaitri), great compassion (mahākaruna), and great joy (mahāmuditā), because they have avoided the four kinds of evil speech (mithyāvāda), they have acquired a pleasant face. Some stanzas say:

- Seeing a mendicant monk
- He treats him in four ways:
- As soon as he sees him, he looks at him kindly;
- He goes to meet him and speaks to him respectfully.
- He gives him a seat
- And fulfills all his wishes:

\[287\]

(10a) With such generous inclinations
- The state of Buddhahood is quite close.
- The person who avoids the four sins of speech;
- Lying (meṣāvāda), slander (paśuṇaya),
- Harmful speech (pūraṇa) and frivolous speech (saṃbhinnapralāpā)
- Gains a magnificent reward
- The kind, gentle person who seeks the Path,
- Wishes to save beings,
- And avoids the four sins of speech
- Is like a harnessed horse.

17. MAHĀPARŠANMADHYEVAISĀRADYASAMANVĀGATA

Sutra: In the great assembly, they are endowed with the fearlessnesses (mahāparsanamadhye vaisāradyasamanvāgata).

Sutra: As a result of their great merits, their firm qualities and their wisdom, they have acquired a supreme dhāraṇī of eloquence (nirodtathāraṇī) and, in the midst of the great assembly, they enjoy the fearlessness (vaisāradya). Some stanzas say:

\[575\] The four mithyāvādas are lies (meṣāvāda), scandal (paśuṇaya), harmful speech (pūraṇa) and frivolous speech (saṃbhinnapralāpā). Cf. Dīgha, I, p. 4, 138; III, p. 232; Majjhima, I, p. 361-362; Samyutta, II, p. 167; Kośa, IV, p. 164-166.
Inwardly, his mind, his wisdom and his merits are slender;
Outwardly, he resorts to fine words:
He is like a bamboo (vṛṇa) without pith
That shows only its exterior.
Inwardly, his mind, his wisdom and his merits are vast;
Outwardly he makes use of true words:
He is like a beautiful diamond (ṣaVyra)
The inner and outer power of which are complete.
Moreover, they are endowed with the fearlessnesses, they are handsome, of noble family and of great power. Their discipline (śīla), their concentration (samādhi) and their wisdom (prajñā) are perfect. Having nothing to fear, this is why they are fearless in the midst of the great assembly. Some stanzas say:
The person of little merit and without wisdom
Is unable to occupy a high seat.
He is like a wolf in the face of a lion
That crouches down and does not dare to come out.
The great sage is without fear,
He can occupy the lion's seat.
He is like the lion whose roar
Makes all the beasts tremble.
Having accumulated immense and infinite wisdom and merit, they have nothing to fear. Some stanzas say:
The person who has destroyed all his faults
And succeeds in avoiding the minor sins,
A great virtuous person of this kind
Has no vow that cannot be realized.
This person of great wisdom
Is free of suffering in this world,
Because for such a person
Samsāra and nirvāṇa are identical.

Finally, they have acquired only the fearlessnesses belonging to the bodhisattva. Thus, in the P'ī na p'o na wang kīng, it is said that the bodhisattvas acquire only the four fearlessnesses (vaiśādṛadāya). This has been said above.

18. ANANTAKALPAKOTIDHARMADEŚANÅNIJSARAÑAKUSALA

Śūtra: For innumerable kōṣ of kalpas, they have been skilled in preaching the Dharma and in surpassing (anantakalpakotīdharmaḍeśanānījṣarañakusālaḥ).
Śūtra: They themselves have thoroughly cultivated the roots of good [101b] (kuśalaṁūla), such as zeal (uparama), etc. This was not for just one, two, three or four lifetimes, but indeed for innumerable asamṛthyakalpas that the bodhisattvas have accumulated qualities (guna) and wisdom (prajñā). A stanza says:
They have produced the great thought for beings;
The person who disdains and scorns them
Commits an unspeakably grave sin.
How much more guilty the person who wants to harm them!
Moreover, for incalculable (asamṛthya) and immeasurable (aprameya) kalpas, the bodhisattvas have cultivated their body, practiced discipline (śīla), exercised their mind (citta) and their intelligence (mati), understood themselves arising (upāda) and cessation (nirvada), the bonds (bandhana) and delivery (vimbodha), intractability (pratiloma) and adaptability (anuloma); they understand the true nature of dharmas (dharmanāthaśaktanāsa), they possess the three kinds of analysis (nirnaya), namely, of text (śruta), of meaning (arthī) and of acquisition (lābha); they understand the various sermons (nāṇadharmaparyaya) without difficulty (pratīgha); in order to preach the doctrine they use the virtue of skillful means (upāyakausalyapramitā) and the virtue of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā); all the words of these bodhisattvas are the words of the āryas to whom it is appropriate to accord faith. Some stanzas say:
The person who is intelligent but who lacks knowledge
Does not know the true nature.
He is like an eye that can see nothing
In complete darkness.
The learned person who has no wisdom

576 Lamotte says he does not know what sūtra this is.
577 Lamotte translates pratiloma as "rebellion" in French, in English 'intractibility'. Monier Williams gives: reverse, inverted, adverse, hostile, disagreeable, unpleasant, in inverted or reverse order, against the natural course or order.
578 Lamotte translates anuloma as "adaptation", in English, adaptability. Monier Williams gives: natural direction, in order, regular, successive, conformable.
Also does not know the true meaning.
He is like a lamp (dīpa) in full daylight
Where the eye would be absent.

As for the learned person of keen wisdom,
His words merit trust.
The person who has neither wisdom nor knowledge
Is just an ox in a human body.

Question. - The sūtra should say that the bodhisattvas for innumerable koti of kalpas are skilled in preaching the doctrine; why does it also say [that they are skilled] in surpassing (nīhūramā)?

Answer. - The bodhisattvas preach easy subjects to the ignorant and the disciples; they preach difficult subjects to the learned (bahuśruta) and the masters with keen wisdom (dīghanāgajñopadeśa). Among teachers of mediocre knowledge, they diminish themselves; among the śaikṣa and the learned (bahuśruta), they welcome objections with courage and joy. Among all beings, they give evidence of great power (anubhāva). Thus, a stanza in the T'ien houei king (Devasamājasūtra)579 says:

His face, his eyes and his teeth gleam
And light up the great assembly.
He outshines the brilliance of all the gods
Who all disappear.

This is why it is said that for innumerable koti of kalpas the bodhisattvas have been skilled in preaching the doctrine and in surpassing.

579The Taishō edition has T'ien houei king “Sūtra of the assembly of gods”, but one should read Ta houei king “Sūtra of the great assembly” according to the Souei and T'ang editions. Ta houei king is the title given to the Mahāsamājasūtra in the T'ou-yang a han, T 1 (no. 19), k. 12, p. 79b, and in the Che song liu, T 1435, k. 24, p. 174b which, in order to avoid error, also adds the title in transcription: Mo ho cha no k'i kien. There are several editions of this text, which E. Waldschmidt has studied in detail:

1) Sanskrit text, Mahāsāṃjīvaniya, in Elph Cathedral, Brechtstücke, p. 149-206.
3) Chinese translations in T'ou-yang a han, T 1 (no. 19), k. 12, p. 79b-81b; Ta san mo jo king, T 19, vol. I, p. 258-259; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 1192), k. 44, p. 323a; T 100 (no. 1085), k. 5, p. 411a.
4) Tibetan translations: Hūla pa chen pohi mdo or Mahāsāṃjīyāstra (cf. Csoma-Feer, p. 288; OKC, no. 750, p. 226); Mo chen po hūla pa chen pohi mdo Kes bya ba or Mahāsāṃjīyāstra mahāśāstra, of which there are two versions (cf. OKC, no. 332, p. 112; no. 688, p. 174).

This sūtra is cited under the title of Mahāsāṃjī’ya in Karmavīhāra, p. 156.
Error excepted, the stanza which the Mppṣ attributes to it here does not occur in any of these versions.
CHAPTER XI: THE TEN COMPARISONS

Text of the sūtra commented upon in this chapter (cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 4-5; Śatāṣṭhārasīkā, p. 5).

19. THE TEN UPAMĀNAS

[k. 6, 101c] Sūtra: These bodhisattvas accept that dharmas are like 1) a magic show, 2) a mirage, 3) the moon reflected in water, 4) space, 5) an echo, 6) a city of the gandharvas, 7) a dream, 8) a shadow, 9) a reflection in a mirror, 10) a creation (māyā, marīci, udakacandra).

850 According to the teaching of the Pāli and Nāgārjuna, dharmas or phenomena are empty of self-nature (svabhāvahaṁśa) because they result from causes (pratityavesapunāyana). These dharmas that are empty of self-nature, arising from dharmas that are themselves empty of self-nature, really do not arise (anuvāpya): they are non-existent. But if things are non-existent, how can they be seen, heard, and experienced? It is to this question that the ten comparisons that are presented here reply: they are seen in the way that one sees a magical object, they are heard in the way that one hears an echo, they are experienced in the way that one experiences things in a dream, etc.

A. Although canonical Buddhism and the Lesser Vehicle, which is its extension, limit their criticism to negation of the svabhāvahaṁśa (sky flower), 7) a dream, 8) a shadow, 9) a reflection in a mirror, 10) a creation (māyā, marīci, udakacandra).

B. In order to explain dharmarāṇīmanyam, the Prajāśās resort to ten type-comparisons of which the Mppī gives a specimen here. But their number is not fixed at ten and they do not follow the same order.

Pañcaviṃśati. Sanskrit text, p. 4: 1) māyā, 2) marīci, 3) udakacandra, 4) svapna, 5) pratīvṛkṣā, 6) pratībhāsa, 7) pratībhīna, 8) nirūpāna (idem in Mahāvyutpatti, no. 854).

Ibid., Huan tsang’s tr., T. 220, vol. VII, p. 10: 1) māyā, 2) marīci, 3) svapna, 4) udakacandra, 5) pratīvṛkṣā, 6) pratībhāsa, 7) pratībhīna, 8) chāyā, 9) nirūpāna, 10) gandharvanagara.

Ibid., Mokṣāla’s tr., T. 221, k. 1, p. 1a: 1) māyā, 2) svapna, 3) pratīvṛkṣā, 4) pratībhāsa, 5) chāyā, 6) nirūpāna, 7) budhāda, 8) pratībhīna, 9) marīci, 10) udakacandra.

Śatāṣṭhārasīkā, Sanskrit text, p. 5: 1) māyā, 2) marīci, 3) udakacandra, 4) svapna, 5) pratīvṛkṣā, 6) pratībhāsa, 7) gandharvanagara, 8) pratībhīna, 9) nirūpāna.

Ibid., p. 1209: The category bodhisattvāḥ is also unreal, like the following things: akāśaśāna, svapna, māyā, marīci, udakacandra, pratīvṛkṣā, pratībhāsa, bimba, taṭaṭāyaśānāmīta.

The Vajracchedikā, p. 46, puts all of this into verse: tadyathādāśre tārākā tīvram dīpā yādāyaśalya budhāda/svapnam ca vidyād abhran ca evam dravyaśaṃ samāyātami/
"The conditioned should be thought to be like a star in space, shadows, a lamp, heat, frost, a water bubble, a dream, a flash of lightning a cloud. - See the Khotanesan commentary in Hornei, Remains, p. 287.

C. The Vaiśeṣikaśātras repeat this entire nomenclature: The Lallavistara, p. 181, when listing the qualities of the bodhisattva, ends with the following list: māyāmṛṣāyrupamānasāyapratīvṛkṣāsrutikāryapaṇamāņaṃāyanīmāyāvyaktāḥ. - The Avatāraṇyaka, T. 279, k. 49, p. 232b, repeats it in regard to the ten āyānas.

dhāṃkāśānta pratīvṛkṣāmṛṣāyapratīvṛkṣāmāyāvāpya sāmo bhāvayati/
"Existence is like a burning brand brandished in a circle, a creation, a dream, a magic show, the moon reflected in water, a fog, an echo in the midst [of the mountains], a mirage, a cloud."

E. The sūtras from which the Vaiñāvadīna school is derived have adopted these comparisons: Lekhāvatāra, p. 25: māyāmṛṣāya udakacandraśruti/marīcimṛṣāya udakacandraśruti sāmo bhāvayati/
"Tell me how is the world like a magic show, a dream, like [a city] of the gandharvas, like a mirage and the moon reflected in water?"

The citations can be infinitely multiplied by referring to D. T. Suzuki’s Index to the Lekhāvatāra Sūtra, Kyoto, 1934, s.v. māyā, marīci, etc.

Sanātanaśrama, I, v. 4-5, where the example of the magic show is fully developed.
1. Like a magic show (māyā)
Śāstra: These ten comparisons serve to explain empty dharmas (śūnyadharma).
Question. - If all dharmas are empty (śūnya) like a magic show (māyā), why are they seen (deśita), heard (śūnya), felt (grūtā), tasted (dvātā), touched (spṛṣṭa) and known (viṣṭāta)? If they truly did not exist, how could one see them ... and know them? - Furthermore, if they are seen out of error although they do not exist, why do we not see sounds (śabda) and hear colors (rūpa)? - If all dharmas are equally empty (śūnya) and non-existent (asat), why are some of them visible (sanidārāna) and others invisible (anidārāna)? Being empty, dharmas are like a finger (aṅguli) of which the first nail (nāka) is non-existent and likewise the second. Why is it that we do not see the second nail and we see only the first? 581
Therefore we know that the first nail, which really exists, is visible, whereas the second, which does not really exist, is invisible.
Answer. - Although the nature of dharmas (dharmalakṣaṇa) is empty, we can distinguish visible dharmas (sanidārāna) and invisible dharmas (anidārāna). Take, for example, magical elephants (hastin) and horses (asva) and other things of this kind: we know very well that they are not real and yet we see their color, we hear their sounds; they correspond to the six sense-objects and they are not mixed up one with the other. In the same way, although dharmas are empty, we can see them, we can hear them, and they are not confused one with the other.

Thus, in the Tō niu king (Therīstūtra) the therī asks the Buddha: "O Bhagavat, is [102a] ignorance (avidyā) internal (ādhyātmika)?"
"No."
"Is it external (bahirādhyā)?"
"No."
"Is it both internal and external?"
"No."
"O Bhagavat, does this ignorance come from the previous lifetime (piṇḍavajanna)?"
"No."
"Does it come from the present lifetime (jīvanam) and does it pass to the next one (punarjānana)?"
"No."
"Does this ignorance have an arising (upādāna) and a cessation (nirodha)?"
"No."
"Is there a truly existent dharma that could be called ignorance?"
"No."

Then the therī said to the Buddha: "If ignorance is not internal, not external, neither internal nor external, if it does not pass from the previous lifetime to the present lifetime and from the present lifetime to the following lifetime, if it does not have a true nature, how can ignorance be the condition (pratītya) for the formations (samkāra) and so on [for the twelve members of [pratityasamutpāda] up to this accumulation of this mass of suffering (duḥkhahasthāndhasyotpāda)? O Bhagavat, is it as if a tree has no root (māla): how could it produce a trunk (skandha), knots (ganiṣṭha), branches (śākhā), leaves (dala), flowers (puppa) and fruit (phala)?"

The Buddha replied: "The nature of dharmas is emptiness. However, worldly people (prabhājana), ignorant (aivatārata) and without knowledge (ajñātārata), produce all kinds of afflictions (kleśa) in regard to dharmas, [of which the main one is ignorance]. This affliction is the cause and condition (pratītya) for actions of body, speech and mind (kṣetavyasaṃkarmanam) which are the cause of a new existence (punarjānana). As a result of this existence we experience suffering (duḥkha) or pleasure (sukha). Thus, if the affliction (i.e., ignorance) did not truly exist, there would be no actions of body, speech and mind, and we would not experience suffering or pleasure. When a magician (māyākar) creates all kinds of objects by magic, are these magical products internal (ādhyātmika) according to you?"
"No."
"Are they external?"
"No."
"Are they both internal and external?"

"No."

"Do they pass from the previous lifetime to the present lifetime and from the present lifetime to the next lifetime?"

"No."

"Do the products of magic have a birth (upadā) and a cessation (niruddha)?"

"No."

"Is there really a dharma that is the product of magic?"

"No."

Then the Buddha said:

"Do you not see, do you not hear, the musical instruments (vīḍyā, tārya) produced by magic?"

"Yes, I see them and I hear them."

"Then", continued the Buddha, "if the magic show is empty (tiṃya), deceptive (vaicukula) and without reality, how can one get musical instruments by magic?"

"Bhagavat, although the magic show has no basis, one can hear it and see it."

"Well," said the Buddha, "it is the same for ignorance. It is not internal, it is not external, it is not both, neither is it neither internal nor external. It does not pass from the past lifetime to the present lifetime nor from the present lifetime to the next lifetime; it has no true nature, it has neither birth nor cessation. However, ignorance (avidyā) is the cause and condition (hetupratyaya) for the formations (samskāra) and so on up to the accumulation of this mass of suffering (dakkha-skandhasyotpādoḥ). When the magic show is over, the products of magic vanish. In the same way, when ignorance is destroyed (kṣaya), the formations also are destroyed and so on [for the twelve members of pratītyasamutpāda] up to the complete disappearance of the mass of suffering."

Moreover, this example of the magic show demonstrates that, among beings, all conditioned dharmas (samskṛtadharma) are empty (tiṃya) and without solidity (adhara). And so it is said that all the formations (samskāra) are like a magic show that deceives little children; they depend on causes and conditions (hetupratyayadipaksya), they are powerless and do not last for a long time [102b] (acitrasthitikā). This is why the bodhisattvas regard dharmas as a magic show.

2. Like a mirage (marcī)

When the light of the sun (tāryāloka) and the wind (vīḍyā) stir up the dust (rūjas), there is a mirage; in the desert (kāndāra), it appears as if there were gazelles (ghoṭakamṛgā) and, on seeing them, not knowing, we assume the presence of water (vātī). It is the same for the characteristics of male and female (striprūṣa): when the sun of the fetters (sanyojana) and the afflictions (klesa) has heated up the dust of the formations (samskāra) and the wind of bad thoughts (mithyā-manuṣkīra) swirls in the desert of transmigration (samsāra), the person without wisdom asserts the characteristics of male and female (striprūṣa). This is a mirage. Furthermore, if the sight of the mirage from afar (vijīraṇa) calls up the notion of water (vārīṣaṃjña), from close up (samsākṛta) this notion disappears. In the same way, when the ignorant person is far away from the holy doctrine (aryadharmā), he is ignorant of the non-existence of self (anātman), the emptiness of dharmas (dharmanāti), and attributes to the aggregates (skandha), the elements (dhātu) and the bases of consciousness (djati) the characteristics of a person, male or female [which are foreign to it]. But when he has come close to the holy dharmas, he discovers the true nature of dharmas (dharmanatyalakṣana) and scatters the illusions (vaicūcana) and false notions (mithyāsāṃjña). This is why the bodhisattvas regard dharmas as a mirage.

3. Like the moon reflected to water (udakacandra)

Actually, the moon (candra) is situated in space (ākāśa) but its reflection (bimba) appears in the water (udaka). In the same way, 'the moon' of the true Dharma (bhūtadharma) is in 'the space' of suchness (dharmanat) and the peak of existence (bhūtakṣeta), but its 'reflection' - the wrong notions of 'the' and 'mine' (ātmātmya-vinimitta) - appear in the 'water' of the minds of fools (bālakīta), gods or men. This is why [dharmas] are like the moon reflected in water. Furthermore, when a little child (bālaka) sees the moon reflected in the water, he is happy and wants to grab it, but the adults who see it make fun of him. In the same way, the ignorant person, seeing his body, believes in the existence of a personal self (ātman): lacking true knowledge, he sees all kinds of dharmas and, having seen them, he is happy and wants to grasp (udgṛhṇati) the characteristics of male or female (striprūṣa), etc.; but the āryas who have found the Path make fun of him. A stanza says:

Like the moon reflected in water, like the water of a mirage,
Like attainments in a dream, death and birth are like that.
In the same say, in the person who has renounced desire (viharāga) and has acquired the third fruit,\(^{584}\) Residues of ignorance and pride still hide the mind.

In autumn (śarad), the sun is not covered by clouds,

The sky is pure like the water of the oceans.

Having accomplished what had to be done (kṛtaṇya), being of an immaculate mind,\(^{585}\) The arhat also is completely pure.

Moreover, space is without beginning, middle or end (apūrvamadhyacarama). It is the same for dharma. In the Mahāyāna, the Buddha said to Śūraṇaṭīṣṭha (Śūraṇa): "Space is beginningless, without middle and without end; and it is the same with dharma." This text should be cited in full. This is why it is said that dharmas are like space.

Question. - Space is a truly existent dharma. Why? If space were not a real dharma, it would not have the activity (kārya) of raising up or lowering, going or coming, bending or spreading out, leaving or entering, etc., since it would not have the room in which to move.

Answer. - i) If space were a truly existent dharma, it should have an abode (adhiṣṭhāna, āṣāṇa). Why? Because without an abode, there are no dharmas. If space resides in holes (chidra),\(^{586}\) space would reside in space; therefore space does not reside in cavities. If it resided in any reality whatsoever, this abode would be real (bhāța) and not empty (jāntya) and thus space would be unable to reside there and would have nothing to accommodate it.

ii) Moreover, you say that space is the place of abiding (adhiṣṭhāna), but in a stone wall (laṅkāśāri) which truly exists, there is no place of abiding. If there is no place of abiding, there is no space. Since space has no abode, there is no space.

iii) Finally, space does not exist because it has no specific characteristic (lakṣaṇa).\(^{587}\) Each dharma has its own characteristic and it is because of this characteristic that we recognize its existence. Thus earth (prthivī) has solidity (khakkhāṭana) as its characteristic; water (ap), humidity (dravatva); fire (tejas), heat \(^{582}\) Space is invisible (ādrīya) but, looking at it from afar, the eye perceives a light blue color. In the same way, dharmas are empty (jāntya) and non-existent (asat): the person who is still far away from pure true wisdom (anūṭravasayaprajñā) does not discover its true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) but sees in it ītman, men (pāṇis) and women (strī), houses (gṛha) and cities (nagara), all kinds of different things (dravya), and his mind clings (abhinnisāvate) to them. When a little child (bhālaka) looks at the blue sky, he says that he sees a real color (varṇa); but those who fly up very high and come closer [to the sky] see nothing; it is when we look at it from a distance that we assert that we see a blue color. It is the same for dharmas. This is why the sūtra says that they are like space.

Moreover, space is always pure by nature (svabhāvapattiyādha), but when it is overcast and covered [by clouds], people say that it is impure (avītiadha). In the same way, the dharmas are always pure by nature, but when they are obscured by desire (rūga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha), people declare them to be impure. Some stanzas say:

During the summer months (grīma), there is thunder, lightning and rain,

Dark clouds cover the sky, the weather is not calm;

In the same way, in ignorant ordinary people (prthagjana),

All sorts of afflictions (kleśa) cover over the mind.

In a wintry (hemanta) sky, sometimes the sun shines,

But usually it is dark and clouds cover over it.

In the same way, the person who has acquired the first or second fruit,\(^{583}\) Is still darkened by the defilements of desire.

In a spring (vasantī) sky, the sun is about to shine forth,

But is still covered by dark clouds.

\(^{584}\) The avatāraāptiphala and the saṅkalpajñāmiphipha.

\(^{585}\) The avatāraāptiphala.

\(^{586}\) For the Sūtraśāri-Vaibhāṣyakas, space is the hole, opening, or the void (chidraṃ akāṣadhāvādhiśāmyaṃ), it is light (ādīka) and darkness (tamas). For the Sautrāntikas, it is just the absence of a resisting body (sapratīgadhāvādhiśāmyaṃ). See references in Kośa, I, p. 49-50.

\(^{587}\) This paragraph and the following one are according to the commentary of the Madh. kārikās, V, 1-2, p. 129-130: nākāśaṃ vidvate kimeśaḥ pūrvaṃ ... bhūte kramātamaḥ katu-lakṣaṇam. "Space does not exist prior to the nature of space (namely, the absence of an obstacle: anūrvaraṇa), for it would be without nature if it existed prior to its nature. - A substance without nature does not exist anywhere. Since a substance without nature does not exist, to what would this nature apply?"
wind (vīṭā), movement (īraṇatva); \(^{588}\) consciousness (vijñāna), intelllection (vijñaptitva); wisdom (prajñā), insight (bodhana); nirvāṇa, cessation (uccheda). Not having such a characteristic, space does not exist.

Question. - Space has a characteristic, but as you do not cognize it, you say \(^{103a}\) that it does not exist. The characteristic of space is absence of rūpa (matter).

Answer. - That is not correct. Absence of rūpa means elimination of matter, but that is not a separate dharma any more than the extinguishing of a lamp (dīpa) is not a distinct dharma. This is why space has no self-nature.

Moreover, space does not exist. Why? You speak of rūpa by saying that the absence of rūpa is the self-nature of space; if that were so, insofar as rūpa does not arise, the specific nature of space does not exist.

Finally, you say that rūpa is an impermanent dharma (anitvā), but that space is a permanent (nītīya) dharma. Before rūpa existed, there should have therefore been a dharma called space, since it is eternal. If rūpa is not absent, the self-nature of space does not exist, and if this nature does not exist, space does not exist either. This is why space is a mere name without any reality. The dharmas are also like space; they are mere names without any reality. Consequently, the bodhisattvas believe that dharmas are like space.

5. Like an echo (pratiśīrātaka)

In a narrow valley, a deep gorge or an empty house, when a sound (śabda) or a noise is made, from this sound [that is produced] another sound arises that is called an echo. The ignorant person thinks that there is somebody who is repeating his words, but the wise person knows that the echo is not due to a third person and that it is solely by a reverberation of the sound (śabdasparśa) that there is a new sound called an echo. The echo is empty (ānitya) of reality but it is able to deceive the ear organ (ivorotrendīya). In the same way, when a person is about to speak, there is a wind (vīṭa) in his mouth (maukha) called Yeṣu to na (udāna) that passes to the nostrils (nābhi); when it strikes the nostrils, an echo is produced and at the moment that it comes out, it strikes in seven places and subsides. That is language (abhiḍūpa). Some stanzas say:

- The wind called udāna
- Strikes the nostrils and rises up;
- This wind then strikes in seven places:
- The nape of the neck, the gums, the teeth and the lips,
- The tongue, the throat and the chest.
- Thus language is produced.
- The fool does not understand that;

Hesitant, obstinate, he produces dveśa and moha.

The person endowed with wisdom
Is not worried, does not cling,
And does not commit any mistake;
He adheres solely to the [true] nature of dharmas.
Bending and staying straight, bending and straightening up,
[The sound] that comes and goes manifests the language.
There is no agent there.
This [language] is a magic show.
How would anyone know
That this skeleton, this bundle of nerves,
Would be able to produce language,
Like molten metal ejects water?

\(^{103b}\) This is why the bodhisattvas regard dharmas as an echo.

6. Like a city of the gandharvas

When the sun rises, we see a city (nagara) of buildings with stories\(^{589}\) (kālīga), palaces (rūjakula), with people coming in and going out. The higher the sun rises, the more indistinct this city becomes; it is just an optical illusion without any reality. This is what is called a city of the gandharvas. People who have never before seen it and who discover it some morning in the east believe in its reality and hurry towards it; but the closer they come, the more unclear it becomes and when the sun is high, it disappears. Tormented by hunger and thirst (kṣetupaśāya), the people who perceive a haze like a herd of gazelles (ghotukamarga) believe in the presence of water and hasten towards it, but the closer they come, the more the illusion becomes blurred. Exhausted, worn out, they come to a high mountain or a narrow valley; they utter cries and groans and the echo replies to them; they believe in the presence of inhabitants and try to find them, but they tire themselves out in vain and find nothing. Finally, when they have reflected and understood, their illusion disappears. In the same way, the ignorant man thinks he sees an ātman and dharmas in the aggregates (skandha), the elements (dīna) and the bases of consciousness (dvatana) which are empty (śānya) of any reality. Prey to desire (dveśa), anger (dveśa) and obstinacy (citthabhiniveśa), they wander in the four directions to satisfy their desire. Lost and deceived, they are plunged into poverty and misery. But when they have recognized the non-existence of the ātman and real dharmas by means of wisdom (prajñā), their mistake (vijñaptitva) disappears.

\(^{589}\) Lamotte translates kālīga as ‘étage’. Monier-Williams gives ‘an upper room, apartment on the top of a house’.

\(^{588}\) For the nature of the four elements, cf. Majjhima, III, p. 240-241; Pitūpaśivasmaṇgamāsāra, cited in Śīlaśāmacaccaya, p. 245; Mahāvyutpatti, p. 1842-1843; Kośa, I, p. 22.
Furthermore, the city of the gandharvas is not a city; it is the mind of the person who sees it as such. In the same way, fools (bālā) conceive of that which is not a body as a body (kāya) and as a mind (citta) that which is not a mind.

Question. - A single example would suffice in understanding; why multiply the comparisons (upamāna) in this way?

Answer. - In the example of the city used by the śrāvakas, the subject of comparison exists as such (dravyasat), whereas the city has merely nominal existence (prākārikat). But in the city of the gandharvas, the subject of comparison itself is non-existent; it is like the burning brand flourished in a circle (ālītacakrab) that deceives the human eye. In the śrāvaka texts, the example of the city is used only to refute the litamana. Here we use the example of the city of the gandharvas so that the bodhisattvas of keen faculties (ikṣenendrāya) penetrate the emptiness of dharmas deeply, which is why these are compared to a city of the gandharvas.

I have given you, O monk, a parable and here is the meaning of it:

The city, O monk, signifies the body composed of the four great elements, resulting from a father and a mother, nourished by rice and whey, undergoing eternal tear and tear, erosion, dissolving and disintegrating.

The six gates, O monk, signify the six inner bases of consciousness (the eye organs, the ear organ, etc.).

The gate-keeper, O monk, signifies attentiveness.

The pair of express messengers, O monk, signify calmness and concentration.

The lord of the city, O monk, signifies consciousness.

The square in the inner city, O monk, signifies the four great elements, earth, water, fire and wind.

The true message, O monk, signifies nirvāṇa.

The road on which to depart, O monk, signifies the noble eight-fold Path, namely, right view and the rest, and right concentration.

The Buddha did not say any more about the lord of the city, but we know from Buddhaghosa (Sārattha, III, p. 60 sq.) that it is about a dissolute young prince whom the two messengers lead back to the right path.

- In the Tsa a han, p. 315, the parable is slightly different and the Pāli version has contaminated the interpretation, which follows: "Imagine there is a city in a border land, having well-constructed walls, solid gates and smooth roads. At the four gates of the city there are four guards; they are intelligent, wise, and know those who enter and those who depart. In this city there is a courtyard where the lord of the city is seated. When the messenger from the east arrives, he asks the guard where the lord of the city is, and the guard answers: "The lord is inside the city sitting in the courtyard." Then this messenger goes to the lord of the city, gets his orders and returns by the same road. The messengers from the south, west and north do the same and each returns to their place of departure.

The Buddha says to the monk: I have told you a parable, now I will explain its meaning: The city is the person's body, coarse matter... the well-constructed walls are the right views (samyutakata). The path of departure is the eight-fold noble Path.

We may notice that the true message, symbolic of the four truths does not appear in the Chinese version, but rather appears in the interpretation which follows, directly borrowed from the Pāli text, where the messengers communicate to the lord of the city the yañakabhūta sacca. The text of the Tsa a han has thus been contaminated by the Pāli version.

The example of the burning brand flourished in a circle which gives the illusion of a ring of fire (ālītacakrab) is not found in the Pāli scriptures but is used by the Madhyamaka: cf. Madh. vutt, p. 173, 219, 238, 49; Catuvatika, v. 325 - It is also found in the Lankāvatāra, p. 9, 42, 9, 106, 287, and the Kośa, I, p. 93, III, p. 212, V, p. 23. The Kośavākyākhyā defines it as follows: alāte iliṣṭvapan commentator tantra tattvopchayamāne 'ālītacakrabuddhir bhavati. - The brahmānical texts also use this comparison.

590 Actually, the word gandhabhanaganara does not appear in the Pāli-English Dictionary of Rhys Davids-Stede.

591 Stausza from the Pheonutsa:

a. In Pāli, in Sanāyutta, III, p. 142: Cullaniḍḍa, p. 680: phenapiṭipamam rūpam vedanā bhudapacayam ... miṣyamatac ca viśeṣanām ādityabhāvabhāvamānām. It is commented on in the Visuddhimagga, p. 479 as follows: phenapiṭo vīpa rūpam ... mūḍa vīya viśeṣanām, vaṭakato.

c. In Tibetan, in Madh. avāḍāra, p. 22: gongs ni sba ba rdo pa 'bcva' ... sū ma gshen gyi gnyi stod ston to.

d. In Chinese, in Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 265), k. 10, p. 69a18-20; Wou yin p'i yu king, T 105, p. 501b18-20; Chouei mo so s'o r'go king, T 106, p. 502a16-18.

592 For example, Sanāyutta, IV, p.195-195 (= Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1175, k.43, p.316a32-c). It represents bhūkaṇa avandana (pudgalladvandana) ... samādhībhūta sa samādhiśayasāti. It is commented in the Visuddhimagga, p. 479 as follows: phenapiṭo vīpa rūpam ... mūḍa vīya viśeṣanām, vaṭakato.
There is no reality in a dream but nevertheless we believe in the reality of the things seen in a dream. After waking up, we recognize the falsity of the dream and we smile at ourselves. In the same way, the person deep in the sleep of the fetters (samyojananidra) clings (abhinnivācita) to the things that do not exist; but when he has found the Path, at the moment of enlightenment, he understands that there is no reality and laughs at himself. This is why it is said: like in a dream.

Moreover, by the power of sleep (niḍābhala), the dreamer sees something there where there is nothing. In the same way, by the power of the sleep of ignorance (avidyānāḍā), a person believes in the existence of all kinds of things that do not exist, e.g., ‘me’ and ‘mine’ (ātmānītya), male and female, etc.

Moreover, in a dream, we enjoy ourselves although there is nothing enjoyable there; we are irritated although there is nothing irritating there; we are frightened although there is nothing to be afraid of there.

Finally, there are five types of dreams: i) In the case of physical unbalance (kāyavāsamuk), when the hot vapors predominate, one dreams a lot, one sees fire (teja), yellow (piṇḍa) and red (lohana); ii) when the cold vapors predominate, one sees especially water (apu) and white (avuḍāla); iii) when the windy vapors predominate, one sees particularly birds [of birds] and black (kṛṣṇa); iv) when one has thought a lot during the day and reflected well on what one has seen and heard (dyaspārita), one sees all of that again in dream; v) finally, the gods send dreams to teach about future events. These five types of dreams are all without reality; they are false visions. - It is the same for people [who are awake]: beings who are in the five destinies (gat) see the ātman in four ways because of their material visions: i) the form aggregate (vipakandha) is the ātman; ii) form (rūpa) belongs to the self, to the ‘me’ (ātmānītya); iii) in the ātman, there is rūpa. iv) in rūpa, there is ātman.

What they say here about rūpa they also apply to feeling (vedanā), perception (samjñā), the formations (samskāra) and consciousness (viṣṇāna): this makes 4 × 5 = 20 ways [of considering ātman]. But when they have found the Path and true wisdom has awakened them, they know that [this so-called ātman] has no reality.

You were asking how consciousness could be produced in the absence of conditions (pratypayu). Even though the conditions [consisting of the five sense objects] were lacking, the conditions [necessary for the production] of dharmas (dharmapratyaya) arise by the efficacy (balaparavṛt) of thinking (manasikāra) and of the mind. If somebody tells you about a man with two heads, this statement would produce in you a concept (saṃjñā) and, in a dream, you will see as existent that which does not exist. It is the same for the dharmas: they are non-existent and nevertheless they are seen (dyāsta), heard (śruta) and cognized (vijñāta).

A stanza says:

- All dharmas
- Are like
- A dream, a magic show
- A city of the gandharvas

This is why the bodhisattvas believe that dharmas are like a dream.

A shadow is visible but cannot be grasped. It is the same for dharmas: the organs (indriya) and the sense objects are seen (dyāsta), heard (śruta), cognized (vijñāta) and felt (mata), but their reality is ungraspable. A stanza says:

- True wisdom
- Ungraspable on all four sides
- Cannot be touched
Like a blazing inferno.

Dharmas are impregnable,
They must not be grasped.

Moreover, it is necessary that light be intercepted so that the shadow appears: without this interception, the shadow would be absent. In the same way, it is necessary that the fetters (samyojana) and the afflictions (kleśa) hide the light of correct seeing (samyapdeśi) so that the shadow of the ātman and of dharmas appear.

Moreover, the shadow walks when the person walks, the shadow moves when the person moves, the shadow stops when the person stops. In the same way, the shadow of good or bad actions (kuśalākuśalakarman) moves when the past existence (pravājanma) moves, but it remains stationary when the present existence (tājanma) is stationary because the retribution of actions (karmavipaka) has not been cut. When the sins (āpattī) and merits (punya) are ripe (paripakva), the shadow disappears. Some stanzas say:

Action follows [its perpetrator] through the air,
It pursues him among the rocks,
It accompanies him in the depths of the earth,
It enters the waters of the ocean with him,
It pursues him always and everywhere:

The shadow of actions is indissoluble.

This is why dharmas are like a shadow.

Finally, the shadow is empty (śīnya), non-existent (asat); one may search hard for its reality but one can never find it similarly. All dharmas are empty and without reality.

Question. - It is not true that the shadow is empty and without reality. Why? It is said in the A pī t'ān (Abhidharma): “What is called ‘visible’? Blue (ānula), yellow (āpūta), red (āloha), white (avaddha), black (kṛṣṇa), deep red, light blue, light (āloka) and shadow (cāya).” Moreover, bodily action (kāyakarman) and the three kinds of derived matter (upādhyayupāpa) are called ‘visible’ or rūpīyata. Why do you say that the shadow does not exist? Furthermore, the shadow truly exists because it has causes and conditions (hetupratyaya): its cause is the tree (vṛka); its condition is light (āloka); when these two principal [factors] come together, the shadow is produced. Why do you say that it does not exist? If there is no shadow, the other dharmas also possess causes and conditions would not exist either. - Finally, [104b] this shadow has a visible color. Long (dīrga) or short (kṛṣa), big (mahat) or small (alpa), thick (sthāla) or thin (stūkṣma), crooked (kuṭṭha) or straight (ṛjju); when the shape (samsabhāna) moves, the shadow also moves. All of that is visible. This is why the shadow must exist.

Answer. - The shadow is empty (śīnya) and non-existent (asat). You quote a passage from the Abhidharma, but the interpretation that you give it is that of a person. People often misinterpret the meaning of scriptural texts (dharmaprayāya) and take their inventions as reality. Thus it is said in the Pī pī'cha (Vibhāṣā): "The atoms (paramāṇu) are subtle, indestructible and incomprehensible; therefore they are eternal." And again, "The dharmas of the three times pass from the future (amārga) to the present (pratyayapanna), and from the present to the past (ātīra) without deteriorating." : these texts favor eternalism (ākāvata). On the other hand, it is also said:

"Conditioned dharmas (samskṛtadharma), arising and perishing ever anew, do not last (ashtikā)." This text favors nihilism (uccheda). Why? Because [that which is conditioned] no longer exists after having existed. Thus in the Abhidharma, there are all sorts of statements that contradict the words of the Buddha. We cannot resort to it to establish that the shadow is a type of material dharma (rūpādharma).

When a rūpādharma arises, it necessarily has a smell (gandha), a taste (rasa), tangibility (spraṣṭārya), etc. This is not the case for the shadow. Therefore it does not exist. The jug (ghūta), for example, is cognized by two organs (indriya), the eye organ (caksurindriya) and the organ of touch (kāyendriya). If the shadow existed, it should be cognized by these two organs. But that is not the case and, consequently, the shadow has no true substance. It is but a 'rompt-œuf' (cakṣuravatikāna). If one takes a burning brand and nourishes it rapidly in a circle, one draws a circle in the air with it, but this circle has no reality. Similarly, the shadow has no real substance. If it were a true substance, it could be destroyed or made to disappear, but as long as its screen (samsabhāna) is intact, the shadow is indestructible. This is why it is empty. Finally, since it depends on a screen (samsabhānam apakṣe) and has no independence (ākāvya), the shadow is empty. But even though it is empty, its notion exists and the eye sees it. This is why dharmas are compared to a shadow.

9. Like a reflection (bimba) in a mirror

The reflection in the mirror is not produced by the mirror (ūdaraśīr), nor by the face (vaktra), nor by the person holding the mirror (ūdaradharva), nor by itself (svatābha), but it is without causes and conditions (hetupratyaya).597

595 Ibid., k. 76, p. 303a14-15, referring so as to criticize the opinion of the Dīnāntīkās and Vibhāṣāvādins: "The samsabhāna enters from the future into the present and from the present they enter into the past."
596 Ibid., k. 76, p. 394a29-394b2 (tr. Poussin, La controverse du temps, MCG, V, 1936-37, p. 14): "True dharmas (saddharma), arisen (ājata), existing (bhāta), created (krta ?), conditioned (samokṣa), having an effect (akṣara), produced in dependence (pratyayamūta), are by their nature perishable (kṣayadharma), doomed to disappear (vayadharma), objects of detachment (virādharma), doomed to destruction (nīrodhadharma), doomed to deterioration (nāyamadharma). These dharmas that are not deteriorate is out of the question."
597 This is the canonical doctrine; cf. Solāruṣa in Samyutta, I, p. 134; Tsa a han, T 99 (no, 1203), k. 45, p. 327b–c; T 100 (no. 219), k. 12, p. 455a: naïdham attikatam bimba na ... heṅeday birdsīgati.
Kota, III, p. 34-36, denies the real existence of the reflection because two things do not exist in the same place, because there is no series, because it arises from two causes.
i) Why is it not produced by the mirror? Because there is no reflection if the face does not come in front of the mirror. Thus it is not produced by the mirror. ii) Why is it not produced by the face? Because there is no reflection without the mirror. iii) Why is it not produced by the person holding the mirror? Because there is no reflection without mirror or face. iv) Why is it not produced by itself? Because in the absence of the mirror and the face, there is no reflection. To be produced, the reflection depends (apekṣānte) on the mirror and the face. Thus the reflection is not produced by itself. How is it not lacking causes and conditions? If it were without causes and conditions, it would exist eternally. If it existed eternally, it would be produced even in the absence of the mirror and the face. Thus it is not without causes and conditions. It is the same for the dharmas: they are not produced by themselves (svatāt), nor by another (paratāt), nor by both together (abhayatāt); but they are not without causes and conditions.598

i) Why are they not produced by themselves? They are not produced by themselves because the litman does not exist, because all dharmas come from causes and are not sovereign and because dharmas depend (apekṣānte) on causes and conditions. ii) They are not produced by another. [104c] If they do not themselves exist, their neighbor would not exist either. Creation by another would suppress the efficacious rôle played by sūtras and merits (āpattapunyabhala). Creation by another is of two types, good (kusala) or bad (akusala); the good must produce happiness (sukha), the bad must produce unhappiness (duhkha). If there is a mixture of good and bad, what is the cause and condition from which the happiness arises and what is the cause and condition from which the unhappiness arises? If both are absent, the self and other are likewise absent. iii) If happiness and unhappiness arise without causes and conditions, the person would be eternally happy and free of all unhappiness. If there is neither cause nor condition, the person could not realize the cause of happiness or escape the cause of unhappiness. All dharmas are necessarily from causes and conditions. It is stupid to ignore that. Thus a person gets fire (agni) from wood (dūra), water (udaka) from earth (prthīvī), and wind (ānīla) from a fan (vījāna). Each of these things has its causes and conditions. The causes and conditions of this mass of unhappiness and happiness are the following: the actions (karman) of the past lifetime (pṛvajjānu) are the causes and the good or bad behavior (suvaratadalacarita) of the present lifetime (ibhajjānu) are the conditions from which suffering and happiness come. These are the different causes and conditions of happiness and unhappiness. In truth, there is no agent (ādeeruka) or any enjoyer (vedaka). The five aggregates (pānakṣandhā) are without activity (kriyā) or enjoyment (vedān). The ignorant person who finds happiness enjoys it and clings to it; if he finds unhappiness, he feels irritation; when his happiness disappears, he tries to recover it.

A child, seeing [its] reflection (bhīna) in a mirror (ādara), is happy and becomes infatuated with it; but when this well-liked reflection has disappeared, the child breaks the mirror to try to recover it; wise people make fun of it. In the same way, those who, having lost their happiness, try to regain it, are mocked by the āryas who have found the Path. This is why dharmas are like a reflection in a mirror.

Moreover, the reflection in a mirror is truly empty (ātma), without arising (upādā), without cessation (nirodha), but it deceives the eyes of fools (bimba). In the same way, dharmas are empty, without arising, without cessation, but they deceive the eyes of worldly people (gṛthajāna).

Question. - The reflection in the mirror is the result of causes and conditions. If there is a face, a mirror, a person holding the mirror and a light, provided these causes are brought together, the reflection is produced. Thus the reflection is both cause (hetu) and result (phala). Why do you say then that it is empty of reality, without arising or cessation?

Answer. - Being the result of causes and conditions, the reflection is not independent; therefore it is empty (ātma). A truly existent dharma cannot be the result of causes and conditions. Why? If the cause (kāraṇa) pre-exists in the cause, there is no effect (kāvyā); if the cause does not pre-exist in the cause, there is no result either. Thus, if cream (dāhi) pre-exists in milk (kṛṣaṇa), the milk is not the cause of the cream, for the cream pre-exists. If the cream does not pre-exist in the milk, everything would happen as in water (udaka) where there is no cream: the milk is not the cause of the cream. If the cream existed without cause, why would water not produce cream?599 If the milk is the cause of the cream, the milk, which itself is not independent, also comes from a cause; it derives its origin from the cow (go); [105a] the cow takes its origin from water (udaka) and grass (grāna) and thus there are infinite (ananta) causes. This is why it cannot be said that the result (kāvyā) exists (bhavati) in the cause (kāraṇa), or that it does not exist (na bhavati) in the cause, or that both exists and does not exist (bhavati ca na bhavati ca), or that it neither exists nor does not exist (naiva bhavati na na bhavati) in the cause. Dharmas resulting from causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpattana) do not have self-nature (svabhāva). They are like a reflection in a mirror. Some stanzas say:

If dharmas come from causes and conditions,

598 This is the essence of the Nāgārjunian doctrine given in the first stanza of the Madh. kārikā (Madh, vṛtti, p. 12; Tchong loun, T 1564, k. 1., p. 2b):

"na svato nī pari para na dvābhūtyām nīpy ahetatāte/aparyānta jīte vidyate bhūmāviv kruvacca ke cane/"

"Never, anywhere in any case, do substances exist that are born from themselves, or from another, or from both, or from cause." In conformity with this point of the initial argument, causality by way of itself (svākāṛavā) where the identity of cause and effect has been refuted in Madh. vṛtti, p. 13 and Madh. avāśa, p. 82 (tr. Lav., Muséon, 1910, p. 280); causality by way of another (paratvatva), in Madh. vṛtti, p. 36 and 78; combined causality (abhākāṛavā) in Madh. vṛtti, p. 38 and 233; absence of any causality (ahetumapāntatvā) in Madh. vṛtti, p. 38, 182; Madh. avāśā, p. 207 (tr. Lav., Muséon, 1912, p. 260).

599 According to Nāgārjuna, modification (anyatvāta) of substances is impossible. He establishes this thesis (Madh. vṛtti, p. 242) in the following way:

"tasya ca anvāda bhāvāya kāravā nī ca bhāvā nātā tasya ca anvāda bhāvāya kāravā nātā
tasya ca anvāda bhāvāya kāravā nātā"

"If the modification [of substances] were possible, milk would be identical with cream. Our adversary will say that it is by the disappearance of the state 'milk' that the state 'cream' is produced. But if our adversary does not want the milk to be identical with the cream because they are opposite to one another, it will follow that the cream can arise from anything that is not milk. But how is that? Could the cream arise from water? It is therefore unreasonable to claim that the cream which comes from that which is different from it. Since the modification of substances is impossible, it is wrong to claim that substances have an essence because changes are observed."
There are four other kinds of nirmāṇa: (1) In the realm of desire (kāmadhātu), substances (dravya) can be transformed by means of herbs (osadhā), precious objects (rāmadravya) and magical means; (2) beings endowed with the superknowledges (abhiṣākā) can transform substances by their magical power (ṛddhibala); (3) the devas, nāgas, asuras, etc., can transform substances by means of the power of retribution (vipākabala) of their [previous] lifetimes; (4) beings rewarded in a lifetime in the form realm (rupadhātu) can transform substances by the power of concentration (samādhiśāla). 602

---

600 A. The list of the 16 mahādhātu occurs in Samgraha, p. 221-222, Bodh. bhumī, p. 58-63. It mentions the powers of making the earth shake (kampana, no. 1), of transforming (anyathābhāvakaśana, no. 5), of concentrating and developing (sāṃskṛtyupavāna, no. 7), which correspond to nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 2, of our list.

601 B. The list of the abhiṣākārayam is mentioned in more than 20 places in the Pāli scriptures (Dīgha, I, p. 78; Saṃyutta, II, p. 121; Anguttara, I, p. 170) and its Sanskrit version appears in Pañcaviṃśatikā, p. 83; Kośavyākhyā, p. 654, Mahāvyutpatti, no. 215-223, 227.

602 Pāli Version: So anukālīṣitam idāvibhāvaḥ paccamabbhati: 1) ... 2) eko pi hirtvāhavā bahuḥhā hoti. 3) bahuḥhā eko hoti. 4) āvīrbhāvaḥ tīrvibhāvaḥ [api paccamabbhati]. 5) tiṅkuddāna tirāśākaṇam tirāśākam sāvatāmāna gacchati seyyatāḥ pi āśīkā. 6) pāhucaruḥ pi unnājanīmājanem kariṇa seyyatāḥ pi udāke. 7) udāke pi abhiśākā gacchati seyyatāḥ pi parīkṣayam. 8) āśkaś pi padattha kariṇa seyyatāḥ pi phākhi śakino. 9) ... 10) ... 11) ime pi candamāḥṣrey evaṃ mahābhāvāḥ piṇāṇāmājatā sāvā brahmāloka pi kāyena va samvattati.

Sanskrit Version: So ‘nukālaḥ ṣāṭāvibhāvaḥ pratyanubhavi: 1) āvīrbhāva apākampayati. 2) eko pi hirtvāhavā bhavati. 3) bahuḥhāpi bhavati eko bhavati. 4) āvīrbhāvaḥ tīrvibhāvaḥ api pratyanubhavi. 5) tiṅkuddāna tiṅkuddāna kāmukarimānañī samaravattya api uskuto gacchati tad yatathā nāma āśīka pi phākhi śakino. 6) pāhucaruḥ api unnājanīmājanem kariṇa tathādhāvāḥ nāmādake. 7) udāke ‘bhāvanīmaṇī gacchati tad yatathā nāma āśīkayam. 8) āśkaś parīkṣaṇa kariṇa tathāydhi śakino phākino.

9) āśīkaye api prajñayā api tad tatthāḥ nāma mahān agnīkāndhāḥ. 10) udākaṃ api kāyita pramukhe ati tad yatathā nāma mahānāṃbhagsa. 11) imāci api sāvaraṇavaramanaṃ evaṃ mahābhāvāḥ mahābhūtāḥ pātinaṃ parīkṣayat yāvad Brahmāloka api kāyam varṣe vartayati.

602 Kośa, VII, p. 122, lists five kinds of ṣāṭā: 1) produced by meditation (bhāvanā); 2) innate (sappatītābhāva), iii) realized by magical phrases (śuddhā or mantra keta), iv) by plants (osaduketa), v) coming from actions (karmata).

Like other texts of the Lesser and Greater Vehicles (Avatāmsaka, Māyāśānavagama, Mahāvīraḥ, etc.), the Mppī is aware of the transmutation of metals. On this subject, see A. Waley, References to alchemy in Buddhist scriptures, BSOS, VI, 4, 1932, p. 1102-1103. We should remember that the biographers of Nāgalījūna, Chinese as well as Tibetan, present him above all as an alchemist possessing the elixir of life and able to change stone into gold (cf. Long chou ʻu sa ta chonhun, T 2047, p. 1844; Hsuan tsang, Si yi ku, T 2087, k. 10, p. 936a; Bu ston, II, p. 13; Tāranātha, p. 73; S. Lévi, Kanjila et Śākyānanda, 3A., Jan.-Mar. 1956. p. 105-107). From these references to alchemy in the Mppī, we must not conclude, as does O. Stein, References to alchemy in Buddhist scriptures, BSOS, VII, 1, 1933, p. 263, that the Chih Tsi loum can hardly be earlier than the 8th century. First, it has not been proven that the author of the Mppī is identical with the Nāgalījūna to whom the Rasarāmālīka, a work of the 7th or 8th century, is attributed. As does alchemy, it constitutes one of the elements of tantric Buddhism the origins of which go back further than is generally admitted. G. Tucci, The first mention of Tantric Schools, J. Asiatic Soc. Bengal, XXVI, 1930, p. 128-132, has shown that one tantric sect, that of the Kālālikā, is at least as old as Harivarman and Asaṅga. Finally, and this is the decisive point, the Mppī was translated by Kumārajīva who lived from 344 to 413 A.D.
These imaginary creatures are not subject to birth (jāti), old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa); they experience neither unhappiness (duḥkha) nor happiness (sukha) and thus are different from humans. This is why they are empty and non-existent. In the same way, all dharmas are without arising (utpāda), duration (sthiti) and cessation (bhanga); this is why they are compared to nirmāṇas.

Furthermore, the products of nirmāṇa have no fixed substance (aniyatadāraya); [105b] only insofar as they arise from the mind [of metamorphosis] do they have an activity (kṛtya), but they do not truly exist. It is the same for human lifetimes; for origin, they have no cause; they come from the minds (citta), synonymous here with karman of the past existence giving rise to the existence of the present life which is absolutely without reality. This is why dharmas are compared to a nirmāṇa.

When the nirmāṇa mind (nirmāṇacitta) has vanished, the manifestation (nirmāṇa) vanishes as well. It is the same with dharmas: when the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) have disappeared, the fruit (phala) disappears as well, for it is dependent as is the product of nirmāṇa.

Although they are empty of reality, the nirmāṇas can cause beings to experience joy (muditā), hatred (dveṣa), sadness (daunmanasa), suffering (duḥkha) or confusion (moha). In the same way, although dharmas are empty and unreal, they can cause beings to experience joy (muditā), hatred (dveṣa), sadness (daunmanasa), fear (bhaya), etc. This is why they are compared to a nirmāṇa.

Moreover, the products of metamorphosis (nirmāṇajadharma) lack beginning, middle and end (apīvramadhyacarama); it is the same with dharmas. When the nirmāṇas arise, they do not go anywhere; when they vanish, they do not go anywhere. It is the same with dharmas.

Finally, the nirmāṇas are pure (lakṣaṇavāsuddha) like space (abhās); they are not attached to (sakta) nor defiled by (kṣīna) sins or merits (pāpa/puṇya). It is the same for the dharmas, for suchness (dharmaśī), the true nature (taṅkatā) or the summit of existence (bhūtadāna) is itself (svātva) always pure (nityaśuddha). Thus the four great rivers of Jambudvīpa,603 each of which has five hundred tributaries, have their waters polluted in various ways, but when they flow into the great ocean, they are perfectly clear.

603 The canonical and post-canonical scriptures list five great rivers (paśca mahānādiya) in Jambudvīpa: Gaṅgā, Yamunā (Jāmuna), Sarasvāti (Saṅju), Acīravati (Rapti), Mahī (Gayā district). Cf. Vinaya, II, p. 237, 239; Samyutta, II, p. 135; V, p. 401; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 101; V, p. 22; Milinda, p. 70. 87. 380; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 2, p. 428c; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 30, p. 215a, Jānapparāṣṭrāṇa, T 1543, k. 1, p. 772b; T 1544, k. 1, p. 918c.

Although the Mūsa is aware of these paśca mahānādiya which it enumerates at k. 28, p. 266a, here it means the four great rivers which flow out of Lake Anuvatapta: Gaṅgā, Śindhu (Indus), Vaiśa (Oxus) and Śīrā (Tarim). It will describe these fully below (k. 7, p. 114a). The perspective of the Mūsa is wider than that of the canonical scriptures whose horizon was limited to Gaṅgetic India. At least this is the reason given by the Vībhāṣa, T 1543, k. 5, p. 216c-22a. When the Bhadanta (Kātyāyana)putra composed this Jānapparāṣṭrāṇa, he was in the East [i.e., in eastern India]; this is why he cites as example the five rivers commonly in the East. But actually there are four great rivers in this Jambudvīpa, each of which gives rise to four secondary rivers: the Gaṅgā, the Śindhu, the Vaiśa and the Śīrā. These four great rivers are known and cited in southern Indian Buddhism in preference to the paśca mahānādiya: cf. Dīghāghanī Cosmography (T 1, k. 18, p. 116c; T 23, k. 1, p. 289; T 24, k. 1, p. 313a; T 25, k. 1, p. 368a); the Vībhāṣa (l.c.), the Kośa, III, p. 147; the Saddharmamūlayaparāṣṭhāna in (S. Lévi, Pour l’histoire du Rāmāyaṇa, 3A, Jan.-Feb., 1918, p. 150); Hsuan tsang, Si yu kī, T 2007, k. 1, p. 809b (cf. Watts, Travels, I, p. 32-34).

As in the present passage of the Mūsa, the Cosmography of the Dīghāgama (l.c.) and the Si m i kousan king, T 159, k. 4, p. 307b, attributes 500 tributaries to each of the four great rivers. In contrast, the Vībhāṣa (k. 5, p. 22a) enumerates four tributaries to each of them (cf. Lévi, I, c. p. 151).

Eastern and northern traditions are contrasted in a passage from Milinda: while the Pāli version enumerates (p. 70) the paśca mahānādiya (Gaṅgā, Yamunā, Acīravati, Mahī), the corresponding passage in the Chinese translation cites the four great rivers flowing out of Anuvatapta (Gaṅgā, Śindhu, Śīrā, Vaiśa) plus a fifth river, still unidentified, the Che pī yi, and attributes 500 tributaries to each of these rivers (Cf. Deméville, Les versions chinoises du Milindapātha, BFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 152-153; 230-231).

This is not the only example where the two traditions do not agree about the same text. Thus the Śaptasūryadārayaśūra tells us that at the time of the third [variant; Fourth] sun, the ‘great rivers’ dry up and disappear. In some versions of this ultra (Pāli Aṅguttara, IV, p. 101; Chinese Madhyamāgama, T 26, k. 2, p. 428c), these rivers are the Gaṅgā, the Yamunā, the Sarasvāti, the Acīravati and the Mahī. On the other hand, in other versions of the same ultra (Sa po to sou li yu nai ye king, T 30, p. 812a; Chinese Ekottarāgama, T 125, k. 34, p. 736b; Mūsa, T 1509, k. 31, p. 290b), the rivers in question are the Gaṅgā, the Śindhu, the Śīrā and the Vaiśa. It is to this latter tradition, the northern tradition, that the Mūsa belongs.

604 Cf. Kośa, II, p. 245 (six kṣetra); II, p. 299 (four pratyaya).
Question. - Any dharma whatsoever is as empty (śūnya) as the ten points of comparison [used here in the sūtra]; why does the sūtra limit itself to these ten comparisons and not give as example mountains (parvata), rivers (nadi), stone walls (saalakapura), etc?

[106a] Answer. - Although all dharmas are empty, there are differences (viśeṣa) among them: emptiness is harder to see in some than in others. Here the sūtra compares [dharmas] the emptiness of which is hard to see [with other dharmas, e.g., magic show, mirage, etc.], the emptiness of which is easy to see.

Moreover, there are two types of dharmas: those that are the object of an erroneous judgment (citābhāvinivesathāna) and those that are not the object of an erroneous judgment (citābhāviniveṣathāna). Here we are using the second type in order to understand the first type.

Question. - Why are the ten points of comparison not the object of erroneous judgment?

Answer. - Because these ten points [magic show, mirage, etc.] do not last for a long time (acircavātika) and because they arise and perish easily. This is why they are not the object of an erroneous judgment.

Moreover, there are people who know that these ten points bring about auditory and visual delusions, but who do not know that dharmas are empty. This is why the sūtra compares dharmas [to these ten points] here. If people believed in the reality of the ten points of comparison [used by the sūtra], they would not understand the various objections [raised here against the reality of dharmas] because they would hold [the magic show, the mirage, etc.] to be real. If these ten points of comparison do not fulfill their rôle [in the discussion], we would need to resort to yet other demonstrations (dharmaparyaya).

20. ASAŚGAVAŚĀRADYAPRATILABDHA

Sūtra: They have acquired the unhindered fearlessnesses (asaṅgavāśāradyapratilabdhā).

Sāstra: Their mind encounters no obstacle (dvarana), neither exhaustion (kṣaya) nor cessation (nirodha), in regard to the various aggregates (skandha), elements (dhātu), bases of consciousness (āyatana) or causes and conditions (hetupratyaya). Thus they have unhindered fearlessnesses (asaṅgavāśāradhā).

Question. - The sūtra said above that in the midst of infinite assemblies the bodhisattvas are endowed with the fearlessnesses (anantaparāśavāśāradhāsamanvāgatah); why does it repeat here that they have unhindered fearlessnesses?

Answer. - Above, it was a question of the cause (hetu) of the vāśāradhās, here it concerns their effect (phala). In the assemblies (sahāga), including those of the bodhisattvas, their preaching (dharmaparyaya) is ineshaubhāt (aksāya), their teaching (upadēsa) indomitable (anapakaraśa) and their mind (citta) imperturbable, for they have acquired the unhindered fearlessnesses. Moreover, the sūtra said above that they are fearless in the midst of infinite assemblies, but one does not know by virtue of what power they are fearless. This is why here it adds that they are fearless because they have acquired an unhindered power (asaṅgabala).

Question. - If the bodhisattvas, like the Buddha, have these unhindered fearlessnesses, how does the Buddha differ from them?

Answer. - We have said that the bodhisattvas who have the power of the fearlessnesses [106a] experience no fear in respect to any dharma. But that is not the [superior] fearlessnesses enjoyed by the Buddha. Moreover, there are two kinds of unhindered dharmas (asaṅgadharma), universal (sarvagama, sarvatālānākṣa) and non-universal (asaṅga). The person, for example, who experiences no difficulty in a whole series of texts (śāstra), from one text to a hundred thousand texts, or who experiences no fear in front of a whole series of assemblies (sahāga), from one to a hundred thousand assemblies, is non-universal. In the same way, the bodhisattvas do not encounter any obstacle in their own wisdom (prajñā) but rather in that of the Buddha. Thus when the Buddha dropped his begging bowl (gātra), the five hundred arhats and the bodhisattvas, Maitreyā, etc., were unable to catch hold of it.605 In the same way, the bodhisattvas encounter no obstacles in their own power (ḥala), but they do in that of the Buddha’s wisdom. It is in this sense that we say that the bodhisattvas have unfettered fearlessness (asaṅgavāśāradhā).

21. AVATĀRAKUṢĀLA

Sūtra: Citation of the course (gati) of the mind and the conduct (carita) of beings, they were skilled in saving them (avatārakṣāla) by means of their subtle wisdom (sāṅkajālāna).

Sāstra: Question. - How do the bodhisattvas know the minds and conduct of beings?

Answer. - They know the minds and the actions of beings; they are like the light of the sun which shines everywhere; they know where the thoughts and acts of beings will lead and they instruct them on these subjects, saying: “Beings have two types of courses (gati): either their mind is always in search of pleasure (ukha) or their wisdom succeeds in distinguishing good from bad. Do not follow your inclinations (satigacita); apply yourselves to wisdom (prajñā), redirect your thoughts. For innumerable kalpas you have accumulated actions of mixed value (miśrakarman) without stopping; you pursue only worldly pleasures (lokasukha) without understanding that they are suffering (dukkha); you do not see that the world that covets pleasure falls into misfortune and will be reborn in the five destinations (gati). Who is able to undo what has been done by the mind? You are like a mad elephant (gandharbhatīra) that tramples, destroys, pillages and demolishes without allowing itself to be controlled. Who will be able to tame you? If you find a skilful tamer, you will escape the torments of the world, you will understand the impurity of the rebirths. The fetter of misfortune is like hell (niṣaya). If one is reborn there, it is old age (jāra), sickness (vyadhī), death (mahāvan), suffering (dukkha), sadness (duṣkaramanaya), and all kinds of confusion; if one is reborn in the heavens (svarga), one will fall back down in the threefold world (traiśāla). There is no peace. Why 605 Cf. Lalithavistara, p. 270 (tr. Foucaux, p. 232): When the Bodhisattva had eaten the honey milk-broth (madhabhāja) that Suṣrata had offered, not caring about the golden vase (saṅgaroṣayaḥ), he dropped it in the water. Śīlāra, king of the nāgas took it and went to his home. However, Indra, having taken the shape of a gandā with a lightning-bolt in his beak, tried to take the golden vase away from the nāga king with no success. Then in his usual form, he courteously asked for it and brought it back to the Tīrthankāriya heaven to build a caitya for it and to pay homage to it. - This ‘beef of the bow’ is represented on a medallion on the bulwarks of Amaruṭi (see RAA, XI, 1937, pt XVI, or Histoire universelle des Arts, published by L. Réau, vol. IV, Arts musulmans et Extrême-Orient, Paris, 1939, p. 142, fig. 103). do you cling to pleasures?” Such are the various reproaches (avaśyā) made by the bodhisattvas to them, and this proves that they know the mind and conduct of beings.

Question. - How do they save them by means of their subtle wisdom? First, what is subtle wisdom (svāsmitā)?

Answer. - Coarse wisdom is a purely mundane skill (laukikamaipunya); generosity (dāna), discipline (śīla), and concentration (samādhi) are called subtle wisdom.

Furthermore, the wisdom of generosity is a coarse wisdom; the wisdom of discipline and concentration (śīlasamādhipījāna) is subtle wisdom.

Furthermore, the wisdom of dhyāna is coarse wisdom; dhyāna without bliss (prairādhi) is a subtle wisdom. [106b]

Furthermore, it is a coarse wisdom that grasps all the characteristics of dharmas (dharmanakṣaṇa), but it is a subtle wisdom that does not accept or reject any characteristic of dharmas.

Finally, destroying ignorance (avidyā) and the other afflictions (kleśa) and discovering the nature of dharmas is a coarse wisdom; but penetrating into the true nature, incorruptible and imperishable like gold (svārman), indestructible and unchangeable like diamond (svijra), un tarnishable and ungraspable like space (ākāśa), is a subtle wisdom.

These are the innumerable subtle wisdoms that the bodhisattvas have acquired and which they teach beings. Thus the sūtra says that, knowing the course of the mind and the activity of beings, the bodhisattvas are skilled in saving them by means of the subtle wisdom.

CHAPTER XII: UNHINDERED MIND

Text of the sūtra commented on in this chapter (cf. Pañcaviṃśatī, p. 5, Śatasāhasrikā, p. 5): (22) apratihatatcittā, (23) adhījahatiśaśrayasamudgatair, (24) yathātmāvedātānukṣīsādīnāḥ.

These bodhisattvas had a mind without obstacles; they were endowed with utmost patience; they excelled in saving appropriately.

*** *** ***

22. APRATIHATACITTA

Sūtra: Their mind had no obstacles (apratihatacitta).

Śāstra: How is their mind unhindered?

i) In respect to all people, enemies (vairīn), relatives (bandha) or neutral ones, their impartiality (samacittatī) is complete (aparāñgha).

ii) [This impartiality] is extended to beings of all the universes (svaḥvaksadhisthānāt): they feel no hostility (āghāta) if someone comes to torment them; they feel no joy (mudita) if they are honored in many ways. A stanza says:

They have no attachment
Towards the Buddha or the bodhisattvas;
They have no hostility
Towards heretics or bad people.

This purity [of mind] is called apratihatacitta.

iii) Finally, their mind is without obstacles in regard to dharmas.

Question. - But these bodhisattvas have not attained buddhahood and do not yet possess omniscience (sarvajñāna); why does their mind not encounter obstacles in regard to the dharmas?

Answer. - Having attained immense pure wisdom (apramāṇavisuddhāprajñā), their mind is free of obstacles with regard to dharmas.

Question. - But since they have not reached buddhahood, they cannot possess immense wisdom (apramāṇa-ājñāna); since they retain a residue of fetters (bandhāna), they cannot have pure wisdom.

Answer. - The bodhisattvas [in question here] are not the bodhisattvas with fleshly body (māṃsakāya), who are bound to actions and limited to the threefold world (traiḍhātaka). All of them have acquired the sovereignty of the dharma-kāya (dharmanakāyāvārya) and transcended old age (jāra), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maraṇa); out of compassion for beings, they dwell in the universes (lokadhātu), move about in and adorn the buddha-fields (buddhaksetra) and convert beings. Having acquired sovereignty (aśīvarya), they wish to become Buddha and to succeed therein.606

Question. - If the bodhisattvas of the dharmakāya are not different from the Buddha, why are they called bodhisattva; why do they serve the Buddha and listen to his teaching? If they are different from the Buddha, why do they still have to cut through death (maraṇa) and obtain real purity completely; if they are not distinct dharmas but merely [three] different results of his actions; the bodhisattva of dharmakāya (bhāmakāya) who transcends ordinary existence and exists in accordance with the dharmadhātu. The bodhisattva abandons his fleshly body and attains a body of dharmadhātu when he enters into the samādhiyūyāna and acquires the patience which accepts and understands non-arising (anupātikādharmakāya). Cf. Mppī, k. 36, p. 278a; k. 34, p. 309b; k. 38, p. 340a. These passages have been translated and explained by L. de La Valée Poussin in Siddhā, p. 780-784.

For the strict analogy of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas, the Hobogirin, Boutra, p. 149, has collected a number of references of which several have been taken from the Mppī. In general, it can be said that the great bodhisattva is 'the result of the dharmadhātu' (dharmañjaya-prabhāvita); cf. Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 159, citing the Tathāgataguhṣastra, whereas the Buddha is 'the sovereign of the dharmadhātu' (dharmañjaya-vatavartini); cf. Lankāvatara, p. 70.

607 For the strict analogy of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas, the Hobogirin, Boutra, p. 149, has collected a number of references of which several have been taken from the Mppī. In general, it can be said that the great bodhisattva is 'the result of the dharmadhātu' (dharmañjaya-prabhāvita); cf. Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 159, citing the Tathāgataguhṣastra, whereas the Buddha is 'the sovereign of the dharmadhātu' (dharmañjaya-vatavartini); cf. Lankāvatara, p. 70.

608 The Mppī distinguishes two types of bodhisattvas: the bodhisattva of fleshly body (māṃsākāya b) who is reborn as a result of his actions; the bodhisattva of dharmakāya (bhāmakāya b) who transcends ordinary existence and exists in accordance with the dharmadhātu. The bodhisattva abandons his fleshly body and attains a body of dharmadhātu when he enters into the samādhiyūyāna and acquires the patience which accepts and understands non-arising (anupātikādharmakāya). Cf. Mppī, k. 36, p. 278a; k. 34, p. 309b; k. 38, p. 340a. These passages have been translated and explained by L. de La Valée Poussin in Siddhā, p. 780-784.

609 During his last fleshly existence (caramam) the bodhisattva contemplates the Buddhas of the ten directions (cakramadgata) and their emanations (nirmāṇa); he is seated in space opposite them. This is what is called 'endowed with utmost patience'. It is like in the ārāhaka system where the increase (vyuddhi) of heat (asamgata) is called summit (mārūhana) and the increase of summit is called patience (kṣánti): they are not distinct dharmas but merely [three] different degrees [of one and the same thing].610 Thus it is the same for the utmost patience (adhimātrakṣánti) and the patience of equanimity (samatākṣánti) [which constitute different degrees of the same patience].
Furthermore, there are two kinds of patience: the patience towards beings (sattvakṣānti) and the patience towards dharmas (dharmaṃkṣānti). The patience towards beings relates to beings: if beings as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānādi-viśālasyasaṃsāra) persecute you in every way, you do not feel any anger (dveṣa); if they honor you (arhayanti) and pay homage to you (pūjyaanti) in every way, you experience no joy (mudūḥ). Moreover, you know that beings have no beginning (agra); if they have no beginning, they have no causes and conditions (hetupratyaya); if they have no causes and conditions, they have no end either. Why? Because the beginning and the end are interdependent (anyonyaśākṣa). If they have neither beginning nor end, they have no middle (madhyya) either.611 When things are seen in this way, one does not fall into the [107a] two extreme views (antādhyaya) of eternalism (sāvata) and nihilism (uccheda); it is by means of the way of safety (yogākāsena) that one considers beings without producing wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭi). This is what is called patience towards beings (sattvakṣānti).

The patience relating to dharmas (dharmaṃkṣānti) is the unhindered mind (apraṇatatacitā) relating to profound dharmas (gambhīradharma).

Question. - What are the profound dharmas?

Answer. - See the explanation already given for gambhīradharma. By gambhīradharma we mean the following: In the twelve-membered pratyahārā, the product is result successively; the result (phala) is not present in the cause (hetu), but neither is it absent; it is from this intermediate state that it arises. This is called gambhīradharma.

Furthermore, when the three gates of liberation (vimokṣaṃkha), namely, emptiness (śūnyatā), signlessness (ānūmita) and wishlessness (āpraṇatvīta), are penetrated, the eternal bliss of nirvāṇa is found. This also is a gambhīradharma.

Finally, it is also a gambhīradharma to consider dharmas as neither empty (śūnyā) nor non-empty (aśūnyā), neither with marks (sanmāna) nor without marks (anamāna), neither active (akṣīrya) nor inactive (upakṣīrya) and, by considering them thus, not to attach one’s mind to it. Some stanzas say:

Dharmas resulting from causes and conditions
Are called empty of nature (śūnyalakṣaṇa),
Are described as conventional (prajñaptiśānta),
Are called the Middle path (madhyamā pratipad).
If dharmas really existed
They would not return into nothingness.
Not existing after having existed (bhūtva abhūva)
Is what is called annihilation (ucchāsa).
When there is neither eternalism nor nihilism,
Neither existence nor non-existence,
The basis of the mind and of consciousness disappears
And words are exhausted.

Faced with these gambhīradharmas, the mind of the bodhisattvas experiences neither difficulty (āvarana) nor repugnance (vipratītā) nor any set back. This is why they are endowed with utmost patience (adhimātraksāntaṃ sāmarṣaṇa).

24. YATHĀTMYĀVATĀRAṆUṢKUṢALĀ

Sūtra: They excelled in saving appropriately (yathātmyāvatāraṇuṣkulaśānti).

Śāstra: The systems of the heretics (tirūtakadhāraṇa), while saving beings, do not save them appropriately, because all kinds of wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭi) and fetters (sannyogana) remain.

- The two vehicles, [that of the śrāvakas and that of the pratyekabuddhas], while possessing the means of salvation, do not save as they should (yathātmyogam), for their adepts, not being omniscient (sarvaśūnyam), use only rather rudimentary skillful means (upāgaśayacitam). It is only bodhisattvas who can save appropriately.

[There is a good and a bad way of saving beings, just as there is a good way and a bad way to cross a river or to cure a sickness.] Thus, to take someone across to the other shore, the master ferryman (taraṃdirāya) is able to use a fisherman’s straw raft (kaivartaṭṭnakola) or a big boat (nauvu); there are notable differences between these two ways of crossing. In the same way, [the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas lead beings to] the other shore of salvation by using the straw raft of the Lesser Vehicle, whereas the bodhisattvas take them across in the ship of the Greater Vehicle. Or again, there are different remedies for curing sicknesses (vyādhiḥ), such as medicinal herbs (osadhā) or cauteryization with a needle; but there is a still more wonderful herb called Sou rō čhan rō (Buddhāśāntā) which it suffices that the sick person looks at it and all his ills are cured. Although these remedies seem similar, their qualities differ. It is the same for the śrāvakas and the pratyekakāthudas in their methods of converting beings: asceticism (sapaḥ), dhītāṅga, practice of the three truths (prathama-madhyama-pācicīma-yāma), exertion (vīracītta) and ecstasy (dhītāṅga). According to the śrāvaka doctrine, one finds the Path by considering suffering (adukkhā); according to the bodhisattva doctrine, the mind finds purity (visādhi) by considering the dharmas as free of bonds (handhana) and free of deliverance (mokṣa). Compare the Wen chou che lo pen yuen (Mañjuśrīyadāna).

Mahāyāna said to the Buddha: "Bhagavat, once in times gone by, (bhāsapatīvam atīhe śārvāni) - [107b] innumerable incalculable periods ago - there was a Buddha called Che tseu yin wang (Sīmānghārāja). The lifetime of the Buddha and of beings was a hundred thousand koṭinayata years; the Buddha saved beings by the three Vehicles (yānāya); the country was called Ts’ien kouang ming (Sahastālōka). In this land, the trees (vrksa) were made of the seven jewels (sastraparṇa) and emitted immense and pure sounds of the Dharma (apramāṇaviśuddhadharmavara); the sounds of emptiness (śūnyatā), siglessness (anaittata), wishlessness (apravāhita), non-arising (anupādā), non-cessation (anuvāda) and nothingness (ākāśayāna). The beings who heard these sounds found their minds opening up and discovered the Path. When the Buddha Simhanārāja preached the Dharma to the first assembly, 99 kōtis of human beings attained the state of arhat. It was the same for the bodhisattva assembly: all these bodhisattvas had acquaintance of the teaching of non-arising (anupattikadhamkāntā), they penetrated all sorts of religious texts (dharmaśaripūya), they saw innumerable Buddhas whom they served (arcana) and honored (pjījā), they were able to save innumerable and incalculable beings, they possessed innumerable dhāraniśūkhas, they used innumerable samādhīs of all kinds; from the first production of mind (pratihāracittotpāda), they had crossed through the gate of the Path. It would be impossible to cite and list all these bodhisattvas and describe the beauties (ālamākāra) of this buddha-field (budhākṣetra). Finally, when the Buddha had converted them all, he entered into nirvāṇa-without-remainer (nirupadhīśesinirvāṇa); his Dharma lasted 60,000 more years and even the trees stopped sounding the sounds of the Dharma (dharmavara).

There were, at that time, two bodhisattva bhikṣus named Hī ken (Prasannendriya) and Cheng yi (Agramati). The Dharma teacher Prasannendriya, of frank and simple manner, had mentioned the things of the world (lokadharmā) and did not distinguish good from evil. His disciples were intelligent (medhāvin), loved the Dharma and understood admirably the profound meaning (gambhīrārtha). Their teacher did not recommend moderation in desires (adpratihāra) to them or the observance of the precepts (śīlacakrā) or the practice of the dhītas. He spoke to them only of the true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) of the dharmas which is pure (visādhi). He said to them: ‘The dharmas are characterized by desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and delusion (moha), but all these characteristics (lakṣana) may be reduced to the true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) of the dharmas which is without hindrance (apravāhita).’ It was by these soteriological means (upāya) that he instructed his disciples and introduced them into the knowledge of the unique nature (ekulakṣaṇaḥkāra). Thus his disciples felt no hostility (pratigha) or affection (anunaya) for people and, as their minds were unperturbed, they had obtained the patience towards beings (sattvākṣānti); provided with the patience towards beings, they acquired the patience relating to the dharmas (dharmaṣānti). In the presence of the true doctrine, they remained motionless (acala) like a mountain.

By contrast, the Dharma teacher Agramati, clinging to the purity of the precepts (śīlavādhi), practiced the twelve dhītas, had acquired the four dhīyanas and the formless absorptions (ārūpyajñāpatti). His disciples were of weak faculties (nyāvindriya) and clung to distinguishing the pure (śīladha [practices] from the impure (aśīladha) ones; their minds were always disturbed [by qualms].

On various occasions, Agramati went to the village (grāma) among the disciples of Prasannendriya, and seated there, he praised the precepts (śīla), moderation in desires (alpecchāvantarṣi), the practice of solitude (aranya) and the dhīyanas. He criticized their teacher Agramati, saying: ‘This man, who preaches the Dharma and teaches people, introduces them into wrong views (mithyādyeyṣi). He says that desire (rāga), anger (dveṣa) and delusion (moha) are not an obstacle (pratigha), that people of mixed practices (mitrāvakṣa) are not really pure.’ The disciples of Prasannendriya, who had keen faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) and the patience relating to [107f] dharmas, asked Agramati:

- O Venerable One, what are the characteristics of desire?
- Desire has affliction as its nature.

- Is this affliction of desire internal (adhymatma) or external (bahirāda)?
- If desire is neither internal (adhymatma) nor external (bahirāda) nor at the four directions (hetuprātyaya) to take birth; if it were external, it would not have anything to do with the self and would be unable to torment people.

People then retorted:

- If desire is neither internal (adhymatma) nor external (bahirāda) nor in the [four] directions; in the east (pūrvaśayyāni dīśi), in the south (daksināśayyāni dīśi), in the west (paśčimāśayyāni dīśi) or in the north (utarāśayyāni dīśi), nor in the four intermediate directions (vidikṣas), nor at the zenith (ubhayaśayyāni dīśī) or at the nadir (adhastād dīśi), one might look everywhere for its true nature and one would never find it. This dharma does not arise (naopādāte) and does not cease (na nirvāṇate) and, since it lacks the characteristics of birth and cessation (upādiṁtralakṣaṇa), it is empty (śūna) and non-existent (ākāśana). How could it torment [the Śāman]?"

Deeply displeased on hearing these words, Agramati could not reply. He rose from his seat, saying: [Your teacher] Prasannendriya deceives many beings and clings to wrong ways (mithyādyeyṣi).’ This bodhisattva Agramati did not know the ghoṣa-praveśasudhāraṇa; he was happy when he heard the speech of the Buddha and grieved when he heard a heteretical (tīrthika) word; he was sad when he heard speak of the three evil (akāla) things and rejoiced when he heard speak of the three good things (kaśita); he hated speaking about sāṃśāra and loved to speak about nirvāṇa. Leaving the dwellings of the vāisiya, he went back to the forest and returned to his monastery (vihāra). He said to his bhihaks: ‘You should know that the bodhisattva Prasannendriya is an impostor who leads people to evil. Why? He claims that the nature of desire, hatred and delusion (rāgadveṣamohalakṣaṇa) as well as all the other dharmas is not an obstacle.'
Then the bodhisattva Prasannendriya had this thought: "This Agramati who is so fierce is covered with faults and will fall into great sins (mahāpatti). I am going to teach him the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma). Even if he cannot grasp it today, this teaching will earn him buddhahood later." Then gathering the sangha together, Prasannendriya spoke these stanzas:

Rāga is the Path,
Dveṣa and moha are also the Path.
In these three things are included Innumerable states of buddhahood.
Whoever makes a distinction Between rāga-dveṣa-moha and the Path Departs as far from the Buddha As the sky is far from the earth.
The Path and rāga-dveṣa-moha Are one and the same thing.
The person who listens to his fears Wanders far from buddhahood.
Rāga is not born, it does not perish,
It is incapable of calling forth anxiety;
But if the person believes in the atman Rāga will lead him to bad destinies.
To distinguish existence (bhava) from non-existence (abhava)
Is not freeing oneself from them.

Prasannendriya spoke seventy more stanzas of this kind and at that moment, 30,000 devaputraś found acquisience in the doctrine of non-production (anupattikadharmaśānti); 18,000 śrāvakas, detached from all dharmas, found deliverance (vimokṣa). The bodhisattva Agramati fell into hell (nīraṇa) where he suffered torments for 10,000,000 years; then he was reborn among humans where he was exposed to ridicule for 740,000 lifetimes. For innumerable kalpas he never heard the name of the Buddha pronounced, but, as his sin was becoming lighter, he heard the Buddhist doctrine preached. Becoming a monk (pravrajita) in search of the Path, he gave up the precepts (śīla) and so, for 603,000 lifetimes, he completely neglected the precepts. Finally, for innumerable lifetimes, he was a śrāmaṇa, but although he no longer neglected the precepts, his faculties remained closed (avyṛta). - As for the bodhisattva Prasannendriya, he is the Buddha in the eastern region (pūrvasyāṃ diśā) beyond 100,000 koṭis of buddha-fields (budhakṣetra); his land is called Pao yen (Ratnavyātha) and he himself is named Kouang yu ming wang (Sūryālokasamatikramantariṣṭa). Maluṣūr śrīpajñā [continued this story], saying to the Buddha: "At that time, I was the bhikṣu Agramati; I knew that I had to endure these immense sufferings." Maluṣūr śrī said again: "Those who seek the Path of the three vehicles (yānatrayamārga) and do not want to undergo such suffering should not reject the [true] nature of dharmas or give themselves up to hatred (dveṣa)."

The Buddha then asked him: "When you heard these stanzas [of Prasannendriya], what benefit did you get from them?" Maluṣūr śrī replied: "When I heard these stanzas, I came to the end of my suffering. From lifetime to lifetime I had sharp faculties (tīkṣṇendriya) and wisdom (prajñā), I was able to find the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma) and I excelled in preaching the profound meaning (gambhīrattra); I was foremost among all the bodhisattvas."

Thus 'to be skillful in preaching the [true] nature of the dharmas' is 'to excel in saving appropriately (yāthātmyāvatāraṇakuśala).'

[108a] Recognizing their fundamental identity
Is to win the victory and realize buddhahood.
CHAPTER XIII: THE BUDDHA-FIELDS

[k. 7, 108a] Text of the sūtra commented on in this chapter [cf. Pañcaviṃśati, p. 5; Śatāśhāsuitīku, p. 5-7]:

(25) Apramāṇa-buddhakṣetrapraṇidhānaparigṛhitair
(26) apramāṇa-buddhakṣetra-buddhānumārtisamādhiṣatassatamāttihmahābhūtair,
(27) aparamitabuddhahṛdayanakṣalaśai (28) nāṇḍrīṣṭiparyavasthānaklekapraśamanakṣalaiś,
(29) samādhiṣatāsahavārthāvāravikṛtiṇāmānakṣalaiś evanvādhaśi cāpamāṇakārau samavāgaṃtaś.

Tadyathā Bhudrapalena ca bodhisattvāna mahāsattvāna Ratnakarāna ca Sārthvāvēna ca Narađattena ca Śāhuguptena ca Varunadattena ca Indradattena ca Utunaratāna ca Viṣeṣamatāna ca Varudhatāna ca Amoghadaṇanā ca Susamprasthitena ca Saṃvīrvandīkārimitāna ca Niṇyodhotāna ca Anisiptadalārṇena ca Śāryagarbhanā ca Anumamcintīna ca Avalokiteśvareṇa ca Maḥāṣoreṇa ca Ratnasudrāhānena ca Niṇyokṣitapaṣaṃstena ca Maityreṇa ca bodhisattvāna mahāsattvāna, evanpramāṇakārau anekabodhisattvakoṣatiṇyatavahānāh sārđham sārvar ekajāptaḥpradhaid bhāvyatvāna kamudrābhūtair.

These bodhisattvas took possession of an infinite number of buddha-fields by means of their aspirations; they always turned to the concentrations commemorating the Buddhas of innumerable buddha-fields; they excelled in inviting innumerable Buddhas; they excelled in destroying various wrong views, entanglements and defilements and were endowed with innumerable qualities of this kind. [The Buddha was thus accompanied] by the bodhisattva-mahāsattva Hṛḍrālahā, etc. (see the listing in the text) at the head of countless hundreds of thousands of kōṇāyutias of bodhisattvas who were all in a state of uncertainty awaiting succession and were still to accede to Buddhadhā.

*** *** ***

25. BUDDHAKṢETRAPRAṆIDHĀNAṆAPARIGRHIŘHETĀ

Śūtra: They have taken possession of an infinite number of buddha-fields by means of their aspirations (apramāṇa-buddhakṣetrapraṇidhānaparigṛhitaiḥ).

Śāstra: Seeing the wondrous infinities (apramāṇavrāhā) of the buddha-fields (buddhakṣetra),612 these bodhisattvas formed all kinds of aspirations (praṇidhāna).

[108b] There is a buddha-field free of all suffering (āluḥka) where the question of the threefold evil (pāpaṇya) has never been heard. The bodhisattva who has it enunciates the following aspiration:

“When I will be Buddha, may my field be thus free of all suffering and may the threefold evil never be heard of there.”

There is a buddha-field adorned with the seven jewels (saptarāmālāmārtha) which is always bathed in clear light (vīśādha-prabhā) although it has neither sun (śūrya) nor moon (candramāsa). [The bodhisattva who has seen it] formulates the following aspiration: “When I will be Buddha, may my field be always bathed thus in pure light.”

There is a buddha-field where all the beings practice the ten wholesome actions (dharma-kāla) and have great wisdom (mahāprajñā), where garments, coverlets and food appear at will. [The bodhisattva who has seen it] formulates the following aspiration: “When I will be Buddha, may beings in my field also find garments, coverlets and food at will.”

There is a buddha-field where the pure bodhisattvas have the physical appearance of the Buddha with his thirty major marks (laṅkāna) and his brilliant light, where there is no question of śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas and where women (śrī) are completely absent; all the inhabitants follow the profound marvelous Path of the Buddhas, travel in the ten directions and convert all beings. [The bodhisattva who has seen it] formulates the following aspiration: “When I will be Buddha, may the beings in my field be like this.”

This is how the bodhisattvas aspire to and attain all the marvellous (nāṇāvidhāvīrhā) of innumerable buddha-fields, and this is why the sūtra says that they have acquired an infinite number of buddha-fields by means of their aspirations (apramāṇa-buddhakṣetrapraṇidhānaparigṛhitai).

Question. - But by the virtue of their conduct and their actions (carītakarmaviśuddhā), the bodhisattvas automatically obtain good rewards (ālāhaviśāpaṭa). Why must they first aspire to them in order to obtain them later? A farmer who has grain, must he still wish for it?

Answer. - Merit (pāṇīya) is ineffective without aspiration (praṇidhāna). Making the aspiration (praṇidhānapraṇidhan) is the guide that leads to the result. In the same way, metal-casting requires a master, the crude metal [itself] being formless (anvacita). Thus the Buddha said: “Some people cultivate (bhāvyavantaḥ) the limited merit of generosity (dāna) or morality (śīla), but are ignorant of the law of merit; learning that there are wealthy happy people, they always think about them and endlessly wish for [similar] happiness; at the end of their life, they will be reborn among wealthy happy people. Others cultivate the limited merit of generosity or morality, but are ignorant of the law of merit; hearing about the existence of the Caturmahiṣājakā, Trāyastriṃśa, Gṛmha, Tārā in Nirvāna and Paranirvānasvaśvartin gods, they endlessly wish for [similar] happiness: at the end of their life, they will be reborn among those gods. This happiness is the result of their wish.”613 In the same way, it is by aspiring for the pure universes (vīśuddhākālāḥ) that the bodhisattvas acquire them later. Therefore it is thanks to their aspirations (praṇidhāna) that they possess superior fruits (agrapalā).

612 For the buddha-fields, see Hobogirin, Butsudo, p. 198-203.

Furthermore, the adornment of the buddha-fields (buddhakṣetrālaṃkāra) is important. By itself, cultivation of the qualities (guna) of the bodhiśatvāva would be unable to realize it; this is why the power of aspiration is necessary. Thus, an ox (gopā) has the strength to draw a cart (rāsa) but a driver (śaityaka) is needed to reach the destination. It is the same for aspirations [108c] related to the pure universes: merit is like the ox, aspiration is the driver.

Question. - [If you are to be believed], one would gain no merit if one did not make an aspiration.

Answer. - Yes! One would gain merit, but not as when the aspiration is added. If one thinks endlessly of the goal, the merit increases (vardhate).

Question. - If merit entails retribution, people who commit the ten sins[614] but do not wish for hell (niraya) as retribution would not have to suffer hell as punishment [for their faults].

Answer. - Although sin (dhpā) and merit (punyaratnā) are necessarily retributed (niyatavipāka), only those who formulate aspirations (prayāhāna) cultivate (bhāvant提示) merit; endowed with the power of the aspirations, they obtain a great fruit of merit (vipākākapala). As was said above, sin (dhpā) has suffering (dakkha) as retribution; but all the beings [who commit it] wish to find happiness; nobody wishes for suffering or hell (niraya). This is why sin has but a limited punishment whereas merit finds unlimited reward (apramūṇavipāka). According to some, even the greatest sinner who has fallen into the Avici hell will suffer his punishment for one kalpa.[615] whereas the very meritorious person, residing in the sphere of neither perception-nor-nonperception (naivaśamjñānāsāṃjñāyatana), will enjoy his reward for 80,000 great kalpas.[616] In the same way, the bodhiśatvās who have aspired to the pure universes (viśuddhaśalokadhātu) will travel the Path for countless kalpas and will attain nirvāṇa, eternal bliss (nirayakāla).

Question. - However, look at the sin that consists of criticizing the Prajñāpāramitā, the sin discussed in the Ni R pīn (Nirayarpavarta): when the antarakaḷpa [spent in Avici] is ended, the guilty one falls into other hells (niraya).[617] How can you say that the very great sinner suffers his punishment in hell for just one kalpa?

Answer. - The Buddhist doctrine, which is intended for beings, uses two [different] ways (mārga): the way of the bodhisattva (read Pου sa ta = bodhisattvamārga) and the way of the śrīvaka (śrīvakamārga). In the way of the śrīvaka, the Buddha says that the person guilty of the five anāntara yas crimes will suffer hell (niraya) for only one kalpa; in the bodhisattva way, the Buddha declares that the enemy of the Buddhadharmā, after having spent an antarakaḷpa [in Avici], will go to yet other hells to undergo innumerable sufferings there (read Pου = dṛkkha, in place of nītur = āpptī). According to the theory of the śrīvakas, a single great merit will be rewarded during 80,000 kalpas; according to the theory of the bodhisattvas, it will be rewarded during innumerable asamkhyyakalpas.

This is why merit requires aspiration [in order to be truly efficacious]. It is in this sense that the sūtra says that the bodhiśatvās are adorned with an infinite number of buddha-fields (upamānuṣabuddhakṣetraupayādhiṇaparipravṛti) by means of their aspirations.

26. BUDDHĀNUSMṛTISAMĀDHĪ

Sūtra: They always turn to the concentration commemorating the Buddhās of numberless buddha-fields (upamānuṣabuddhakṣetraudhānusmṛtisamādhīsattatatatsamāddhiśubhābhūtāḥ) to means of the

Sāstya: The countless buddha-fields (upamānuṣabuddhakṣetra) are the buddha-fields of the ten directions. - The concentration commemorating the Buddhās (budhānusmṛtisamādhī) is that which, by means of the 614 The ten evil paths of action (ākāśālaṅkārakāmatika), murder (prārddhālāpika), etc.

615 According to the śrīvakas, adherents of the Lesser Vehicle, the damned remain in Avici hell for one kalpa:

i) The śrīvaka, III, 18, p. 11, says that the schismatic is cooked in hell for one kalpa: āpāyika niyatavipāka samphothona dhātu ... bhītāna kappam nirayukti paccan. "The schismatic falls into the abyss, he falls into hell for one kalpa. Creating schisms, living in isolation, he falls away from the safety of the community."

ii) The Buddha declared that Devadatta, guilty of schism, would be damned for one kalpa: āpāyika Devadattavā niyatavipāka kappati sthāviro "Devadatta has fallen into the abyss, fallen into hell for a kalpa; he is unpardoned." This judgment is repeated in Vinaya, II, p. 202; Mājūhima, I, p. 393; Āgīutta, III, p. 402; IV, p. 160; Āvīvatika, p.85; Teḷong a haṭa, T 26(no. 112), p. 27, p. 600a; A neou fong king, T 58, p. 854a.

616 The concentration commemorating the Buddhās (budhānusmṛtisamādhī) is that which, by means of the 617 The Nirayarpavarta is one of the chapters of the Pañcaviṃśatisaṃgha and the Aṣṭaḥsūkhakī. The passage alluded to here is in Pañcaviṃśatisaṃgha T 220, k. 435, p. 187c; T 221, k. 9, p. 63a; T 223, k. 11, p. 304c. In the Aṣṭaḥsūkhakī, T 224, k. 3, p. 441b; T 225, k. 3, p. 488a; T 225, k. 3, p. 523a; T 227, k. 3, p. 530c. Here are a few extracts from the Sanskrit text of the Aṣṭaḥsūkhakī, ed. R. Mitra, p. 179-180.

Asītī Sakha punaḥ Subhuti pratikṣāvāṃśās āśāya saṃbhāvita pratikṣāpuṣṭaṃ ... mahānaṃ mahākīrṇadukkhaṇī pratikṣāpavārayantā. “By criticizing, by rejecting, by insulting this Prajñāpāramitā, O Subhuti, one criticizes, one rejects, one insults the omniscience of the Buddha Bhagavat. Those who act in this way will be banished from the definitive and complete exclusion from the Three Jewels. As a result of a sin of such magnitude, they will be reborn in the great hells for many hundreds of millions of kotiṇiṇās of years. They will pass from one great hell to another, the destruction of the world by fire will occur. And when this destruction of the world by fire has taken place, they will fall into the great hells of other universes. It is in these great hells that they will be reborn. In these great hells they will suffer the great torments of hell."
mind’s eye (cittacakṣus), perceives all the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadiś) and the three times (tryadhvan) as if they were present.

Question. - Then what is the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi?
Answer. - It is of two types: i) According to the śrāvakas, it is to see with the eye of the mind one single Buddha filling the ten directions; ii) according to the bodhisattvas, it is to recollect all the Buddhas of the ten directions and the three times[109a] who are present in numberless buddhakṣetras.

Also the sūtra says that the bodhisattvas always direct themselves towards the concentrations commemorating the Buddhas of countless buddha-fields.

Question. - The concentrations (samādhi) of the bodhisattvas are of infinite variety; why does the sūtra praise only the bodhisattvas who devote themselves always to the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi?
Answer. – i) Because by commemorating the Buddhas these bodhisattvas reach buddhahood. This is why they devote themselves always to the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi.

ii) Furthermore, the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi is able to drive away the afflictions (kleśa) of all sorts and the sins (āpatti) of former lifetimes (pārvaja). Other samādhis can drive away desire (ṛga) but not hatred (dveṣa); others can drive away hatred but not desire, still others can drive away delusion (moha) but not desire or hatred; finally, others can drive away the threefold poison (triviṣa) but not the sins of earlier lives. Only the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi is capable of eliminating all the afflictions and all the sins.

iii) Finally, the buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi has the great merit of being able to save beings and this is precisely what these bodhisattvas want. The buddhasaṁśatīsamādhi is able to destroy sins quickly, but all the other samādhis. Here is proof of it.[109] Once there were five hundred merchants who had gone to sea to 109 Commemoration in general, and especially commemoration of the Buddha, was practiced already in the Lesser Vehicle. It was applied sometimes to six objects (Divyāvadāna, I, p. 250, 280; Aṅguttara, III, p. 284, 312 seq., 452; V, p. 329 seq.; Patisambhidā, I, p. 28), sometimes to ten (Aṅguttara, I, p. 30, 42; Lālivāsānīya, p. 31).

Commemoration of the Buddha was greatly expanded in the Greater Vehicle; the seven-fold recollection of the dharmakāya in Saṃgha, p. 314-316, and the ten-fold recollection of the qualities of the Tathāgata in Bodh. bhūmi, p. 91, should be noted.

109a The story that follows is taken from the legend of Dhammaruci, told in detail in Divyāvadāna, chap. XVIII, p. 228-262 (tr. H. Zimmer, Karman, ein buddhistischer Legendenkreis, München, 1925, p. 1-79). It is essential to know the major outlines of this legend in order to understand the allusions that abound in the story of the Mpp.

In the course of his earlier lifetimes, Dhammaruci had met the future Buddha Śākyamuni: i) Under the Buddha Ksenakāraka, Dhammaruci was a captain in command of a thousand men (sahasrayodhin), while Śākyamuni was a merchant who decorated a stūpa in honor of the Buddha Ksenakāraka (Divyāvadāna, p. 242-246). - ii) Under the Buddha Dīpankara, Dhammaruci was Māri, friend of Sumati, the future Śākyamuni, who offered lotuses to the Buddha Dīpankara and made his hair into a mat for him. Māri was angry at seeing Dīpankara walking on the hair of a brahmin; nevertheless, he entered the Order of the Buddha along with his friend, but, as punishment for his anger, he fell into the hells (Divyāvadāna, p. 246-254). We have already come across this famous incident, of which a certain number of references have been collected; in the sources indicated, Dhammaruci does not appear always under the name Māri but also under the name Meghadatta (mainly in the Mahāvastu), while Śākyamuni is called Sumati, Megha or Sumedha. - iii) Under the Buddha Krakucchanda, Dhammaruci was a merchant’s son (vaṅgadāraka) and became guilty of various crimes: he lived in a great brahmin family. I was Dhammaruci, filled with horror for any sin; having seen the Lamp of the World, I went, at search for precious stuffs. They encountered the king of the fish (Makara) in the sea water (avatāraparvatā) and a waterfall (jalapradāta) at the entrance to a cave. The captain (karnadhra) asked the man in the look-out: "What do you see?" He answered: "I see three suns (ādīrī), ranges of white mountains (avatāralaparvatā) and a waterfall (jalapradāta) at the entrance to a cave." The captain shouted: "It is the Makara, the king of the fish; he is holding his mouth agape; the first sun is the real sun, the other two suns are his eyes (ākṣa); the white mountains are his teeth (ānata); the waterfall is the sea water that is rushing into his mouth." Then each of you call upon the god whom you worshipped, but with no success. Among them there was a ship's captain who observed the five precepts (pañcaśīlādsapāparighūturupasūka) of the Buddha. He rejoined them miraculously and, seated cross-legged on the board of the boat, he calmed the storm raised by the yak Mahēśvāra. The episode is told in Divyāvadāna, p. 41-42 (tr. Burnout, Introduction, p. 228-230) and in the Mīlāsārasvatīvadā Vinaya, T 1448, k. 3, p. 13a. In other sources, the merchant from Śīrāpanaka miraculously saved is called, not Dhūnakamīra, but Śāvakārṇika (Avadīnāṃtakā, II, p. 166; Bhuddhacarita, XXI, v. 22; in E. H. Johnston, The Buddha's Mission and last Journey, Extract of Acta Or., XV, 1937, p. 53, where Bsa stod translates the Sanskrit Śāvakārṇika). This fish is called Mo k'ie lo (Makara) in the Hien yu king and the Tsa pi king; tīṃtīṅgila in the Bhūruttad medallion, the Mahāvastu and the Divyāvadāna (where the variant tīṃtgīla also occurs), tīṃtīṅgīla (probably to be corrected as tīṃtīṅgīla) in the Avadīnāṃtakāla, tīṃtīṅgīla in the Avadīnāṃtakā. The proper reading is that of the Avadīnāṃtakāla: tīṃtīṅgīla, in Tibetan ṣa-mid par byad-pahiṅ lo 'the fish-that-swallows a fish-swallower'. Three kinds of fish must be distinguished: i) The sun, described as follows in the Rhaguvāsīka, XIII, 10: - Saṁvatram dālāya badmukshāmśabdā sammālāyanto vivṛttamānāvātā! amidaṁ biṁśaṁ sarvadānātā tādāvam viśvamānātā talaśvaṇātāh! *See these sharks (ādīrī) that suck in the water with the animals at the mouths of rivers; suddenly they shut their gullets and emit columns of water into the air through the holes in their heads." (tr. L. Remou) ii) The tīṃtīṅgīla, in Tibetan ṣa-mid 'swallower of suns'! Indeed, the Amarakośa, I, 10, 19, has: tīṃtīṅgīla tīṃtīṅgīla gītār gītār: gī magare. iii) The tīṃtīṅgīla, in Tibetan ṣa-mid par byad po 'a swallow of tīṃtīṅgīla'. Thus there are three kinds of fish of different sizes, the smallest of which is swallowed by the middle one, and the middle one by the largest. This fits perfectly with the Hindu concepts of life in the sea. Cf. Divyāvadāna, p. 230. "In the great ocean, the living beings are divided into three size-ranges (aśkhaṇṭa): in the first are the fish 100, 200 and 300 yojanas in length, in the second, those 800, 900, 1000 up to 1400 yojanas in length; in the third, those 1500, 1600 and up to 2100 yojanas in length. In the great ocean, these kinds of fish are always eating one another; those in the first size-range (bhūmi) are devoured by those in the second; those in the second are devoured by those in the third. There is a fish there called Tīṃtīṅgīla (as he is corrected to Tīṃtīṅgīla) that, surpassing the third range, comes up to the surface. When it opens its mouth, a funnel of water is sucked into it violently; drawn in by this mass of water, fish of all kinds, turtles, sea horses, dolphins, whales, etc. pass from its mouth into its belly. When it moves, it is so huge that its head, even from afar, seems to be a mountain as high as the sky and its two eyes from afar are like two suns in the sky." The captain (karnadhra) or chief of the merchants (āśrethārīka) is called Śīhopākārṇika (variants: Thāpākārṇi, Thāpakārṇi, Śīhopākārṇi) in the Mahāvastu. Cf. the Śāvakārṇika of the Avadīnāṃtakā and the Bhuddacarita.
v) Moreover, by always commemorating the Buddhas, we acquire all kinds of qualities (guṇa) and benefits (artha). In order to reach the culmination of his career, he must then impose upon himself painful efforts that will be prolonged over three, seven, or even thirty-three asaṅga days. In order to progress in his career, it will suffice that the bodhisattva faithfully accomplish certain rituals, to which the Mahāyāna theocircuitian will attach increasing importance.

A text that makes up part of the Ratnakūta, the Vajrādātāparipāca (cited in the Śikṣāsaṃuccaya, p. 290) recommends that the bodhisattva, pure and clad in clean clothes, three times during the day and three times during the night, carry out the Triskandha, namely, the confession of sins, acceptance of the good and invitation to the Buddhas. Here is the text: Āryogrāvattaparipācaḥḥyām hi trīśrāvī dīvīsmaya ca ... pāpadeśamūnyutumodāṇīḥ-buddhādyayasmukhyāḥ.

The Mppī also mentions this threefold practice and, according to the explanations it gives here, it appears that the Triskandha consists of the following practices:

i) Pāpadēśaṁ, confession of sins.
ii) Buddhasvatāyam-ānasamudāṇa-śamādāpana, commemoration, rejoicing and exhortation of the Buddhas.
iii) Adhyeyāṃ and yācanā, invitation to the Buddhas to preach the Dharma and prayer to the Buddhas to delay their entry into nirvāṇa.

But it is Śūntādeva who recommends these spiritual exercises mainly in his Bodhicharyāvatāra, chap. II-III, and his Śikṣāsaṃuccaya, p. 290-291 (tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 263-265). The threefold practice, so-called because it is done three times during the day and three times during the night, consists of at least six parts:

i) Pāṇḍañna and pājama: worship and vow of the Buddhas, etc.
ii) Varaṇasamana, taking refuge in the Buddhas, etc., and pāpadeśaṁ, confession of sins.
iii) Pūnyatūrputaṁ, rejoicing in virtue.
iv) Adhyeyāṃ, invitation to the Buddhas to preach the Dharma.

vi) Finally, the sutra has already mentioned the samādhi of emptiness (tāṇayatā), signlessness (ātīṃtita) and wishlessness (apramāṇīta), but it did not say anything about the buddhāndusmṛtisamādhi. That is why it is spoken of here.

27. APARIMITABUDDHĀDHĪHYEŚANĀKUSALTAL

Srūṣṭa: They excelled in inviting innumerable buddhas (aparimitabuddhādhyeyasanakusalātā). Śastra: The invitations[629] which they address to the Buddhas are of two types.[630]

[629] It is understood that, before and after he has entered into the bhūmīs, the bodhisattva must cultivate the awakened mind by the practice of the six or ten pūrṇamāṇīs. In order to reach the culmination of his career, he must then impose upon himself painful efforts that will be prolonged over three, seven, or even thirty-three asamāla kalpaṣ. (cf. Sāngrahā, p.209-211; Siddhi, p.731-733).

In actual fact, however, it seems that the cultivation of the awakened mind is less complicated than it seems at first sight. In order to progress in his career, it will suffice that the bodhisattva faithfully accomplish certain rituals, to which the Mahāyāna theocircuitian will attach increasing importance.

A text that makes up part of the Ratnakūta, the Vajrādātāparipāca (cited in the Śikṣāsaṃuccaya, p. 290) recommends that the bodhisattva, pure and clad in clean clothes, three times during the day and three times during the night, carry out the Triskandha, namely, the confession of sins, acceptance of the good and invitation to the Buddhas. Here is the text: Āryogrāvattaparipācayām hi trīśrāvī dvīsmaiya ca ... pāpadēśamāṇyutumodāṇiḥ-buddhādyayasmukhyāḥ.

The Mppī also mentions this threefold practice and, according to the explanations it gives here, it appears that the Triskandha consists of the following practices:

i) Pāpadēśaṁ, confession of sins.
ii) Buddhasvatāyam-ānasamudāṇa-śamādāpana, commemoration, rejoicing and exhortation of the Buddhas.
iii) Adhyeyāṃ and yācanā, invitation to the Buddhas to preach the Dharma and prayer to the Buddhas to delay their entry into nirvāṇa.

But it is Śūntādeva who recommends these spiritual exercises mainly in his Bodhicharyāvatāra, chap. II-III, and his Śikṣāsaṃuccaya, p. 290-291 (tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 263-265). Here is the threefold practice, so-called because it is done three times during the day and three times during the night, consists of at least six parts:

i) Pāṇḍañna and pājama: worship and vow of the Buddhas, etc.
ii) Varaṇasamana, taking refuge in the Buddhas, etc., and pāpadeśaṁ, confession of sins.
iii) Pūnyatūrputaṁ, rejoicing in virtue.
iv) Adhyeyāṃ, invitation to the Buddhas to preach the Dharma.

i) When a Buddha becomes buddha, the bodhisattvas ceremoniously invite him three times during the night and three times during the day: throwing their upper garment over one shoulder (ekāṇkam aṁ durvāraṇīgam kṛṇai), with joined palms (aṭṭhāmuraṇaṃ), they say to him: “In the buddhāfieldeos (budhakṣetra) of the ten directions (dasaśānti), countless Buddhas, once they have become buddha, do not turn the wheel of Dharma (dharmanakacāra). I, so-and-so, invite all the Buddhas to turn the wheel of Dharma for beings to save them all.”[631]

ii) When the Buddhas are about to abandon their life of immense duration (aparimitākūśa) and prepare to enter nirvāṇa, the bodhisattvas, three times during the day and three times during the night, throw their upper garment over one shoulder and with joined palms, say: “I, so-and-so, invite the countless Buddhas of the buddhāfieldeos of the ten directions to remain for a long time in this world, for countless kalpaṣ, for the salvation and welfare of all beings.”[632]

This is how the bodhisattvas invite innumerable Buddhas.

Question. - The Buddhas have a pattern according to which they must preach the Dharma and save all beings. Whether they are invited or not, this pattern remains the same. Then why must they be invited? Besides, although it is possible to invite the Buddhas who are close by, how is it possible to invite the Buddhas of the innumerable buddhāfieldeos of the ten directions? They cannot even be seen!

Answer. - i) Although the Buddhas are obliged to preach the Dharma and need no human invitation, the person who invites them gains merit (puṇya) by doing so. In the same way, even though the king finds plenty of delicacies to eat at home, many people still invite him in order to gain his favor and obtain his advice.

ii) Śākyamuni, prayer to the Buddhas to delay their entry into nirvāṇa.

v) Purināmandrā, dedication of merit for the good of beings.

But, as Śūntādeva comments, many of these exercises are mixed up one with another: the vandana is included in the pāpadeśaṁ, and the yācanā is joined to the adhyeyāṃ (cf. Śikṣāsaṃuccaya, p. 290). [In Tibetan, this practice is called Phaung-po gsum-pa tsho mdo].

[630] Namely, adhyeyāṃ, invitation, and yācanā, prayer.

361 Formula of the adhyeyāṃ in Bhadraćarīprajñādāna, v. 10: Ye ca dasaśānti lokapraṇidhāḥ ... caubu amatāva varaṇatāvaiānīyāḥ.

“And these lamps of the world, in the ten directions, who have attained enlightenment and overcome detachment, I invite all these protectors to turn the unsurpassable wheel [of Dharma]. In the Bodhicharyāvatāra, III, v. 3: Sarvakāmāyikā saṃbuddhāḥ prārthitaḥ-āmāḥ mohāḥ dhiśkṛpaṇānām. “With joined palms I request the perfect Buddhas of all the directions to light the lamp of Dharma for those whose delusion has caused them to fall into misfortune.”

362 Formula of yācanā in the Bhadraćarīprajñādāna, v. 11: Ye ‘pi ca nīveto darśātmarāmaḥ ... sarvakāmāyikā hūlaḥ sabhūṭāḥ.

“And so with joined palms, I beg these Buddhas who wish to manifest their nirvāṇa, that they wait for a number of kalpaṣ as large as the number of grains of sand in a [buddha]-field for the good and welfare of the entire world.”

In the Bodhicharyāvatāra, III, v. 5: Nirvāṇākāmatā ca jīvān yācanāyam ... adhamsaśānta javāt. “And I also entreat those Victorious Ones who wish to enter nirvāṇa that they wait for endless kalpaṣ lest this world become blind.”
ii) Moreover, if one feels friendship (matirīcchita) for beings and one wishes them happiness, one gains great merit even though these beings do not get any. It is the same when one invites the Buddhas to preach the Dharma.

iii) Furthermore, there are Buddhas who have not been invited to preach and who have entered directly into nirvāṇa without having preached the Dharma. Thus, in the Fa houa king (Saddharmapundarakāśītra), the Bhagavat Yo pao (Prabhattarāma), whom nobody had invited [to preach], entered nirvāṇa directly but, later, his disciple nirmāṇakāya and his stūpa made of the seven jewels (ṣaparata) appeared simultaneously in order to confirm the prediction of the Saddharmapundarakāśītra.633 - Similarly also the Buddha Sūra chan to fo (Sūrīnabuddha): as his disciples had not yet repented the seeds of good (apuripakukuseśamāla) and were consequently unable to grasp his teaching, he entered directly into nirvāṇa, but, to save beings, he left [behind] a fictive Buddha (nirmānabuddha) which lasted for a kalpa. - The present Buddha Śākyamuni, having become buddha, waited 57 days before preaching the Dharma.634 He said to himself:

633 Cf. Saddharmapundarakā, chap. XI: Stīlaśaṃsārīkrama, p. 248-249 (tr. Burnouf, p. 150-151; Kern, p. 236-237). When Śākyamuni was in the process of preaching the holy Dharma, a precious stūpa appeared in the sky above the assembly. A voice came from it which praised Śākyamuni who opened the stūpa and there found the preserved body of Prabhattāraṇa: Ātha khalā bhagavāti Śākyamuni taṭāgatās tasyāṁ vaśāyām var ... dharmaparyaya śūryavatīvyapatakā. That is when at that moment the blessed Tathāgata Śākyamuni, seeing all the assembled Tathāgatas miraculously created from his own body..., arose from his seat and flying up, remained suspended in the air. The four assemblies all together arose from their seats and stood, palms joined in respect, with eyes fixed on the face of the Bhagavat. Then with his right hand, the Bhagavat divided this great stūpa made of precious stones which was suspended in the air; and having divided it, he opened the two halves completely. Just as the two halves of the gate of a great city open up when the piece of wood holding them closed is removed, so the Bhagavat, having separated this great stūpa into two parts with the index finger of his right hand, opened it. Hardly had this great stūpa of precious stones been opened, when the blessed Tathāgata Prabhattarāma appeared seated cross-legged on his throne, his limbs dried out but his body not decreased in size, as if deep in meditation; and at this same moment, he pronounced the following words: "Good, good, O blessed Śākyamuni, it is well said, this explanation of the Lotus of the holy Dharma which you are about to make; it is good, O blessed Śākyamuni, that you explain this Lotus of the holy Dharma to the assemblies; I too, O Bhagavat, have come to hear this Lotus of the holy Dharma." (tr. Burnouf) 634 These 57 days that separated the enlightenment from the first sermon are problematic chronologically in the biography of the Buddha. The sources do not agree on the number of weeks that elapsed between these two events.

The Pilī Vinaya (vol. 1) counts four weeks which the Buddha spent respectively: 1) under the bodhi-seat; 2) under the ajāpālayaṅgrodha (p. 3); 3) under the uccaliṅgrodha (p. 3); 4) under the rājājīvatū (p. 3). The Nidānakathā (p. 77-80) counts seven weeks that the Buddha spent respectively: 1) at the mahābodhiṃandha; 2) by the ānāmācchātuyā; 3) by the ratanamaṅkamacchātuyā; 4) by the ratanaprabhāracamacchātuyā; 5) under the ajāpālayaṅgrodha; 6) with Muscalinda; 7) under the rājājīvatū. - The Dīpavamsa, I, v. 29-30, has almost the same details: during the seventh week, the Buddha stayed in the Kāḷīpāḷī park. The Mahāvastu (vol. III) also counts seven weeks. The Buddha passed the first two under the bodhiṃandha (p. 273 and 281); he spent the third in dīgha cañnavā (p. 281). During the last four, he stayed respectively in the dwelling of the nāga Kāla (p. 300), in the uccaliṅgrodha (p. 301), in the ajāpālayaṅgrodha (p. 301), in the Kīlaśāvana at the Bhuvedavatī-cātya (p. 303). The Mahāvastu concludes by saying: "Thus the Bhagavat spent the seven-week retreat during 49 days."

"My Dharma is profound (gambhīra), difficult to penetrate (durvīyeha) and difficult to understand (durahnavabduḥ). Beings attached to worldly things (ālayārūpā) are unable to understand it."

[109c] Nevertheless, Śākyamuni did not enter into silence in the bliss of nirvāṇa. At that time, the bodhisattvas and the Śākrendravendra and Brahmādevārja gods came to bow down before him with joined palms (utvaṃ prananyā) and invited him to turn the wheel of Dharma (dharmacakra) for beings. The Buddha accepted their invitation in silence and then went to Po lo naī (Vāraṇāsi) in the Lou lin (Mrgadāva) where he turned the wheel of Dharma. Under these circumstances, how can you say that it is useless to invite the Buddhas?

iv) Finally, it is customary for the Buddhas to consider beings, not in order to know whether they are noble or lowly, light or heavy, but to know if they invite them. It is as a result of this invitation that they preach the Dharma. Even if beings did not invite the Buddha face-to-face, the Buddha, who always knows their minds, hears their invitation. Supposing even that the Buddhas do not see and do not hear [those who invite them], there would still be the same merit of inviting them; how much more so when they are able to see you and hear you.

Question. - If it is so advantageous to invite the Buddhas, why invite them only on the two occasions indicated above?

Answer. - It is not necessary to invite them in other circumstances, but in those two, it is indispensable to do so.

If the Buddhas preached the Dharma without being invited, the heretics (ādhikāra) might say: "Since his Buddha quality definitely has been established, does he not speak so much and act so much out of clinging to his own system (dharmanabhinivāsa)?" That is why, in order to teach, the Buddhas should be invited.

The Lalitavistara [p. 377, 379-381] locates the seven weeks as follows: The Buddha spent the first week seated on the bodhi-seat; he spent the second in dīgha cañnavā; during the third, he stayed on the bodhiṃandha; in the fourth, he accomplished the dhātura cañnavā. During the last three, he stayed successively with Muscalinda, under the ajāpālayaṅgrodha, and finally under the rājājīvatū tree. - Cf. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 236 seq.

At the end of the seventh week, exactly 49 days after his enlightenment, at the invitation of Brahmi the Buddha agreed to preach the Dharma. But according to the Mapi, the first sermon at Benares did not take place until the 57th day. Therefore eight days elapsed between Brahmi's invitation and the sermon at Benares. From the Mahāvastu, III, p. 324-328 and the Lalitavistara, p. 406-407 (tr. Foucaux, p. 338-339), we know that this week was spent by the Buddha traveling from Gayā to Vāraṇāsi. According to the Nidānakathā, p. 81, having remained a few more days at the bodhiṃandha, the Buddha resolved to be at Benares on the day of the full moon of the Āśādha month (June-July). On the fourteenth, he arose early in the morning and traveled 18 yojanas so that he arrived the same day towards evening at Rajputana near Benares. That same evening, he preached the Dhammacaravaprapattavātānta.

635 Cf. Vinaya, I, p. 4: ayam dharmo gambhīrāh dādattā darambhāḥ ... ālayārūpāḥ ca prajñāyān durvīyām iman śāhāṃ; Wou fen liu, T 1321, k. 15, p. 105c; Suou fen liu, T 1428, k. 31, p. 786c. On the enigmatic formula ālayārūpā, ālayata, ālayasamuddita, see also Mahājina, I, p. 167; Samyutta, I, p. 136; Aṣṭagaṇṭa, II, p. 131. - We know that the Viśālakṣikānanda resorted to these texts to prove the existence of the store-consciousness (ālayasamuddita) by means of scripture. See Seґraba, p. 26; Siddhi, p. 180; S. Lévi, Autour d'Āriyabhūta, JA, Oct.-Dec., 1929, p. 281-283.
People might also say: “If he knows the [true] nature of dharmas, he should not covet a long life. By remaining so long in the world, he is in no hurry to enter into nirvāṇa!” This is why prayers [for him to stay here] are needed. If the Buddha preached without being invited, people would say that the Buddha is attached to his own system and wants to make it known to people. This is why the Buddha must wait people’s invitation to turn the wheel of Dharma.

The heretics (tīrthikas) themselves are attached to their own systems; with or without invitation they preach to people. The Buddha has no attachment or fondness for his doctrine; it is out of compassion (karuna) for beings that he preaches when he is invited; if he were not invited, he would not turn the wheel of Dharma. Some verses say:

The Buddhas say: "What is true?
What is false?
The true and the false
Are both non-existent.
Thus the truth consists Of not being discursive about the dharmas."

It is out of compassion for beings

That they turn the wheel of Dharma.

Moreover, if the Buddha preached the doctrine without being invited, he would have preached his own discoveries (pratibhā), his own beliefs (grāha) and would certainly have answered the fourteen difficult questions. But when the gods invited him to preach, where it was a matter only of cutting through old age (jarī), sickness (vyāḍa) and death (maraṇa), he did not engage in controversial questions (nīgrahasthāna); this is why he did not answer the fourteen difficult questions and avoided any criticism. For this reason he must be invited to turn the wheel of Dharma.

Furthermore, although born among humans, the Buddha nevertheless acts as a Mahāparāśaṇa: despite his great compassion (karunā), he does not preach without being invited. If he preached without an invitation, he would be criticized by the heretics (tīrthikas); therefore first he must be invited. [110a] Again, the heretics belong to the sect of the god Brahmā and, if Brahmā himself invites the Buddha, the heretics give in.

Finally, the bodhisattvas regularly accomplish a threefold practice (trīkāndha) three times during the day and three times during the night: 1) In the morning, throwing the upper garment over one shoulder (ekāṃśam uttarāsaṅgam kṛvā) and with joined palms (kṛtāḥjali), they pay homage to the Buddhas of the ten directions, saying: “I, so-and-so, in the presence of the Buddhas of the ten directions, confess the faults and sins of body, speech and mind that I have committed for countless kalpas, in my present lifetime and in past lifetimes. I vow to wipe them out and not to commit them again.”636 During the night, they repeat this formula three times. 2) They commemorate the Buddhas of the ten directions and the three times, their activities (caritra), their qualities (guna) and those of their disciples. They praise them (anumodante) and exhort them (samādīpyayati). 3) They supplicate the Buddhas of the ten directions to turn the wheel of Dharma and invite them to remain in the world for countless kalpas to save all beings. By accomplishing this threefold practice, the bodhisattvas gain immense merit and approach buddhahood. This is why they must invite the Buddhas.

28. NĀṆĀḌṚṢṬIＰARYAVASTHĀNALKESAPRAŚAMANAKUŚALA
Sūtra: They excelled in destroying various wrong views, entanglements and afflictions (nāṇāḍṛṣṭiparyavasthānaklesapraśamanakūśalaṁ).

Sūtra: A. There are many kinds of wrong views (dṛṣṭi):
1) Two types of dṛṣṭi: the view of eternalism (sākṣatdṛṣṭi) and the view of nihilism (ucchchedadṛṣṭi).637 Sākṣatdṛṣṭi is an adherence of the mind (citākṣānti) which holds the five aggregates (skandha) to be eternal (nītya); Ucchchedadṛṣṭi is an adherence of the mind which holds the five aggregates to be perishable. Beings often fall into these two wrong views. The bodhisattvas who have suppressed them within themselves are also able to suppress them in others in order to establish them in the Middle Way (madhyamagratpad).
2) Two types of dṛṣṭi: the view of existence (bhavadṛṣṭi) and the view of non-existence (vibhavadṛṣṭi).638
3) Three types of dṛṣṭi: adherence to all dharmas (sarvadharmasākṣānti), non-adherence to all dharmas (sarvadharmaṃ aśāsānti), both adherence and non-adherence to all dharmas (sarvadharmaṃ kṣānti).
4) Four types of dṛṣṭi:639 i) The world is eternal, the world is not eternal, the world is both eternal and non-eternal, the world is neither eternal nor non-eternal (sāvavato lokah, aśāvavato lokah, sāvavato cālāvavato ca lokah, naśāvavato naśāvavato ca lokah). ii) The world and the self are finite, infinite, both finite and infinite, neither finite nor infinite (antarvā lokai caṁ ca, amantarvā lokai caṁ ca, antarvā lokai caṁ ca, naśāvavato naśāvavato ca lokai caṁ ca). iii) The Tathāgata [or the saint free of desire] exists after death, does not exist after death, both exists and does not exist after death, neither exists nor does not exist after death (bhavati tathāgaṇaṁ param maraṇaṁ na bhavati bhavati tathāgaṇaṁ paraṁ maraṇaṁ na bhavati).

636 Formula of pūjāsaṅkramaṇa in Bhadraśarīrakumārī, v. 8: ye ca laṃ samā pāpu bhavavyo ... tām pratīkṣayeṣu abhi sarvaṁ. “And the sins committed by me, under the impulse of attachment, hatred or delusion, of speech or of mind, I confess them all.” See also a more developed formula in Bodhiracāyavatāra, l. 1, p. 154; II, p. 240; III, p. 130; Kośa, V, p. 17, IX, p. 265.
637 This is antagrāhādṛṣṭi: Ajīvattāra, I, p. 154; II, p. 240; III, p. 130; Kośa, V, p. 17; IX, p. 265.
638 Cf. Sanyuttam, III, p. 95; Majjhima, I, p. 65; Ajīvattāra, I, p. 83; Kośa, IX, p. 265.
639 One falls into these dṛṣṭis when one comes to a decision about the ‘fourteen difficult questions’.
According to the K’ia tchan yen t seu a p'i t'an (Kātyāyanīputrābhidharma), these ten paryavasthānas and 98 bandhanas make 108 kleśas.646 In the Tou tseu eul a p'i t'an (Vātisputrībhīdharma), the sanyojanas are the same in number, but the paryavasthānas are 500.

The bodhisattvas destroy all these passions in themselves by all kinds of means (upāya), and they excel in destroying those of others as well.

Thus, at the time of the Buddha, three brothers heard speak of three courtesans (viṣya): Nāgan ṇo p'ō li (Āṇarāja) of Vaiśāllī, Šiā mā n (Śrīnāgar) and Yeou po lō p'ān na (Upalavārṇa) of Rājagṛha. Hearing everyone praise the incomparable beauty of these three women, the three brothers thought of them day and night and could not get them out of their minds. In dreams, they possessed them. Once awakened, they said to themselves: "These women did not come to us and we did not go to these women; nevertheless, pleasure was produced. Because of them we woke up. Are all dharmas like that?"

Once awakened, they thought to themselves: "These women did not come to us and we did not go to these women; nevertheless, pleasure was produced. Because of them we woke up. Are all dharmas like that?"

Then they went to the bodhisattva Po’se pō lo (Bhadrapāla) to ask him about this. Bhadrapāla said to them: "All dharmas are indeed like that; they are all the result of mind." Then he skillfully (upāya) explained the emptiness (śāntiṣya) of dharmas to the three men, and all three became bodhisattvas without regression (avatāranī). The bodhisattvas use all kinds of tricks in this way to preach the Dharma to beings and suppress their wrong views (dṛṣṭi), manifest active defelements (paryavasthāna) and kleśas. This is what the sūtra explains by saying: nan daṅḍīparyavasthānaṇākleśasādipramasamanālaṣa.

29. SAMĀDHĪSATASAHRĀBHINIRHĀRAVIKṚDANAKUṢALA

Sūtra: They excelled in producing and playing with a hundred thousand samādhis (samādhisātasahrābhīnirhāravikṛdankuṣalaḥ).

5) Five types of dṛṣṭi:640 1) saṅkhyāvadāni (view related to the accumulation of perishable things, i.e., the five skandhas, ii) antagṛhādṛṣṭi (view of believing in the extreme theories of eternalism or nihilism); iii) niśkṣetram (wrong view which consists of denying that which really does exist), iv) dṛṣṭiparāmarśa (holding wrong views in high esteem), v) illavatapāramarśa (holding morality and disciplinary practices in exaggerated esteem).

These various views increase in number up to 62 dṛṣṭigāna.641

These views are brought about by various causes and conditions (hetpravaya), are discovered by various sciences (jñānaparāśīya), are understood by various teachers (deçēya); they constitute all kinds of fetters (sanyojana) under various characteristics and cause diverse sufferings to beings. This is why they are called 'various views' (nāṇa dṛṣṭi). The meaning of the word dṛṣṭi will be explained fully later.

B. There are ten manifestly active defelements (paryavasthāna)642 1) anger (krodha), ii) hypocrisy (mraka), iii) lethargy (śtyāna), iv) languor (middha), v) regret (kaukṣyapa), vi) agitation (auśadha), vii) shamelessness (ābhṛṣṭa), viii) non-emarrassment (anapatiṣyupa), ix) avarice (mūṣyāra), x) envy (tṛṣyād).

Moreover, because they fetter the mind, they are called manifestly active defelements (paryavasthāna).

C. The afflictions (kleśa) are called kleśa (in Chinese, fan nao) because they vex (fan) and torment (nao) the mind.

[110b] There are two types of kleśa: inner attachment (ādhyātmikavāsita) and outer attachment (ādhyāvyavāsita). The kleśas of inner attachment are the five dṛṣṭis, doubt (vīcūka), pride (māna), etc.; the kleśas of outer attachment are lust (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), etc. Ignorance (avidyā) is both inner and outer.

There are two other types of bonds (bandhana): those that depend on craving (tṛṣṇāpattita) and those that depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭipattita).

There are also three types of bandhana: those that depend on lust (rāgapatita), those that depend on hatred (dveṣapatita) and those that depend on delusion (mokṣapattita).643 They are called kleśa.

Some people list ten paryavasthānas; others, 50.644 The kleśas are called ’all the fetters (sanyojana). There are nine sanyojanas, seven anumāyas and a total of 98 bandhanas.645

---

641 These 62 dṛṣṭigānas are described in the Brāhmaṇajālasūtra; they have their root in saṅkhyāvadāni.
642 Kośa, V, p. 90.
643 Kośa, p. 87).
644 The Viśuddhīsākṣa claim 10 paryavasthānas (Kośa, V, p. 90, others, 500 (Pr) ni moou king, T 1463, k. 8, p. 850, on Holoqirin, Jossé, p. 124).
645 There are 6 anumāyas: rāga, pratīgha, māna, avidyā, dṛṣṭi, vimati (Kośa, V, p. 2). - They make 7 by dividing rāga into two (Kośa, V, p. 3, Dīgha, III, p. 254, 282; Aśguttara, IV, p. 9; Samyutta, V, p. 60; Vībhāṅga, p. 383; Jñānaprasthāna, T 1543, k. 4, p. 784c).
646 For these 108 kleśas, see Priyabahi, Aikoua, p. 323.
647 Example of a story often used in Madhyamaka treatises.
648 Pitṛputrasāmalanadūtra, cited in Śikṣāsūcayacā, p. 252: Tattva māhārāja niṣṭhāpadānīṣṭhāna svapnapāma viṣayād .... vighūtāaya kāśāyavara bhūṣya yati.

Bhavaśeṣāntīndrīṣṭra cited in Madh. avatāra, p. 127 (pr. Lav., Mūleon, 1910, p. 319): ‘Similarly, O great king, a sleeping man dreams that he possesses a beautiful woman, and awakened from his sleep, he thinks of her with regret. What do you think, O great king? Is he a wise man who, having dreamed that he possessed the beautiful woman, thinks about her with regret after he has woken up from his sleep?’ - ‘No, O Bhagavat. And why? Because, O Bhagavat, in the dream, the beautiful woman does not exist, is not experienced, still less so, the possession of the woman. Nevertheless, this man will be tired out and exhausted.” Cf. the Chinese versions in Bhavaśeṣāntīrdhrā, ed. N.A. Saukat, p. 10-11.

The Viśuddhīsūtras and Gāthāsūtras also explain how, in the absence of any object, there can be accomplishment of function (kṛtyakāra), as in a dream: cf. Vīnākṣa, p. 4: Svāmhapagāthavat kṛtyakāra siddhīti vīśajitam .... labhāvijñātadvahnāvah svāmhapagāthā. “The accomplishment of function is maintained [in the absence of any real object] such as discharge in the course of a dream: thus, in a dream and without any sexual coupling, there is discharge characterized by emission of semen.”
Śāstra: By the power of dhyāna and mental discipline (cittaniyama), by the power of pure wisdom (vīśuddhāptaprajñā) and skillful means (upāya), these bodhisattvas produce (abhinnirharanti) all kinds of samādhis.

What is samādhi? It is the fixing on one point of a good mind (kṣulacittanikāgrata), the immobility of the mind (cittalacalata).

There are three kinds of samādhis: i) samādhi with vitarka (investigation) and vicāra (analysis); ii) samādhi without vitarka but with vicāra; iii) samādhi with neither vitarka nor vicāra.648

There are four other kinds of samādhi: i) samādhi connected with the world of desire (kāmadhūtvacara); ii) samādhi connected with the world of form (rupadhūtvacara); iii) samādhi connected with the formless world (ātma-dhūtvacara); iv) samādhi not connected with anything.

Here it is a question of the bodhisattva samādhis that have already been mentioned. They are not as complete (paripūraṇa) as those of the Buddhas. The bodhisattvas produce them (abhinnirharanti) by the practice and cultivation of effort (prayāma).

Question. - Why do the bodhisattvas produce (abhinnirharanti) and play with (vīkrīdati) these [110c] hundred thousand samādhis?

Answer. - Beings are innumerable (apramāṇa) and the functioning of their minds (cittaprayātta) differs: some have sharp (śīṣṇa) faculties, others have weak (myṛda) faculties; the feters (sanyojana) are heavy among some, light among others. Therefore the bodhisattvas use the hundred thousand kinds of samādhis to cut through the disturbances of the passions [among beings]. Thus, those who wish to enrich the poor (dārīdra) must first gather all sorts of wealth (vasu) and provisions (sambhāra) to be able then to go and help the poor; those who wish to cure sick people (vyādhita) must first prepare all kinds of drugs (bhajasya) to be able then to cure the sick. In the same way, the bodhisattvas who wish to save beings use hundreds of thousands of samādhis.

Question. - Why are they not content with just producing (abhinnirhāva) these samādhis, but they also play (vīkrīdana) with them?

The bodhisattvas who produce these samādhis amuse themselves by entering into (praveśa) and emerging from (vyayatāna) them; this mastery (vaśita) of the samādhis is called play (vīkrīdana). This play is not attachment to desire (tyāgabhanduna); it is a mastery (vaśita). Thus the lion (simha) who appears as a fearless sovereign (śīvarā) among gazelles (meṣa) is called megarati (the one who plays with the gazelles). In the same way, these bodhisattvas who have mastery of these samādhis go in and out of them at will. [Other people do not have such mastery over the samādhis]: some enter into them at will but remain there and do not emerge easily; others remain there at will but do not enter and emerge freely; others enter and remain freely but do not emerge easily; finally, others remain and emerge at will, but do not enter freely. Because the bodhisattvas have the threefold power over these samādhis of entering, remaining there and emerging at will, the stūra says that they produce a hundred thousand samādhis and play with them.

---

648 See references in Kośa, VIII, p. 183.
13. Che cheng (Suvikrāntavikramin)
14. Tch'ang k'in (Nityodyukta)
15. Pou chö tsing tsin (Anikṣiptadhura)
16. Je tsang (Śūryagarbha)
17. Pou k'iae yu (Anupamacintin)
18. Kouan che yin (Avalokiteśvara)
19. Wen chou che li or Miao tō (Mahāyānī)
20. Tche pao yin (Ratnamudrāhasta)
21. Tch'ang kiu cheou (Nityotkṣiptahasta)
22. Mī kō or T'Veu che (Maitreya).

They were at the head of countless thousands of koṭinayuta of bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who were all still awaiting succession (ekajātipratibaddha)⁶⁵⁰ and will still accede to Buddhahood (bhūyastvena kumārabhūta).⁶⁵¹

[111a] Sūtra: All these bodhisattvas accompanying the Buddha were at Rājagṛha on the Gṛdhrakūṭaparvata.

Question. - These bodhisattvas are very numerous; why does the sutra give the names of only twenty-two?

Answer. - If they were to cite the countless koṭinayuta of bodhisattvas by name, there would be no end to it; the person who wants to cite them all would not have enough letters (aksara) at their disposal.

Moreover, there are two categories among these bodhisattvas: the lay (gṛhaṇa) and the monastic (pravrajita):

1) These are the lay bodhisattvas, the first 16 on the list, beginning with Bhadrapāla.

- Bhadrapāla, of the vaisya caste, is an old man from Wang chō (Rājagṛha).⁶⁵²

- Rāṭākara, a young prince (kumāra), lives in Vaiśālī.

- Śubhagupta, a merchant's son (śvēṣṭhīrpura), lives in Tchān po (Campā).

- Sāthavādhī, of the vaisya caste, lives in Chō p'o rī (Śravānī).

- Naradatā, of the brāhmaṇ caste, lives in Mī rī lo (Mithilā).

2) There are the monastic (pravrajita) bodhisattvas, Maitreyā, Mahāyānī, etc.

The bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, etc., all come from a buddha-field (budhaśeṣtra) in a foreign region (deśantarā).

By citing a few lay people (gṛhastha), the sutra includes all the lay bodhisattvas; it is the same for the monastic bodhisattvas and the foreign (deśantarā) bodhisattvas.

Question. - What are the special (visesā) qualities of the bodhisattva Bhadrapāla who is at the top of the list? - If the greatest ones were to be put first, you would have to cite first of all the bodhisattvas Prīṇa kī (Vaiśālī), Kouan che yin (Avalokiteśvara), Tū ti che (Mahāsthānāprāpṭa), etc. If the least were to be placed on top, you would have to cite first the bodhisattvas of fleshly body (mānasākhāya-buddhiśravasta) and those who were about to produce the mind of enlightenment (prathamamucitotpāda-buddhiśravasta) for the first time.

Answer. - If the bodhisattva Bhadrapāla is placed first, it is not because he is the greatest or the least, but because he is an old man from Rājagṛha, the greatest of the lay bodhisattvas (avādītavasana-buddhiśravasta), and because the Buddha went specifically to Rājagṛha to preach the Prajñāpāramitā.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva Bhadrapāla has immense qualities (gūṇa) of every kind and, in the Pan tchou san mei (Pratyutpannasamādhi)⁶⁵³ the Buddha praised his qualities.

Question. - If the bodhisattva Maitreyā can be said to be ‘awaiting succession’ (ekajātipratibaddha),⁶⁵⁴ why are the other bodhisattvas also called ‘waiting for succession to Buddhahood’?

Answer. - Divided up among the various buddha-fields (budhaśeṣtrā) of the ten directions, these bodhisattvas are all awaiting succession (ekajātipratibaddha).

- Varuṇadatta is an apāsaka bodhisattva.

650 The Chinese expression pou tu/you or 'still awaiting succession' imperfectly renders the Sanskrit ekajātipratibuddha (Tibetan, skye ba gcig thugs pa), which means 'separated from Buddhahood by only one rebirth'.

651 The Chinese expression chao toun weí rō 'who will accede to the noble place' imperfectly renders the Sanskrit bhūyastvena kumārabhūta (Tibetan phad cher gcen nor gyur pa) which means 'always prince' [i.e., associated with royal power]. This expression will occur again at k. 10, p. 128a16 where it again is translated as bhūyastvena kumārabhūta, 652 See Bhadrapālasūtra, T 416, k. 1, p. 872a-b.
CHAPTER XIV: EMISSION OF RAYS

ACT I

Sūtra: Then, having himself arranged the lion-seat, the Bhagavat sat down cross-legged, holding his body upright and fixing his attention, he entered into the samādhi called King of Samādhis, in which all the concentrations are included (Atha kho bhagavān savaṃ eva sīnhāsanam prajñāyaya nuyātat paryahānāṃ buddhānāṃ rjukāyaṃ prajñādhāyīṃ bhūmikāḥ śnṛtim upasthāyāya samādhirājaṃ nāma samādhiṃ samāpāyate yma yaatra sarvasamādhiyo 'ntārattātah).

Sāstra: Question. - The Buddha has a servant (upasthāyakā) and numerous bodhisattvas; why does he arrange the lion-seat (sīnhāsana) himself?

Answer. - This seat was created (nirmita) by the Buddha himself in accordance with the great assembly; this is why Ananda [the Buddha's servant] could not arrange it. Besides, it is the Buddha's mind (citta) that creates this seat; this is why it is said that he arranges it himself.

Question. - What is this sīnhāsana? Did the Buddha create a lion? Is a real lion [111b] present, or did he make a lion out of gold, silver, wood or stone? Besides, since the lion is not a nice animal, the Buddha does not need it and, since there is no need for it, the lion should not be there.

Answer. - The lion in question is not a real lion but, since the Buddha is a lion among men (purusasimha), the seat where he sits down, whether it be on a bed (dīṣa) or on the ground (bhūmi), is called the 'lion's seat'. In the same way, even today the seat where the king is enthroned is called a lion's seat, the chief who commands warriors is called a lion-man (purusasimha) and people call the king of the land purusasimha. Just as a lion among animals is strong, fearless and can conquer all (abhībhavati), so the Buddha triumphs over all ninety-six heretical systems and is called purusasimha.

Question. - Sitting postures are numerous; why does the Buddha take just the cross-legged posture (pariyākabandha)?

Answer. - 1) Among sitting postures, the cross-legged position is the calmest (kṣema) and the least tiring; this is the posture of those in dhyāna for, by holding the hands and feet in this way, the mind does not wander.

2) Furthermore, among the four bodily positions (khyeryāpatha), it is the most calming (kṣema): it is the posture of ecstasy, the usual position for finding the Path (mārgalabhā). When King Māra sees it, he is sad and frightened. Sitting in this way is customary for the monastic (pravrajīta); he actually sits cross-legged under a tree in the forest; the crowds who see him feel joyful and know that this monastic will certainly attain the path. Some stanzas say:

When one sits cross-legged
The body is at peace, one enters into samādhi.

Powerful people regard you with respect
Like the sun that lights up the continent.

Slowness and mental disturbances are driven away,

The body is light and does not know fatigue.

The intellect also is alert;

This peaceful posture is like the coiling up of a snake.

If merely a painting of crossed legs
Causes king Māra to feel sad and afraid,

How much more so if it is a person entered onto the Path
Sitting peacefully and motionlessly.

This is why one sits with crossed legs.

3) Furthermore, the Buddha told his disciples that they should sit this way 657 There are some heretics who search for the path by always standing on one foot, or by always remaining standing, or by placing their feet on their shoulders; such tortures plunge the mind into a sea of bewilderment; these postures are not calming.658 This is why the Buddha recommends that his disciples sit with crossed legs holding the body upright (rjukāyaṃ prajñādhāya).

Why? When one keeps the body straight, it is easy to control the mind; in those whose body is straight, the mind is not idle. With right mind, the ascetic fixes his attention (abhībhavati smṛtim upasthāpayati); when the mind wanders, he seize it and brings it back. In order to enter into samādhi, he keeps his mind free of any distraction. It is by fixing his attention thus that [the Buddha] entered into the Samādhirajassamādhi.

655 The Buddha should be visualized as seated in paṃḍāsana, 'a position in which the legs are tightly folded with the soles of the feet turned upwards'. This lotus posture had always been utilized by the yogins of India and is still used by the sādhus (Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 325). Also, as the Buddha is in samādhi, he exhibits the meditation mudrā in which the two hands are superimposed one on the other in the lap. Buddhist sculptures often show the Buddha in this posture.

Although according to the Mppi the lion-seat should be understood in a symbolic sense as the seat of the lion-man (purusasimha), the Buddha is sometimes represented seated on a sīnhāsana, ‘a throne supported by lions’. Among other examples, see: a Buddha from Gundhūr, in A. von Le Coq, Von, Land u. Leuten in Osr-Turkestan, Leipzig, 1928, pl. 44; bodhisattva-buddha at Mathurā in Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 670, fig. 550; Vogel, Sculpture de Mathurā, pl. XXVIa. As Le Coq notes, o.c. p. 166-167, the lion-seat is still used among the Muslim Persians. For further details, see J. Auboyer, Un aspect de la souveraineté dans l’Inde d’après l’iconographie des trônes, RAA, XI, 1937, p. 88-101.

656 Made up of the systems of the six heretical teachers plus the fifteen schools founded by each of them. Buddhist daitya, p. 296a-b.

657 For example, in the Sutapathchautta (Majjhima, I, p. 56): Kathaṁ ca bhikkhave bhikkhu kāye kāyānupassā viharati ... parimukhān satīn upasthāpayati.

658 These postures have been condemned by the Buddha in Diţha, I, p. 167.
What is the Šamādhījñānasamādhi? This samādhi is foremost among all the samādhīs; [111e] it takes innumerable samādhīs at will as object (ālamhāta). Just as the king (rāja) is foremost of all men, just as the cakravartin king is foremost among kings, just as the Buddha is foremost among all the beings of earth and heaven, so this samādhi is foremost of all samādhīs.

Question. - By virtue of the power of the Buddha, all the samādhīs [practiced by him] are necessarily foremost. Why do you call only the Šamādhījñānasamādhi foremost?

Answer. - Although all the samādhīs practiced by the Buddha are necessarily foremost by virtue of his miraculous power (āṣṭāṅgabala), nevertheless there are differences (viśeṣa) among them; they do not all have the same value.

Question. - In what absorption (samāpatti) is the Šamādhījñānasamādhi contained (samyagkhaṇa), and what is its nature (laṅkana)?

Answer. - a) Some claim that the Šamādhījñānasamādhi has mastery (vaśiṣṭha, aśīvayya) as its nature, that it is contained in the five good elements (pāhīcakulasamākhaṇḍha) and that it resides in the fourth dhyāna (caturtha dhyāna). Why?

b) Others say: Who can know the nature (laṅkana) of a samādhi of the Buddha? All the dharma of the Buddha have a unique nature (ekaluṅkana), without mark (animitta), immense (āprameya), incalculable (asamkhyeya), inconceivable (acintya). If the other samādhīs [of the Buddha] are immense, incalculable and inconceivable, then what could be said of the Šamādhījñānasamādhi? The Buddha is the only one who knows it. If the basis of his miraculous power (āṣṭāṅgāyusa) and his morality (śīla) is inconceivable, then what could be said of the Šamādhījñānasamādhi?

Moreover, all the samādhīs are collected (antaṅgato) in the Šamādhījñānasamādhi; this is why it is called 'king of samādhis'. In the same way, all the rivers and all the streams of Jambudvīpa depend on their king.

Question. - The Buddha is omniscient (sarva-jñā) and knows everything. [112a] Why does he enter into the Šamādhījñānasamādhi and will he know subsequently (prayum)?

Answer. - 1) He wishes to show that his wisdom (prajñā) is the result of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamanantapana) and astounds the six heretic teachers who claim: 'Wisdom is always present in us; we always know.' [666] This is why it is said that the Buddha knows because he has entered into the Šamādhījñānasamādhi and, if he did not enter it, he would not know.

665 The five pure skandhas are ālāna, samādhi, prajñā, viññāṇa and viññāṇadāna (Dīgha, III, p. 279; Sānyutta, I, p. 99-100; Kośa, I, p. 48).

666 The Buddha attained bodhi in dependence on the fourth dhyāna: this detail is noted by all the stories of the enlightenment; see, among other sources, Majjhima, I, p. 247; Mahāvastu, II, p. 283, l. 12; Lalitavistara, p. 344, l. 13. - The Piśācha, T 7, 1545, k. 153, p. 780a-b; Kośa, II, p. 206, VI, p. 177, explain how the Bodhisattva comes to bodhi in one session (ekāsanaṃ) in dependence on the fourth dhyāna. This session consists of 34 mind-moments:

i) The sixteen moments of the path of seeing (darśanāmargā) or understanding of the truths (abhiññāmaya) make of the future Buddha an ānāgāmin detached from all existence except for the bhavāṅga. These sixteen moments have been discussed above.

ii) The eighteen moments (nine prahānas or 'abandonments', nine viññāṇas or 'deliverances') of the path of meditation (bhavānāmarga) or repeated study (abhidyāsa) of the truths destroy the passions (kleśas) relating to bhavāṅga in the future Buddha and assure him the quality of sāmyagkhaṇa.

661 This detail is noted in the stories of the Parinirvāṇa: Catuttha jñānam samāpatti; catutthajjhāna vesapphidhā sajanantarā Bhagavā pariṇāmbī: Dīgha, II, p. 156; Sānyutta, I, p. 158; Chinese translations of the Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra: T 1, k. 4, p. 26c; T 6, k. 2, p. 188c; T 7, k. 2, p. 205a.

662 There are three stages for each of the first three dhyānas, and eight stages for the fourth dhyāna: anubhāva, punyapraṇava, bhṛtahpahāla and the five suddhavālīkas - in all, seven places for rūpadhātu. This is the opinion of the Bihārīdīkās or Pāścīduyas, "Westerners", i.e., Sarvāṇivadins from Gandhāra. See Kośa, III, p. 2-3 as a note, where other opinions are mentioned.

659 The five pure skandhas are ālāna, samādhi, prajñā, viññāṇa and viññāṇadāna (Dīgha, III, p. 279; Sānyutta, I, p. 99-100; Kośa, I, p. 48).

660 The Buddha attained bodhi in dependence on the fourth dhyāna: this detail is noted by all the stories of the enlightenment; see, among other sources, Majjhima, I, p. 247; Mahāvastu, II, p. 283, l. 12; Lalitavistara, p. 344, l. 13. - The Piśācha, T 7, 1545, k. 153, p. 780a-b; Kośa, II, p. 206, VI, p. 177, explain how the Bodhisattva comes to bodhi in one session (ekāsanaṃ) in dependence on the fourth dhyāna. This session consists of 34 mind-moments:

i) The sixteen moments of the path of seeing (darśanāmargā) or understanding of the truths (abhiññāmaya) make of the future Buddha an ānāgāmin detached from all existence except for the bhavāṅga. These sixteen moments have been discussed above.

ii) The eighteen moments (nine prahānas or 'abandonments', nine viññāṇas or 'deliverances') of the path of meditation (bhavānāmarga) or repeated study (abhidyāsa) of the truths destroy the passions (kleśas) relating to bhavāṅga in the future Buddha and assure him the quality of sāmyagkhaṇa.
Question. - If that were so, the power of the Buddha would be very reduced!
Answer. - No, because he never has any trouble entering into Samādhi, penetrates the ten directions without obstacle or limit.

2) Moreover, when he has entered Samādhi, the Buddha, with his six super-knowledges (ābhinibandhā), penetrates the ten directions without obstacle or limit.

3) Moreover, when he has entered Samādhi, he manifests his great miraculous power (vishuddhikāyā) by means of all kinds of metamorphoses (śīla-mārga). If he manifested his great miraculous power without entering into Samādhi, some people might think that the Buddha was using the powers of magic (māyābala) or of spells (mantrabala), or that he is a very powerful nāga, or that he is a god and not a human. Why? When a single body emits countless bodies and when all sorts of rays (vainīśa) are created (nirmāta), we might [easily] think that this is not the doing of a human. It is to prevent such an error that the Buddha enters into Samādhi.

4) Moreover, if the Buddha entered some samādhi other [than the Samādhīrāja], the devas, nāgas and pratyekabuddhas would be able to probe it: they would say that the miraculous power of the Buddha is great but nevertheless knowable, and their veneration (gurukāra) would be small. It is because the Buddha enters into Samādhīrāja that no ārya nor even a tenth-bhūmi (daśabhūmi) bodhisattva is capable of sounding it out. [Actually, when the Buddha is deep in this Samādhīrāja, no one knows what the support (ābhyāsa) or what the object (ālambana) of the Buddha's mind is. This is why the Buddha enters into the Samādhi.]

5) Moreover, there are occasions (samaya) when the Buddha emits great rays (vainīśa) and manifests his great miraculous power (vishuddhikāyā): when he attains bodhi, when he turns the wheel of Dharma (dharma-cakra), when a great assembly of devas and āryas gathers, when he astounds the heretics (tīrthikas). He emits great rays on all these occasions. Indeed, it is in order to manifest his superiority (viśesā) that he emits great rays, so that all the beings of the ten directions, human and divine, so that all the ārhatas, pratyekabuddhas and bodhisattvas might know him by sight. This is why he enters into the Samādhi.

6) Finally, rays (vainīśa) and miraculous power (vishuddhikāyā) may be lesser (avara), medium (maudhyā) or superior (agra): i) spells (mantra) and magic (māyā) can produce luminous effects (vainīśanirmāna) that are lesser; ii) devas, nāgas and asuras, by virtue of retribution (vipaka) for their actions, have rays and miraculous power that are medium; iii) the one who has entered into samādhi by actual qualities (guṇa) and mental power (cintabala), is able to emit great rays and manifest great miraculous power that are superior. This is why the Buddha enters into the Samādhi.

Question. - All the samādhis have their own nature (svalakṣaṇa); how can they all be included in this [Samādhi]?
Answer. - 1) When one obtains the Samādhi, one obtains all the samādhis [by that very fact].

[112b] This is why 'they enter into it' (samatāntara). By the power of the Samādhi, all the samādhis become immense (upamaṇya), incalculable (asamkhyeya) and inconceivable (acintya). This is why it is said that they are contained in it.

2) Furthermore, by entering into the Samādhi, one enters into all the other samādhis if one wishes.

3) Furthermore, when one has entered into the Samādhi, one can contemplate the nature of all the samādhis in the way one contemplates everything below from the top of a mountain.

4) Finally, when the Buddha is in Samādhi, he is able to contemplate all the universes (lokadhātu) of the ten directions and also all beings (śravaṇa). This is why he enters into the Samādhi.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: Then, having tranquilly come out of this samādhi and having contemplated the entire universe with his divine eye, the Bhagavat smiled with his whole body (uṣṇīśa bhūmīvaṃsāvata samprajātanam tamātā samādhr̥vyathāḥ divya caṃkṣeṣa sarvalokādhyānāṃ vasvādikṣeṣa vayavākṣeṣa arvacākṣeṣa svataḥ karmu).

Śūtra: Question. - Having entered into the Samādhi, why does the Buddha leave it immediately and contemplate the universe?

Answer. - The Buddha enters Samādhi; he opens and examines the precious basket (cakyaṣṭakāya) of all the buddhadharmas. In this samādhi, he contemplates and says to himself: "The basket of my Dharma (dharmagātika) is immense (upamaṇya), incalculable (asamkhyeya) and inconceivable (acintya)." Immediately afterwards, he comes out of samādhi and contemplates beings (śravaṇa) with his divine eye (dīva caṃkṣeṣa). He knows the misery of beings, he knows that the basket of the Dharma which comes from causes and conditions (heng-prayasya vasvādikṣeṇa) can also be attained by all beings but that the latter, plunged in the shadows of error (mokhadhākhāru), do not ask for it and do not seek it. This is why he smiles with his whole body (svaṃkṣeṣa svatāḥ karmu).
Question. - The Buddha possesses the buddha-eye (buddhacakṣus), the wisdom-eye (prajñācakṣus) and the Dharma-eye (dharmaacakṣus).671 They are better than the divine eye (divyacakṣus). Why does he use the divine eye to contemplate the universe?

Answer. - Because the visual range of the fleshly eye (mīmāsmacakṣus) is not great enough. The wisdom-eye (prajñācakṣus) knows the true nature (satyakāla) of the dharmas; the Dharma-eye (dharmaacakṣus) sees a given person and discovers by what skillful means (upādaya) and by what teaching (dharma) that person will find the Path; the buddha-eye (buddhacakṣus) is the direct insight (pratayakṣavigama) into all dharmas. Here it is the divine eye that considers the universe (lokadhātu) and beings (sattva) without encountering any obstacles (ānvavaranam). It is not the same for the other eyes. The wisdom-eye, the Dharma-eye and the buddha-eye, although superior [to the divine eye] are not meant to see beings. If one wishes to see beings, there are only two eyes one can use, the fleshly eye (mīmāsmacakṣus) and the divine eye (divyacakṣus) but since the fleshly eye's range is insufficient and encounters obstacles, the Buddha uses the divine eye.

Question. - But the divine eye occurs in the Buddhas; why is it called divine eye [and not buddha-eye]?

Answer. - 1) Because it often occurs among the gods (deva). The range of the divine eye is not obstructed by mountains (parvata), walls (kauya) or forests (vana). The zealous person (vīryavara), disciplined (śīlavat) and concentrated (ḍhyāyin), obtains it by the power of practice (abhismaksabhairala); it is not an inborn gift (upapattija). This is why it is called divyacakṣus.

2) Furthermore, people are very respectful towards the gods and take them as teachers; and as the Buddha is in harmony with human conceptions, he calls this eye divyacakṣus.

3) Finally, there are three types of gods (deva): gods by metaphor (samatīdeva), gods by birth (upapattidēva), and pure gods (visuddhiddēva). The samatīdeva are [112 e] kings (rājasa) and princes (kumāra). The upapattidēva are gods like Cho (Indra), Fan (Brahmā), etc. The visuddhiddēva are the Buddhas, pratyekabuddhas and arhats. The Buddha is the most venerable of the visuddhiddēva; this is why it is not wrong to speak of the divyacakṣus [concerning him here].

[The śīra says]: “With his divine eye he contemplates the entire universe.” All the beings of this universe always seek happiness (sukha); their minds become attached (abhinivāsate) to the ātman, but in reality there is no ātman. Beings are always afraid of suffering (duḥkha) but they always suffer: they are like blind people (anuḍha) who lose their way and fall into the ditch while seeking the right path. After all these considerations, the Buddha "smiles with his whole body".

Question. - One smiles with one's mouth (mukha) and sometimes with the eyes (akṣi). Why does the śītra say that the Buddha smiles with his whole body (sarvakāyāti)?

Answer. - The Buddha who has obtained mastery (svāvyāra, vaśita) over the universe can make his whole body like the mouth or the eyes. Besides, we call 'smiling' the dilatation of all the pores of the skin (svaromatāpaśivaratana); when we smile with pleasure, all the pores dilate.

Question. - Why does the Buddha who is always so serious (guru) smile like this?

Answer. - When the great earth (mahāprārthi) trembles (kampate), it is not without a reason or for a trivial reason; it is the same for the Buddha: he does not smile without rhyme or reason. He smiles with his whole body for a grave reason. What is this grave reason?

1) The Buddha is about to preach the Prajñāpāramitā and innumerable beings (asamkhyaevatattva) will continue the Buddha's lineage (budhagastra): that is the grave reason.

2) Furthermore, the Buddha said: “From lifetime to lifetime, I was once a tiny insect (lavat): a wretched thing, but little by little I accumulated the roots of good (kulasamātia) and I finally attained great wisdom (mahāprajñā). Today I am a Buddha: my miraculous power (śuddhākula) is immense (apramāla). All these beings could themselves do as I have done. Why are their efforts in vain and why do they fall into the lower destinies?” That is why the Buddha smiles.

3) Furthermore, small cause (hetu), large effects (phala); small condition (pratyaya), great results (vipaka)!

If those who seek buddhahood have only to pronounce a single stanza (gandha) and burn only a single pinch of incense (gandha) to be assured of becoming Buddha, what will not be the success of those who, from having heard (śruta) that dharmas are neither born (anupatama) nor destroyed (aniruddha), will perform the actions that lead [to buddhahood]? That is why the Buddha smiles.

4) Furthermore, the Prajñāpāramitā is essentially pure (visuddha): like space (ākāśa), it can be neither given nor received. The Buddha, who wants to convert all beings, resorts to various skillful means (upādaya), such as rays (vīma) and miraculous qualities (vṛddhiratbhava), in order to soften their minds and cause them to have faith in the Prajñāpāramitā. That is why he smiles and emits rays.

Finally, a smile has all kinds of causes (hetupratyaya): one smiles out of joy (madita) or anger (dveṣa) or timidity; one smiles at the sight of strange or ridiculous things; one smiles in the face of strange customs or extraordinary [113a] difficulties. Here it is a matter of an absolutely extraordinary difficulty. Dharmas are non-arisen (anupatama), non-ceasing (aniruddha), absolutely empty (śūnya), unpronounceable (anukāra), unnameable (anāmaka), unspreakable (anabhilipta), inexpressible (anuvraca); however, they must be given a name (nāma) and letters (ākṣara) must be applied to them when one speaks of them to others in order to lead them to delivery (vimukta): this is an enormous difficulty. Let us suppose that there is a fireplace one hundred yojanas in length and that a man carrying dry grass (kuśattra) enters this fireplace and crosses it without burning a single blade; that would be an exploit. In the same way, it is very difficult... for the Buddha to take these dried grasses that are the 80,000 sayings of the Dharma (dharmanāmasaṃketa)672 and to enter with them into the true nature of the dharmas (dharmanasyaśīlaśākṣa) without letting them be burned by the fire of attachment (sangatajñata) and to pass through this fire safely without stopping. That is why the Buddha smiles and it is a result of these difficulties of every kind that the Buddha smiles with his whole body.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: Wheels with a thousand spokes [imprinted on] the soles of his feet shoot out six hundred prabhakodakō of rays (Tasyākāhastāt pañcatalayoḥ sahasrādbhāvyāṃ satrasmiṃ prabhakodakoṭiṭatāni niśceruh)

Śāstra: Question. - Why does the Buddha first emit rays from the soles of his feet?

Answer. - We have already answered this question by talking about the causes for the smile, but we will repeat it here.

1) By seeing the immense body of the Buddha emit great rays, some people are filled with pure faith (śrutaḥvinicuddhi) and great veneration (sattikāra): they know that he is not an ordinary man.

2) Moreover, the Buddha wishes to manifest his wisdom. By means of the miracle of his rays, he first emits a body light and beings know that if his bodily light appears, the rays of his wisdom (prajñārañjini) will [soon] be emitted.

3) Finally, all beings are attached (asaṅkā) to sensory pleasure (kāmasukha) and the first of the five sensory objects is form (rūpa). Seeing the marvelous light of the Buddha, their mind becomes attached to it; they renounce their earlier pleasures; their mind becomes detached little by little from sensory objects and then wisdom can be preached to them.

Question. - Yet others, gods or men, are able to emit rays; how are they different from the Buddha who emits rays?

Answer. - The rays that gods and men are able to emit are limited. The sun and the moon (siyācandramas) illuminate only the four continents (cāturādhipaka); but the rays emitted by the Buddha fill a trīśaḥrasamahāḥsaharsaḥkaladhūtu and, leaving this trīśaḥrasamahāḥsaharsaḥkaladhūtu, they extend as far as the nadī (adhaṭṭādī). The rays emitted by men make only men rejoice, but the rays emitted by the Buddha make all beings hear the Dharma and find salvation. That is the difference.

Question. - The head is the noblest part of the body; why does the Buddha first emit rays from the soles of his feet (pādaśāla)?

Answer. - The body owes its stability (pratīṣṭhāna) to the feet. Moreover, if the head is noble in the body, the feet are lowly and, since the Buddha does not esteem his own rays and does not consider them very precious, he emits them from the lowly place. Finally, the nāgas, mahoragas and asuras emit rays from their mouths and poison whatever is in front of them. If the Buddha emitted his rays from his mouth, beings would be frightened and fear to be exposed to them. This is why the Buddha emits rays from the soles of his feet.

Question. - The six hundred prabhakodakoṭi of rays that escape from the soles of his feet up to and including those that come from his cranial protuberance [113b] (ūṣṇīṣa) can be counted. If they cannot fill the trīśaḥrasamahāḥsaharsaḥkaladhūtu, how could they then fill the ten directions?

Answer. - The rays from the body [of the Buddha] are a source of light (ālokaśāla) and the secondary currents coming from this source are innumerable (prakāraṃśa) and incalculable (āsūryaḥ). Just as the K'ie lo k'ien lo insect (?), the body of which is minuscule (paramaḥ), grows in contact with the wind to the point of being able to devour everything, so the Buddha's rays, on contact with beings to be converted (vinayasaṃvata), grow to be infinite.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: In the same way, beams of six hundred prabhakodakoṭi of rays are emitted (niśceruh) from the ten toes of his feet (pādaṃgūla), from his two ankles (gulpha), from his two thigs (jātgha), from his two knees (jānumandala) from his two hips (kati), from his spine (prṣṭha), from his belly (udara), from his sides, from his navel (nābhi), from the 'trīvaśa' mark on his chest (kṛdavaśaṭvata), from his shoulders (ānśa) 673, from his arms (bhāha), from his hands (hasta), from his ten fingers (ānguli), from his neck (grīvā), from his mouth (maṇḍaḥ), from his forty teeth (aṇṭa), from his two nostrils (ghrāṇa), from his two eyes (cakṣa), from his two ears (jrostra), from his urṇa and from his uṣṇīṣa.674

Śāstra. - If the rays that shoot out from the soles of his feet can illuminate the trīśaḥrasamahāḥsaharsaḥkaladhūtu and the universes of the ten directions, why do the other parts of his body also shoot out six hundred prabhakodakoṭi of rays?}

Answer. - I have said above that the rays from the soles of his feet light up the direction of the nadī (adhaṭṭādī), but do not fill the other directions; this is why the Buddha also emits rays from [the other] parts of his body. Some say that the feet, the support (pratīṣṭhāna) of the entire body, are the most important and, for this reason, the Buddha emits six hundred prabhakodakoṭi of rays from the soles of his feet. By so doing, he shows beings that, of his thirty-two marks (dvārāśīlaśākṣa), the foremost consists of having his feet well-plantèd (upapratīṣṭhāpadālata), but that the other parts of his body have also a miraculous power (rādhāha).}

Question. - On which samādhi, on which abhibhā and on which dhyāna does the Buddha depend (āśīra) to emit his rays?

672 This is a matter of the 80,000 or 84,000 dharmanaskandhas.

673 See, for example, the statue found near Kabul which is in the Calcutta museum showing the Buddha surrounded by flames coming from his shoulders (Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, fig. 463, p. 331 and 369, note).

Answer. - Among all the samādhis, he depends on the Samādhirājasamādhi; among the six abhijñās, he depends on the abhijñā of miraculous power (paripṛcchāḥ); among the four dhyanas, he depends on the fourth dhyaṇa. The fire of the fourth dhyaṇa surpasses ordinary fire, and all who enter into it emit rays.

Moreover, when he was born, when he attained bodhi and when he set in motion the wheel of Dharma (dharma-cakra), the Buddha emitted immense rays that filled the ten directions. Why then would he not emit rays when he preaches the Mahāprajāpāramitā?

The jewels of a cakravartin king usually have a brilliance that illuminates the king and his army on all four sides to a distance of one yojana.675 It is the same for the Buddha: if he did not enter into samādhi, he would emit only his usual light (prakṛtiprabhā).676 What is that? It is the light of the Three Jewels: the Buddha, the Dharma and the Samgha.

*** *** ***

Śūra: From these rays (raśmi) came a great light (avabhāṣa) that illuminated (paripṛcchā) the trisahasamadhiḥsaharakadāthu. From the trisahasamadhiḥsaharakadāthu, it went to illuminate universes in the east (pūrvavāyāṃ dīśi) as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gangānīrduḥvālikopamā lokadīvātah). And it was the same in the south (dakṣiṇavāyāṃ dīśi), in the west (pācimavāyāṃ dīśi) and in the north (uttaravāyāṃ dīśi), in the four intermediate directions (vākiṣu), at the zenith (uparīṣṭām dīśi) and at the nadir (adhaṅga dīśi).677 And all the beings touched by this light were settled into supreme perfect enlightenment (ye ca sattvān mahātā raśmyavabhāṣena sphatati avabhāṣaṁ te sarve nīyati abhāvam anuttarāyāṁ samayukṣasambodhau).

[113 c] Question. - The nature of fire (tejas) is flame which rises upward (ārdhavajāvāla), that of water (ūpās) is moisture which tends to go downward (adhavaṅgacchādlā), that of wind (vāyus) is sinuous movement (sīrhagamaṇa). Therefore the vapor ignited by the rays [of the Buddha] will necessarily go upwards. Why does the sūtra say that it illuminates everywhere (paripṛcchāḥ) the trisahasamadhiḥsaharakadāthu and the universes of the ten directions?

Answer. - The rays are twofold: vapor of fire and vapor of water; such are the vapor of fire of the sun-stone (sīrṣyakāṇa) and the vapor of water of the moon-stone (candrakāṇa).678

Although the nature of fire (tejasakṣaṇa) is to blaze upward, the fire in the human body rises, descends and penetrates everywhere. It is the same for the solar fire and it is in this way that the waters of the earth dry up in the summer months. Thus we know that fire does not always rise upward.

Furthermore, by the power of the Buddha, these rays penetrate the ten directions like an arrow (īśu) shot by a bow (dhanu) goes straight to the target.

Question. - Why do these rays first light up the east and only after that the south, the west and the north?

Answer. - Since the sun rises in the east, the east is first; the Buddha, who is in harmony with people’s ideas (sattrucittāmavartatā), lights up the east first. Furthermore, we will always come up with the same difficulty: if he first illuminated the south, we would wonder why he did not first illuminate the east, the west and the north; if he illuminated first the east and then the north, the difficulty would be the same.

Question. - When do the rays disappear?

Answer. - The Buddha uses his miraculous power (ārdhivahala); as long as he maintains it, the rays persist; when he lets it go, the rays disappear. The Buddha’s rays are like a lamp (śilpa) and his miraculous power is like the oil (meda); as long as the Buddha does not abandon his miraculous power, the rays do not disappear.

*** *** ***

Śūra: The rays shoot out across the region of the east and its universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and the same for the ten directions.

676 Below, k. 8, p. 114c, the Buddha will exhibit this usual light (prakṛtiprabhā) which is one arm-span in width and surpasses the light of a thousand suns. This will be Act III.
677 Here it may be useful to give the Sanskrit, Pāli, Tibetan and Chinese vocabularies for the ten directions. See the following sources: Pali-vernacular, ed. N. Dutta, p. 6; Chinese translations: T 221, p. 1612-16; T 222, p. 147b25-26; T 223, p. 217b21; Sataṭaṅkā, p. 9; Sukhāvyājaśūtra st. 12; Saddharmapiṭaka, p. 243; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 8326-8337; Sānyutra, III, p. 124.

678 Sūryakāṇa and candrakāṇa: cf. Milinda, p. 118; Samāhīnirnācana, p. 268. - The sūryakāṇa, cold to the touch, emits fire when it is exposed to the sun’s rays. Cf. Kāśyapa in Śīhakautiya, II 7: sampurāṇānte sapaghaṃvamāt gāthānaḥ hi śāhavāh samantam. “In ascetics among whom tranquility predominates, a burning energy is hidden; they are like the sūryakāṇa, cold to the touch, but which burst into flames when provoked by other fires.”

On the other hand, the candrakāṇa streams with water when exposed to the moon’s rays. Cf. Bhavabhūti in Uttarāmāracarita, VI, p. 12: viksaṇāt hi patantasyaṃyayate pandu-rālam - candrakāṇah “The lotus blossoms at sunrise, but the moon-stone streams with water when the star with cold rays appears.” (tr. N. Stchoupsk, p. 117).
Śāstra. - What is a trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu or trichiliomegachiliocosm?

Answer. - The Buddha defined it (vyākaro) in the Tsa a han (Samyuktaāgama).679

"A thousand suns (sūrya), a thousand moons (candra), a thousand Jambudvīpas, a thousand [Avara]godāntyas, a thousand Uttarakurus, a thousand Pīravidehas, a thousand Sumerus, a thousand Ćūturnahārijākas. a thousand Trāyastrīnīs, a thousand Yāmas, a thousand Tuṣitas, a thousand Nīrmanaratis, a thousand Paranimittavaiśarīnīs, a thousand Bramalokas, a thousand Mahābrahmās: all that is called sāhasracitānākānadhātu (chiliomicrocosm) or cūnā for short.

A group of a thousand universes of the sāhasracitājaka type is called diviśāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu (dīchilīmegachilīocosm).

A group of a thousand universes of the diviśāhasramadhīnya type is called trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu (trichiliomegachiliocosm)."

Thus we have the sāhasracitānākānadhātu (1,000), then the diviśāhasramadhīnya

(1,000 x 1,000 or a million), finally the trisāhasramadhīnāsra (= 1,000 x 1,000,000 or a billion).

Therefore a billion suns, moons, etc., up to a billion Mahābrahmās is a trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu.

The creation (vīvartana) and the destruction (samsāranta) (of the universes within a group) takes place at the same time.

Some say: The period of duration (sitī) is a kalpa, the period of destruction (samsāranta) is a kalpa, that is the trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu.680 The mahākalpa has three disappearances: by water (āpas), by fire (tejas) and by wind (vāyu).681

[114 a] The small kalpa also has three disappearances: by knife (kṣatra), by plague (rogas) and by famine (ārūhkāsa).682

The trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu rests on space (ākāśa). [On top of space, the circle of wind (vīvartana), on top of wind, [the circle] of water (abmanḍala); on top of the water, [the golden] earth (kaṇcanaṁśī bhimī); on the earth, people. Mount Sumeru has the abodes of two classes of gods, the Cūturnahārijīkas and the Trāyastrīnīs. The others, the abodes of the Yāma gods, etc., are lands formed of the seven jewels (saptarāmanubhūmi) and caused by their merits.683 The wind arises in space and reaches the Mahābrahmā gods and the levels formed of the seven jewels which all rest on the wind.

It is the trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu that the Buddha's rays illumine and when these rays die out, other rays arise which go to light up universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. The same phenomenon is produced in the regions of the south, the west and the north, in the intermediate directions and in the regions of the zenith and the nadir.

Question. - Why does not their brilliance disappear the farther out they go out?

Answer: These rays have as their source (māla) the Buddha's miraculous power (cūdnākha), and as long as they persist, they will not disappear. Just as in the sea of the nāgas (nāgakūdrā), the water does not dry up by the power of the serpents, so these rays illumine the ten directions without disappearing in the course of their route by the mental power of the Buddha.

Question. - In Jambudvīpa there are many kinds of great rivers (mahānīla); there are some that surpass even the Ganges. Why do you always use the expression 'as numerous as the sands of the Ganges' (goyyāfīvīnālāvīlokapama')?

Answer. - 1) Because the Ganges is sadder than the other rivers.

2) Furthermore, the Gangetic region is the birthplace of the Buddha and was the place where he moved about. Since his disciples knew it by sight, we use it as comparison.

3) Furthermore, the Buddha is a native of Jambudvīpa. In Jambudvīpa, four great rivers come from the northern (utarāstātā) boundaries and empty into the oceans in the four directions of space (catarādīsāmanāvād).684

At the northern boundaries, in the Snowy Mountains (Ḥimavat), there is lake A na p'o tu to (Anavatapta); in the lake there is a lotus golden in color and made of the seven jewels (suvaramavānānāsaptarāmanāvā据)

679 The passage that follows is taken from three consecutive śūtras of the Samyuktaāgama: Tsar a han, T 99 (no. 424-426), p. 111c-112a. There is no correspondent in the Pāli Samyutta.

The same passage also occurs in various places in the Chinese Āgamas: in the Cosmography of the Tschantā a han (T 1, k. 18, p. 114b-c) and its three independent versions (T 23, k. 1, p. 177a; T 24, k. 1, p. 310b; T 26, k. 59, p. 796c).

On the other hand, the Pāli Nīkāya contain only one test relating to the three chilīocosms: it occurs in Aṅguttara, V, p. 59).

Tavatī Ānanda cāndimaṁśīparbhuṭati dhiḥ bhantī tīrōcand ... kūtā yām vaccau Ānanda trisāhasramadhīnāmlokadhātu.

The Great Vehicle that has specially developed the chilīocosms; see the references gathered by S. Beal, Catena, p. 101 seq. See also Kosā, III, p. 170.680

Kosā, III, p. 181-182.681

Ibid. p. 184, 215.682

Ibid., p. 207.

683 Ibid., p. 138-141.

684 The four great rivers of Jambudvīpa have already been mentioned. The main sources are: Tschantā a han T 1, k. 18, p. 116c; separate passages of the Cosmography of the Đīgha: T 23, k. 1, p. 279a; T 24, k. 1, p. 313a; T 25, k. 1, p. 568a; Sa po to sou li yu nai ye king, T 30, p. 812a; Tseng yi a han, T 125, p. 658b-c, and k. 54, p. 756b; Sin ti kou nian, T 159, k. 4, p. 307b; P t i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 5, p. 21c-22a; Kolha, III, p. 147; Si yu ku, T 2087, k. 1, p. 869b (tr. Watters, Transl., 1, P. 32-34). - In his commentaries on the Nīkāya, Buddhaghosa describes at length where these rivers take their source: laku Anuttata has four mouths: sūkhāla, karthiśīla, uṣṇaśīla and uṣṇāśīla; from which the four great rivers flow. Two of these rivers, those of the east and the south, go around the lake three times before continuing in their course. Buddhaghosa tells us that the Ganges changes its name five times in its course: āvattagatī, kathagatī, ākālagatī, bhulagatī and unmaśagatī. All of this information has been gathered by Malāśekara, s.v. Anuttata (I, p. 96) and Gāntig (I, p. 733). Iconographic study, J. Przyłęski, Le symbolisme du piliers de Sarnath, ML., p. 481-498. (I, p. 733).
As large as a chariot wheel,685 [Its master], Anavatapta, king of the nāgas (nāgarāja), is a great bodhisattva of the seventh bhūmi.686

At the four corners of the lake there are four [mouths] from which the water flows out: i) at the east, the Elephant's Mouth (Śrīga ṇi t'ēou = hastimukha); ii) at the south, the Ox's Mouth (Nīgu t'ēou = viṣṇubhamukha); iii) at the west, the Horse's Mouth (Ma t'ēou = aśiṣamukha); iii) at the north, the Lion's Mouth (Che tseu t'ēou = simhamukha).

a) In the east, the Elephant's Mouth empties into the Heng (Gaṅgā). Its bed consists of golden sand (suvarṇāvalīkūḍā).

b) In the south, the Ox's Mouth empties into the Sin t'ēou (Siṅgha). Its bed also consists of golden sand.

c) In the west, the Horse's Mouth empties into the Po t'ēou (Vakṣu). Its bed also consists of golden sand.

d) In the north, the Lion's Mouth empties into the Stīr t'ō (Sīra). Its bed also consists of golden sand.687

These four rivers all come from the mountain in the north. The Gaṅgā comes from the mountain in the north and empties into the eastern ocean (pārvasamudra). - The Siṅgha comes from the mountain in the north and empties into the southern ocean (dakṣināsamudra). - The Vakṣu comes from the mountain in the north and empties into the western ocean (paścimāsamudra). - The Sīra comes from the mountain in the north and empties into the northern ocean (uttarasamudra).

The Gaṅgā is the most important of these four rivers; people come there from the four directions of space and consider it to be a sacred river, the sins (āśīra) and faults (śūpa) of those who bathe there are completely removed.688 Since all people venerate and know this river, the sands of the Gaṅgā are taken as comparison.

4) Finally, the other rivers change their name vying with one another, but the Gaṅgā keeps its name from generation to generation; this is why the sands of the Gaṅgā are taken for comparison and not the other rivers.

[114 b] Question. - How many grains of sand are there in the Ganges?

Answer. - No mathematician is capable of knowing the number;689 it is known only by the Buddhhas and dharmakāya bodhisattvas who are able to number the atoms (paramātman) that arise and cease in the whole of Jambudvīpa and therefore they can also know the number of grains of sand in the Ganges!

Thus the Buddha was seated under a tree in a forest near the Jetavana. A brahmīn approached him and asked: "How many leaves (pattra) are there in this forest?" The Buddha immediately replied: "There are such-and-such a number." The brahmīn wondered how to prove that. He went behind a tree, tore off a few leaves and went to hide them. He came back and asked the Buddha: "Exactly how many leaves are there in this forest?" The Buddha answered by subtracting from the original number the number of leaves he had torn off. The brahmīn recognized [the precision of his calculation] and was filled with respect and faith; he asked the Buddha to accept him as a monk and later he became an arhat.690

This proves that the Buddha is able to know the number of grains of sand in the Ganges.

Question. - What is the number of those who became destined (niyata) to supreme complete enlightenment in contact with the Buddha's rays? If it is enough to be touched by the Buddha's rays to find the Path, why does the Buddha, who is so benevolent (mahāmaitrī), not always emit his rays so that everyone will find the Path? Why should it be necessary to observe morality (śīla), samādhi and wisdom (prajñā) in order to finally find the Path?

Answer. - Beings find salvation by all sorts of different means. Some are saved by concentration (samādhi), others by morality (śīla) and preaching (devāntādharma), still others because the Buddha's rays touched their body. It is like a city (nagara) with many gates (dvāra); the entry-ways are different but the point of arrival is the same. Some people whom the Buddha's rays have touched find salvation; others who see the rays and whom the rays have touched do not find salvation.

ACT II

Sūtra: Then the Bhagavat smiled once more with all the pores of his skin and emitted rays that lit up the triśaṁkaraṁahāśāhasrakādāññu and extended to universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges. All the beings who were touched by their brilliance were destined to supreme complete enlightenment (Atha khalu Bhagavān puruṣa eva sarvamokkheśbhāṇyā mithān kṛtā maṁ ca niṣārāyati sma yaṁ ayaṁ triśaṁkaraṁahāśāhasravā lokadhāññā suṣrūpānaṁvarṇaṁ lokadhāññā samājaṁ ati ca daśarasīkū 685 According to the Si yu ki, I.c., Anavatapta is located at the center of Jambudvīpa, south of the Perfumed Mountain (Gandhamāla) and north of the great Snowy Mountain (Himavat). This is evidently a mythical lake which would be sought in vain on a map (Watters, 1, p. 35); this however did not prevent the kings of Ceylon from trafficking in its waters (Mahāvamsa, XI, v. 30).

686 For this nāgañāña, see Hobgōrōn, s.v. Anokudatsu, p. 33; in Si yu ki, he is a bodhisattva of the eighth bhūmi.

687 On the identification of the Siddha, the Vakṣu and the Sīra with the Indus, the Oxus and the Turīya, see references of L. de La Vallée Poussin in Kosé, III, p. 147, 148 as note.

689 The Siṃyutta has already affirmed this (IV, p. 376): Tām kīm maṅgās ābhūrīta arthi te ko ānāt vād iti ... vikāraṇaśucchāsānti vā iti. - No hetam ay ye; (tr. L. de La Vallée Poussin).

690 I [Lamotte] know this episode in the Buddha's life only from a mixed Sanskrit stanza from the Lalitavistara, p. 166: Syama tīyipagatī puri dhananālīya ... tathā tasa evaggam samagacca racacī "Once, having gone to the rṣī Syama who lived under a tree, he said: 'I want you to count the number of leaves that this tree has', after having counted them and knowing how many there were, you told him the number in an even voice." (tr. Foucaux, p. 130).

In the corresponding passage in the Chinese translation entitled Fang kousang ta choangsu yen king, T 187, k. 5, p. 566b10, the rṣī is called Chō mo (37 and 8; 64 and 11), which gives Syama in Sanskrit.
Answer. - It is a light one armspan in width (vyāmaprabhā) surrounding the body of the Buddha on all sides; the Bodhisattva possessed it since his birth and it is one of the thirty-two marks (lakṣaṇa) called vyāmaprabhālakṣaṇa.\footnote{A number of references to the thirty-two marks have been collected above. In the lists presumed to be the oldest, those of the Nāgārjuna and the Āgamas, the vyāmaprabhā mark is missing or is put among the eighty secondary marks (amṛyatās), but it does appear in the later lists: Tson kha bru lha ring, 21st mark (T 191, k. 3, p. 940b); Pañcaratnagrāma, 15th mark (T 223, k. 24, p. 395c); Daisōjushōkō (ed. Sien Konew, p. 110); Bodh. bhūmi, 12th mark (p. 375); Vībhāṣā, 15th mark, (T 1543, k. 177, p. 888b). The latter adds the following definition: "The mark which consists of having a usual light (prakṛtiprabhā) the width of one armspan (cīva = vyāma). Surrounding the body of the Buddha there is always a light, one armspan in width in all directions which shines constantly day and night."

In the Avadanas, on almost every page, there is a completely stereotyped physical description of the Buddha where this characteristic is always mentioned: cf. Avadānāstra in 32 different places (e.g., p. 3, 18, 37, etc.); Divyavādana (e.g., p. 45-47, 75, etc.): Atha N. Bhagavanto dadārā dvārānām ... sambhavo bhādram. "Then N. saw the Bhagavat adorned with the thirty-two marks of the Great Man, his body resplendent with the eighty minor marks, having a light of one armspan surpassing the light of a thousand suns, like a moving mountain of jewels, excellent in every way." The austerities which Śākyamuni had undergone had dulled his thirty-two marks, but according to the Lalitavistara, p. 270, they reappeared along with the vyāmaprabhā when the future Buddha ate the millet gruel offered to him by Sujātā. Some texts state that this light, one armspan in width, has a circular shape (cf. Divyavādana, p. 361: vyāmaprabhālakṣaṇam Bhavavato rūpam).

A. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 366-370, has studied representations of this usual light of the Buddha on Greco-Buddhist monuments. It is a flaming aureole surrounding the Buddha's body on all sides. "Naturally circular around a seated person, it has a tendency to become oval around a standing person." The author refers to the following monuments: a bas-relief in the Lahore Museum representing the great miracle at Śrīvastī where, above and to the right of the Buddha, there is a bodhisattva dressed like a Buddha, seated and surrounded by a luminous halo (Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 331, fig. 459; Beginnings of Buddhist Art, p. XXVII); a statue in the Calcutta Museum showing the Buddha seated with a circular aureole into which are inserted episodes of the Buddha's life (ibid., II, p. 351, fig. 463); a bas-relief in the British Museum dedicated to the legend of Dipankara, where the future Buddha to whom the prediction is about to be given is represented with a radiant aureole (ibid., I, p. 277, fig. 140); a coin from Kaniška representing a Buddha with nimbus and aureole (ibid., II, pl. V, 9).The aureole or halo which surrounds the entire body is to be distinguished from the nimbus (mukhamandala) which surrounds only the head. Sometimes both are represented at the same time on the bas-reliefs of Gandhāra (ibid., I, p. 192, fig. 76; II, p. 205, fig. 405), and especially on the monuments of central Asia; see A. von Le Coq, Bilderatlas zur Kunst Kulturgeschichte Mittel Asiens, Berlin, 1925, fig. 178); fig. 243 (mural painting in cave 103 at Touen-houang); fig. 245 (cave 111); fig. 246 (frieze at Qyzil); fig. 248-249 (statues of seated Buddha at Qyzil).}

ACT III

Sūtra: Then by means of his usual light (prakṛtiprabhā) the Bhagavat illuminated the triśarvaṃbhāsahāsakāraṃ lokaḥdūtum avabhaśayānām. yadat pārśvāy dītī gajagñānadvālukopamāḥ sarval okadhātvaḥ pari sphutā abhūvan. ye ca sattvaḥ tasya avabhātāms tayā prabhāvayā avabhāhānaḥ bhūvan. ye ca sattvaḥ tasya prabhāyā spryās te sarve niyataḥ abhūvan anuttarādhyām samyaksaṃbodhidhūvan.

Sūtra: First the Buddha smiled with his entire body (sarvakāyāyā); why now does he exhibit his usual light (prakṛtiprabhā) to light up the ten directions?

Answer. - Some people who have seen the different rays [shooting out from the body and the pores of the Buddha] believed that this was not the light of the Buddha. [Now] seeing the great development of the usual light of the Buddha, they are filled with joy (mudātā) and, recognizing the true light of the Buddha, they finally reach anuttarāsaṃbhodhi.

Question. - What is the usual light (prakṛtiprabhā) of the Buddha?
light. When a person sees a god, his eyes are blinded because the greater the [outer] light, the more the eye contracts. It is to people of keen faculties (tāṇvinḍīya) and eminent merit (gurupyaṇa) that the Buddha shows his immense brilliance (āpamāṇa-prabhā). Besides, there are people who, seeing the usual light of the Buddha, rejoice (pramōdante) and find salvation.

[k. 8, 115 a] The king makes a gift of the leftovers from his usual table to his inferiors, and the latter receive them rejoicing greatly. The Buddha does the same. Some people feel no joy in seeing the other

2) Numerous allusions: Mppśaṃ, and, as we shall see later, the Dīvyāvadana and the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya, it is a proof of truth.

365

694 In this story the Mppi combines two episodes of the Buddha's life: the first, taken from the Pīndakaśāra, tells about the Buddha's trip to a village of brahmins and his return with an empty bowl; the second, taken from the Brāhmaṇadākāraśāsana, telling about the offering of the brahmin lady, the disbelief of her husband and the final triumph of the Buddha. There are numerous versions of the sūtra and the līlāvadana in question. The way in which they are combined here allows us to grasp in a vivid way the literary processes used by the Buddhist compilers.

References to the Pīndakaśāra:

1) Four different versions: i) Samyutta, I, p. 113-114 (tr. Rh. D., Kindred Sayings, I, p. 143-144: Geiger, I, p. 177-178; ii) Ts'a a han, T 99 (no. 1095), k. 30, p. 288ac; iii) Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 41, p. 288a (tr. in Hobogirin, p. 159b, with some inaccuracies: thus P'o lo yuan means "Garden of the brahmins" and not "Garden of Benares"; the Buddha of the Bhadrakalpa called Kiu leu souen is Kukukchhana and not Krosal.; iv) Dhammapadaththi, III, p. 257-258 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, III, p. 72-73).

2) Numerous allusions: Mppi, T 1509, k. 9, p. 121c; Milinda, p. 154 (tr. Rh. D., I, p. 219). - Legend of Aśoka: Divyavādīna, p. 350. A yu wang t'o cha, T 2042, k. 5, p. 119b; A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 8, p. 159c (tr. Przyłuski, Aśoka, k. 357). - Ts'a a han, T 92 (no. 31), k. 9, p. 308b (tr. Huber, Sāhmalaṅkāra, p. 267); Ken pen choo... yao che, T 1448, k. 18, p. 94c; - P'o lo yuan, T 1545, k. 76, p. 392a22.

References to the Brāhmaṇadākāraśāsana: This is the fourth avadāna in the Dīya, p. 67-72. - It is also in the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya, Ken pen choo... yao che, T 1448, k. 8, p. 363a-375a. - A slightly different story in Kriṣṇa p'i yu king, T 206 (no. 31), k. 1, p. 55c-56a (tr. Chavannes, Cocre, I, p. 393-395).

695 In the Sanskrit and Chinese sources, this brahmin village is called Šālī; in the Pāli sources, Pañcāudāla "the five sāla trees", it was a place in Magadha (Samyutta). The Buddha came there during the visitors' festival (pānakulana) during which the young boys and the young girls exchanged gifts. The villains refused alms to the Buddha because they were possessed (avīśīṣṭha) by Māra pāpīmat. The Mppi is the only slightly more expanded source that passes over the action of Māra in silence. The other texts refer to a twofold conversation between Māra and the Buddha, but their story is somewhat incoherent. The Pāli version of the Samyutta is evidently disordered and that of the Ts'a a han is preferable. Here is how the order of events may be restored: When the Buddha was returning with an empty bowl, Māra went to find him and asked: "Has the monk received alms?" The Buddha replied: "It is you, O Evil One, who has prevented people from giving alms," and he added this stanza (Samyutta, I, p. 114; Ts'a a han, p. 288ac): Apādham punavi Māra... na me pāpam vipaccati. "Māra has committed an evil deed, an offence against the Tathāgata: do you think, O Evil One, that your sin will not bear fruit for you?"

Then Māra invited the Buddha to return to the village. The Dharmapadaththi, III, p. 258, assumes that his intention was to ridicule (hassakhe) the Buddha, but the canonical sources are precise: Māra promises to force the inhabitants to give him alms: "Ahām kavāśiṃ yathā Bhagavā pānāṃ tucchatī." What is the reason for this about-face? This is given by the

THE BUDDHA'S JOURNEY TO ŠĀLĀ694

Once, having spent the Rain Retreat (vassa) in the country of Chō p'o'er (Śrīvastvī), the Buddha started out to travel followed by Ānanda and was about to enter a village of brahmīns (brāhmaṇa-grāma). Knowing that the miraculous power of the Buddha would convert his subjects, the king was very worried and agitated. "If he comes here today, would everyone still love me?" he said to himself. And so he issued the following edict: "Whoever gives food to the Buddha or listens to his words will be fined five hundred kāraṇapānas." Hardly had the edict been issued than the Buddha arrived; preceding Ānanda and holding his begging bowl, he entered the village to beg for his food. All the inhabitants had closed their doors and did not respond; the Buddha returned with his bowl empty (dhauṭena pāṭreṇa)695

693 As we have seen above, the 27th mark, prabhāṣṭājīvihārīv, goes along with the cryptochody of the Buddha. Its symbolism seems to have varied in the course of time: according to the Āśoka, p. 919, it was a reward for gentleness of words (lakṣāndivavacāyā prabhāṣṭājīvihārīv); in the Mppi and, as we shall see later, the Divyavādīna and the Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya, it is a proof of truth.

692 Cf. Pālacaviṣānti, p. 7-8; Sutadāsīkārikā, p. 11-12.
At that time, there was an old woman in a house \[^{696}\] [in place of lao ch jen, read lao niu jen as in the rest of the story], who had in her hands a chipped clay dish (bhinnamrūddhiśūla) full of foul broth (saktu) which she had come out onto her doorstep to throw away. She saw the Buddha who was going away with his empty bowl. Seeing the Buddha - with his major marks (ākāra), his minor marks (anuvyañjana), his golden color (snimudramanava), his ārūṣa, his anuvyañjana and his aureole one armspan in breadth (sīvāṃprabhā) - returning with an empty bowl and without food, the old woman thought: "A being as marvellous as this ought to eat the food of the gods. If he is embodied and begs with his bowl, it is surely out of loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karunā) for all beings." Filled with pure faith (ṛudhāvivṛiddhi), she

Tseng yi a han. Māra hopes that the Buddha and his monks, overwhelmed by the gifts of the villagers, would become attached to these pleasures and, no longer knowing how to deal with luxury, would always seek for more sensuous beauty. But the Buddha, reading the intentions of the Evil One, refused by the following stanza (Saññyata, I, p. 114):

Tsa a han, p. 288a: Sūvakham vara jivāma yeṣāṃ no ... devā ābhaṣṣarā yātāt ti. "In perfect joy we live, we who possess nothing. Joy will be our food like the radiant gods."
The Aṭṭa to tu tchouan (p. 119b) has a slightly different stanza: "Those who rejoice without having an abundance have a calm, light, active body. If in regard to food and drink, one does not have desiring thoughts, one's mind does not cease to be joyous, like the Ābhivaśa gods" (tr. Przyłęski).

These stanzas are missing in the Tseng yi a han version (p. 772). The Buddha simply reproaches Māra for having prevented the villagers from giving him alms and recalls that a similar mishap had previously occurred in the Bhadrakālpa. These stanzas are missing in the Tseng yi a han version (p. 772). The Buddha simply reproaches Māra for having prevented the villagers from giving him alms and recalls that a similar mishap had previously occurred in the Bhadrakālpa. Then in prose and verse, \[^{697}\] the village of Nyagrodhikā took its name from a marvellous fig tree that could shelter five hundred chariots in its shade. Nyagrodhikā was a city in modern-day western Nepal, which is mentioned in the commentaries of the Mahābhārata and the Mahāvyūha Sūtra. The tree was so large that it could provide shelter for a large number of chariots. The Buddha and his disciples were often visited by this tree, and it became a symbol of his divine power and wisdom.

The Buddha gained enlightenment under this tree, and it is said that the Bodhisattva Māra, who was the personification of desire and greed, tried to prevent the Buddha from gaining enlightenment. However, the Buddha's enlightenment was not affected by Māra's attempts, and the tree became a symbol of the Buddha's victory over Māra. The tree is also mentioned in the text of the Avadāna Sūtra, where it is described as a symbol of the Buddha's wisdom and power. The tree was so large that it could provide shelter for a large number of chariots, and it became a symbol of the Buddha's divine power and wisdom.
There was, at that moment near the Buddha, a brahmin who spoke the following stanza:

You are of the solar race, from a family of Kaśyapī, you are the crown prince of king Suddodana, but you are a great liar about this food.

How could the gift of such foul food have such a great reward?"700 Then the Buddha put out his broad tongue (prabhāṇa) and, covering his face with it up to his hair-line (saṃrūpaṇa), he said to the brahmin: "You have read the texts (āsteti) the person who has such a tongue, would he tell lies (mṛṣāvāda) ?" The brahmin replied: "The person whose tongue can cover his nose (ghṛṇa) tells no lies; what can be said about the person whose tongue reaches his hair-line? I fully believe that the Buddha does not lie, but I do not understand how such a small gift (dāna) can assure such a great reward (vipāka)."701

Then the Buddha said to the brahmin: "Have you ever seen something extraordinary (adhihata) and rare (durdhāra)?" The brahmin replied: "I have. Once I was travelling with some other brahmans and I saw a nyagrodha tree (Ficus indica) the shade (chāya) of which covered five hundred chariots (śāta) without being completely used up. That was an extraordinary and rare thing." The Buddha then asked him: "What was the size of the seed of that tree (kṣīptamānaṃ tasya vṛksasya bījan)?" He answered: "It was a third as big as a mustard seed (saṁsāpattītahadhagamātram)." The Buddha said: "Who would believe you when you say that such a big tree could come from such a small seed (kas te śrādhatāyita īyatvamānaśya bījasyamān mahābhūskṛta nirvṛttā iī?)" The brahmin answered: "Nevertheless, that is so, Bhagavat; I saw it with my own eyes, it is not a lie." The Buddha said: "It is the same for me: I see that this old woman who has given alms to the Buddha with faith and pure mind will attain a great fruit of retribution (mahāvṛkāphalā), just like a big tree comes from a tiny seed. Besides, the Tathāgata is a field of merit (punyākṣerav) filled with marvels."702

The brahmin's heart opened and his mind was liberated. Prostrating himself on the ground with all five limbs (pañcamandalakena candanam kṛttvā), he repented of his error and said to the Buddha: "It was foolish of me not to believe the Buddha." The Buddha preached the Dharma in many ways to him and the brahmin obtained the first fruit of the Path [namely, srotāpattipāla]. Then raising his hand, he uttered a great shout and addressed the villagers thus: "The gates of immortality (amṛtāvara) are open to all beings! Why do you not enter therein?" All the brahmans in the village paid the five hundred kārṣṭaṇa and went with the king to the Buddha and paid homage to him. They all said: "When one can attain the taste of immortality (amṛtarasa), who cares for five hundred kārṣṭaṇa?" The inhabitants went in a crowd and the royal edict was abrogated. The king of the brahmans and his ministers (amāya) and subjects took refuge (śrāvaṇa gatah) in the Buddha and the Dharma. All the villagers attained [115 c] pure faith (ṣvetuddharāddhā).703 It is thus that the Buddha puts out his broad tongue (prabhāṇa) to [convert] the unbelievers.

***  ***  ***

Question. - In the case of the brahmin, the Buddha put out his tongue and covered his face with it. How is it that here his tongue and his rays extend as far as the tristhas (trisṛla) of the universe? Answer. - When it was a matter of people of little faith, the Buddha's tongue [was limited] to covering his face up to his hair-line, but here it is a matter of the great interests of the Prajñāpāramitā, so his long tongue covers the entire tristhas (trisṛla) of the universe. Question. - If it is already extraordinary that all the inhabitants of one village should be able to see the Buddha's tongue, is it not still more extraordinary that when he preaches the Prajñāpāramitā, all the great assemblies (upramānasamātā) of this region and others should also be able to see it? Besides, the range of the human eye does not go beyond a certain number of ātī and you assume here that it extends to an entire tristhas (trisṛla) of the universe? Since the eye does not see that far, that is difficult to believe.

Answer. - The Buddha uses his miraculous power (ṛddhibhāsa) skillfully (updyena) so that all beings can see his tongue cover the tristhas (trisṛla) of the universe. If the Buddha did not communicate his miraculous power to them, even [the bodhisattvas] of the ten bhinis would not know the Buddha's mind (citta), but if he does communicate his miraculous power, the animals (tīrṇagony) themselves [know the mind of the Buddha. [It is thanks to this intervention] that, in one of the following chapters of the Prajñāpāramitā, all the people see the assembly of the Buddha. A ch'ou (Aṣṭāḥśrī) and contemplate it face to face. 704 And when the Buddha had spoken of the various splendors (alāṇkārayūḥa) of the universe of the seven buddhas, the great assembly of the eight million arhats was now complete, as the Prajñāpāramitā speaks only of the seven buddhas and the Buddha himself, so that the effect of his miracles might be well understood. The Buddha also describes the appearance and function of the Seven Buddhas, as well as the Seven World Systems. As the Buddha is the first of the Seven Buddhas, the assembly of the eight million arhats, the seven principal bodhisattvas, the entire great assembly of the Buddha, and the entire seven world systems come into existence. The purpose of the Prajñāpāramitā is to show the linkage between the two episodes artificially.

From the Divya and the Mālamāraṇāvādin Vinaya, we know that the pratyaśikabuddha will have the name Supraphihi, in Chinese Chan yuen. 705

700 This stanza is missing in the other sources.

701 Cf. Divya, p. 71: Tato Bhagavatā mahābhājī jīvāṃ nirunayata ... samprajñamanān ... bhājata: no bho Gauṣama.

But in the Divya and the Mālamāraṇāvādin Vinaya, the Buddha puts his tongue out only after having convinced the brahmin by the parable of the fig-tree.

702 Cf. Divya, p. 70-71: Bhagavān dhā kim manyase brāhmaṇa, asti kaiśī tvayāhīcaryādibhubho ... astha Bhagavān annim upasane gāndhī bhūṣate.

yathā kṣetre ca bījena pratyaśakasa evam iti dvija iti ....

evam mayā brāhmaṇa dṛṣṭam etad alpaṃ ca bījam mahāt ca sampad iti.

703 This last paragraph is peculiar to the Māppī: it aims to show the linkage between the two episodes artificially connected here.

704 It is because the Buddha communicates to them his miraculous power that the listeners to the Prajñāpāramitā have seen with their own eyes the assembly of the Buddha Aṣṭāḥśrī, but, continues the Aṣṭāḥśrī, p. 465: "When the Bhagavat withdrew his miraculous power, the Bhagavat Aṣṭāḥśrī, tathāgata, arhat and completely enlightened, was no longer visible" (pratitaṃbhīte ca Bhagavatā tasmān ... sāmyakāmbuddhaṃ samādhiṣyate sva).
The Buddha A mi t'o (Amitābha) and when Ānanda had said to him: "I would like to see them"; the Buddha caused the entire assembly to see the splendors of the universe of Buddha Wou leang cheou (Amitāyus). It is the same for seeing the tongue of the Buddha.

With his long tongue, the Buddha covers the triḍhasramahāhasrakadhītu, then he begins to smile. The reasons for this smile are the same as above.

Question. - Previously, the Buddha had emitted rays (raṃtī) from his tongue; why does he again emit rays from his tongue?

Answer. - 1) Because he wants all beings to have solid faith (śraddhā).

2) Moreover, the color of his tongue is like the pure light of coral (pravāda, vidrūma). In order to produce all these characteristics, he sends out rays again.

3) Finally, these rays change into precious lotuses with a thousand petals and golden in color (sahasrapatrāṇi suvarṇanirbāhānī ratamayānā padmānī). These lotuses, the rays of which shine like the rising sun (śūnyadāya), come from his tongue.

Question. - Why does the Buddha create precious lotuses of this kind by metamorphosis (nīrmanā) on these rays?

Answer. - Because the Buddha wishes to sit on them.

Question. - He could sit on a mat (maṅka, kartāḍ); why does he need these lotuses?

Answer. - 1) The mat is the usual seat of worldly (loka) people and of lay people (avāḍhatvavasana) but not of the Buddha.

2) Furthermore, the lotuses are delicate (ūlakāna) and the Buddha wants to manifest his miraculous power (cīddhābala) by sitting on them without crushing them.

3) He wishes also to adorn the seat of the holy Dharma (saddharmamanḍāṇa).

4) In general, lotuses are small and do not have the purity of perfume (116 a) (gandhaivuddhī) nor the size of those of the Buddha. The size of the lotus among people is no greater than a foot. On lake Man t'o k'i ni (Mandākini) and lake A na p' o ta to (Anavatapta), the lotuses are as large as a chariot wheel (rathacakra). In heaven, the precious lotuses are even larger. The lotus on which the Buddha is seated cross-legged is a hundred thousand prabheda times larger. It forms a floral platform of marvelous perfume on which one can sit.

5) Finally, after the kalpa fire, everything is empty (śūnya); then by the causal power of the merits of beings (saṁvṛṣaryavantraprayāṣayaḥ), the winds (vīṭasya) come from all the directions and, interacting and mixing with one another, they are able to support the great waters (mahāpātha). On these waters there is a man with a thousand heads, two thousand arms and two thousand legs called Wé miao (Viṣṇu). From his navel (nābhi) comes a precious lotus, golden in color, with a thousand petals, the light and rays of which are like the combined light of a thousand suns. On this lotus there is seated cross-legged a man who, in turn, possesses an infinite light. He is called Fan'tien wang (Brahmādevatā) who mentally gives birth to eight sons who, in their turn, give rise to the heavens, the earth and people.707 Brahmadevatā has eliminated all sexual desire (ṛgā) and all hatred (dveṣa) without residue; thus, when people cultivate (bhūvyānti) the pure practice of the dhyānas (dhyānaisadvaihacarya) and abandon sexual desire (ṛgā), they are said to follow brahmānic conduct (brahmacarya).708 And the wheel of Dharma which the Buddha put into motion is sometimes called dharmacakra and sometimes brahmacakra.709 This Brahmādevatā is ...

---

707 This is the classical myth of the birth of Brahmā, told in the Mahābhārata (1.272.44; 12.207.13) and which gives to Viṣṇu the name padmananda, and to Brahmā the epithets padma aṣṭa, jñāta, bhūvā, aṣṭa, samabhūva, etc. Although the usual mount of Brahmā is a swan, the Hindu iconography often shows him seated on a lotus. The Mppi is not the only Buddhist source that tells this Hindu myth; it is also found in another work, also translated by Kumārāṅga, the Tsu p'i ya king, T 207 (no. 31), p. 529b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 53-54). It is also recorded in his Tchoung kouen louen chou, T 1824, k. 1, p. 14c.

708 The word brahmacarya is of brahmin origin and designates in a general way the rigorous observation of prescribed rules and, in a more specialized way, the sexual continence imposed on the novice during his studies at the foot of the master. Cf. the Manusūrī, II, v. 249:

*evar curati yo brahmacaram avyapalatah/
va gacchati uttamam sītham na cādiṣṭāṣṭate punah/*

The word has passed into Buddhism with this twofold meaning. It designates the holy life, the religious life, notably in the form of the arhat: kinnārī jīti vīṣṭaṃ brahmacarīyaṃ, etc. but also chastity. The latter meaning is evidenced in the Mppi, k. 8, p. 120c: "There are beings who follow the ten wholesome courses of action (kalakārakapātha) but who have not yet destroyed lust. Thus the sūtra here praises those who practice the conduct of king Brahmā (brahmacarya) by cutting through their sexual desire. It is said that those who practice brahmacarya purely never smell bad (nīrmanasyaṅgada) the person who is addicted to lust has an ugly malodorous body; thus, to praise those who have cut through lust, it is said that they do not have a bad smell." Later the Mppi, k. 20p, p. 211b, will return to this subject: "The gods who have cut through sexual desire are Brahmās, a term applied to all the gods of the form realm (vipañchāta); this is why the method of cutting through sexual desire is called brahmacarya." 709 From the earliest texts on, besides dharmacakra, the expression brahmacakra occurs: Majjhima, I, p. 69; Sanyutt, II, p. 27; Aśguttara, II, p. 9; 24, III, p. 417; V, p. 33; Tsu a han, T 99 (no. 348), k. 14, p. 98a13; Tsu yu a han, T 125, k. 19, p. 645b20. The Mppi, k. 25, p. 24b5 (tr. Hobgirin, Bie, p. 120), interprets it as follows: "The wheel of Brahmā bears this name because it is pure ... or else because Brahmā means vast (bhūyanti), now the wheel of Dharma which the Buddha turned extends to the entire world; or again because the Buddha taught the four dwellings of Brahmā (the four limitless ones) (brahmavasātuḥ); or also because at the start, it was Brahmā, king of the gods, who invited the Buddha to turn the wheel of Dharma; or also, in order to please those who reverence the god Brahmā. - Sometimes the Buddha said 'wheel of Dharma', sometimes 'wheel of Brahmā'. - What difference is there between these two terms? - They are synonyms. Nevertheless, according to some, the wheel of Brahmā refers to the four limitless ones (apramāṇa) and the wheel of seated on a lotus; this is why the Buddha, who conforms to current usage (saṃvṛtyanuvartanāt), also sits cross-legged on a precious lotus to teach the six pāramitās, and those who listen to this sermon necessarily reach amutarasamyaksambhūti.

Question. - The Buddha Śākyamuni creates innumerable thousands of prabhedaṅkoṭi of Buddhas by emanation. How can they all preach the Dharma at the same time? It is said in the Aṣṭaṅga (Abhidharma):

"There cannot be two minds (citta) at the same time (ekakṣaṇa): when the apparitional (nirmita) Buddhas speak, the master who creates them (nirmāna) must be silent; when the creating master speaks, the apparitional creations must be silent."710 How do these [apparitional Buddhas] preach the six pāramitās all at the same time?

The words brahmacyāga and brahmacāleśa are not the only signs of brahmā influence on the Buddhist vocabulary. The Māpiś can also add that, according to Tisaka, "the Bhagavat is Brahmā" (Kośavyākhyā, p. 578: eva hi Bhagavān Brahmeynt etad udāhṛtham śravakoḥ kalpaṃ etat), and that the term brahmabhūta ‘identified with Brahmā’ is applied to Buddha himself to that of wisdom (prajñā).

The words brahmacyāga and brahmacāleśa are not the only signs of brahmā influence on the Buddhist vocabulary. The Māpiś can also add that, according to Tisaka, "the Bhagavat is Brahmā" (Kośavyākhyā, p. 578: eva hi Bhagavān Brahmeynt etad udāhṛtham śravakoḥ kalpaṃ etat), and that the term brahmabhūta ‘identified with Brahmā’ is applied to Buddha himself (Dīgha, III, p. 84; Majjhima, I, p. 111; III, p. 193, 224; Samyutta, IV, p. 94: Anguttara, V, p. 226; Tisaka, T 26, k. 34, p. 645b24), sometimes to the arhats (Samyutta, III, p. 83; Anguttara, II, p. 206).

According to Buddhaghosa, the word brahmā is used here in the sense of excellent (sattātthana), but the explanations of the Bodhi. bhūmi, p. 385 are subtler: svāyam adhigamya paraśaṃ apy anukampayā vistarāya…tasamā brahmāni ca avaram ity ucyata.710

Undoubtedly the Māpiś is referring here to the theory of nirmāna explained in the Kaṇāraprājapti, which is one of the seven books of the Abhidharma. Che chō loos, T 1538, k. 6, p. 526a: “Why are beings created (nirmita) by the Nirmāna, i.e., the Buddha Bhagavat, of fine color, handsome, pleasant to see, their body adorned with the thirty-two marks of the Great Man, silent while the Buddha speaks and speak when the Buddha is silent; whereas the beings created by the śīvākas, of fine color, handsome, head shaved, clothed in robes and having the marks of the āraṇa, speak when the śīvākas speak and are silent when the śīvākas are silent?” - The Buddha Bhagavat dwells always in sanna and has mastery of mind (cintenaśīla); he enters into sanna and comes out quickly and with no difficulty; he never abandons the object (āśrama) of his mind. This is not the case for the śīvākas. On the contrary, the Bhagavat is omniscient (cintenaśīla); he has obtained mastery of knowledge (jñāna) and mind (citta), and he has reached the other shore (parinirvāna). This is why the beings created by the Buddha… are silent when he speaks, speak when he is silent; whereas the beings created by the śīvākas… speak when the śīvākas speak and are silent when the śīvākas are silent.”

This text should be compared to a canonical stanza, the Pili version of which is in Dīgha, II, p. 212:

Ekānīṃ bhūtadvayāyāṃ saha śīvāka nirmiti
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ bhūtadvayāyāṃ saha śīvāka nirmiti
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā
Ekānīṃ taddhi dharmadharmavatā

"When one speaks (i.e., the creator), all the created beings speak; when one remains silent, all remain silent." Answer. - What has been said there holds for the creations (nirmita) of the heretics (tṛṣṭhika) and śīravakas, but the immense power of concentration (apramāṇasamādhiḥbhāṣa) inherent in the creations of the Buddha is inconceivable (acintya). Thus, when the Buddha speaks, the innumerable thousands of prabhedaṅkoṭi of apparitional Buddhas speak at the same time as him. - Moreover, the apparitional creations of the tṛṣṭhika and the śīravakas are unable in their turn to create [other] apparitional creations, whereas those of the Buddha Bhagavat can create them in turn. - Moreover, after their death, the tṛṣṭhika and śīravakas cannot make the fictive beings [that they have created] last (adhīṭṭhitanti),711 whereas the Buddha, after his own parinirvāna, can make the apparitional being [that he has created] persist as if it were no different from the Buddha himself.712 . Finally, what the Abhidharma says, that there cannot be two minds at the same moment, holds true also for the Buddha. At the moment when the emanated being speaks, he is without thought; but when the Buddha thinks about his emanated creations and wants them to speak, then they all begin to speak.

Question. - The Buddha now wants to preach the Prajñāpāramitā; why does he have the emanated Buddha preach the six pāramitās?

[116 b] Answer. - The six pāramitās and the Prajñāpāramitā are identical and not different. Without prajñāpāramitā, the [first] five pāramitās would not be called ‘pāramitā’. Without the prajñāpāramitā, the virtue of generosity (ādīnāvādanta) would be classed among the perishable dharmas (asyadharma) of the world or would lead to the parinirvāna of the arhats and pratyekabuddhas: it is when it is joined with prajñāpāramitā that it is called pāramitā and leads to Buddhahood. This is why the prajñāpāramitā and the six pāramitās are identical and not different.

There are two kinds of prajñāpāramitā, that which is adorned (ālakṣṇātā) and that which is not adorned. It is like a person who takes coral (gavaḍḍa, vidruma) and adorns their body with it, and a person who does not have coral and does not adorn themselves with it. Or also, when the king comes accompanied by his retinue (parivaṭa), we say: "The king is coming!": when he does not have a retinue, he is said to be "solitary". This is the way it is in universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges in the east and in the ten directions.

This holds for all śīvaka creations, but not for those of the Buddha for, says the Kośa, VII, p. 118, "the latter has perfect mastery of concentration: at will, the magical beings speak one after the other; they question and the Buddha responds; the Buddha questions and they respond." This is also the opinion of the Divyāvadāna, p. 166, if one applies the corrections proposed by L. de La Vallette Poussin in Kośa, VII, p. 118, n. 3: yam bhūtī levaṅka nirmitaś abhīṃśreṇī tuḥ pratīṣṭhānaṃ prācchāti. nirmito vijñānāh.

1 [Lamotte] am not sure that the Māpiś has completely understood its sources: according to it, "when the Buddha speaks, the innumerable thousands of prabhedaṅkoṭi of apparitional Buddhas speak at the same time as him." 711 For this special meaning of adhīṣṭhāna ‘to make last or endure’, see Kośa, VII, p. 119, n. 2. 712 It is thus that, after their parinirvāṇa, the Buddhas Prabhūtārama and Śuṣantā left behind an apparitional Buddha, in a way their ‘double’, in order to convert beings. The śīravakas are unable to prolong themselves thus after their death, but they can use a certain adhīṣṭhāna: thus Kālīyapa, the Buddha’s disciple, caused his skeleton to last until the coming of Maitreya (Kośa, VII, p. 120).
Question. - If the Buddha has miraculous power (ṛddhibala) such that innumerable thousands of prabhedakoṭi of fi... and, by the action of his [miraculous] superknowledge, shook the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu which trembled Answer. - Three obstacles (āvāraṇa) [oppose universal salvation]: i) beings plunged in the three bad destinies (durgati) cannot understand [the teaching of the Buddha]; ii) and iii) gods and humans who are too young, too old or too sick, as well as the non-perceptive gods (asamjnideva) of the formless realm (ārūpya) cannot hear or understand [the teaching of the Buddha].

Question. - Why cannot all those who hear and understand [this teaching] find the Path?

Answer. - They do not all find the path. Why? Because of their fetters (cānyojana) and the obstacles [constituted by] actions (karmāvāraṇa). People whose fetters are heavy have a mind obsessed with fetters; this is why they do not all find the Path.

Question. - Now that the Buddhas of the ten directions and the apparitional Buddhas whom they have delegated preach the six pāramitās, why do we, who are free of the three obstacles (āvāraṇa), not hear them?

Answer. - Actually, beings are living in a bad age and enter into the three obstacles; they are living in an epoch after the Buddha. The retribution of evil actions (karmāvāraṇa) consisting of the errors and sins of the world or the obstacle constituted by heavy fetters (śīlāsva-cānyojāvāraṇa) has plunged beings into an epoch after the Buddha, and many people are chained (āvṛtya) by heavy fetters; sometimes their desire (rāga) is small but their hatred (dvesa) is considerable; sometimes their hatred is small but their desire is considerable; sometimes their desire is small but their delusion (moha) is considerable; sometimes their delusion is small but their hatred is considerable. Thus there is mutual interchange in the order of importance [amongst the fetters]. As a result of the obstacle consisting of the fetters (cānyojāvāraṇa), people do not hear or do not understand the apparitional Buddhas who are preaching the Dharma and do not see the rays of the Buddha. How then would they find the Path? Thus, when the sun (sīrṣa) rises (udarati), blind people (andhakapuruṣa) who do not see it claim that the world has no sun or moon (śūracandra-maṇi); is that the fault of the sun? [116c] When thunder and lightning (meghadvītya) shake the earth, deaf people (badhiva) do not hear it; is that the fault of the sound (śabda)? Actually, the Buddhas of the ten directions are always preaching the Dharma and always delegating the apparitional Buddhas to preach the six pāramitās in universes of the ten directions, but those who are affected by the blindness or deafness of evil actions do not hear the sound of the Dharma. Therefore they do not all in a position to hear and to see. Although the Ārya (here, the Buddha) has great loving-kindness (mahāmaitriśīna), he cannot cause everyone to see and hear. But when peoples’ sins (āpatti) are almost destroyed and their merits (puṇya) are on the rise, then they succeed in seeing the Buddha and hearing the Dharma.

ACT V

Sūtra: Then the Bhagavat, on the same lion-seat, entered into the concentration called Lion's Play and, by the action of his [miraculous] superknowledge, shook the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu which trembled in six different ways (āthaka khalu Bhagavāṁs tasmin eva simhāṣāke niṣpanṇaṁ simhasvākṣaṁ nāma samādhīsamānupada. tadādhyāpa ca rddhibhāvāsahāsralokadhātubhāḥ jñātiṣkāraḥ akkhpataḥ).

Śrūtra: Question. - Why is this samādhi called Lion's Play (simhasvākṣaṁ)?

Answer. - 1) Just as the lion (simha) who has taken a gazelle (mṛga) plays with it as a master (aśivaryena kṛti), 713 so the Buddha, having entered this samādhi, can upset the world in every way and thus make it shake in six different ways.

2) Moreover, [sometimes] the lion plays, and when he plays, all the animals are reassured; in the same way, when the Buddha enters this samādhi, he shakes the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu in such a way that beings in the three evil destinies (durgati) simultaneously attain cessation (nirvṛtti) and all will reach salvation (yoguddhena).

3) Finally, the Buddha is called the man-lion (purvamakṣa) and the samādhi of the Lion's Play is the samādhi of the Buddha's Play. When he enters this samādhi, he causes the great earth (mahāpūthivā) to shake in six different ways and all beings deep in the hellṣ (nīrata) and the two unfortunate destinies (durgati) all receive deliverance (vimokṣa) and are reborn amongst the gods. Such is his ‘Play’.

Question. - Why does the Buddha enter this samādhi?

Answer. - To shake the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, to take beings out of the three unfortunate destinies (durgati) and bring them to the threefold Path (mārga-vṛta). Moreover, by means of three kinds of samādhi, the Buddha has already shown his Buddha body but there are people whose faith (āraddhācitrā) is not profound (gambhāra). And so the Buddha [now] shakes the great earth so that these beings, knowing the immensity of the miraculous power (ṛddhibhāla) of the Buddha who shakes external objects, [may be filled] with pure faith (āraddhāvitaśuddhi) and joyful thoughts (citramuditā) and will all escape from suffering.

Question. - But the arts and devas also can shake the earth. Why speak only about the miraculous power of the Buddha here?

Answer. - The arts and devas are unable to shake it at its base; only the Buddha can make it tremble in six different ways.

Question. - Why does the Buddha shake the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu?

Answer. - So that all beings know that everything is empty (śūnya) and transitory (anītva). There are people who claim that the great earth (mahāpūthivā), the sun and the moon (śūracandra-maṇi), Sumeru and the great ocean (mahāsūnavadra) are all eternal (niśva). This is why the Bhagavat shakes the earth six times and gives the reason (hetupratyaya) for it: Beings will know that it is not eternal.

713 Hence the Sanskrit expressions negarūḍa and negarūjadva to designate the lion.
their minds are softened (mṛduka, snigdha), he preaches the Dharma to them. This is why he shakes the earth in six ways.

Question. - What are the six ways?

*** *** ***

Sūtra: 1) The east rises up and the west sinks (pūrvā dig unnamati paścinā dig avanamati); 2) the west rises up and the east subsides (paścinā dig unnamati pūrvā dig avanamati); 3) the south rises up and the north sinks down (dakṣiṇā dig unnamati uto rā dig avanamati); 4) the north rises up and the south subsides (uttarā dig unnamati dakṣiṇā dig avanamati); 5) the edges rise up and the center sinks (anta unnamati madhye 'vanamati); 6) the center rises and the edges sink (madhyā unnamati ante 'vanamati).?114

Sāstra: What are these six tremblings of the earth (bhūmica)?

Answer. - The trembling of the earth is lesser (avara), medium (madhyā) and greater (agra). In the lesser trembling of the earth, there are two movements: the east rises and the west sinks; or else the south rises and the north sinks; or else the edges [rise] and the center [sinks]. In the medium trembling, there are four movements: in the east, in the west, in the south and in the north; or again in the east, the west, the edges and the center; or again in the south, the north, the edges and the center. In the greater trembling, all six movements appear.

There are all kinds of causes for a greater trembling of the earth. Thus the Buddha said to Ānanda: "There are eight causes and eight conditions for a great trembling of the earth (ajjīva ime Ānanda ketavo 'ṣṭau pratīyayā mahatim prthivīcālasaya)", etc.?115

Moreover, some talk about four kinds of trembling of the earth: trembling of fire (agnicala), trembling of the dragon (nīgaricala), trembling of the golden garuda (garudacala), trembling of the king of the gods (devendaracala).

The moon revolves [around the earth] in 28 days.

1. If the moon enters one of the following six constellations (naksatras).?116

1. Mao (Kṛśīkā, Smin-drug): Tauri (Pleiades),
2. Tchung (Pūrvapählīṃtī, Gre): Leonis
3. Ti (Viśākhā, Sa-ga): Librae,
4. Léou (Aiśint, Tha-skār): Arietis,
5. Che (Pūrvabhadrapadī, Khrums-stod): Pegasi,
6. Wei (Bhārīṛ, Bra-śe): Arietos, then at that moment, the earth trembles as if it would collapse, this shaking extends up to the god of fire (Agni). Then there is no more rain, the rivers dry up, the year is bad for grain, the emperor (Yi'en tsuo) is cruel and the great ministers are evil.

II. If the moon enters one of the following six constellations:

1. Léou (Āšīpēk, Skag): Hydrae
2. Wei (Mūla, Snrubs): Scorpiois
3. Ki (Pūrvāśādhū, Chu-stod): Sagittarii,
4. Pi (Uttarabhadrapadī, Khrums-stod): Pegsi, Andromedae,
5. K'ouei (Revati, Nam-gru): Piscium,
6. Wei (Dhanīṣṭhū, Mon-gru): Delphini,

714 Cf. Mahāvyutpatti no. 3019-3030, Lalitavistara, p. 52, 411.

715 The eight causes are the following: The earth trembles (1) when the waters on which it rests are stirred by the wind; (2) when a being endowed with supernatural power has come to the point of visualizing the earth as limited and the water as unlimited; (3) when a bodhisattva descends into his mother's womb and leaves it at birth; (4) when a Tathāgata succeeds to the state of Buddha, (5 - 8) turns the wheel of Dharma, rejects the remainder of his life, enters into nirvāṇa.

These eight causes are listed in the following texts: Pāli sources: Dīgha, II, p. 107-109; Anguttara, IV, p. 312-313. - Sanskrit sources: Divyāvadana, p. 204-206. - Chinese sources: Versions of the Mahāparipūrṇaśāstra (T 1, k. 2, p. 15c-16a; T 5, k. 1, p. 165a-b; T 6, k. 1, p. 180c; T 7, k. 1, p. 191c-192a); Tseng yi han, T 125, k. 36, p. 753c-754a. Some sources have only three causes, namely, the first two and the last of the preceding list: Tūṅg a han, T 26, k. 9, p. 378b-47a; Ken pen chou... tsa che, T 1451, k. 36, p. 389a. Some of the texts have been translated and compared by Przyłęski, Le Parinirvāṇa et les funérailles du Buddha, p. 63-92.

The Lalitavistara points out that the tremblings of the earth were produced at the main events of the Buddha's life: at conception (p. 52), his birth (p. 85), at the moment of enlightenment (p. 352) and at his first sermon (p. 411). - Corresponding passages in the translation of Foucher, p. 51, 79, 285, 342.

716 The Mppi lists 27 constellations or lunar mansions of the zodiac, divided here into three groups of six and one group of nine. Next to the Chinese term are the Sanskrit and Tibetan translations (according to the Mahāvyutpatti, no. 3187-3214 and the modern equivalent. The series of 27 or 28 naksatra has already appeared in the Vedic literature and has passed from there into the Brahmanical; Buddhist sources and Jain texts. Ancient Brahmanical sources: Atharvā-, XIX, 1, 1 seq. I 1 8 2 seq. Kāthaka-Samhitā, XXIX, 13; Maitreyānī-Samhitā, II, 13, 20; Taittirīyā-Samhitā, IV, 4, 10, seq. Taittirīyāh. I, 5,1; Taittirīyāh. III, 4, 1 seq. - Synopsis table in Kīrīf, Kosmographie der Inrer, p. 36. Recent Brahmanical sources: Naksatrapalpa, etc., in Kīrīf, o.c., p. 138-139.

Buddhist sources, in Sanskrit: Mahāvīra, III, p. 305, 1, 20-21; in Pāli: 306, 1; 21; in 308, 2, 3; 309, 2, 3; Lalitavistara, p. 389; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 3187-3214; - in Pāli: Abhidhānapadippikā, ed. W. Subhuti, Colombo, 1883, p. 58-69 (list in Rhys Davids-Stede, s.v. nakkhata); - in Chinese, in a whole series of texts yet poorly explored.
then at that moment the earth trembles as if it would collapse and this trembling extends as far as the Nāgas. Then there is no more rain, the rivers dry up, the year is bad for grain, the emperor is cruel and the great ministers are unjust.

III. If the moon enters one of the following six constellations,
1. Chen (Ādrā, Lag): Orionis,
2. Kouei (Pusya, Rgyal): Cancri,
3. Sing (Maghī, Mchu): Leonis,
4. Tchen (Hasta, Me-bī): Corvi
5. K'ung (Svātī, Sa-tī): Bootis,
6. Ti (Uttaraphālguṇi, Dīo): Leonis, then at that moment the earth trembles as if it would collapse, this trembling extends as far as the Garuda. Then there is no more rain, the rivers dry up, the year is bad for grain, the emperor is cruel and the great ministers are unjust.

IV. If the moon enters one of the following nine constellations:
1. Sin (Jyeṣṭhā, Sōrun): Scorpionis
2. Kio (Citārā, Nag-pa): Virginis,
3. Fang (Amarakdhā, Lha-mtshams): Scorpionis
4. Niu (Abānijīt, Byi-bīn): Lyrae,
5. Hu (Sātabhīa, Mont-gre): Aquarīi,
6. Tsing (Punavarvasu, Naḥ-so): Geminorum,
7. Pi (Rohin, San-ma): Tauri,
8. Tsuwei (Mrgasīras, Mgo): Orionis,
  then at that moment the earth trembles as if it would collapse and this trembling extends as far as Devendra. Then peace (yogaksomā) is plentiful, rain favors the growth of the five grains, the emperor is kind (īśa), the great ministers are virtuous and everyone is peaceful.

Moreover, among the causes of the trembling of the earth, some are small and others are great. There are some that shake one Jambudīvpa, others cīturdvīpaka, one sāhasralokadhātu, one dvīsāhasralokadhātu or one trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu.

Question 7. How could a trembling of the earth inspire beings to a joyful mind?

Answer. - Mind (citā) stands in support behind the body (kīya); thus when the body is at ease, the mind is joyful. And so (read you instead of you sich), in the person who has fasted (apūrṇadikṣā)718 has a joyful mind on returning to his normal routine. At present in the trisāhasramahāsāhasralokadhātu, beings with various faults have a coarse (sudarika) mind deprived of wholesome stimuli; this is why the Buddha shakes the great earth so that gentle and gentle minds (mrdaka-sīgduhacittā) can develop (vṛddh).

Thus, when the gods enter the Houan lo yuan (Nandanavana) garden of the king of the Trīyāstraṃśa gods, their minds become soft and gentle, they are joyous, content and no gross minds (sthulacittā) arise in them. When the asuras come with their armies, they feel no aggressive attitudes (vṛguhacittā). But it happens that Che t'i p'o na min (Sakro devādān intrā), at the head of an army of gods, enters the Pārvayavana and, because this garden, where the trees, flowers and fruits have an unpleasant smell, is coarse (parṣu), the army of gods [feel] aggressive thoughts arising in themselves.719 It is the same for the Buddha: Since this

---

717 [Translator's note: Due to the lack of the Greek alphabet on my computer, I was unable to reproduce the Greek letters delineating the individual constellations in each of the above three lists.]

718 In Sanskrit, the person who fasts is said to be upuṣṭadhikā (Mahāvastu, ii, p. 9), in Pali, upuṣṭhikā (Vinaya, i, p. 58; IV, 75, 78).

719 The Trīyāstraṃśa gods with Śakra as king live in the city of Sadarāśana on the summit of Mount Meru. This city has four parks: Caitaravata, Pārvayva, Mīraṇ and Nandana (TeCh'ang a han, T 1, k. 20, p. 132b; Mahāvastu, i, p. 32; great earth is coarse and harsh, he transforms (parināmayati) it, softens it and causes all beings to have joyous dispositions. Thus, when certain magical beings (mantaṇaṣuddhi) are burned under people's noses, violent feelings (āghāṭhācitta) are aroused in them and they fight. On the other hand, there is a certain magical herb which inspires joy (muditā), happiness (nanadana), respect (yukkha) and harmony (samaṇa) in people. If a simple magical herb has such power, what can be said [of the Buddha] who makes the ground of the triśaṁsārahāṁśhaśravakakoṭṭhā tuo soft and gentle?

---

Sūtra: In this triśaṁsārahāṁśhaśravakakoṭṭhā, [beings] in the hell realms (nīraṇa), in the preta realm, the animal realm (ṭīyagotra) and the eight difficult (aksana) conditions were immediately liberated (vimukta) and reborn among the gods dwelling at the Cūrṇamārtājīka stage to the Parānirmitavasavātīn stage.720

These sources mention the beneficent influence of the Nandanaśrī and the maleficent influence of the Pāṇḍuṇāyana. - Tēvāna hāna, T 1, l. 20, p. 152b: "Why is it called Pāṇḍuṇāyana? Because when one enters it, one's thoughts (chenni) become harsh (parasana)... Why is it called Nandanaśrī? Because when one enters it, one is happy and joyful." — Jātaka V, p. 158: Nanadana ni nanjanaṇasannattakha Nanadanaśrīnāmānābhate Tāmāsakārahe. - Pi pū cha T 1545, K. 153, p. 692a: "In the Pāṇḍuṇāyana, when the gods want to go to war, armor and weapons appear according to their needs... In the Nandanaśrī, all kinds of marvels and joys are gathered and they go from one to another without getting tired." — Samyutta, I, p. 5 (cf. Tis a hāna, T 99, l. 22, p. 153c) says that those who have not seen the Nandana do not know happiness (Na te saṇkhā pāṇāye ye na passinī Nanandana), and Aṅguttara, III, p. 40 (cf. Tiss ya hāna, T 125, k. 24, p. 681a) speaks of those who walk in the Nandana, joyous, happy and content among the five sense pleasures (te tattu nanḍanti ramanī medio simaṇḍeśā kāmanogameti pācakaha). Originally an abode of the śrīyastireṇa, with all its wonders, was shared with the asuras, but when Maheṇa was born as Śakra among the Traystaaśrīnī gods, the company of the asuras displeased him and, having previously made them drunk, he expelled them from his palace, the five walls of which he had guarded by the nāgas, suparnas, kumbhānas, yakṣas and the Cūrṇamārtājīka gods. Cf. Jātaka, I, p. 201 seq; Dhammadanadīthā, I, p. 272 seq (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 319). It is undoubtedly wrong that the Mipp claims that the asuras still had access to the Nandanaśrī.720 Here Kumārājīva abridges the text of the Pālcāpiṣṭāni and leaps over an important phrase. In reality, it is not only among the gods of the kāmadhātu (from the Cūrṇamārtājikas to the Pārānirmitavasavātim) that these beings take rebirth, but also especially among humans. This is expressed by the continuation of the sūtra given below, p. 118a, where it is said that these gods and these men, remembering their former existence, go to the Buddha. Here is the text of the Pālcāpiṣṭāni, p. 8, where rebirth among humans is explicitly mentioned:

"Atika khaṇṭaṇasamānāṁ bhūte ye omā triśaṁsārahāṁśhaśravakakoṭṭhā lokadhiṣṭatu nivṛtti va tīrāgyaṇeṇo devaṇāma saḥkāryāṇāṁ ārjanaṇāṁ cātāḥ bhūte ādigacchate."

Then at that very moment, at that minute, at that hour, the hells, the animal destinies and the gods who were in this triśaṁsārahāṁśhaśravakakoṭṭhā were broken open and emptied and all the difficult conditions (aksana) disappeared and the beings who had fallen into the hells, the animal realm and the realm of Yama, all experienced such great joy that they were reborn among humans or among the Cūrṇamārtājīka, Śrīyastireṇa, Yama, Tātā, Niṁśukāra or Pārānirmitavasavātim.

Aside from a few unimportant differences, the corresponding text of the Sātānāhārīkā, p. 13-14, is the same. 721 The hell, animal and preta destinies constitute the three bad destinies (duḥṣṭa); these are well known and it is not necessary to define them here. By contrast, the aksana, which the Chinese translation renders as 'difficult conditions' asks for some explanation. There are eight (occasionally nine) aksana: belonging to one of the bad destinies, i.e., damned (narakā), animal (ṭīyagotra) or preta, being a human, one is lacking an organ (indravasākana), is plunged into wrong views (moharudāna), is living before or after the Buddha (tathāguṇānām asampādā), or living in a border region (prayatnaṇāsarpadā). If one is a god, belonging to the class of the long-lived gods (ārīpyaphalā), one is linked to the bhuma, living in the eight difficult (ānaśyakāra), is plunged into wrong views (moharudāna), is living before or after the Buddha (tathāguṇānām asampādā), or living in a border region (prayatnaṇāsarpadā). If one is a god, belonging to the class of the long-lived gods (ārīpyaphalā), one is linked to the bhuma, living in the eight difficult (ānaśyakāra), is plunged into wrong views (moharudāna), is living before or after the Buddha (tathāguṇānām asampādā), or living in a border region (prayatnaṇāsarpadā).
formless realm], they cannot be reborn in the form realm (rupadhåtu) or the formless realms (arûpyadhåtu).

Question. - The five aggregates (skandha) [making up the individual] are transitory (anîtya), empty (înśya) and non-substantial (andmaka); then how can one be reborn among the gods or men? Who is reborn?

Answer. - This point has already been fully discussed in the chapter on the bodhisattva. We shall limit ourselves here to a brief answer. You say that the five skandhas are transitory, empty and non-substantial, but according to the Prâjâpâramith, the five skandhas are neither eternal nor transitory, neither empty nor non-empty, neither substantial nor non-substantial. Like the heretics (tîrthikaka), you are looking for a real atman, but that is non-existent (anupalabdha); it is only a designation (prajñapti). It exists as a result of diverse causes and conditions (nânÎheta-pratyayavasthåga), but only nominally and conventionally (nâmasankēta). Thus when a magician (mîyâkâra) kills himself, the spectators see him dead, and when a trick resuscitates him, the spectators see him alive; but his life and his death have only nominal existence (prajñaptisat) and are not real (dravyasat). According to ordinary systems (lokadharmå), samsâra really does exist; but according to the system of the true nature (bhâtalaksa-nadharmå) there is no samsâra, transmigration.

Furthermore, if there were a transmigrating being (samsârin), there would be transmigration, samsâra; without a samsârin, there is no samsâra. Why? Because the Asamsârin has destroyed birth by means of his great wisdom.

Thus some stanzas say:

Although the Buddha dharmas are empty (înśya)
They are not, however, reduced to nothingness (ucchitÎna).

[118 a] Existent, but non-eternal

Actions are not lost.

Dharmas are like the trunk of a banana tree (kudall): All are the result of mind.
If one knows the non-reality of the dharmas This mind, in its turn, is empty.

The person who thinks about emptiness Is not a practitioner of the Path.
Dharmas do not arise and they do not perish: Being momentary (kṣaṇîka), they lose their nature.

The person who falls into Måra's net,
The person who does not think finds escape (nihsaraṇa).
Mental discursiveness is not the Path,
Non-discursiveness is the seal of the Dharma (dhammanuḍå).

*** *** ***

Śûtra: Then remembering their former existences (pûrva-jñamânî anumôtya), these gods and men (devamanaṣya) experienced great joy (prâmodya). They went to the Buddha and, having bowed down to the Buddha's feet (bhagavatå pâdan iśrîbhîr abhîvandya), they stood to one side.

Śûstra.- Question. - When the gods are reborn, they know three things: they know where they have come from (kutasî cyâtâ), they know where they are born (kusutzapannadhå) and they know by virtue of what previous merit (kena pûra-vâkrapunjeyya).222 But when men are reborn, they are unaware of these three things. [How can it be said here] that they remeber their previous existences?

Answer. - 1) It is not a fixed rule (niyama) for men (manusya-yagati): some rememeber, some do not remember.223
2) Furthermore, it is thanks to the miraculous power (rddhibala) of the Buddha that [those in question here] remember their previous existences.

Question. - The gods, who possess the five superknowledge (abhijñå) and remember their previous lives, are able to go to the Buddha; but supposing that they received [the gift] of the miraculous power of the Buddha and remembered their previous lives, how could men go to the Buddha?

Answer. - Some of them, by birth (janman) or by retribution (vipâka), possess the superknowledge (abhijñå)224, as for example, the noble cakravartin kings; the others borrow the Buddha's miraculous power [in order to go to him].

Question. - Humans are carried in the womb for ten months, suckled for three years and fed for ten years; only after that can they support themselves. It is said, by the power (anabhadhå) of the Buddha, beings in the three bad destinies (durgati), and the eight difficult conditions (akṣaya), all obtain deliverance (vimukti), 222 Cf. Avadîniśatakā, l. p. 292: dhammaṁ khalu devaputraya eva devakanyo 'y ... cyåtå kusutzapannadhå kena karmaṇa. - Kośalâyâkhyâ, p. 413: nîcåra-papannadhå devaputraya tråsi cîtâni ... kusutzapannadhå kena karmaṇa.

---

223 It is not rare that Indian newspapers report the case of young children who remember their immediately preceding lifetime.
224 Notably the rdhåyubala of moving rapidly from one place to another.
are reborn among gods or humans, and go to the Buddha. It may be so for the gods but it is impossible for humans; indeed, how could they walk [as soon as they are born]?

Answer. - In the five destinies (gati), living conditions differ:

1) Gods and hell beings (naraka) are all appariitional beings (upapādaka).

2) Pretas are of two kinds, born from a placenta (jārīṣya) or appariitional (upapādaka).

3) Men (manuṣya) and animals (ṭiṣṭhaṇya) are of four kinds: born from an egg (ándaṇja), born from exudation (sammavṛddhā), appariitional (upapādaka) or born from a placenta (jārīṣya).725

a) Born from an egg, e.g., the thirty-two sons of Piṭ chō k'āi mi k'é la mou (Viśākhā Māgāmāṇī): Viśākhā, their mother, gave birth to thirty-two eggs which on breaking open, released thirty-two boys who all were strong men;726 the oldest of them was Mrgha. Viśākhā obtained the fruit of the threefold Path.

b) Born of exudation, for example, Ten lo p'o li (Ānrapālī), chief courtean (vejīgye) who gave birth to a cakravartin king, etc.727

c) Appariitional beings: thus, when the Buddha was traveling with the four assemblies, in the group of nuns there was a bhikṣunī named A lo p'o (Āśūmārā) who appeared miraculously on this earth.728 Moreover, the people born at the beginning of the cosmic period (prāthamakalpiṣṭha) were all appariitional beings.

d) Born from a placenta: this is the usual birth for humans.

118. b) People of appariitional birth (upapādaka, as an emanation), being full-grown at birth, are able to go to the Buddha. There are people who have obtained the abhijñā who are able to go to the Buddha [by themselves]; others also are able to go to the Buddha because the latter lends them his power of abhijñā.

*** *** ***

725 These are the four "womb" or yoni which are listed in Dīgha, III, p. 230; Majjhima, I, p. 73; Tei′āng a han, T I, k. 8, p. 50c; Mišinda, p. 146; Visuddhi-magga, p. 552, 557; Mahāyāna-pīṭṭha, up. 2279-2282. To illustrate these four types of birth, the Kāranaprajñaptī in Tibetan (Lav., Cosmologie, p. 345-346), Viṣṇubha (T 1545, k. 120, p. 626c-627a) and Kośa (III, p. 28) have gathered a long series of examples. The Mpiś mentions the cases of Viśākhā, Ānrapālī and Āśūmārā.

726 The thirty-two eggs of Viśākhā: Dulpba, III, p. 126-131 (Cosma-Feer, p. 173-174); Rockhill, Life, p. 71; Schiefner-Ralston, Tibetan Tales, p. 125.

727 Ānrapālī was born from the stem of a banana tree as is told at length in the Nai nin k'ī yu yin yuán king, T 553 (tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 325-329); Schiefner-Ralston, Tibetan Tales, p. 85. - But Ānrapālī is the mother of Jivaka, not of a cakravartin king.

728 As her name indicates, this nun 'dweller in a hermitage' was born in a hermitage, her head shaven and clothed in ochre robes.

Sūtra: In the universes of the ten directions, universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, the earth shook similarly in six ways. The damned (naraka), the pretas, the animals (ṭīryaṣa) and the other inhabitants of the eight difficult conditions (akṣaraṇa) were at once liberated (vimuktā) and reborn among the gods of the six classes.

Śāstra: Question. - Beings, infinite (apramāṇa) and innumerable (asamkhyeya), form a considerable number just in the trisahasramahāhāra-laḥkhaṭhā; why does the Buddha also address himself to beings in the universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges?

Answer. - The power of te Buddha (buddhākhaṇa) is immense (apramāṇa): it is a trifle for him to save the beings of the trisahasramahāhāra-laḥkhaṭhā: this is why he addresses himself also [to the beings] of the ten directions.

Question. - If, by his great power, the Buddha Śākyamuni saves the ten directions as a whole, why are other Buddhas still needed [to save beings]?

Answer. - 1) Because beings are infinite (apramāṇa) in number and do not all ripen (paripakṣa) at the same time.

2) Furthermore, causes and conditions (henupratvaya) vary for each being. Thus it is said in the system of the śrīvakas: "In the Chō lī fou yin yuán (Śrīpratvādhana), disciples become separated from Śrīputra;729 if the Buddhās cannot save them, how could others do so?"

3) Furthermore, here it is a matter only of universes of the east equal in number to the sands of a single Ganges; we are not speaking of universes as numerous as the sands of two, three, four, up to a thousand prabhedaśī of Ganges.

4) Finally, universes (laḥkhaṭhā) are infinite (ananta) and unlimited (apramāṇa) in number. If they were finite and limited, the number of beings would be exhausted. This is why the Buddhās must save the innumerable universes of the ten directions.

*** *** ***

Sūtra: Then, amongst the beings of the trisahasramahāhāra-laḥkhaṭhā, those who were bānd from birth were able to see (jātyuddhiḥ paśyanti sma), the deaf began to hear (budhikralaḥ śravanti sma), the mute began to speak (mūktaḥ bhāṣanti sma), the insane became rational (amaṃṭṭhāḥ smṛtiḥ pratilabhante sma), the distracted recovered their attention (vikṣipatitāḥ evaṃcātāḥ bhavanti sma), those who were naked received clothing (agnaiṣ caśvarītāḥ pratilabhante sma), those who were hungry and thirsty had their bowls

729 This perhaps concerns the schism of Kaśāmbrī in which Śrīputra had to intervene (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 354).
filled (jighatsitāḥ pāṛṇaṃdarā bhavanti sma), the sick recovered their health (vyāgasprṣṭā vigatārogā bhavanti sma), the crippled regained their wholeness (hiṃendriyāḥ pariḥpāṛṇendriyā bhavanti sma).730

Śāstra: Beings are subject to hundreds of thousands of sufferings (dukhhā); if the Buddha uses miraculous power (yuddhikāla), why does he not liberate them from all of these sufferings?

Answer. - All sufferings are suppressed, but here only the most serious (sthiḻa) ones are spoken of in brief. Similarly, in order to designate all the fetters (sanyojana), they are spoken of, as a whole, as the three poisons (triviṣa).

I. Question. - It would suffice to say that 'the blind' obtained their sight; why specify 'those blind from birth'?

Answer. - Because in their previous existences, those born blind (pāṛṇaṃdāraṇa) were great sinners. If great sinners can thus recover their sight, what about minor sinners?

Question. - What grave sin (ṣthiḻapattī) have they committed in their previous lives in order to be blind from birth today?

Answer. - They have gouged out or torn out someone's eyes, or destroyed someone's correct view (sanyogprācticakṣa) by saying that sin (apatti) and merit (punya) do not exist. After death, these people fall into hell (nīrāya), then, being reborn in the form of humans, their sins make them blind from birth. - Moreover, stealing lights or lamps (pradaśa) from a stūpa of the Buddha, arhat [118e] arhat or pratyekabuddha, ruining the lamps in other fields of merit (punyakṣetra) are also actions of previous lives (pāṛṇaṃdāraṇakarmaṇa) that cause the loss of sight [in the course of a future lifetime].

But one may lose one's sight during the present lifetime (jhaṇanma) as a result of sickness (vyāḍhī) or because of being beaten (prahāra): those are actual causes.

Only the Buddha is able to restore sight to the 96 eye-sicknesses that king Chō na kia lo (Bāhānakara) could not cure; first he gives them back their sight, then he makes them find the wisdom eye (prajñācakṣa). It is the same for the deaf who recover their hearing.

II. Question. - If there are those who are blind from birth, why does the stūra not speak of those who are deaf from birth?

Answer. - Because those who are blind from birth are more numerous than those who are deaf from birth.

Question. - What are the causes of deafness?

Answer. - 1) Deafness has [the actions] of the previous life as cause. To reject or transgress the instructions of one's teacher (ācārya) or one's father (pitṛ) and to rebel against them is a sin (apatti) which will result in deafness. To cut off or tear out someone's ear, to ruin a gong (gaṇḍi), a bell (dhanḍā), a conch (śaṅkha) or a drum (dundubhi) of a stūpa of the Buddha of the samgha of good men or of any field of merit (punyakṣetra) are also sins (apatti) which in turn lead to deafness. These various actions of a previous lifetime (pāṛṇaṃdāraṇakarmaṇa) are the causes of deafness in a future lifetime.

2) In the present lifetime (jhaṇanma), one can lose one's hearing as a result of sickness (vyāḍhī), or being beaten (prahāra), and other similar things: those are the actual causes.

III. Question. - The mute (mūka) cannot speak. What sins (apatti) have they committed in order to be mute?

Answer. - 1) They have cut out someone's tongue or choked someone; they have made someone unable to speak by means of an evil herb; hearing the instructions of their teacher (ācārya) or the orders of their father, they have cut off their speech and not followed their advice; acting in bad ways, they did not believe in sin or merit and opposed correct speech (samyagvṛṣṭa). Condemned to hell, when they are reborn in human form, they are mute, unable to speak. Those are the various causes that make someone mute.

IV. Question. - [The stūra says] that the insane become rational (unmattāḥ smṛtim pratīlabhante sma); why is one insane?

Answer. - For having committed the following sins in the course of previous lifetimes: molesting someone (ājīvanma) in sin or merit and opposed correct speech (samyagvṛṣṭa) and their sins make them blind from birth. - Moreover, stealing lights or lamps (pradaśa) from a stūpa of the Buddha, arhat [118e] arhat or pratyekabuddha, ruining the lamps in other fields of merit (punyakṣetra) are also actions of previous lives (pāṛṇaṃdāraṇakarmaṇa) that cause the loss of sight in the course of a future lifetime.

Thus the brahmin, who had lost his rice field (tad tao tien), sasyakaṭṭha, instead of fou tien) and whose husband had died, had a fit of madness and fled completely naked. - The bhikkhu Tch'e chō k'ie kiao t'an (Krīśākā gautami), while she was still a lay-person (suddhavasanaṃ), lost her seven sons; the sadness made her lose her reason and she became insane.731 Extremely irritable people, unable to contain themselves, become completely insane. Mad people (mūdha), by a sad mistake, cover their bodies with ashes (bhūsan), tear out their hair (keia), go about naked and eat dung (purūla) in their madness.732 After a serious illness, a sickness of wind (vāyuḥdādi) or a sickness of fire (tāvoyādhi), people become insane. Others are insane because they are possessed by evil demons or because they have stupidly drunk rain 730 Similar exposition in Pulavimānti, p. 8-10; Śataāhārasūk, p. 18-19; Lalitavistara, p.278-279; Suvannaprabhūsa, ed. Nobel, p. 8-9; Mahāvyutpattī, no. 6036-6309.

731 The story of “Thin Gautamī”, in Pāli, Kiśāgotami, is especially well-known in the Pāli sources: Therīṭṭārga Conf., p. 174 seq (tr. Rh. D., Sisters, p. 106-108); Apudīnā, II, p. 564-567; Dhammapadātha, II, p. 270-275, III, p. 432 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, II, p. 257-260: III, p. 165-166): Manorathā, I, p.378-381; Rastou-Schneider, Tibetan Tales, p. 216-226: See J. H. Thiessen, Die legende von Kiśāgotami, Breslau, 1880 Kiśāgotami fled in despair with her dead child in her arms. She came to the Buddha who promised to bring her child back to life if she brought him a mustard seed from a house where nobody had died. She sought in vain for such a house until she realized that ‘the living are few and the dead are many’ and that the Buddha had wanted to teach her the universality of death. Comforted, she entered the monastic order where she attained arhathood.

This nun is different from Kiśāgotami, a young girl of Kapilavatūra, known also under the name of Megi who promised the future Buddha when he returned to his palace, addressing him to the famous stanza: Nibbatā nibbatā sūlā māl ā ... “Blessed truly the mother; blessed truly the father, blessed truly the wife who has such a husband as that.” Cf. Nidānaṅkathā, p. 60; Mahāvastu, II, p. 157; Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 15, p. 724b; Tchong hiu ho huo ti king, T 191, k. 4, p. 944c; Ken pen chouo... p'o seng che, T 1450, k. 3, p. 114b.

732 An allusion to the religious practices of the Nirgranthas.
It is said that in southern India (daksinapatha) there was a Dharma teacher (dharmacarya) Kao tso 736 736 Kao tso may not be a proper name; these characters mean 'he who sits on a high seat' and probably translate the Sanskrit uccāsane niṣṇanāḥ, which occurs in the Pāli Pītiṇākkha, 69th nikāya (Vinaya, IV, p. 204): na nīce uccāsane niṣṇati uccāsane nīcāsante agāḷāsate dhamman deśasehii: "I will not preach the Dharma while sitting on a seat lower than a man who is sitting on a higher chair; unless he is sick" and in the Sanskrit Sarvāstivādins Pratītiśīkha, 22nd śāṣāka (L. Finet, Le Pratītiśīkha des Sarvāstivādins, Extracts of JA, Nov.-Dec., 1913, p. 75; Mahāyānastūpa, no. 8603; Che song pi k’ieou po lo y’i mou tch’ a kiai pen, T 1436, p. 478a: na nīce uccāsane niṣṇan uccāsane niṣṇanāya gāḷāḥyavā yā dharmam deśasehīṃ. Therefore a kao-tso teacher is a teacher seated on a throne to teach.

We know that the famous translator Dhamarākṣa who came from a family of Sceythian origin at Tousen Houang and who lived in the 3rd century, was the student of the Hindu Kao tso (Tchou Kao tso) whom he accompanied into the Western countries. Here again kao tso is an honorific title rather than a proper name.

We should note that the Kao tso presented to us here by the Mppūs is a native of southern India, that he converted the king and ensured his protection in an original way - by his actions rather than by words - and that he finally triumphed over the heretics. These three points constitute the outline of Nāgārjuna's biography and, if indications were not so slight, I [LaMonte] could easily believe that Kao tso is none other than Nāgārjuna. Nāgārjuna was also a native of southern India (Andhra) and was a friend of King Satavahana. Many sources, or less dependent on one another, tell us how he was converted; it was indeed in the manner of Kao tso: "When Nāgārjuna came back from the nāga, the king of southern India, full of wrong views, favored the tīrthikas and disputed the holy Dharma. In order to convert him, Nāgārjuna appeared before him with a red flag for seven consecutive years. The king was astonished and asked who was this man before him. Nāgārjuna replied: "I am omniscient (sarva-jñā)." The king was startled at these words and said: "An omniscient one is very rare; how can you prove that?" Nāgārjuna answered: "If the king wishes to test my science, he may pay attention to my words..." The king then asked him what the devas were doing at that moment; Nāgārjuna told him that the devas were fighting against the asuras. At that moment the king heard a sound as if someone were being choked. Not believing that this sound was coming from the devas, he said that that was no proof... Then at once a mass of shields, spears and weapons fell from the sky. The king then said: "Although these are certainly weapons, how do you know [that they come] from the devas fighting with the asuras?"... Immediately, severed hands, feet, ears and noses of the asuras fell from the sky... The king bowed his head and was converted. Some brahmīs who were on the palace terrace cut their hair and took on the precepts (āsā). From that time on Nāgārjuna spread Buddhism widely in southern India, vanquished the tīrthikas and developed the Mahāyāna."

This story is drawn from a biography of Nāgārjuna attributed, wrongly, without a doubt, to Kumārajīva: the Long chou p’o’u sa chouan, T 2047, p. 186a-b; it is repeated by later biographies (Fou fa tsung yin yun tchouan, T 2058, k. 5, p. 318a-b; Fo tou fong k’i, T 2055, k. 5, p. 174c; Fo tou li fong t’ai, T 2056, k. 4, p. 503a-b) but its great antiquity is attested by a note of Kumārajīva inserted in the Tchou wei mo kie king, T 1775, k. 2, p. 538; where the episode is summarized.

The same sources tell also about a brahmīn who, in association with Nāgārjuna, produced a magic pool in the middle of which was a lotus with a thousand petals, and how Nāgārjuna astounded him by creating a white elephant with six tanks that upset the pool.

In the victory of Kao tso over the tīrthikas as it is told here in the Mppūs, we see perfect agreement with the biographies of Nāgārjuna written in the same spirit and with the same concerns. It would be rather tempting to identify Kao tso with Nāgārjuna. If the latter is really the author of the Mppūs, he was thus transmitting to us an anecdote in his own life... who preached the five precepts. In the crowd there were many heretics (tīrthika) who had come to listen, and the king of the country made some objections: "If as you say, those who provide liquor (muḍvāḥ) or who drink liquor were punished with madness, among our contemporaries mad people would be more numerous than rational people. Now actually, mad men are rare and those of healthy mind are numerous. How can that be?" At once the heretics applauded (sādhabhāṣyam adātī), saying: "This is a profound (gaṇabhāṣya) objection. This Kao tso with the slaven head (munda) will not be able to answer it for the king's knowledge is sharp (tīkṣṇākābha)." Then the Dharma teacher, pointing his finger at the heretics, spoke about something else. The king understood but the heretics said to him: "The king's objection was profound; he has not answered. Ashamed of his ignorance, he just raises his finger and talks about something else." The king said to the heretics: "The Dharma teacher Kao tso has answered with his finger and that is all; he said nothing in order to spare you. By showing you his finger, he meant that you are the madmen and that madmen are not rare. You coat yourselves with ashes (bhasman) and have no shame in going about naked; you fill human skulls (kapāla) with excrement (purīṣa) and you eat it; you tear out your hair (kuṭika); you sleep on thorns (kantaka); you hang yourselves upside-down and you asphyxiate yourselves; you go into the water in winter; you roast yourselves in summer. All that is all; he said nothing in order to spare you. By showing you his finger, he meant that you are the madmen and that madmen are not rare.

Thirst. What then could be said of those who meet the Buddha?

391

Thus, at the time of the Buddha Kāśyapa, two brothers left home (pravrajita) in order to seek the Path (mārga).737 The first observed the precepts (sīlādhara), recited the sūtras (sūtrapāṭha) and practiced dhyāna; the second solicited patrons (dāna) and practiced meritorious actions (punykarman). When Buddha Kāśyamuni appeared in the world, the first was born into a merchant's (śāra) household and the second became a great white elephant (pūnārājga) whose strength conquered the enemies. The merchant's son left home (pravrajita) to practice the Path. He became an arhat endowed with the six abhijñās, his relatives or his family, would be hungry and thirsty because of the gravity of this fault even if they are living during the [golden] age of a Buddha.

Furthermore, people who, in their previous lifetimes, have stolen food from the Buddhas, the arhats, the pratyekabuddhas, their relatives or their families, will be hungry and thirsty because of the gravity of this fault even if they are living during the [golden] age of a Buddha.

Thus the prayer says (pūjā): "You who are the Buddha, by your miraculous power (śāntāla), created (nirmītā) food that satisfied them. According to others, the Buddha's rays, on touching their bodies, suppressed their hunger and thirst. This is like the wish-fulfilling jewel (cintāmanī): those who think of it have neither hunger nor thirst. What then could be said of those who meet the Buddha?"

391

This explains why causes and conditions (hengprataya) vary [for each individual] and why, although being born in [the golden] age of a Buddha, one may still be hungry and thirsty.

737 The story of the two brothers here is taken from Ts' a p'i yi ku, T 207 (no. 3), p. 523a (tr. Chavannes, Contos, II, p. 4-6).

738 According to Ts' a p'i yi ku, the king maintained this elephant in luxury and had assigned the revenue of a city of many hundreds of households to the elephant's maintenance.

739 In Ts' a p'i yi ku, it was to the king that the monk made this explanation; the king's understanding was awakened and he released the monk.
VIII. [The sūtra says that] the sick are cured (rogasātyā vigatarogā bhavanto sma). There are two kinds of sickness (ṛṣṭā vigatarogā bhavanto sma). A vaiśya invited him and the samgha to take a meal at his house. There are five reasons (hetupratyaya) why the Buddha, staying in a vihāra, would go for a meal: 1) He wishes to enter into samādhi; 2) He wishes to preach the Dharma to the devas; 3) He wishes to visit the monks’ cells in the course of his walk; 4) He wishes to care for the sick monks (gānapatīhāya); 5) He wants the monks who have not yet taken the precepts to take the precepts (lākṣāddùna). Then raising up the door-latch with his hand, the Buddha entered the bhikṣu’s cells; he saw a bhikṣu who was sick and had no care-giver (gānapatīhāyu): unable to rise up from his bed, he carried out all his needs in his bed. The Buddha asked him: “Why, O unfortunate man, are you alone and without a care-giver?” The bhikṣu answered: “Bhagavat, I am lazy by nature (ṣīnu sātikātām); I have not yet understood. This is why you have had to undergo these sufferings and you will still have more sorrows immediately disappeared; my body and my mind rejoiced.” The Buddha asked him: “Why, O unfortunate man, are you alone and without a care-giver?” The bhikṣu answered: “Bhagavat, I am lazy by nature (ṣīnu sātikātām); I have not yet understood. This is why you have had to undergo these sufferings and you will still have more sorrows immediately disappeared; my body and my mind rejoiced.”

394 In the present lifetime, all kinds of illnesses are also contracted following sudden cold (śīna, heat (aṣṭā) or wind (vīyu). In the present lifetime, sicknesses are of two types: i) internal sicknesses (ālaḥdyānikarogā): disturbances of the five internal organs, coagulation, sickness due to the stars, etc.; ii) external sicknesses (bhūhyarogā): being crushed by a chariot, falling from a horse, being injured by weapons and other accidents of this kind.

Question. What are the causes of sickness? Answer. 1) For having devoted oneself in past lifetimes to all kinds of violence, e.g., beatings, pillage, imprisonment, etc., sicknesses are contracted in the course of the present lifetime. In the present lifetime, again all kinds of sickness are contracted due to lack of hygiene, wrong nourishment, irregularity of sleeping and rising. There are 404 different illnesses. These illnesses are cured by the Buddha’s miraculous powers (ālaḥdyānikara). What is said is as follows:741

740 See Hobogrīn, Ṭhā, p. 155. 741 In the Pāli text (Vinaya, I, p. 301-302) there is the story of the sick and abandoned monk whom the Buddha washed with his own hands:

Tenā khaṃ samayena abhitārasya bhikṣhako kacchāvīkārādhāho hoti ... Ānanda pādato uccāreṇa mahāve Karakātena.

The same story occurs in many texts: Tseng yi a han T 125, k. 30, p. 766b-767b; Cheng king, T 154 (no. 26), k. 3, p. 89b-90a; Pou sa pem chung man loon, T 160 (no. 11), k. 4, p. 342b-c; Fu kiu p’i yyun king, T 211, k. 2, p. 591b-c; Wou fun liu, T 1421, k. 28, p. 139b; Mo ho seng k’i liu, T 1425, k. 28, p. 455a-457b; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 41, p. 861b-c; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 28, p. 205a-b; Hiuan tsang, Si yu li, T 1087, K. 6, p. 899b (tr. Beal, II, p. 5; Watters, Travels, I, p. 387).

There are some differences among these stories:

a. The scene takes place at Śrīvastī in most of the sources, but in Rāgahga in T 125 and T 160 and in the kingdom of Hien t’i (154 and 8; 64 and 9) in T 211. Hiuan Tsang may have visited the stūpa commemorating this cure, either NE of Śrīvastī (according to the Si yu li, I.c.) or NE of Rāgahga (according to the Che che yao lan, T 2127, k. 2, p. 306a).

b. In T 125, the sick man calls to the Buddha for help and the Buddha hears his cry by means of his divine ear.

c. The Buddha cures the sick man, sometimes without the aid of anyone else (T 211, T 1421, T 1428, T 1435, T 2087), sometimes with the help of Ānanda (Pāli Vinaya; T 1425) or Śakrā (T 160 and Mppi) or Vaiśravana and Śakrā (T 125).

d. In three sources (T 154, T 211 and Mppi), the sickness and the abandonment of the monk is presented as the punishment for his evil conduct in past lifetimes.

e. All the Vinayas (Pāli Vinaya, T 1421, T 1425, T 1428, T 1435) add that the Buddha profited from the occasion by encouraging his monks to care for one another when they are sick; cf. Vinaya, I, p. 302: Nāthā te bhikṣhavo mātā nāthā pitā ... to gilāmān upaṭṭhāhayasa.

No longer, O monks, do you have a mother or father to care for you. If you do not care for one another, who will care for you? Whoever wishes to care for me must take care of sick people.”
2) In the present existence (imājanam) they are victims of robbers (caura) or butchers (ghātaka) and they are crippled because of all this. Or the sicknesses (vyādhī) of wind (śāra), cold (śīla) or heat (uṣna) causes them physical discomfort and parts of their bodies become infected; this is why they are crippled. But thanks to the Buddha's loving-kindness they recover their wholeness.

Thus, for example, the servant of the Jetavana (jetavanīdāna) called Kien ti (Gaṇḍaka)?742 [Gaṇḍaka in the Ts' in language means 'cut up']. He was the brother of king Po saw ni (Prasenañjiti); he was handsome (ubhāruṇa), kind (bhādu) and endowed with an excellent heart (kalyāṇakāya). A high court lady fell in love with him, called him secretly and asked him to follow her, but Gaṇḍaka refused. The lady became very angry and slandered him to the king, placing the blame on him.743 On hearing this, the king had him cut into pieces (gandapagandam) and thrown into a cemetery (imaianasna). As he was not yet dead, a rākṣas tiger-wolf came during the night to feed him.744 Then the Buddha came to him and shone his rays on him; his limbs reunited at once and his heart felt great joy.745 The Buddha preached the Dharma to him and he attained the threefold Path (mārgatayaya). Taking him by the hand, the Buddha led him to the Jetavana. Then Gaṇḍaka said: "My body was broken and abandoned; the Buddha has rejoined my limbs; I must dedicate my life to him. I give my body to the Buddha and to the saṅgha of bhikkhus." The next day, on hearing of this event, king Prasenañjiti went to the Jetavana and said to Gaṇḍaka: "I am sorry for the mistake [I have committed] against you; indeed, you are not guilty, I have wrongly punished you; therefore I am going to give you half of my kingdom as compensation." Gaṇḍaka answered: "I am satisfied, O king, you are not guilty either: it must be that way as punishment (vipaka) for faults [that I have committed] during my previous existences (piṭavanīdāsa). But today I have given my body to the Buddha and the saṅgha; I will not return with you."746

This is how the crippled who have lost their wholeness recover it when they receive the Buddha's rays. This is why [the sūtra] says that the crippled recover their wholeness (abhijnendrañāpi pariññendrañā bhavanti). They are reestablished as soon as they receive the Buddha's rays.

---

742 Kien ti may well conceal an original Sanskrit Khadin which also means 'cut up', but Gaṇḍaka is attested by the Divyāvadāna. p. 155: He was originally called Kăla, but 'as his body had been cut into pieces, his name was changed to Gaṇḍaka.' Indeed, Kien ti can easily conceal an original Gandu, because Kien (93 and 9) can as well translate gand as kălam, and ti (64 and 5) probably translates a final diśa: Gaṇḍika.

His story, told here, also occurs with some divergences in detail in the Divyāvadāna, p. 153-155 (tr. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 154-156) and the Mūlaśravastivādin Vinaya, Ken pen choa - su che T 1451, k. 28g. 338bc.

The same Gaṇḍaka, called Gandu in the Pāli sources, appears also in another story. The gardener of king Prasenañjiti, he went one day to the palace to offer the king a ripe mango (ambapakkha). But meeting the Buddha on the way who was on his begging round, he offered it to him instead. The Buddha ate it at once and gave the seed (bhuma) to Gaṇḍaka. It is the Ts' in language means 'cut up'. He was the brother of king Po saw ni (Prasenañjiti); he was handsome (ubhāruṇa), kind (bhādu) and endowed with an excellent heart (kalyāṇakāya). A high court lady fell in love with him, called him secretly and asked him to follow her, but Gaṇḍaka refused. The lady became very angry and slandered him to the king, placing the blame on him. Then Gaṇḍaka refused. On hearing this, the king had him cut into pieces (gandapagandam) and thrown into a cemetery (imaianasna). As he was not yet dead, a rākṣas tiger-wolf came during the night to feed him. Then the Buddha came to him and shone his rays on him; his limbs reunited at once and his heart felt great joy. The Buddha preached the Dharma to him and he attained the threefold Path (mārgatayaya). Taking him by the hand, the Buddha led him to the Jetavana. Then Gaṇḍaka said: "My body was broken and abandoned; the Buddha has rejoined my limbs; I must dedicate my life to him. I give my body to the Buddha and to the saṅgha of bhikkhus." The next day, on hearing of this event, king Prasenañjiti went to the Jetavana and said to Gaṇḍaka: "I am sorry for the mistake [I have committed] against you; indeed, you are not guilty, I have wrongly punished you; therefore I am going to give you half of my kingdom as compensation." Gaṇḍaka answered: "I am satisfied, O king, you are not guilty either: it must be that way as punishment (vipaka) for faults [that I have committed] during my previous existences (piṭavanīdāsa). But today I have given my body to the Buddha and the saṅgha; I will not return with you."746

This is how the crippled who have lost their wholeness recover it when they receive the Buddha's rays. This is why [the sūtra] says that the crippled recover their wholeness (abhijnendrañāpi pariññendrañā bhavanti). They are reestablished as soon as they receive the Buddha's rays.

---

746 The Divyāvadāna adds that he will retire into the Buddha's hermitage and that he will be the Buddha's servant (upachāryaka).

747 The last phrase translates only imperfectly the original Sanskrit of the Palaśvinipati, p. 10 and the Śatāsāhariśa, p. 19: taṁ samīr eva ca saṁsa evaṁprāpyaṇaṇu... taduḥ prāmbhakī prāvāhīṇam. "At that very moment, they were filled with such wisdom that they cried: 'Long live mastery of the self! Long live the discipline! Long live the practice of the religious life! Long live non-violence towards animate beings!"
Answer. - No. They consider old people as their father and mother, large people as their elder brother, small people as their younger brother; similarly for elder or younger sister. By the power of samākīcita, everybody is considered as a relative (ākācīta).

Question. - Why call father and mother somebody who is neither father nor mother, etc.? Why call somebody who is not a relative a relative? Is that not a falsehood (māyāvāda)?

Answer. - In the course of innumerable generations, all beings have been one's father, mother, elder brother, younger brother, elder sister, younger sister and relative. Furthermore, according to the true nature (satyalaṅkana) of dharmas, there is no father or mother, no elder or younger brother; but people who are submerged in the error of self (ātmaniparāśābhāvinīśīpa) believe in their existence and thus there is the question of father and mother, elder and younger brother. Therefore it is not a lie when, by virtue of a wholesome mind (kausalukīcita), we consider one another [with the feelings we would feel] for a father or mother. Finally, there are people who, out of interest, treat as a father someone who is not their father and as a mother someone who is not their mother. It is the same for elder brother, younger brother and children. There are people who send away their son when he is badly behaved and other families take him in and treat him as their own son.

A stanza says:

Consider another person's wife (parakulatara) as a mother,
Consider the welfare of another (paranadhana) like fire,
Consider all beings as your relatives,
This is what is called the vision of evenness.

II. [The stūra says that]: all beings practice the ten good paths of action (daiaukusaladharmapathasevino bhavanti sma).

1) The paths of bodily action (kāyakīmpathā) are three in number: abstaining (virāti) from murder (prātītātiṁpā), theft (adattātātiṁpā), and wrongful sexual relations (kāmāniṁhīkātiṁpā).

2) The paths of vocal action (vākṣkīmpathā) are four in number: abstaining from falsehood (māyāvāda), slander (paścātuvāda), harmful speech (pārasyavāda) and thoughtless speech (sambāmīnamprayātiṁpā).

3) The paths of mental action (manaskīmpathā) are three in number: abstaining from envy (abhiḥdiḥ), spitefulness (syādpada) and wrong views (mūḍiḥkādyāti).749

Every path of action, from abstention from murder to abstention from wrong views, involves four subdivisions: not to kill beings oneself; not to order others to kill, praising (prātītātiṁpā) those who do not kill, rejoicing (anumodana) when one does not kill.

120] Question. - The last three paths of action, [abstaining from envy, spitefulness and wrong views] are not actions, whereas the first seven are actions. Then why speak of 'ten paths of action'?

749 These ten kīmāpathā are listed in the same way in Asagutta, V, p. 261, 266-267; Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 1052), k. 37, p. 274c; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 1685-1698; Kośha, IV, p. 168. See Rhys Davids-Stede, s.v. kāmāpathā.

Answer. - Because they are often resorted to, they are rightly called 'paths of action'. Although the last three may not be actions, they can give rise to actions; this is why they are called paths of action as a whole (samaśānta).

III. [The stūra continues]: "Pure, observing chastity, they are without fault" (tucayo brahmārāṇyo nirvānavādhi).

Question. - We have just said that these beings practiced the ten wholesome paths of action and the argument is satisfactory. Why add that they are pure and practice chastity?

Answer. - There are beings who practice the ten wholesome paths of action and who have not cut through their sensual desire. Here we are also praising those who observe the conduct of king Brahma (brahmācaya, in the sense of chastity). Because they have cut through lust, [the stūra] says that they are 'pure, chaste and without fault'. People who practice impurity have an ugly malodorous body. This is why we praise those who have cut through their sensual desire by saying that they are without fault (nirvānavādhi).

IV. [The stūra says that] they were full of bliss (suvāsakhasamapita).

Question. - What is bliss (sukha)?

Answer. - This bliss is of two types, internal bliss (ādityātīnakṣaṇaka) and the bliss of nirvāna (nirvānavāsaka). This bliss is not the result of the five coarse objects (āṇṣeṣa) or the formless realm (ānākyavāsaka), and wrongful sexual relations (āṇaṃkāya), by practicing the ten wholesome paths of action (daiaukaladalakarmapathā), one is pure (āṇa) and faultless: this is what is called internal bliss.

Question. - To what realm (ājīvakkhaṇa) does this bliss belong? Does it belong to the desire realm (kāmādhūṇa), the form realm (āvāsādhūṇa) or the formless realm (āvāsādhūṇa)?

Answer. - This bliss both belongs to and does not belong to the desire realm (kāmādhūṇa); it does not belong to the form realm or the formless realm. The stūra says that it is like that experienced by a bhikṣu entered into the third dhyāna (śāntiprāmaṇa bhikṣu). If this bliss belonged to the form realm (āvāsādhūṇa), the stūra would not have used this comparison (āpamaṇa); that is why we know that it does not belong to the form realm. It is a matter here of a mind of the desire realm (kāmādhūṅkha) that produces a joy filling the entire body; it is like a warm joy that floods the body, makes it flexible (āṇaṃkṣa), soft and happy (āṇa). Those who are without bonds (anuṣayavācara) discover the nature (ālyanasa) of Prajñāpāramitā; they see that all dharmas are unborn (anupanna) and unceasing (anuttappa); they acquire real wisdom (prajñā) and their mind is without attachment (asaṅga). The bliss of the signless (ānuttappa) is the absence of bonds.

Question. - The Buddha has said that nirvāna is the supreme bliss (nirvāṇaṃ paramaṇa sukham),750 why do you speak here about the bliss of the third dhyāna (trīṣadūṇakṣaṇa)?

750 For example, in the well-known stanza of the Maṅgalandasutta (Majjhima, I, p. 508; Tsongh a han, T 26, k. 38, p. 672b):
Answer.751 - There are two types of bliss, the bliss that involves feeling (saveditasukha) and the bliss that involves the abandonment of feeling (veditanirodhasukha). In the latter, the five aggregates (pañca-skandha) are completely eliminated and there is no further rebirth; this is the bliss of nirvāna-without-residue (nirapady-dhi-sam-nirvānasa-kha). But the bliss of the mind (citānanda) that suppresses displeasure (avesi) and the afflictions (kleśa) is called pleasant feeling (su-khaveda) and the fullness of the pleasant feeling (su-khaveda-paripūṭṬi) occurs in the third dhīyā. This is why [the bliss which these people experience] is compared to that of the third dhīyā.

Question. - The first and second dhīyās involve a pleasant feeling as well: why does the stītra speak only of the third dhīyā?

Answer. - Bliss is lesser (avara), medium (madihyu) and greater (agra). The lesser bliss is that of the first dhīyā, the medium bliss is that of the second dhīyā, the greater bliss is that of the third dhīyā.

In the first dhīyā it is twofold: the faculty of pleasure (sukhendriya) and the faculty of satisfaction (saumanasayendriya), namely, the faculty of pleasure associated with the [first] five consciousnesses (pañca-vijñānasam-prayukta-sukhendriya) and the faculty of satisfaction associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasam-prayukta-saumanasayendriya).

[121 a] In the second dhīyā, there is the faculty of satisfaction associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasam-prayukta-sauman-asayendriya).

In the third dhīyā there is the pleasure associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasam-prayukta-sukhendriya).

In all the threefold world (trai-dhituka), with the exception of the third dhīyā, this faculty of pleasure associated with the mental consciousness is absent. The [first] five consciousnesses (pañca-vijñāna) are unable to conceive (vikalpaṇu) things; they do not know their names (nāma) or their symbols (ṣaṁketa) or their marks (nimitta). At the moment it is produced, the visual consciousness (caksu-vijñāna) is like a first indication; but it is the mental consciousness arising later [that knows the thing]. This is why the faculty of pleasure associated with the first five consciousnesses (pañca-vijñānasam-prayukta-sukhendriya) is unable to perfect (paripūṭṬi) happiness; it is the faculty of pleasure associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānasam-prayukta-sukhendriya) that perfects bliss. Consequently if, in the third dhīyā, the qualities (guna) are few in number, bliss (sukha) abounds. It is not vinākha, abhibhāvyatana or kṛṣṇūryatana which surpasses this third dhīyā, for they themselves lack this bliss. This is why the stītra compares the [bliss of these beings] to that experienced by a bhikku in the third dhīyā.

V. [The stītra says]: "They approve of wisdom (praṭijñā), keeping the precepts (śīla), mastery of the self (dharma) and non-violence toward others (praṇibhāṣṭey avihina)."

Question. - Having spoken of the bliss [which they experience], why does the stītra say that they approve of wisdom?

Answer. - Those who have not found bliss (sukha) can still acquire qualities (guna); but when they have found it, attachment to bliss (asajjasukha) dominates and they no longer acquire qualities. This is why, immediately after this bliss, they set their minds to the approval of wisdom. Those who approve wisdom keep the precepts, master themselves and do no harm to others.

Question. - Keeping the precepts is 'mastering oneself' and 'not harming others'; why add this useless comment?

Answer. - Purity of body and speech (kāśyāvākkauṣṭya) constitutes 'keeping the precepts'; setting one's mind on the wholesome is 'mastering oneself' and also 'not harming others'. All these qualities are included in the section on morality (siḍḍhakanda), the section on concentration (samādhi-skandha) and the section on wisdom (prajñāskandha).752 Keeping the precepts constitutes the siḍḍhakanda; mastering oneself constitutes the samādhi-skandha; not harming others - loving-kindness (maññī) in the course of dhīyā and other qualities (guna) - constitutes the prajñāskandha.

Question. - Nobody boasts about hating the precepts. Why does the stītra say that the beings [whom it praises here] approve the observing of the precepts?

Answer. - There are some brahmans attached to worldly things (lokadharmaśastra) who say: "Leaving home, observing the precepts, those are the deeds of a casteless person. Dedicating one's life to acquiring wealth (dhanā) and accumulating precepts (guna), that is what is good. How can a mendicant (prayāvata) who begs for his food and makes no personal effort acquire qualities?" This is how they criticize those who keep the precepts.

There are also people attached to political institutions who criticize the partisans of self-mastery (dama). They say: "People should govern the world by law. Rewarding good and punishing evil is an inviolable principle. There is great profit in never forgetting to pay respect to one's parents, establishing laws and helping one's neighbor. Why should one be limited to improving oneself, mastering oneself, without doing anything about putting the disordered world into order, or helping those in need?" This is how they criticize the partisans of self-mastery.

Finally, there are people who criticize the partisans of non-violence towards beings (praṇibhibhāṣṭey avihinā) by saying: "They do not punish the wicked, they [121b] do not arrest thieves or chastise rogues; they show no severity towards the guilty; they are unable to repel an offense or put aside difficulties. What is the use of preserving profitless silence?" This is how they criticize the partisans of non-violence toward beings. They also say:

Why does a man without energy
Come into the world?
He does not avoid his own difficulties.
He is like a wooden statue fixed in the ground.

752 These three skandhas, śīla, samādhi and praṭijñā are the three elements constituting the Path. See for example Atīgūtara, I, p. 291.
With evil words like these, they criticize non-violence toward beings.

But the gods and men [with whom the stūtra is concerned] all approve of wisdom, observation of the precepts, mastery of oneself and non-violence toward beings. Practicing these good dharmas, [they enjoy] peace of body and mind (kāyacitrayogākāsme) and the fearlessnesses (vaśīrdrayaṣa); they are without worry and without anger; they have a good reputation; they are beloved by people; they are going towards entry into nirvāṇa. When their life reaches its end and they think about their merits, they feel neither sorrow nor remorse. If they do not attain nirvāṇa, they are reborn in the Buddha universes or in the heavens (svarga). This is why the stūtra say that they approve wisdom, keeping the precepts, self-mastery and non-violence toward beings.

ACT VI

Sūtra: Then the Bhagavat, seated on the lion-seat, mastered the trisūtrasmahātālakāslokadhātu by his brilliance, his color, his beauty and his splendor, and extended [his domination] as far as universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, in the same way that Sumeru, king of the mountains, surpasses all the mountains by its brilliance, its color, its beauty and its splendor (Atha bhālu Bhagavāṁ tammin eva śīḥāsam inam trisūtrasmahātālakās lokadhātam abhiḥbāya tiṣṭhati ... abhiṣāy varṇena iśrīyā teṣāṁ ca, yayaś dasādikāyā guṇinādimāvlokāspamāṇā lokdhātām abhiḥbāya tiṣṭhati. tadvajāhāpi nāma Sumeruh parvartādjaḥ sarvaparvatvān abhiḥbāya tiṣṭhati ... abhiṣāy varṇenaśrīyā teṣāṁ ca).

Śāstra: Question.- By means of what power (bala) does he thus dominate all beings with his brilliance, beauty and splendor? The cakravartin kings, the devas and the lāyās also have power, brilliance and beauty; why speak only of the Buddha’s superiority here?

Answer. - Although these lāyās have brilliance and beauty, theirs are limited like the stars that are dimmed and disappear at sunrise (sūryadvaya). For numberless [k, 9, 121e] asamkhyeyakalpas the Buddha has accumulated great qualities and all the accumulations (sambhāra); and because his merits (hanuprāyaya) are great, his retribution (vipakākhalpaya) also is great. This is not the case for other men.

Moreover, from age to age the Buddha has practiced the austerities (dukkaracaya) beyond measure or limit; uncannily he has sacrificed his head, his eyes, his marrow and a fortiori, his kingdom, his wealth, his wife and his children. Having, from age to age, cultivated all types of morality (mīla), patience (ksīnta), energy (vīrya), dhyāna, and acquired incomparable (anupama), pure (visiśuddha), unchangeable (avākāta) and inexhaustible (aḍakṣaya) wisdom (graṇḍhikā), his accumulations (sambhāra) were complete. By the power of retribution, he has obtained [as result] an incalculable powerful superiority. This is why we have said that when the merits are large, the reward also is large.

Question. - If the miraculous power (vīddhīhāla) of the Buddha is immense, if his beauty and grandeur are ineffable (avākācha), why would he have to undergo the retribution of the nine sins (navapattiyāpaka)?

---

1) Sundarī's slander. - At the instigation of the heretics, Sundarī went to the Jetavana in the evening, announcing to the Sākyas: “I have come to the butterflies and the birds, and I want to hear the story of the Buddha. I have come to the Buddha's cell.” The next day she made it appear as if she was coming back from the Jetavana. After a few days, the heretics had her killed and hid her body under a heap of rubbish near the Jetavana; then they announced her disappearance to king Prasenajit. A search was carried out and the corpse of Sundarī was found near the Gundhakara cell of the Buddha. The heretics placed her body on a litter and carried it up the city of Śrīvastī, crying: “See the work of the Sākyā monks!” The Buddhists were all insulted, but the Buddha announced to them that the public uprising would end in seven days. The murderers were found by the king and confessed having been hired by the heretics who were forced to retract their accusation against the Buddha and his monks.

Chinese sources: Hsin k’i hing king, T 197 (no. 1), k. 1, p. 164b-165c; Yi tao king, T 198 (no. 3), k. 1, p. 176b-177c; Ta pao tsi king, T 310, k. 28, p. 54a18; P’ou sa chou t’ai king, T 384, k. 7, p. 105b6, (where Sundarī is called Sundaranandi); Po kung t’ai, T 790, p. 729b1; Ken pen chou ... yao che, T 1448, k. 18, p. 95a5 (where Sundarī is called Mei yung); Hsuan tsiang, Si yu k’i, T 2087, k. 6, p. 899c (tr. Beal, ii, p. 7-8; tr. Watters, I, p. 389).

2) Sundarī by Cittac - See above.

Chinese sources: Hsin k’i hing king, T 197 (no. 7), k. 2, p. 170b-c; P’ou sa chou t’ai king, T 384, k. 7, p. 105c5; Ken pen chou ... yao che T 1448, k. 18, p. 94a13; Fa hiem, tr. Legge p. 83; Hsuan tsiang in Watters, Travels, ii, p. 152; Yi tao in Chavannes, Religious éminents, p. 155.

4) Wound caused by kālava flower. - Daśābala Kālāyapu took care of the Buddha's foot wounded by an acacia thorn. Sanskrit sources: Saḍāriśaṃsa, ed. Sūlī, 26: Satagah kālavi kālas atitiyānāhaḥ ... pāde vidhīto śmi bhūtavah.

Chinese sources: Hsin k’i hing king, T 107 (no. 6), k. 1, p. 16a1b-16b; Ta pao tsi king, T 203 (no. 80), k. 7, p. 481a-b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, iii, p. 78); Ta pao tsi king, T 310, k. 28, p. 154c14; P’ou sa chou t’ai king, T 384, k. 7, p. 105b6; Ken pen chou ... yao che, T 1448, k. 18, p. 94b14.

5) Headache. - The Buddha suffered a headache at the time of the massacre of the Śākyas by Viśādābhāhu, in Pāli Viśādābhāhu. The Pāli sources, which essentially are confirmed by the Sanskrit and Chinese sources, tell that Pasenadi, king of Kosala, had a son, Viśādābhāhu, whose mother was a young slave named Viśādakhātthā, the natural daughter of Mahālāmaṇī, the successor to Siddhasana at Kapilavastu. Viśādakhātthā had been fraudulently affianced by the Śākyas. When the trick was subsequently discovered and Viśādābhāhu was treated as ‘the son of a slave’ by the Śākyas, he vowed to avenge himself. With the help of his general Diṅgha Kālāyapu, he dethroned his father Pasenadi, who fled from Śrīvastī to take refuge with his former enemy Ajātasattu. Viśādābhāhu marched against Kapilavastu and, despite the intervention of the Buddha, which three times succeeded in stopping the operations, he finally took the city and massacred the entire Śākya clan. But he himself perished miserably as a result. In the Buddha, his mother Viśādakhātthā and his minister Diṅgha Kālāyapu, appear under the names of Vīrusaka, Mālākā (or Mālākī) and Diṅgha Cārīyapu respectively.

It was most certainly from these works or other similar works that the objections raised in the Mppś were borrowed for the "List of nine sins" of the Buddha.

403

The brahmācārīn Sūren rō li (Sundarī) slandered (abhivyaktiyati) the Buddha, and five hundred arhats wiped out the slander.

J) The brahmācārīn Sūren rō li (Sundarī) slandered (abhivyaktiyati) the Buddha, and five hundred arhats wiped out the slander.
Buddha therefore underwent the small sufferings of this world. If the Buddha has immense miraculous power (ādhātadāna), if he dominates the trisūtra (in the Ganges), if he possesses such miraculous qualities (upramāṇa), who can say that the Buddha experiences the retribution for wrongdoings. It is only out of compassion (śīṣṭa) that the Buddha, who had gone from Rājagṛha to Vaiśālī, spent the night in the Gotamaka cetiya, seated in the open air. The son of king Suddhodana was rebuked by old age (jūrus); sickness (vyādhi) and death (marana), left home (pravrajita) and attained Buddhahood. Can we say that such a man will undergo the retribution of sins and be tormented by cold (ālava), heat (usna), etc? If the miraculous power of the Buddha is immense, if he possesses such miraculous qualities (acintyadhāna), he could be insensible to heat, cold, cold, etc.

2) Furthermore, the Buddha has two bodies (kāya); a body of essence (dharmanakāya) and a body born from father and mother (ārambhakāya). The essence body fills the ten directions of space; it is immense (upramāṇa), infinite (ananta), handsome (aṅkīrakṣa), charming (pravāsīkuśa), adorned with the major and minor marks (laksanādhanijānindanī) and has immense rays (upramāṇaśāna); the assembly (samgha) that listens to his preaching also fills space (this assembly is also his essential body and is not [112a] visible to sāṃskāric people. Cæselyes he emits various bodies (kāya) with various names (nāma), of various births (jānavartakā), with various skilful means (upāya) to save beings. He is always seeking to save everybody, never stopping for a moment. It is by means of this essential body that the Buddha saves beings of the universes of the ten directions. To undergo the retribution of sins is the business of the Buddha’s body of birth (jānakajyotibuddha). The Buddha of birth body preaches the Dharma in stages as if it were a human body. Since there are two sorts of Buddha, it is not a mistake that the Buddha experiences the retribution for wrongdoings. If he submits to the retribution for his sins (āpitāviptikā) and attains Buddhahood, can we say that such a man will undergo the retribution of sins and be tormented by cold (ālava), heat (usna), etc?

3) Furthermore, when the Buddha attains Buddhahood, he eliminates all the bad dharmas (aksālādharma) within himself and acquires all the good dharmas (kṣīlādharma). How then could he really suffer the punishment of the bad dharmas? It is only out of compassion (anukampā) for the beings of future generations (anantarjanamasatra) that he resorted to this means (āpūya) to prevent suffering the retribution of sins.
4) Furthermore, Aniruddha (Aniruddha) received an immense reward for having given food to a pratyekabuddha?757 whatever food he thought of he found at will.758 How then could the Buddha, who from one lifetime to the next has cut off his flesh (māṃsā), dug into his marrow (majjī) to make a gift of it to others, find nothing when he begged for his food and returned with an empty bowl (dhutapāṭhena)?
This is why we know that it is the skillful means of the Buddha who [pretends] to undergo retribution for sins in order to save beings.

What is this skillful means (upāyā)? In the future, in the fivefold assembly, there will be Buddhists (Sākyaputra) who, having acquired but little merit by their lack of generosity (dānapunyānāvatā), will get nothing when they go to beg for their means of livelihood (dāya); the lay people (avuddhavasana) will say to them: “You who cannot obtain robes (āvāra) and food (āhāra), you cannot cure your own sicknesses (vyādyā)! How will you be able to find the Path (mārga) and care for the welfare of beings?” [Thanks to this skillful means of the Buddha], the fivefold assembly will be able to answer: “We have no means of existence, but that is of little importance; we have the meritorious qualities inherent in the practice of the Path (mārgacaryā). Our actual suffering is the punishment for sins of our past lifetimes, but the reward for our actual virtues will come later. Our great teacher, the Buddha himself, went into a brahmin village

757 In a previous lifetime, Aniruddha had been a poor man named Ansuṭṭhāna (in the Pāli sources); one day when he was cutting grass for his master Sumana (Pāli sources) or gathering dead wood to earn his living (Chinese sources), he saw a pratyekabuddha who was returning with an empty bowl and gave him some coarse brot. As a retribution for this generosity, he was reborn seven times among the Trāyāstikāra gods, was a cakravartin king seven times, and was finally reborn in his last lifetime in a wealthy Sākya family.

407
sickness? Then take this milk in your bowl in silence and be careful lest the unbelievers (pāṣaṇḍa) should learn about it."

This is why we know that the sicknesses of the Buddha are pretenses coming from skillful means and are not real sicknesses; it is the same for the [pretended] sins that are their cause. This is why the sūtra says that the Buddha dominates everything by his brilliance, his color, his beauty and his splendor.

ACT VII

Sūtra: Then the Bhagavat made his ordinary body (prakṛtyātmabhāvā) appear to all the beings of the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu. At that moment, the Śuddhāvāsakāya, Brahmakāya, Paranirmitavasavartin, Nirmāṇarati, Tuṣita, Yama, Trāyastriṃśa, Caturmahālokabhūtas gods760, as well as the amanuṣya and the amanuvya of the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu, bearing heavenly flowers (divyas puṇṇa), celestial garlands (divyas mālā), heavenly unguents (divyas vīśapana), celestial powders (divyas cārṇa), celestial lotuses, blue (nīlotpal), red (kokanada), white (pundarīka), purple (padma), and leaves of manuṣya trees (tāmālapattra), gathered around the Buddha (Atha khalu bhagavān punar eva yādek trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu sattrāṇāṁ atmabhāvām prakṛtyātmabhāvām upādāya-yādāya. Aha khalu śuddhāvātāsamayākā deva brahmākāyaṁ ca paranirmitavasavartinaṁ ca nirmāṇarataṁ ca tuṣitāṁ ca yāmaṁ ca trāyastriṃśo ca caturmahālokākāyaṁ ca ye ca trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu manuṣyāmanusyāyā ca te puspāṃḍavāyapīvapīcāyāni dhūryā niśotpala-kokanapundrakapadāni dhūryāni ca tāmālapattraṁ grhitvā yena satāṅgās tenopasamāvāntaḥ).

Śāstra: Why does the Buddha make his ordinary body (prakṛtyātmabhāvā) appear to all the beings of the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu?

Answer. - 1) Wishing to preach the Mahāprajāpāramitā, the Buddha first enters the Samādhījñāsamālāḥ. The wheels on the soles of his feet emit rays and the other parts of his body, including the seven psychic faculties, also emit rays (sūtra). Just as at the end of a kalpa, at the time of the great fire, the mountains such as Sumeru parvataś, forth with brilliant light. Just as at the end of a kalpa, at the time of the great fire, the mountains such as Sumeru parvataś, forth with brilliant light.

2) The Buddha makes his ordinary body (prakṛtyātmabhāvā) and those who hesitate then attain deliverance by faith (anuttarasamyaksa-paridadāna). This is why beings say that that is truly the miracle of the Buddha. Therefore, to preach the Prajñāpāramitā, the Buddha first manifests his miraculous power (vyuddhālā). 3) The Buddha emits his ordinary light (prakṛtyātmabhāvā), namely, his aureole which is one armspan in width (vyuddā). 4) He covers the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu with his tongue (jihvā) and begins to smile. 5) He enters into the Simhavikīrtasamālāḥ, and the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu shakes in six ways. 6) Seated on the Simhāstha, the Buddha manifests his light, his splendor, his color and his lofty form. By this miraculous power (rākṣibhāla), he touches beings profoundly and those who have faith reach anuttarasamyakshaṁbhodhi in the end. Therefore, to preach the Prajñāpāramitā, the Buddha first manifests his miraculous power (vyuddhālā).

7) And finally here, for those who have doubts, he shows his ordinary body (prakṛtyātmabhāvā) and those who hesitate then attain deliverance by faith (anuttarasamyaksa-paridadāna). This is why beings say that that is truly the miracle of the Buddha. By the power of the Buddha, these people of the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu, seeing the ordinary body of the Buddha, come near him without confusion; and then the beings of the trisāhasramahābhūtasalokadhātu, full of joy (ānanda), cry out: "This is truly the body of the Buddha." Indeed, the Buddha always had this body, when he was born, when he became Buddha and when he turned the wheel of Dharma. This is why beings say that is truly the body of the Buddha.

Question. - What is meant by the Śūdravāsika gods and the Brahmāloka gods?

Answer. - The fourth dhyāna has eight stages (bhūmi):761 five stages are the abodes (sahāna) of the anāgāmins and are called the pure abodes (sahādhatva);762 three stages are the shared abode of ordinary people (prakṛtyātmabhāvā) and saints (ārya). Beyond these eight stages are the abodes of the bodhisattvas of the ten bhūmis (dasaśāhasra-bodhisattva): these are also called pure abodes (sahādhatva), [The Śūdravāsikas] are called Mahāvīravevatārīja.

The gods of the Brahmāloka have three stages of birth (janamabhāva):763 i) the heaven of the Brahmākāyas, the birthplace of the lesser Brahmās; ii) the heaven of the Brahma-pr̥ahitas, the birthplace of the noble Brahmās; iii) the heaven of the Mahābrahmās, also called the birthplace of intermediate dhyāna (ādiyānāntarāya).764

Question. - Renunciation (vairāgya) is the same [in all the Brahmās]; why do they have abodes of different quality?

---

Answer. - The first dhyāna [where they dwell] is of three kinds: lesser (avara), medium (madhya) and higher (agro). If they cultivate the lesser dhyāna, they are reborn as Brahmaparohitas; if they cultivate the medium dhyāna, they are reborn as Brahmaparohitas; if they cultivate the higher dhyāna, they are reborn as Mahābrahmās. It is the same for the development of loving-kindness (maitrībhāvanā). Thus the teacher Maṇḍya yon (Sunetra) said: "I have preached the Dharma to people and they have all been reborn among the Brahmaparohitas; I should not be reborn in the same place as my disciples; I am going to develop a higher loving-kindness (sattād maitrī)?"765 because he had developed higher loving-kindness, he was reborn among the Mahābrahmās. Moreover, it is by virtue of a mind of supreme purity (paramaviśuddhi) that one is reborn among the Mahābrahmās.

Question. - When there are four dhyānas, why do we speak here only of the first [: abode of the Brahmā gods] and of the last [: abode of the Suddhāvāsikas] and not say anything about the second or the third?

Answer. - J) We speak of the first dhyāna because renunciation (vaśārgyā), the gate to it, is difficult [to practice]; we speak of the fourth because its subtle beauty is difficult to obtain (durlabha). Nothing is said of the intermediate dhyānas because they are easy to enter.

2) Moreover, the brahmakīla is the start of the form realm (rūpadhatu), whereas the fourth dhyāna is its summit; this is why they are mentioned in particular (pṛthuk).

3) Moreover, many are the people who know the Brahmā gods but do not know the other gods. This is why we speak here only of the Brahmā gods. We [123a] also speak of the Suddhāvāsikas gods who, out of compassion (anukampā) for beings, always invite the Buddhas.

4) Moreover, when the Buddha preaches, the sound of the Dharma (bhāsana) reaches as far as the Brahmā gods. When the Buddha attained Buddhahood, these gods sent the news to the Suddhāvāsikas. It is why this is the first and the last [class of gods of rūpadhatu] are mentioned without saying anything about the two intermediate classes.

5) Moreover, the Brahmā gods who are close to kāmadhatu, [dwelling just above it], and the Suddhāvāsikas gods who are the chiefs of rūpadhatu should be mentioned here. Thus, when a gatekeeper (dvarapāda) knows that a guest (āgantuka) has arrived to see his master, the latter knows it also; the intermediaries being of no importance, they are not spoken of.

6) Finally, the second dhyāna is characterized by great joy (mahāpritī) and the third dhyāna by great bliss (mahāsukha). As joy and bliss imply carelessness, they are not spoken of.

Question. - What is meant by Paramirmitavasavartini?766

Answer. - The gods who take hold of and enjoy desirable objects created by others are called Paramirmitavasavartini "Using that which has been created by another". The Nirmāṇarati gods create the five sense objects themselves and enjoy them. This is why they are called Nirmāṇarati 'Enjoying that which they have themselves created'. The Tuṣita gods are the satisfied gods. The Yakṣas are the happy (suḥṣaṅga) gods.

The second category [of gods of rūpadhatu] is that of the Trayastraṇīa or Thirty-two gods.

765 Sunetra’s thought. - Aṅguttara, IV, p. 104: Na kho pan’ etam patitāpanam ... mettane bhāvayyān ‘ti. - Tchong a han, T 26 (no. 8), k. 2, p. 420a9; ibid. k. 30, p. 619b10; Pāṇḍita chau, T 1545, k. 82, p. 425a20.

766 For these definitions, see Dhīja, III, p. 218.
The first class, starting from the bottom, is that of the Caturmahārājikas or the Four Great Kings.

Mount Sumeru has a height of 84,000 yojanas; at its summit is the city of the Trayastrīṁśas.767 Beside Mount Meru is a mountain called Yugandhara, 42,000 yojanas high;768 it has four peaks on each of which is a city inhabited by a group of Caturmahārājikas. The lands of the other gods, Yīmas, etc., made of seven jewels (suptaramanaya), are situated in space (ākāsa) where they are supported by wind.769 and so on up to the Pure Abodes (śuddhadvāra).

Seeing the Buddha's body (buddhakāya), its purity (viśuddhi) and its great rays (mahāraimāi), these gods offer him aquatic and terrestrial flowers (jalasthalajñāṇi puspāṇi). Of all the terrestrial flowers, jasmine (malākī) is the most beautiful; of all the aquatic flowers, blue lotus (nilotpāla) is the most beautiful. Whether they grow on trees or on reeds, these are flowers having different colors and different perfumes. Each holding a celestial flower (divyapuspā), they gather around the Buddha. These flowers have a beautiful color, a rich perfume; they are soft (malāja) and flexible; this is why they are used as offerings.

Question. - What is a celestial flower?
Answer. - The celestial flower is one the perfume of which goes against the wind. - Cf. Kośa, III, p. 162-163.

Moreover, it is customary in India to call celestial (divya) anything that is beautiful. Even though the flowers of the manuṣya and amanuṣya do not come from the heavens, they can, nevertheless, be described as 'celestial' because of their beauty. Thus it is not wrong to say that the manuṣya and the amanuṣya offer celestial flowers.

Sūtra: They scatter (avakārantī sma) [all these offerings], from celestial flowers (divyapuspā) to leaves of the celestial tree (sāmālapatra), over the Buddha.

Question. - Why do they scatter these flowers on the Buddha?
Answer. - As a sign of respect (satkāriṇa), these flowers that have been scattered were not numerous, but nevertheless they form a great garland. The celestial garlands (divyadhiḍhava) are spread out on the ground before the Buddha; celestial powders (-divyacūrṇa) are scattered above the Buddha.

Question. - Celestial lotuses (divyapadmā) are blue (niśā), red (lohitā) pink (rakta) or white (avadana). Why are they not yellow (piṭu)?
Answer. - Because yellow is an attribute of fire (teṣaṁ 'peksate) and fire is foreign to aquatic flowers. These precious lotuses have a stem (daṇḍa) of jade (vaidūrya), a corolla (vēkā) of diamond (vaijra), leaves (pattarā) of golden sand from the Jambū river (jāmbūnādasvarnā). They are tender and perfumed. Taking also leaves from the celestial tree (tānulīla or Xanthochymus pictorius), they gather around the Buddha.

Question. - The gods can get celestial flowers (divyapuspā) as offerings, but how can men (manuṣya) and amanuṣya get them?
Answer. - Thanks to the bases of his miraculous power (uddāhāra), the Buddha emits great rays and the earth trembles in six ways; the gods rain down all sorts [123be] of marvellous flowers that fill the trīṣṭhasrarahastharakādhātu as offerings to the Buddha. The manuṣya and amanuṣya can gather these flowers and offer them in turn.
Sūtra: From the enchantment of these bouquets of flowers and garlands, the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu takes on a golden color; and it is the same in all the Buddha-universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (tāśī ca pūpādārmañḥiḥ pāṭādārmañḥiḥ cāyām trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgokālikadhātuh svuṣaṇavarṇena attivābhadhata. ye ca daśaśi dīkṣu gaṅgānaḍvālākopaṃ lokādhiḥtaeva śpuṣṭaḥvābhāsīti cābhāvān).

Sāstra: Some say: "The noble cakravartin king is the chief of four universes [i.e., of a catuḥdṛpta], Brahmrudevaraḥ is the chief of a chiliocosm (sāhasra-lokapāda), the Buddha is the chief of a trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu." That is not correct, for the creations (nirvāṇa) of the Buddha extend to universes of the ten directions as numerous as the sands of the Ganges.

Sūtra: Then, among the beings of the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu and of the ten directions, [123c] each had the impression that the Buddha was preaching the Dharma for them alone and not for the other people (atha khalu asmin trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭasvokālikadhātu daśaśi dīkṣu ca teṣām satrīṇāṃ ekakāśvyātād abhiḥ mama pūrato nāṃ nyāṣena tathāgaṭo dharmam delayati).

Sāstra: Question. - The Buddha appeared simultaneously in the same form to all the beings of the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu and the ten directions; how then does each of these beings see a Buddha seated face-to-face and preaching the Dharma???

Answer. - The miraculous power (dīkṣaḥèla) of the Buddha is twofold: 1) seated in the same place, he preaches the Dharma in such a way that all beings see him from far away (duśrataḥ) and hear from far away; 2) staying in the same place, he preaches the Dharma in such a way that each being in particular sees a Buddha facing himself (tāpuraṇataḥ) preaching the Dharma. In the same way, at daybreak (sūryodaya), the shadows (chāyāḥ) seem to be a mass of water.

Moreover, all beings are not the same: some find pure faith (viṣuddhikṣamādhdhiḥ) by seeing the Buddha’s body fill the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu; others find pure faith, bliss (puṇḍita) and joy (mudātī) in seeing a particular Buddha preaching the Dharma face-to-face: this is why the Buddha preaches the Dharma facing each one of them.

ACT VIII

Sūtra: Then, seated on the lion-seat, the Bhagavat smiled with joy, and the light of this smile illumined the whole trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu. Thanks to this light, the beings of the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu saw the Buddhas and the sanghas in universes of the east as numerous as the sands of the Ganges; [conversely], the beings of the universes of the east, universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, saw the Buddha Śākyamuni and his great assembly which were in the trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu. And it was the same for the south, the west and the north, the four intermediate directions and the directions of the zenith and the nadir (atha khalu bhagavāṃ tasmāna eva śūnāḥsatya nāśaḥ satyaḥ steva sarve ’ṣminn eva trīṣaḥ hasralokadhātuṣaḥ svarṣṭih yayaḥ ca satyābhāvabhāṣena ye ca trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuḥ satrīṇāṃ eva pūrṇa evāsmitam akaraṇaṃ yanā smrtyahahālāṃyaṃ trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuh svarṣṭiḥ bhūtyaṃ pātrīyaṃ sma svaśvaḥālayaṃ svaḥ ca satyāvabhāṣena ye ca trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuḥ yayaḥ ca satyāvabhāṣena ye ca trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuḥ yayaḥ ca satyāvabhāṣena ye ca trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuḥ yayaḥ ca satyāvabhāṣena ye ca trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātuḥ)

Sāstra: Question. - Several times already, previously, the Buddha has emitted rays (vaśmi); why does he again emit them now?

Answer. - Above, when he emitted rays, he had a particular reason each time as we have noted. But up to now the great assemblies were invisible to one another; now, by the miraculous power of his rays (rāmiṇīdīkṣaḥ), the Buddha allows all the great assemblies of these different universes to see one another.

Question. - The great arhat, the āyusmat A ni lou teou (Añiruddha), who was the first of the Buddha’s disciples to possess the divine eye (dvayavakṣakunām agrah), ordinarily saw a chiliomicrocosm (sāhasra-lokapāda) and exceptionally a dīkhilomesocosom (dīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu). A great pratyekabuddha normally sees a dīkhilomesocosom and exceptionally a trīṣaḥśramaṇaḥḥaṭṭaṅgakālikadhātu. How can all beings here see the Buddha-universes of the east, universes as numerous as the sand of the Ganges?

Answer. - It is the miraculous power of the Buddha which allows them to see so far; it is not due to the power of the beings themselves. It is accepted that arhats, pratyekabuddhas, etc., also have an unlimited field of vision by the power of the Buddha. Thus, when a noble cakravartin king comes flying, his entire 771 This is a classical miracle and the Buddha is not alone in being accomplished. Thus, in the Jātakasamānta (Dhīgā, II, p. 211-212), Brahmā Samanukumāra, going to visit the Tāvatissas gods, created 33 forms of himself (ettinn tenān atta bhavāb abhinnominātiva), each sitting on the couch of one of the 33 gods, and he is expressing himself in such a way that each god has the impression that the form is on his own couch and is speaking to him alone (yo ’yam mama pālaṇīkṣe so yam eko va bhāvati).

---

army with its retinue of elephants and horses follow him in the air. Here, by the Buddha's miraculous power, beings, distant as they may be, see one another. Moreover, by the power of the concentration of wisdom (prajñāsamādi), even those who do not have the divine eye (divyacakṣus) see the ten directions. The Buddha's eye (cakṣus) and ear ( śrotra) are free of obstacles (āvarana). In the same way that all beings attain samādhi, the divine eye (divyacakṣus) and the divine ear (divyārotra) by themselves (svatāḥ) at the end of a kalpa at the time of the great conflagration, so the Buddha, by his miraculous power (rādhīhala), causes all beings to have the ability to see at a distance.

[The sūtra says]: "Then the Bhagavat, seated on the lion-seat, smiled with joy." We have spoken previously of this smile; here we are content to explain what has not yet been explained.

Question. - The fact that beings of this place see yonder direction over there is due to the Buddha Śākyamuni’s miraculous power; but whose is the power by virtue of which beings of yonder place see this direction here?

Answer. - Again it is the Buddha Śākyamuni's power that allows those beings to see our tridhāramahātashasralokadhātu and to contemplate the Buddha Śākyamuni with all his assemblies (sangha). It is the same also for the south, the west and the north, the four intermediate directions and the directions of the zenith and the nadir.

CHAPTER XV: THE ARRIVAL OF THE BODHISATTVAS OF THE TEN DIRECTIONS

ACT IX

Sūtra: Then in the east, beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and at the limit of these universes, there is a universe called To pao (Ratnāvatī) where there is a Buddha called Pao tse (Ratnākara) who is now teaching the Prajñāpāramitā to the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas (Ālha khulu pīrvavāyām dīśi gandhāravālikampamūn lokadhātun aitkramyā tehhyā yah sarvadhasniko lokadhātū Ratnāvatī nāma tatra Ratnākuro nāma tathāgatasya tiṣṭhāti. sa imān eva prajñāpāramitāṃ bodhisattvānāṃ mahāsattvānāṃ dharmam deśayātā).

Śāstra: Question. - It has been said by the Buddha that the universes are innumerable (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta); how can you speak of a universe situated at the limits of the universe (sarvadhasniko lokadhātuh)? To talk in this way is to fall into the [heretical theory] of a finite world (antaravān lokah). If the universes were limited [in number], the total number of beings would [at length] be exhausted. Actually, each one of the innumerable Buddhas saves an immense (aprameya) and incalculable (asamkhyeya) number of beings and introduces them into nirvāṇa without residue (niśratadhiṣesāmāroḍha); if there were not always new beings, their number would finally be exhausted.

Answer. - The Buddhist sūtras do indeed say that the universes are infinite in number, but this is a statement of a practical order (upādhiṣṭ) and not a true doctrine. In the same way, although the saint (ch'en here translates 'tathāgata') does not exist [after death], in practice (upādhiṣṭa) we say that the saint exists [after death]. All of this is in the fourteen difficult questions [on which the Buddha refused to comment]. To say that the world is finite (antaravān lokah) or to say that the world is infinite (antaravān lokah) are both wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭ). If the universes were infinite [in number], the Buddha would not possess omniscience (sarvajñā), for omniscience is a universal wisdom from which nothing can escape; if the universes were infinite, some things would escape him. On the other hand, if the universes were finite in number, you would run up against the difficulty you raised above [in your question]. Therefore both solutions are wrong. Why? Because by being based on the infinite, one destroys the finite. The Ratnāvatī universe is not the limit of all the universes, but the Buddha Śākyamuni abides in the extreme limit so that beings may be saved. Similarly, when one abides at the boundary of a country, one does not claim to be abiding at the boundary of Jambudvīpa. If the universes were infinite, the Buddha would not be omniscient; his wisdom being immense, he must know everything, for ‘if the letter is big, the envelope also must be big.’

Question. - This universe is called Ratnāvatī ‘Rich in Jewels’. There are two kinds of jewels: the [124 h] substantial jewel (dhanaratā) and the dharma jewel (dharmanatā). What are these jewels the abundance of which merits the name Ratnāvatī for this universe?
Answer. - Both kinds of jewels occur in this universe. Furthermore, the many bodhisattvas [who inhabit it] are also jewels who illumine the nature of things (dharmañc). [Note by Kumārajiva: These jewels, namely the great bodhisattvas, serve as a diadem (ratanamukita); in the center of this diadem we see the Buddha and we penetrate the nature of all dharmas]. As these jewels are numerous, the universe in question is called 'Rich in Jewels' (ratanavrata).

There is a Buddha there called Ratnakāra 'Jewel Mine'. He is so called because he includes the pure faculties (ausparsavanubhāvānusilā, the powers (sala), the Path of bodhi and the other jewels of the Dharma (dharmanamatha).

Question. - If that is so, all the Buddhas should be called Ratnakāra. Why reserve the name Ratnakāra for this Buddha alone?

Answer. - All the Buddhas have these jewels, but this Buddha is the only one to take his name from them. In the same way, Miśśī (Maitreya) is called 'Loving-kindness' (mañña) although all the Buddhas have the same loving-kindness (maññ), but Maitreya is the only one to have this as his name.

Furthermore, the Buddha Ratnapuṣpa was named Ratnapuṣpakumāra 'Prince of Precious Flowers' because at his birth, all the extremities of his body were adorned with various flowers of brilliant colors. The Buddha Dīpaṃkara was called Dīpaṃkararākumāra, 'Prince, Lighter of Lamps' because when he was born, all the extremities of his body were like lamps. When he became Buddha, he was still called Dīpaṃkara. It is the same for the Buddha Ratnakāra: he was called 'Jewel Mine' because, when he was born, many precious substances appeared, whether produced from the earth or whether the gods rained down a whole collection of them.

OBJECTIONS TO THE PLURALITY OF BUDDHA

Objector. - Only the Buddha Śākyamuni exists; the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśaśīdāghuṣu) do not exist. Why?

Argument number 1. - The Buddha Śākyamuni with his immense power (upramuñjalalāki) and his immense superknowledge (upramuñjābhijñā) is capable of saving all beings [by himself]; there is no need of other Buddhas. It is said that Ānanda, absorbed with one-pointed mind (ekacittena manastikṣa), said to himself: "The Buddhas of the past, Ratnapuṣpa, Dīpanakara, etc., were all born in marvelous times; their life was very long and they saved all beings. Then how could the present Buddha, born at a bad time and of short life, save all beings?" These were the questions he asked himself. At dawn (stīryodāya), the Buddha, who knew Ānanda's thoughts, entered into the Daybreak samādhi (stīryodāyāsamādhi); then he emitted rays (rasūmi) from all the pores of his skin (vānañc). Like the sun, he emitted rays the brilliance of which spread successively over Jambudvīpa, the four continents (caturvāopi), the triśihasramahāsatarakṣādādhū and finally over all the innumerable universes of the ten directions (daśaśīdāglokādādhū). Then the Bhagavat sent forth from his navel (nābhī) a precious lotus (ratanapuṣpa) described by the following stanzas:

- The stem (daṇḍa) is of green jade (vaidūrya),
- The petals (patra), a thousand in number, are of yellow gold.
- The corolla (vadiṃkā) is of diamond (vajra)
- The trimming is of coral (matsyagava). The stem is flexible, without the usual curves, its height is ten arm spans (vyūha).

The trimming is of coral (matsyagava).

[124 c] Having the color of green jade, various glows. Flames escaped from the lower part of his body and from the upper part there came a rain of cold water (sahuh kāyaṃ prajñāvatsayat aparimalā kāyaṃ kālī tālā tālā vārāhīnādī standante). The Bhagavat himself knew that the miraculous power that he was thus manifesting is shared by all the śīvakas (paravāvananadīdhūraṇa stīrān). And we have already seen that several saints have accomplished this twin miracle.

2) The Great Miracle proper. - This miracle is higher than any human can perform (utāna manasuddhaharmadīgacchāhyā). The Dīvya, p. 162, describes it in the following way: Nandapuramandhābhī yuddhābhī yuddhābhī, the Buddha, anūpamā yuddhābhī pravānāyamā yuddhābhī pravānāyantam ... ānē pravānāyamā yuddhābhī pravānāyantam ...

- The two nāga kings, Nanda and Upamana, created a golden thousand-petalled lotus the size of a chariot wheel (saṃhātikāruṣaṅkalpa). The Mūla-śākyamuni existed; the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśaśīdāghuṣu) do not exist. Why?

Argument number 1. - The Buddha Śākyamuni with his immense power (upramuñjalalāki) and his immense superknowledge (upramuñjābhijñā) is capable of saving all beings [by himself]; there is no need of other Buddhas. It is said that Ānanda, absorbed with one-pointed mind (ekacittena manastikṣa), said to himself: "The Buddhas of the past, Ratnapuṣpa, Dīpanakara, etc., were all born in marvelous times; their life was very long and they saved all beings. Then how could the present Buddha, born at a bad time and of short life, save all beings?" These were the questions he asked himself. At dawn (stīryodāya), the Buddha, who knew Ānanda's thoughts, entered into the Daybreak samādhi (stīryodāyāsamādhi); then he emitted rays (rasūmi) from all the pores of his skin (vānañc). Like the sun, he emitted rays the brilliance of which spread successively over Jambudvīpa, the four continents (caturvāopi), the triśihasramahāsatarakṣādādhū and finally over all the innumerable universes of the ten directions (daśaśīdāglokādādhū). Then the Bhagavat sent forth from his navel (nābhī) a precious lotus (ratanapuṣpa) described by the following stanzas:

- The stem (daṇḍa) is of green jade (vaidūrya),
- The petals (patra), a thousand in number, are of yellow gold.
- The corolla (vadiṃkā) is of diamond (vajra)
- The trimming is of coral (matsyagava).
- The stem is flexible, without the usual curves, its height is ten arm spans (vyūha);

there is a difference in detail that is worth mentioning. At Śrīvaṭa, the central lotus is created and brought by Nanda and Upamana and in most of the reproductions, the two nāga kings can be seen holding the stem of a lotus. In the account of the Mūla-śākyamuni, there is no mention of the two nāga kings; the original lotus and the adventitious lotuses arise from the Buddha's navel. Without a doubt, the Buddhist legend has been contaminated by the myth of the birth of Brahmā who appears seated cross-legged on a golden thousand-petalled lotus arising from Viṣṇu's navel.
It is planted in the Buddha's navel.

Its leaves are broad and long,
White in color, striped with marvelous colors.
Infinitely precious ornament,
The thousand petalled lotus.

This marvelous lotus of such beautiful colors
Emerges from the Buddha's navel.
On the four petals of its corolla
Precious seats shine with divine light.

On each of these seats sits a Buddha;
One would call them four golden mountain summits.
Their light is equal as if one.

From the navels of these four Buddhas
Comes a magnificent precious lotus.
On each lotus there is a seat,
On each seat there is a Buddha.

From the navels of all these Buddhas,
Come in turn precious lotuses.
On each lotus there is a seat;
On each seat there is a Buddha.

These successive creations
Rise up to the Śuddhāvāsa heaven;
Whoever would like to know how far
Will have to resort to the following comparison:

An enormous rock
Having the size of a high mountain,
Thrown from the height of the Śuddhāvāsa
And falling straight down without meeting any obstacle
Would take eighteen thousand three hundred
And eighty-three years
To land on the earth,\textsuperscript{773}
That is the number of years it would take.

In the intermediate space,
Emanated Buddhas, placed in the center,
Spread out a brilliant light
That surpasses the fires of the sun and moon.

Some Buddhas have bodies streaming with water,
Others have bodies emitting fire;\textsuperscript{774}
Sometimes they appear to walk,
Sometimes they are seated in silence.

Some Buddhas go to beg their food
To make a gift of it to beings.
Sometimes they preach the Dharma,
Sometimes they shoot out rays.

Sometimes they go to visit the three bad destinies
And the hells of water, the shadows and fire.\textsuperscript{775}

\textsuperscript{773} This is the number given by the Jñānaprasthāna, cf. Beal, \textit{Catena}, p. 83.
Their warm breath warms up the cold water,
Their rays illumine the shadows,
In the fiery places, they breathe out a cooling breeze,
Skillfully they calm the torments [of the damned].
By pacifying them and calming them
They save them by the bliss of the Dharma (dhammasukha).

By all of these skillful means (upāya) [these apparitional Buddhas], all at the same time, wanted to save the innumerable beings of the ten directions. When they had saved them, they returned to their starting point and re-entered the navel of the Buddha.

[125 a] Then the Bhagavat, coming out of the Sūryodhayasamudhi, asked Ānanda: "Did you see the power of my abhijñā during this samudhi?" Ānanda replied: "Yes, I saw it", and added: "If it is sufficient for the Buddha to appear for just one day in order that the disciples converted by him (vinayavīrāvaka) fill space (ākāśa), what would not the number of those converted amount to if he remained in the world for eighty years?"

This is why we say that one single Buddha, whose qualities (guna) and miraculous power (ākāśa) are immense, suffices to convert the ten directions without the need for other Buddhas.

Argument number 2. - Furthermore, the Buddha said: "A woman cannot be a cakravartin king, Śakra, or Brahmādevatā. Two cakravartin kings cannot reign together at the same place. Similarly, with regard to the Bhagavat with ten powers, there cannot be two Buddhas existing in the same world."

Argument number 3. - Finally, the Buddha said - and his words are not frivolous - that two Buddhas do not exist at the same time: "One thing that is difficult to find is a Buddha Bhagavat. It takes innumerable koti of kalpas to find one. In 91 kalpas, there have been only three Buddhas. Before the good kalpa (bhuddhaloka), during the 91st kalpa, there was a Buddha called Vipāsī, 'Views of All Kinds'; during the 31st kalpa, there were two Buddhas; the first was called Śīkhin, 'Fire', and the second Viśvabuddhi, 'Victorious Over All'. During the good kalpa, there were four Buddhas, Krocchchanda, Kanakamuni, 'Golden Sage', Kaśyapa and Śākyamuni. Except for these kalpas, all the others were empty (śūnya), lacking Buddhas and miserable."

If the Buddhas of the ten directions existed, how could [the Buddha] say that the other kalpas lacked buddhas and were miserable?

ANSWER TO THE OBJECTIONS

1. Refutation of argument number 1. - Although the Buddha Śākyamuni, endowed with immense miraculous power (apramanārddhibala), is able to create the apparitional Buddhas (nirmāṇabhuddha) established in the ten directions, preaching the Dharma, emitting rays and saving beings, he is, however, not able to save beings without exception. [To claim the opposite] would be to fall [into the heresy] assigns a limit to existences (bhavastha) and to deny the existence of the Buddhas of the past. Since the number of beings is inexhaustible (ākṣaya), there must be other Buddhas [than Śākyamuni] to work for their salvation.

2. Refutation of argument number 2. - You also object: "The Buddha has said that a female cannot be five things, that two cakravartin kings cannot appear in the world simultaneously and, likewise, that two Buddhas cannot exist in the same world at the same time." You do not understand the meaning of this text. The Buddhist sūtras have two meanings: Some have a meaning that is easy to understand (saññāvaca), others have a profound (gambhīra) meaning, remote (vipaśyata) and difficult to grasp (dūryogākyāya). Thus, at the moment of entering Nirvāṇa, the Buddha said to the bhūkṣus: "Henceforth, you must rely on the truth in

774 This is the sūtra of 'the four reliances' (catuvā pratisaranā) attested to only recently:

Dharmasamgraha, ch. I.: catuvā pratisaranā. tadā yāṁ arthapratisaṅgatī na ... pujapadapratisārataḥ

Mahāyānapi, n. 1546-1549: catuvā pratisaranā. arthapratisaṅgataḥ bhavāyaḥ na ... neyadhiśeṣaṃ pratisāranaḥ

Sūtrakārikā, ed. Lōvi, p. 138: pratihāre pratisaranām āryadharmaparipātaketaḥ ... caturdhiṣṭādhuṣaya jñāṇasya pratītyāvadālayasya

The Madh. vetti alludes to the four pratisaranās: p. 43.: sattam cāryakṣaṇamātānaṃ. katame sattatāṃ neyāḥ kathaṃ nāṃhūṃ ... na neyāh kṣaraṇamātānaṃ iti; p. 533: su kīṃ vijñāṇaṃ parichhvatitē uta jñāṇaḥ.

The Bodh. bhūmi, p. 256, gives detailed explanations: katāḥ bodhisattvāc catasā pratisaranānu prajñāya. 1. iva bodhisattvāḥ arthārthāḥ pariṅało. 2. punar bodhisattvāḥ kāmādheko bhavati mahīkādheko ... 3. punar bodhisattvāḥ tathāgata vimarṣādhatu. 4. punar bodhisattvāḥ adīrga-mābhijñānā yuvādhi bhavati ... na pratikājati nāsrayati. evaṃ ca punah upekṣyo bhavati tattvāt jñāṇatvaḥ pratisaranānu ... cādāyatādheko pratisranānu.

Although to my [Lamotte's] knowledge the sūtra of the four reliances is later than the canonical literature, the theory of the pratisaranā is already hinted at in the Nikāyas. They make the distinctions between dharma, 'doctrine', and pratisara, 'authority' (cf. Mahājina, I, p. 265, where the Buddha advises his monks not to adopt the Dharma out of respect for the teacher (sattadvīpa) but because they themselves have understood, seen and grasped the distinction between artha, spirit [or meaning], and vijñāna, letter (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 40, where Śāriputra says to Assaji: appamā bhavām vā bhāvasu, attham yeva me bhūtu, atthen eva me attho, kim kāśā yuvājanam bhavām iti; Mahājina, II, p. 240: āyamattānaṃ me attho. kim kāśā yuvājanam bhavām iti; Mahājina, II, p. 240: āyamattānaṃ kha atthato e'va sameti bhūjanito ca sameti; between sattam nītābham and sattam neyattām (Nettipakarana, p. 21). itself and not on any authority, whatever it may be (dharma-pratisaranaṇa bhavatāyaṃ na pudi-galapratsaranaṇa); you must rely on the meaning (spirit) and not on the letter (arthapratisaranaṇa bhavatāyaṃ na vyañjapaṇḍitaśaranaṇa); you must rely on gnosis and not on discursive knowledge (jñānamahatāyaṃ abhavatāyaṃ na vyijñāpraṇāya); you must rely on the sūtras of explicit meaning and not on the sūtras of indeterminate meaning (nīlāthāsūtra-pratisaranaṇa bhavatāyaṃ na neyārthāsūtra-pratisaranaṇa).”

a) Relying on the truth in itself (dharma-pratisaranaṇa) is keeping to the twelve categories of texts (āvadānagadharma)778 and not keeping to the authority of a person.

b) Relying on the meaning (arthapratisaranaṇa), since goodwill or malice, defect or merit, falsity or truth, cannot be attributed to meaning. It is the letter (vyijñāna) that indicates the meaning (arthā), but the meaning is not the letter. Suppose a man points his finger at the moon to people who doubt the moon’s presence; if these doublets fixate on the finger but do not look at the moon, this man tells them: “I am pointing to the moon with my finger so that you may notice the moon. Why do you fixate on my finger instead of looking at the moon?”779 It is the same here: the letter (vyijñāna) is the finger pointing to the meaning (arthā), but the letter is not the meaning. This is why one should not rely on the letter.

c) Relying on gnosis (jñānamahatāyaṃ). - Gnosis (jñāṇa) allows one to appreciate and distinguish between good and evil; discursive knowledge (viṣādā) is always seeking pleasure (sukha) and does not penetrate the essence.780 This is why one should not rely on discursive knowledge.

d) Relying on sūtras of explicit meaning (nīlāthāsūtra-pratisaranaṇa). - Those sūtras are of explicit meaning that say: “Of all the omniscient ones (sarvajñā), the Buddha is foremost; among all the texts, the Buddhist texts are foremost; among all beings (sattva), the bhikṣus are foremost.”781 “Through generosity one acquires great merit (puṇya).”782 “Discipline (iḷa) allows one to be reborn among the gods”783, etc. - On the other hand, that sūtra is of indeterminate meaning which says: “By preaching the Dharma, the Dharma teacher (dharmaśāgya) is assured of five benefits: great merit, people’s love, beauty, renown, final attainment of nirvāṇa.”784

Why is this sūtra of indeterminate meaning? It is evident and easy to understand that generosity (dāna) includes great merit (mahā-puṇya), [but it is not so clear] that preaching the Dharma (dharmaśāgya), which is not a material gift (dīnaśādyā), is meritorious, as this sūtra would have it. Nevertheless, it is meritorious; for the preacher, by praising generosity in every way, destroys the greed (mūrtāya) of others and combats his own greed: this is why his preaching is meritorious. [But the sūtra’s allegation being itself unclear], is called ‘of indeterminate meaning (sanitārthā).’ Many sūtras, out of skillful means (upāya), say things that seem’ to be inexact [at first sight and which require explanation].

Thus, a sūtra has said that “two Buddhas cannot appear together in the same world”, but by ‘the same world’ the sūtra does not mean to designate all the universes of the ten directions. The sūtra also says that “two cakravartin kings are not found in the world together”; it does not mean to say that two cakravartin kings cannot coexist in the same trīṣaṁlokaśaradaḥ; it says only that two cakravartin kings cannot coexist in the same cūṭu-dvīpasa (sphere of universe of four continents). It is necessary to appreciate very pure merit (punyaviddādhi) in order to reign over the entire world without encountering a rival [as is the case for the cakravartins]. If there were two kings [in the same world], that would mean that their merit was not pure. Similarly, although the Buddhas have no feeling of jealousy (āsāya) one against the other, over lifetimes they have accomplished such pure actions that they cannot both appear in the same world (lokadīnāḥ), namely, in the same trīṣaṁlokaśaradaḥ lokadīnāḥ consisting of 4 a million Mounts Sumerus, a million suns and moons. In the ten directions, these trīṣaṁlokaśaradaḥ lokadīnāḥ are as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and each of them constitutes the universe of a Buddha (ekabhudālokaśatā); only one Buddha is found there, never two. In one of these Buddha universes, the single buddha Śīkyumuni incessantly creates emanated Buddhas (sīrmanāsbuddha) who resort to preaching (dharma-prapāya), to apparitional bodies (kūya), to causes and skillful means (upāya) of all kinds in order to save beings. It is in this sense that it is said in many sūtras that two Buddhas cannot exist simultaneously in the same world. That does not mean that there are not [many] Buddhas in the ten directions [at the same time].

The corresponding Sanskrit phrase is in the Divyāvadāna, p. 155, and Avadānaśāstra, 1, p. 49-50, 329-330. Ye keci sattva upādā va dvipādā ... Tatāgatāvā kuva saṃsāram buddha agra dhyaṇa.

See the development of the phrase in Tieng yì hán, T 125, k. 12, p. 602a.

782 See these five advantages in Aṅguttara, III, p. 41. Pāli ‘my bhikkhave dāne dhīsanaṃ ... sojñān samgām lokam upapajjati.

But if it is clear that these benefits result from generosity, it is less clear that they should also be attributed to preaching.
Hence the necessity for an explanation that will lead the exegetes to place the sūnson the five advantages of preaching into the neyārthāsūtra category.
Refutation of argument number 3. - You also made the objection: "The Buddha has said that it is hard to find a Buddha Bhagavat" and you said that in 91 kalpas, only three kalpas had a [125 e] Buddha and that the other kalpas were empty, lacking a Buddha, and were miserable.

The Buddha has in mind those guilty men who have not planted the roots of good needed to see a Buddha (anavataptaikavalamāla buddhadārāmoyya) when he said: "The appearance of a Buddha is a rare thing, as rare as the appearance of a flower on the udimbara tree (Ficus glomerata)." Indeed, these sinners cycle through the three bad destinies (āgati), sometimes even being reborn among humans or among the gods; but when a Buddha appears in the world, they are unable to see him. It is said that among the 900,000 householders in the city of Śrāvasti, 300,000 saw the Buddha, 300,000 heard him speak but did not see him, 300,000 did not even hear him speak. Now the Buddha lived at Śrāvasti for 25 years and, if some citizens did not see him and some did not hear him speak, what can be said of people living far away?

One day, accompanied by Ānanda, the Buddha went to Śrāvasti on his alms-round. A poor old woman was standing at the roadside. Ānanda said to the Buddha: "This woman is worthy of compassion; the Buddha should save her." The Buddha replied: "This woman does not have the conditions required [to be saved]." Ānanda continued: "May the Buddha approach her. When she sees the Buddha with his major marks (lakṣaṇa) and minor marks (ānuvarta-lakṣaṇa) and his rays (rasmi), she will experience a joyful mind (maddatikā) and will thus fulfill the required conditions." Then the Buddha came near the woman, but she turned away and showed her back to him. The Buddha tried to approach her from four different sides; each time she turned her back to him in the same way. She looked up in the air, but when the Buddha came down to her, she lowered her head at once. The Buddha rose up from the earth [to make her see him], but she lowered her face with her hands and did not want to look at the Buddha.785 Then the Buddha said to Ānanda: "What more can I do? Everything is useless; there are people who do not fulfill the conditions necessary for being saved and who do not succeed in seeing the Buddha." That is why the Buddha has said that it is as difficult to meet a Buddha as a flower on the udimbara tree. With the Buddha, it is like rainwater (varṣajala), easy to receive in folded hands, but which the pretas, ever thirsty, never get. 786

You say that in 91 kalpas, only three times has there been a Buddha. This holds for one Buddha universe taken alone but does not hold for all the Buddha universes taken together. Similarly, the other affirmation which says that "the other kalpas were empty, without Buddhas, and miserable", applies only to one Buddha universe alone and not to all the others taken together. This is why we affirm the existence of the Buddhas of the ten directions.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF THE PLURALITY OF BUDDHAS

Furthermore, the Buddhas of the ten directions do appear in the śrāvakas texts, but you do not understand these texts.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF THE PLURALITY OF BUDDHAS

1) In the Tsu a han king (Sanmuktāgamastūtra), it is said: "When it is pouring rain, the rain drops (būnūla) are so close together that they cannot be counted. It is the same for the universes (lokadhātu). In the east (pitravatīna dīri), I see innumerable beings born, subsisting and perishing. Their number is very great, defying calculation. It is the same in the ten directions. In these universes of the ten directions, innumerable beings undergo the threefold physical suffering (kāyadukkha), old age (jara), sickness (vyādhi) and death (marava); the threefold mental suffering, desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) and ignorance (moha); and the threefold suffering of rebirth (punarbhavadukkha), rebirth among the damned (naraṇa), the pretas and animals (ṭīṭaya-gos). All of these universes have three types of men, inferior (āvaraṇa), middling (madhyāya) or [126 a] superior (agama). Inferior men are attached (saktu) to present happiness, middling men to future happiness, superior men seek the Path; they are filled with loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuna) and have pity for beings. When the causes and conditions [necessary for the coming of a Buddha] are present, why would the effect, [namely, the coming of a Buddha] not be produced? The Buddha has said: 'If there were no sickness, old age and death, Buddhas would not appear.' That is because when one sees people tormented by old age, sickness and death, one makes the resolution (pravāhīnā) to become Buddha in order to save all beings, cure their mental illnesses and take them out of the pain of rebirths. Now, precisely these universes of the ten directions show how all the causes and conditions for the coming of a Buddha (buddhaprāprādhatāvāna) are present. How can you say that our universe is the only one to have a Buddha and the others do not? You merit as little credence as the merit of those who do not see the Buddha. The Buddhas of the ten directions must necessarily exist.

2) Furthermore, a sūtra789 in the Tekʿung a han (Dirghāgama) says: "There was a king of the asuras, guardian of the north; during the last watch of the night, he went to the Buddha with many hundreds of kōti of asuras, and having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, he stood to one side; emitting a pure light, he illumined the Jetavana with a great light. Joining his hands together, he praised the Buddha with the following stanzas:

Great hero, I take refuge in you!
Buddha, the greatest of those who walk on two feet.

787 I [Lamotte] have not found this sūtra in T 99 where it should appear. Excepting error, it is lacking in the Pāli Sānyutta.

788 Aṅguttara, V, p. 144: Tyo bhikkhave dhūnāma loke na sansārijeyyasam. na Tathāgato loke uppajjeyya araham sammāsambuddho... Katame tayo? Līlī ca jāra ca maravann ca.

789 This is the start of the Āḍāntākāśa in Sanskrit, the text of which has already been given above.
What you know with the wisdom-eye
The gods cannot understand.

Whether they be past, future, or present
I bow before all the Buddhas.

Taking refuge today in the Buddha
I also pay homage equally to the Buddhas of the three times.*

In these stanzas, it is a question of the Buddhas of the ten directions; the asura king bows before the Buddhas of the three times; then, in particular, he takes refuge in the Buddha Śākyamuni. If the actual Buddhas of the ten directions did not exist, he would take refuge only in the Buddha Śākyamuni and he would not say anything about the other past (ātta), future (undgata) or present (pratuyapanna) Buddhas. This is why we affirm the existence of the Buddhas of the ten directions.

3) Furthermore, if there were, in the past, innumerable Buddhas, if there will be, in the future, innumerable Buddhas, there must also be, in the present, innumerable Buddhas.

4) Furthermore, if, in the sūrīvaka texts, the Buddha had spoken of incalculable (asamkhyeya) and innumerable (apramāna) Buddhas of the ten directions, beings would have said: “Since Buddhas are so easy to find, it is not necessary to seek deliverance (vinokā) zealously. If we won’t meet this particular Buddha, we’ll meet another one later.” Out of laziness (kaustudaya) they would not diligently seek their salvation. A gazelle that has not been shot at by [1260] an arrow (sara) does not know fear; but once it has been shot at, it bounds away [at the approach of the hunter]. In the same way, people who know the sufferings of old age (jaru), sickness (vyādhi) and death (marana) and who have heard that there is but one Buddha who is very hard to find, feel fear, make energetic efforts and quickly come to escape from suffering. This is why, in the śrīvaka texts, the Buddha has not spoken about the existence of the Buddhas of the ten directions but neither did he say they do not exist.

5) If the Buddhas of the ten directions exist and if you deny their existence, you are committing a sin of immediate retribution (ānantarpāṇi). On the other hand, if the Buddhas of the ten directions do not exist and, nevertheless, I affirm their existence merely to produce the notion of Buddhas infinite in number (apramānabhūsamjñā), I gain the merit of paying homage to them (satkṛapanyu). Why is that? Because it is good intention (kulaṅgacita) that makes great merit. Thus, in the samādhi of loving-kindness (maitrīcittasamādhi), one considers all beings and sees them all happy; even though there is no real benefit for the beings [to be considered as happy], the person who considers them in this way with loving-kindness gains immense merit. It is the same for [the person who sets out] the idea of the Buddhas of the ten directions.

If the Buddhas of the ten directions really exist and if one denies their existence, one commits the extremely grave sin of attacking the Buddhas of the ten directions. Why? Because one is attacking something true. The person does not see these Buddhas with his fleshly eye (māṃsacakṣus); but if he affirms their existence out of faith (cittaprasāda), his merit (punya) is immense. On the contrary, if he mentally denies their existence, since these Buddhas actually exist, his sin (āpatti) is very grave. If, then, the person should believe in the existence [of the Buddhas of the ten directions] from their own lights, why should he not then believe in them when the Buddha in person has proclaimed the existence of these Buddhas in the Mahāyāna?

LARGE NUMBER OF SAVIORS, BUT SMALL NUMBER OF THE ELECT

Question. - In the ten directions, if there is an immense number of Buddhas and bodhisattvas, why do they not come [to the aid] of the beings who, at the present time, are falling into the three bad destinies (durgānti)?

Answer. - 1) Because the sins (āpatti) of these beings are too serious. Even if the Buddhas and bodhisattvas come [to their aid], these beings would not see them.

2) Moreover, the dharmaśākya Buddhas ceaselessly emit rays (śrāvinku) and ceaselessly preach the Dharma but, because of their sins, these beings neither see nor hear them. Thus, when the sun (vāraṇa) rises, blind people (andhā) do not see it; when thunder (vajra) shakes the earth, deaf people (buddhā) do not hear it; similarly, the dharmaśākya emits rays ceaselessly and preaches the Dharma ceaselessly, but the beings who have accumulated sins (āpatti) and stains (mala) in the course of innumerable kalpas do not see it and do not hear it. If the mirror (ādaśaka) is clear or if the water (vāka) is limpid, one can see one’s image in it; but if the mirror is dirty or the water disturbed, one sees nothing; in the same way, beings of pure mind see the Buddha, while those of impure mind do not see him. Although even today, the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the ten directions come to save beings, they cannot see them.

3) Moreover, the Buddha Śākyamuni, born in Jambudvīpa, lived in Kapilavastu, but often traveled to the six great cities of eastern India. One day he flew to southern India to the home of the vaisya Tiśeul (Kotikarna), whose veneration he received. Another day, he went to northern India to the kingdom of...

---

790 Cf. Sandhinimocana, IX, st. 25: If the bodhisattvas have at their disposal inexhaustible wealth, if they are compassionate, how is it that there are still miseries in the world? This is solely the fault of the sins of beings. If there were not sins standing in opposition to their happiness, how would there be wretched people in the world since the bodhisattvas think only of helping others and have inexhaustible wealth? It is like the pretas tortured by thirst; they see the water of the ocean dry up in front of them. This torture cannot be imputed to the ocean; it is due to the retribution of the sins committed by the pretas. Similarly here, the suffering of wretched people cannot be imputed to this ocean which is the generosity of the bodhisattvas, but solely to the demonic actions that are the sins of beings.

791 The frequent visits of the Buddha to the six large cities of eastern India and especially to Rājagaha and Śrīvastī has already been noted.

792 The journey of the Buddha to southern India and his reception by Kotikarna. The legend of Kotikarna in the Vinayas has been studied by S. Lévi, Sur la récitation primitive des textes bouddhiques, JA, May-June, 1915, p. 401-417. The sources are Pāli Vinaya, I, p. 194 seq.; Udīna, p. 37 seq.; Mūlasarvāstivādin Vinaya, T 1447, k. 1, p. 1048c-1053c.
the Yue tche; there he subdued the nāga-king A po lo (Apalāla); then, going to the west of the Yue tche kingdom, he subdued the rākṣasī, stayed in her cave (gūlī) and, even until today, the Buddha's shadow has remained there: those who go

[126 e] inside the cave see nothing, but when they come outside, they see the rays at a distance. Finally, the Buddha flew to Ki pin (Kapiśa?) on the mountain of the råṣi Li po t'o (Revata); remaining in space, he subdued this råṣi, who said to him: "I would like to stay here; would the Buddha please leave me one of his hairs (keśa) and one of his fingernails (nukha)?" The råṣi then built a stūpa to venerate them which still exists today; at the foot of this mountain is the monastery (vihāra) of Li yue, to be pronounced Li po t'o (Revata)."

793 The journey of the Buddha to the north-west of India. - The Mppī briefly recalls only the more important incidents: the subjugation of the nāga Apallāla, the conversion of the rākṣasī, the miracle of the shadow, the conversion of Revata. - The cycle of Akiśa is hardly any more precise; it mentions only four incidents:

Tsā a han, T 99, K. 23, p. 165b: "When the Buddha was about to enter into nirvāṇa, he converted the nāga-king Apallāla, the master-potter (kāmbhādrā), the candala, the nāga Gopāli; then he went to the kingdom of Mathurā." Divyāvadāna, p. 348 (corrupt text): Tadī Bhagavanta pariññāvikāsāmyayā pariññājīvanvinī kumbhākārā Candaliṇī Gopālīn cha tesaṃ Mathurāṃ anuprātīṣṭa.

A ya wang tchouan, T 2042, K. 9, p. 102b, adds some geographical indications: "Once, when the Buddha was in the kingdom of Ou tch'ang (Ujjīyāna), he subdued the nāga, A po po (Apallāla). In the kingdom of Ki pin (probably Kapiśa), and not Kaimir as Przyłuski, A. 243, would have it) he converted the fan tche (brahmācārin) teacher. In the kingdom of Kiun t'o nei (Gandhāra), he converted the tche n lo (candala). In the kingdom of Gandhāra, he subdued the ox-nāga (gosāga, i.e., Gopālanīga). Then he went to Mathurā." The voyage is told in detail in the Mahāsāṃghikī Vinaya, Kōn pen chūan... yao che, T 1448, K. 9, p. 408b-416b. The judicious comments of S. Lēvi in Catalogue des géographes du Yàhà, J.A., Jan-Feb., 1914, p. 500-511. From this good will, one may retrace the major stages of this journey by taking as an outline the Mahāsāṃghikī Vinaya (or, more properly, the information provided by the Mppī, the Koana fo san mei (T 643) and especially the Chinese pilgrims Fa lien (in Kao sang fa lien tchouan, T 2085), Song yun (in Lo yung k'i le lan k'i, T 2092) and Hsuan tsang (in Si yu ku, T 2087 and Tsu tceu ngem sung fa che tchouan, T 2053) who visited north-west India in 399, 520 and 630 respectively. For greater objectivity, I [Lamotte] will refer to the sources directly and not the translations of Legge and Giles (for Fa lien), Chavannes (for Song yun), Sr. Julian, Beatt and Watters (for Hsuan Tsang). Despite its late date, the Avadīn Vinaya, ch. 34-57 (ed. Mitra, II, p. 110-151) merits all the attention given to it by De Mèville in his study on Versions chinois du Milindapātha, BIFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 36-43. The splendid Greco-Buddhist discoveries of Foucher and the French archaeological work in Afghanistan permit us to trace the Buddha's footsteps on the maps they have prepared. Cf. A. Foucher, Notes sur la géographie ancienne du Gandhāra, BIFEO, I, 1901, p. 322-369; Notes sur l'itinéraire de Hsuan tsang en Afghanistan, Études asiatiques, Paris, 1925; De Képälï a Pashkaraatit, BSOS, VI, p. 341-348; J. Barthoux, Les Fouilles de Hadda, Paris, 1933, p. 4: map of the Jellā-Ābād district. According to the Mahāsāṃghikī Vinaya (i.e., after having crossed the Indo towards the west, the Buddha took eight stages to cross Uṣñīḍāya, the Lampāka, and arrived in the neighborhood of Peshawar.

1st stage. - In the kingdom of the Yue tche (Mppī, T 126b), in Uddālāya (A ya wang tchouan, T 102b), near the sources of the Swat (Si yu ku, p. 882b), he subdued the Nāga Apallāla. We have already studied the legends relating to this nāga and we have seen that except for the Pissu sa pen hing king, T 155, K. 2, p. 116b-c, which locates him in the pool of Teos lion, near Rajāgaha, the other sources locate him in the north-west.

The Mahāsāṃghikī Vinaya (i.e.) gives a detailed account of the struggle between the Buddha and the nāga: Accompanied by Vajrapāla, the Buddha arrives at Apallāla's palace. Furious, the nāga-king rises up in the air and rains a deluge of hail and clouds of earth. Having entered the meditation of loving-kindness, the Buddha changes the hailstones and the earthen clods into various perfumes. The nāga hastens to send weapons against him which are immediately changed into lotus flowers. Then Apallāla spreads a cloud of smoke which the Buddha counters with another cloud of perfume. On the Buddha's order, Vajrapāla with his club destroys the mountain crest which crumbles and fills up (corresponding exactly to the Kotikāḷavādī in the Divyā, p. 1-243); Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, T 1435, K. 25, p. 178a-182a; Mahāsāṅkā Vinaya, T 1421, K. 21, p. 144a; Dharmagupta Vinaya, T 1328, K. 39, p. 845b.

In all these sources, Kotikāra is a disciple of Mahākāśyapa. Teacher and disciple lived in the kingdom of Avanti, capital Ujjainī, on the Milavā plateau. In the Plī Vinaya and the Udhana, the kingdom is called Avanti; in the Dharmagupta and Mahāsāṅkā Vinayas, Ājñākāvati; in the Sarvāstivādin Vinaya, Ājīna Aparatana. - Kotikāra went to visit the Buddha who was staying at Śrīvastī in the Jetavana (or, according to the Dharmagupta Vinaya, at Rājagaha on the Ghṛṭakālanarpura). He prostrated before the Buddha and sat down at one side. The Buddha welcomed him in the usual way, Ananda prepared Kotikāra's bed in the Buddha's cell.

The Buddha came to his cell after midnight and Kotikāra followed. At the request of the teacher, Kotikāra recited the Athavarga and the Buddha congratulated him. Kotikāra informed the Buddha about the difficulties of observing the monastic precepts in remote countries; in southern countries and in Avanti, where monks were few, the Buddha allowed five monks to conduct ordination; he also permitted the constant use of baths and shoes. Thus it is established from the texts that Kotikāra once went from Avanti to Śrīvastī (or Rajagaha) to make the acquaintance of the Buddha. On the other hand, the sources do not say that the Buddha ever went to Avanti, or any other place to visit Kotikāra. Nevertheless, the Mppī is explicit: "One day the Buddha flew to southern India to the home of the vaisyā Kotikāra, who paid his respects to him." But the Mppī is wrong. Let us see what the error consists of and let us try to explain it.

a) It is wrong that the Buddha ever went to Kotikāra in Avanti, it is true that he visited southern India. On the invitation of Pīrūsa and his brothers, he went to Śrīpūraka, capital of Śrīpūrapura (southern Konkan). The voyage is described in the Mahāsāṃghikī Vinaya, T 1448, K. 3, p. 140b-172a; Divyāvadāna, p. 16-55 (tr. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 234-245); Papulka, V, p. 98-92; Marthi, II, p. 378-379. The Buddha flew there with five hundred arhats. On the way, he converted five hundred widows, five hundred rāṣis and the sage Vakkallā. He landed in Śrīpūrapura in the sandalwood palace (candundhāla prāșada) which he changed into crystal. On returning, he converted the nāga king Kṛṣṇa and Gautamaka and, according to the Plī sources, he left the imprint of his foot on the bank of the Nammadī (actually the Nerbudda) river. From there, he went to the Maricika heaven to convert Bhadrakanyaka, Maudaghyālaya's mother. Finally at the speed of thought, he returned to Śrīvastī to the Jetavana.

b) There is no doubt that the Mppī is alluding to this voyage when it says that the Buddha flew to southern India. But why does it say that the Buddha went to the home of Kotikāra when the Buddha was received by Pīrūsa? Probably because Śrīpūraka, Pīrūsa's city, is located in Śrīpūrapura and the surname of Kotikāra is Śrīna (in Plī, Śrīna Kotikāra). The Mppī is not alone in having brought together the name of the country and the surname of heroes, whereas in the other Vinayas which we have analyzed above, the Buddha is the disciple of Mahākāśyapa and a native of Avanti. The Mahāsāṅkā Vinaya, T 1425, K. 23, p. 415c, has it that he was a disciple of Pīrūsa and living at Chou na (Śrīpūrapura).
We may add that there are many 'Revata's in Buddhist hagiography; Malalasekara's dictionary of proper names (II, p. 751-755) counts no less than a dozen and the list is not complete. There was, notably in a monastery of Kāmilā, a Revata, or rather a Raivatka, who was the hero of an avadāna told in chap. 103 of the Avadānākālamūtra, ed. S.C. Das, II, p. 979:

_Pure Raivataka nāma Kāmilāyānivaṃcīvatīrata_

_Bhikṣu Śālavahāra 35ṭī sarvabhūtādṛṣṭyārūpa_

"Among the Kāmilāyānas in the Craggy Monastery, she once was a monk with pure vows, named Raivataka, the compassionate support of all beings."

The Vibhāk, T. 1545, k. 125, p. 654c-655b, tells his misadventure at length. Once in the kingdom of _Kia moshī ma lo_ (Kāmilā), there was a capital called _Pi lo τούτου_ (Birathā). Not far from this city there was a monastery (_samghārāma_), the _Che yai_ (Śālavahāra) where there lived a bhikṣu-arhat. One day, he was about to dye his robe when a man approached him and asked if he had seen his calf. When the monk replied in the negative, the man examined the inoffensive dye-vat; fate, or rather the law of karma, had it that the man mistook the robe for a cow's hide, the dye for its blood and the vat for the head of the cow. The bhikṣu was thrown into prison by the king and his pupils were not concerned about him. After many years, they came anyway to reclaim him from the king and to protest his innocence. When he was to be liberated, the bhikṣu had changed so much in appearance that nobody recognized him any; they had to shout aloud in the prison: "Where are you, O Śāmartu? By the royal favor you are free." The bhikṣu leapt out of prison and flew up into the air. At this sight, the king felt remorse and apologized to the bhikṣu who affirmed that he had never felt any anger towards the king and recommended that his students not hold it against a king. A young Āramaṇa who had not heard this advice, inwardly cursed the evil city that had imprisoned his master for so many years. An amaṇya, divining his thoughts, caused a rain of earth to fall that completely destroyed the capital of Kāmilā.

[Chavannes, who was unaware of the above-mentioned sources, knew the story of the bhikṣu Revata from two tales incorporated in the Kūnou tsu pi yi king, T. 206, no. 32, k. 1, p. 516a, and Tsa poa tsang king, T. 203, no. 19, k. 2, p. 457b. He translated them in his Contos, I, p. 395; III, p. 15-17.]

5th stage. - The city of Green Reeds (Chin. Lou si), Tib. Gsī ma can] where the Buddha converted a yakṣa and his family.

6th stage. - The city of 'Shelter-heap' (Sansk. _Kāṭipāla_) where the Buddha converted the cow-herder (gopāla) and the nāga-king _Sāva_. This passage from the Mālāsūrvātīdīn Vinaya is probably interpolated; it should read "where the Buddha converted the nāga-king Gopāla."

Other sources tell us that the Buddha left his shadow in the nāga's cave; here is their content:

a. The Mālāsūrvātīdīn Vinaya places the conversion of the nāga-king Gopāla at Kāṭipāla but does not mention the Cave of the Shadow.

b. Fa hien and Song yun describe the Cave of the Shadow at length which they locate at Nagarālāra but say nothing of the conversion of the nāga Gopāla.

c. Hsuan tsang places at Nagarālāra both the conversion of the nāga Gopāla and the Cave of the Buddha's Shadow.

d. The Kuasou fo sam sei hai king locates at Nagarālāra the conversion of a nāga whose name it does not mention and that of five rākṣas. It describes at length the circumstances that led to the Buddha leaving his shadow in the nāga's cave.

e. The Māpp places the conversion of the female rākṣasi and the Cave of the Buddha's Shadow in the west of the land of Yue tohe.

No doubt the same legend lies hidden beneath the diversifications of detail. Some citations from these sources will convince the reader:

Fa hien tschouan, T 2085, p. 859a3-7: "If one follows the mountain chain to the south-west, half a yojana south of the city of Nagarālāra, there is a rock cave where the Buddha left his shadow. Whom one looks at it or from a distance of more the nāga's lake. To prevent the latter from fleeing, the Buddha sends out flames everywhere. Apallā takes refuge close to the Buddha where the earth is quiet and cool. Subdued, he takes refuge in the Three Jewels.

The taming of Apallā is represented on the Gandhāran bas-reliefs (Fouchet, _Art Gréco-Bouddhique_, 1, fig. 270-275) and the Chinese pilgrims Fa hien (p. 858a), Song yun (p. 1020h) and Hsuan tsang (p. 882c) add further details: they note the place where the Buddha dried his kāyāja wetted by the nāga, the rock where he left his footprint, the spree where he chewed a willow twig which he planted and which immediately became a big tree.

2nd stage. - Conversions of the nīya and the yākṣa in the villages of Tsuì lou (in Tib., _Yul gling grags so_) and Kānāthi, which must certainly be located on the upper Swīt.

3rd stage. - Sojourn in the rice-granary city which is none other than Mangalaud, in Sanskrit, Mahāgalupura, the _Mong kie li_ of Hsuan tsang (p. 883b), capital of the Udjugāna kings. There, according to the Mālāsārvātīdīn Vinaya and Hsuan tsang, the Buddha healed and converted the mother of king Utarasena.

It seems that after this third stage, the Buddha, either walking or flying south-west, went directly to Lampākā (Langhaun) a district of Afghanistan located on the middle course of the Kābūl river, (Kābul). Its main cities are Nagarālāra (Jelīlābād) and Hadda (cf. J. Barthoux, _Les fouilles de Hadda_, I and II, Paris, 1933). Its neighbor to the east is Gandhāra, cradle of Greco-Buddhist art, made famous by the works of Fouchet; to the west, Kāspīa, capital Kāpīṭṭa (Beqram), illustrated by the French archeological works in Afghanistan (cf. J. Hackin, _Recherches archéologiques a Beqram, 2 vol.,_ Paris, 1939; J. Hackin and J. Carli, _Recherches archéologiques au Col de Khair khanah_, Paris, 1936). Note that Lampākā, long a tributary of Kāspīa (cf. Hsuan tsang, Si yi ku, k. 2, p. 871b) is often confused with it in the texts.

4th stage. - City of Revata (Chin., Kī yi to, Tib., _Dhsan ldan_ where the Buddha converted the master potter (_kumbakāra_ as is told at length in the Mālāsārvātīdīn Vinaya (I.c.). We have seen that the A yu sang tschouan locates the conversion of this brahmānacin teacher at Kī pi. P. Przyluski, _Legende d'Aksou_, p. 245, thinks that Kī pi means here the Kāmilā, but I [Lamotte] have good reason to think that it is rather Kāspīa-Lampākā. This is not impossible because if "it is certain that, in the translations of Buddhist texts prior to the year 600, Kī pi always corresponds, when we have a parallel Sanskrit text, to Kāmilā and not to Kāspīa-Lampākā, ... theoretically it is not impossible that Kī pi may have originally meant Kāpīṭṭa._" (P. Pelliot, _Tokharien et Koutchéen_., JA, Jan.-Mar., 1934, p. note 39). The Māpp tells us that the nīya Revata built a stūpa on a mountain, containing the hair and finger-nails of the Buddha and that, at the foot of this mountain, there was still at this time the vihāra called Revata.

Fa hien (p. 859a) found a stūpa 400 paces from the Cave of the Buddha's Shadow built over the hair and finger-nails of the Buddha, located a half-yojana from Nagarālāra, Hsuan tsang (Si yi ku, p. 879a) found this same stūpa at the northwest side of the cave; it contained, he said, the Buddha's hair and nails. Song yun (p. 1021c) also notes at Nagarālāra some famous relics containing the tooth and the hair of the Buddha. This can only be the stūpa built by Revata and the relics gathered by him after his conversion.

Therefore Revata's stūpas and vihāras are near Nagarālāra and the mountain of Kī pi in question here is to be found in Kāpīṭṭa-Lampākā and not in Kāmilā.

The monastery of Revata (in Chinese Li yue or Li po τού) was well-known. In the legend of Aksou (Diyāvāldināna, p. 399; Tsa a hou, T. 99, k. 23, p. 169a-b; A yu wang tschouan, T. 2042, k. 2, p. 105a; A yu wang king, T. 2043, k. 3, p. 139c), the great emperor, in a mystical trance, invited the faithful wise men dwelling in the pleasant city of Kāmilā or the vilāras of Tāmāsvana, Mahāvāna and Revatuka. The pleasant city of Kāmilā, as the name indicates, is in Kāmilā, the Tāmāsvana and the Mahāvāna (Soungrām) are in Udjugāna (cf. Hsuan tsang, Si yi ku, T. 2097, k. 4, p. 889b; k. 3, p. 883a); as for Revatuka, we locate it in Kāspīa. The latter enjoyed great veneration by the faithful. The Śūrdīkhārītā (tr. Huber, p. 429) mentions the case of a poor man and a poor woman from Kī pi (Kāspīa) who went so far as to sell themselves in order to make offerings to the monks of the Revata monastery.
than ten paces, it has the appearance of the true shape of the Buddha with his golden color (suvarṇavarṇa), his major marks (lakṣaṇas) and minor marks (anumāṇa). His eyes (rāmi) and his light (prakāśa). The closer one gets, it becomes dimmer as if it were an illusion. When the kings of the neighboring regions sent their artists to make a copy of it, none of them succeeded. In this land there is a popular tradition that says that the thousand Buddhas must all leave their shadow there.”

The difficulties always experienced by artists trying to reproduce the Buddha's image are illustrated by a short tale told by the Mālāśravastīyā/vādin Viniya, T 1442, k. 4, p. 874a-b; Divyāvadāna, p. 547 (tr. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 304; San po kau ying yao liu, T 2004, k. 1, p. 827-828). Rādāya, king of Rovak, made a gift to Bimbāśa, king of Mañgāda, of a marvellous breastplate. The latter, in return, wished to send him a portrait of the Buddha, but the painters entrusted with this work were unable to take their eyes off their divine model and their hands remained inactive. The Buddha then projected his shadow onto a cloth; the painter then traced the outline and added the colors.

Song yun, Lu yang k’ie ian k’i, T 2092, k. 3, p. 1021c-1022a (according to the corrections and translations of E. Chavannes, Voyage de Song yun, BEFEO, III, 1903, p. 428). “I arrived in Nagaragāra where I saw the cave of the Buddha's shadow; there is a door facing west; if one penetrates the mountain to a depth of fifteen paces and one looks from afar, then all the distinctive marks [of the Buddha] appear clearly; if one touches the place with one's hand, there is nothing but the face of the rock; if one withdraws gradually, one begins to see the face appear again in a remarkable way; that is a very rare phenomenon in the world. In front of the cave there is a square rock on which is the imprint of one of the Buddha's feet. One hundred paces south-west of the cave is the place where the Buddha washed his garments.”

A century later, Hiuan tsang also had the occasion to visit the cave, of which he gives ample detail. Cf. Si yu k’t, T 2087, k. 2, p. 879a (tr. Beal, I, p. 93-95; Watters, I, p. 184) and Vie de Hiuan tsang, T 2053, k. 2, p. 226c-230a (tr. Beal, Life of Hiuan tsang, p. 61-62). He states that the Buddha's shadow, seen clearly at earlier times, was no longer visible except on rare occasions and to certain individuals. The Viṣṇu tells under what dramatic circumstances he himself was privileged to see the shadow; it is a fine page of religious literature which may be read in Groussard’s Sur les traces du Buddha, Paris, 1920, p. 93-95.

According to Hiuan tsang, the cave had been inhabited formerly by the nāga Gopāla, a cow-herder who had been changed into a nāga in revenge. Converted by the Buddha, he had asked him for permission to remain in his cave always. Hiuan tsang confirms certain details already mentioned by his predecessors: like Fu hien, he is aware of the tradition according to which the thousand Buddhas of the good kalpa must leave their shadow in this cave; like Song yun, he saw the place near the cave where the Buddha left the imprint of his feet and washed his clothes. He also notes, close to the cave, the presence of other caves “which the other noble disciples of the Buddha had occupied as their places of meditation.” Now we know from the Kouan fo san mei hai king that the nāga king and his rākṣasa had built five caves for the great disciples of the Buddha.

The Kouan fo san mei hai king, T 643, k. 2, p. 670b-671b (tr. J. Przyluski, Le Nord-Ouest de l'Inde, p. 565-568), translated by Buddhabhadra (died 429), perhaps a native of Nagaragāra (Bagchi, 1, p. 341, n.3), thus in a good position to tell us the folklore of Lampākā. This very detailed work is perhaps the direct source of the Mppē. Here is a brief summary of it:

The Buddha came to the kingdom of Nu kie ho lo (Nagaragāra), on the mountain of the old rishi, in the flowering forest of Jambu, at the shore of a poisonous nāga pool, north of the source of blue lotuses, in the cave of the rākṣas, south of the mountain A na sau (Anōila). There was, at that time in the cave, five rākṣas who had been changed into female nāgas and were the mates of a poisonous nāga. They caused famine and epidemics in the land. Puspākā, king of Nagaragāra, invited the Buddha to rid his kingdom of this scourge. Accompanied by Ananda and four great disciples, the Buddha went to the mountain of the old rishi and, with the help of Vajrapāṇi and Maudgalyāyana, vanquished the nāga and the five rākṣas. At their request, he agreed to stay for a time in the rock cave of the rākṣasa. When he wanted to leave, the nāga-king asked him to stay with him forever. “If you leave me, I will never see the Buddha again,” he lamented, “I will commit deeds again and fall back into my evil ways.” The Buddha comforted him: “I accept; I will stay in the cave for fifteen hundred years.” Then the Buddha performed a series of miracles; he leaped up and his body entered into the rock. The nāgas all saw the Buddha who remained in the rock and whose brightness was seen outside. Without leaving the pool, they constantly saw the sun of the Buddha seated cross-legged in the rock. When living beings saw him, it was by looking from a distance; from close up he was not visible. The shadow also preached the Dharma. (tr. J. Przyluski).

Finally, we may note that Foucher has identified the Cave of the Shadow near the village of Tchh-ki-Dheri. ‘... On leaving Nandivardhana, the Buddha went to the city of Kunff, at the shore of a poisonous lake, the nāga Puṣyāṇa, who caused famine and epidemics in the land. Puṣyāṇa, a native of Nagaragāra (Bagchi, 1, p. 341, n.3), thus in a good position to tell us the folklore of Lampākā. The Buddha came to the kingdom of Nu kie ho lo (Nagaragāra), on the mountain of the old rishi, in the flowering forest of Jambu, at the shore of a poisonous nāga pool, north of the source of blue lotuses, in the cave of the rākṣas, south of the mountain A na sau (Anōila). There was, at that time in the cave, five rākṣas who had been changed into female nāgas and were the mates of a poisonous nāga. They caused famine and epidemics in the land. Puṣyāṇa, king of Nagaragāra, invited the Buddha to rid his kingdom of this scourge. Accompanied by Ananda and four great disciples, the Buddha went to the mountain of the old rishi and, with the help of Vajrapāṇi and Maudgalyāyana, vanquished the nāga and the five rākṣas.

If people were born in the same country as the Buddha were unable to see him, then what can be said of strangers? Therefore, it is not because the Buddhas of the ten directions are unseen that one can say that they do not exist.

4) Furthermore, the bodhisattva Mi lō (Maitreya), despite his great loving-kindness (maitri), stays in his celestial palace and does not come here. But, because he does not come, can it be said that he does not exist? If we find it strange that Maitreya, who is so close to us, does not come, why should we be surprised that the Buddhas of the ten directions who are so far away do not come to us?

5) Furthermore, if the Buddhas of the ten directions do not come here, it is because beings are laden with very heavy wrong-doings (dpatti) and stains (mala), and do not fulfill the qualities (guna) needed to see the Buddhas.

6) Moreover, the Buddhas, before coming, first must know it the roots of good (kaśālamāla) of beings are ripe (pākṣa) and their fetters (sāmyojana) light. It is only after that that they come here. It is said:

By a preliminary examination, the Buddhas recognize beings.
Whom no skillful means (upāya) can save,
Those who are difficult to save or easy to convert,
Those whose conversion is difficult yet possible,
Those whose conversion is easy yet possible,
Those who have come to their end of existence.

This is why, although the Buddhas of the ten directions do not come here, it cannot be said that they do not exist.

7) Moreover, if the great arhats such as Śāriputra, etc., and the great bodhisattvas such as Maitreyā, etc., cannot know the wisdom (prajñā), power (bala), skillful means (upāya) and superknowledges (abhijñā) of the Buddha, how could worldlings (prthva-gjana) know them?

8) Finally, when, menaced by imminent danger, a being wholeheartedly invokes the Buddhas or great bodhisattvas, it sometimes happens that they do come to his aid.

a. Thus in the west of Ta yue tche, near the monastery (vihāra) of Buddhaoṣṇa,794 there was a man suffering leprosy (pāmaṇa, kṣaṇa), a wind sickness (vyūha-kūṭa). He went to the statue (pratimā) of the bodhisattva Pīṇ ki (Samantabhadra); one-pointedly (ekacittena) he took refuge in him (śaranam gatah) and, thinking of the qualities of the bodhisattva Samantabhadra, he asked him to remove his sickness. Immediately the statue of the bodhisattva rubbed the leper’s body with the precious rays [that came] from his stoney hand and the sickness disappeared.

b. In a certain land, there was a forest bhikṣu (aranyakābhikṣu) who often recited the Mahāyāna [sūtras]. The king of the land always gave him his hair (keśa) to trample under his [127 a] feet. A bhikṣu said to the king: “This man, O mahaṭṭha, has not often recited the sūtras; why do you pay him so much homage?” The king replied: “Once in the middle of the night, I went to see this bhikṣu whom I found in a cave (gālu) reciting the Fa houa king (Saddharmapūraṇakāvīṣṭhā). I saw another man with golden colored rays (suvarnāvarṇaraṇaṃ) mounted on a white elephant who, with joined palms (atāṭījāli), paid homage to the bhikṣu. When I approached, he disappeared. I then asked the venerable one (bhūdayu) why the man with the rays had disappeared at my arrival. The bhikṣu answered: “That is the bodhisattva Pīṇ ki (Samantabhadra); this bodhisattva has made the following vow: Each time someone recites the Saddharmapūraṇakāvīṣṭhā, I will come on a white elephant to teach him (avavādo).” As I was reciting the Saddharmapūraṇakāvīṣṭhā, the bodhisattva Samantabhadra came in person.” [Note by Kumārajīva: Pīṇ ki in the Fa houa king is called Pōu hien, Samantabhadra].

c. Finally, in a certain country, there was a bhikṣu who recited the A mi t'o fo king (Amitābha-buddhasūtra) and the Mo ho pan ju po lo mi (Mahāprajñāpāramitā). When he was about to die, he said to his students: “Here comes the Buddha Amitābha with his great samgha”; his body shook, he took refuge and died at once. After his death, his students built a funeral-pyre and burned him. The next day, among the ashes (bhāsanā) they discovered the bhikṣu’s tongue (śīva) which had not burned up. Because he had recited the Amitābha-buddhasūtra, this bhikṣu had seen the buddha Amitābha come to him; because he had recited the Prajñāpāramitā, his tongue could not be burned.796

These are facts of the present day, and the sūtras tell of many cases of Buddhas and bodhisattvas appearing. Thus in many places there are people whose sins (upāpi), stains (mula) and bonds (bandha) are light; they wholeheartedly (ekacittena) invoke the Buddha; their faith (kṣīra-dhā) is pure and free of doubt; they will necessarily succeed in seeing the Buddha and their efforts will not be in vain.

For all these reasons, we know that the Buddhas of the ten directions really exist.

794 This is the precious relic of the Uṣṇīṣa, a bone formation on the skull of the Buddha; it was at Hi lo (Hadda), about five miles south of Nagarāhāra (Jetūl-Abhir). The Chinese pilgrims never failed to visit it and they describe in detail the festivals that took place there: Fa hien ts’ouan, T 2085, p. 858c (tr. Legge, p. 36-38); Lo yang k’ie lan ki, T 2092, k. 5, p. 1021c (tr. Chavannes, BEFEO, III, 1903, p. 427-428); Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 2, p. 879a (tr. Beal, I, p. 96; Watters, I, p. 195-198); Yi ts’ing, Religieux éminents, tr. Chavannes, p. 24, 79, 105.

795 This promise was made by Samantabhadra when, leaving the buddhafield of the buddha Ratnasambhava, he went to the Saṅgha universe to visit Śākyamuni on the Gedrakāla-puravata. It is recorded in the Saddharmapūraṇa, p. 475-476: ye ca bhagavan paṃcime kāle paścime samaye paścimāyām paścimāyāy kutukṣita-yām dandaṃpaṭhāraṁ karītyaṃ vicāśīśaṁ karītyāmi.

796 “If, at the end of time, in that last era during the last five hundred years [of the kalpa], O Bhagavat, monkeys or nuns or the faithful of both sexes, possessing, writing, researching, chanting this explanation of the Dharma, I will show my own body to them, the sight of which is pleasing to all beings. Mounted on a six-tusked white elephant, surrounded by a crowd of bodhisattvas, on the twenty-first day, I will go to the place where the Dharma teachers walk, and when I get there, I will teach these interpreters of the Dharma, I will make them accept the teaching, I will encourage them, I will fill them with joy and give them magical spells so that these interpreters of the Dharma will not be oppressed by anyone; so that not a single being, whether human or non-human, will have a chance to surprise them and so that women will be unable to seduce them. I will watch over them, I will ensure their safety, I will protect them from being beaten or being poisoned.” (tr. Burnouf).

For the white elephant, the mount of Samantabhadra, cf. Koun p'ou hien p'ou sa hing kā king, T 277, p. 390a.

796 Cf. Hobogirītā, Amida, p. 25.
Sūtra: At that time, in that universe there was a bodhisattva called P'ou ming (Samantaraśmi) - (Athā tatra lokadhātou Samantaraśmin nāma bodhisattvāḥ).

Sātra: For the meaning of the word 'bodhisattva' see Chapter VIII.

Why is this bodhisattva called Samantaraśmi? Because his rays (rāmi) illumine all the universes ceaselessly.

Sātra: Seeing this great brilliance, this great trembling of the earth and the [ordinary] body of the Buddha, he went to the Buddha Ratnakāra and said: “Bhagavat, what are the causes and conditions for this great brilliance that lights up the universe, for this great trembling of the earth and the appearance of the body of the Buddha?” (mahāntum avabhāṣāṃ dṛṣṭaṃ ca mahāntum prthivīcālan man ca mahāntum prthivīcālam tam ca bhagavatā prākṛtam dīmabhāvam dṛṣṭya yena bhagavān Ratnakaras tenopasamānmad upasamkṛnyya tam tathāgatam etad avocat. ko bhavayan hetu pratyaya ‘śya mahato vābhāsvaya loke pūrṇābhāsva yāya ca tathāgatasya prākṛtaṁ bhāsvasya samādārayasya).

Sātra: For the trembling of the earth, the body of the Buddha and his brilliance, see Act V, above.

Question. - The bodhisattva Samantaraśmi, the most venerable and the foremost of the bodhisattvas, should himself know all that. Why does he question the Buddha on this subject?

Answer. - 1) Great as he is, the bodhisattva Samantaraśmi is incapable of knowing the wisdom (prajñāḥ) and the miraculous power (śiddhiḥ-bala) of the Buddha; it is like the moon (candram) whose light, great though it is, disappears at day-break (śāyadayaṃ). This is why he asks the Buddha.

2) Moreover, the bodhisattvas always want to see the Buddha and his hearts are insatiable [127 b] (asaṃstata). Even without any reason, they wish to see the Buddha; what then can be said when they have good reasons?

3) Moreover, Samantaraśmi's motivation [for asking Ratnakara] is unquestionable. It is not astonishing that the calf (vatsa) follows its mother; it is normal for kinglets to come to greet the great king. Similarly, the great bodhisattvas who have derived such great benefits from the Buddha always wish to follow the Buddha. Thus, when the bodhisattva Samantaraśmi sees these things, his attention is awakened; [he says]: “This must be something very important.” Seeing that the incalculable (asaṃkhyeyas) innumerable (upamaṇya) universes become visible one to another, he questions the Buddha.

4) Finally, some say: The bodhisattva Samantaraśmi [knows the reasons for these miracles] because he himself has miraculous power (śiddhiḥ-bala) because the Buddha Śākyamuni makes them known to him. If he asks the Buddha, it is intended only for the lesser bodhisattvas who do not know. These lesser bodhisattvas, out of fear of objections, do not dare to question the Buddha; this is why Samantaraśmi asks for them. The bodhisattva Samantaraśmi guides the [Ratnakaratt] universe with its youths (dāsaka) and maidens (dārśkārā); therefore he knows that they cannot ask the Buddha. Just as when a big elephant (mahāgaja) uproots a big tree (mahābīrka) to allow the little elephants (gajapota) to eat its leaves, thus Samantaraśmi questions the Buddha [for the lesser bodhisattvas] and asks him: “Bhadanta, what are the causes and conditions for this great brilliance, for this great trembling of the earth, and for the appearance of the body of the Buddha?”

*** *** ***

Sātra: The Buddha Ratnakāra answered Samantaraśmi: “O son of good family, in the west, beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges, is the universe called So p'io (Sāhā). The Buddha named Śākyamuni is there who, at this time, is preaching the Prajñāpāramitā to the bodhisattva-mahāsattvān. These [marvels are caused] by his miraculous power” (Evam adhā Ratnakarasa tathāgataḥ Samantaraśmin bhūtisattvam etad avocat. asit kula nan ina saṃsāramīyam dīśī gātānātmāvaḥkāpaṃ lokadhātun aśīrmanya Sāhā nāma lokadhātou satra Śākyamuni nāma tathāgataς tiṣṭaṃ sa bodhisattvaṃ mahāsattvān prajñāpāramitāṃ samprakāśayati. tasyāyaṃ idṛṣy maḥābhūvah)

Sātra. - Question. - The Buddha is like Mount Sumeru which cannot be moved by the waves (tarunaja) of the great sea; why does he reply here to Samantaraśmi? That is a mark of agitation (vīryaśīla), for when the mind is concentrated, one does not talk; a certain agitation of the mind is necessary to talk. Preaching the Dharma comes from an arousal (avabodhana) which in itself is a coarse thing (sthilādaryanā). But the Buddha cannot have anything coarse.

[127 c] Answer. - 1) Deep in samādhi, the Buddha is not disturbed (iḥīta) by things of the world; nevertheless, as a result of his great loving kindness (maitrī) and great compassion (karunā), he has compassion for beings and preaches the Dharma for them to destroy their doubts. Like Sumeru, king of the mountains, unshaken by gentle winds but which trembles strongly when the Souē-lan winds blow, the Buddha, at the breath of the wind of his great loving-kindness and great compassion, is moved by compassion and constantly enters into the five destinies (pārākṣaṇīyān) in order to convert beings; to this effect he assumes [the five kinds of existence], from the god realm to the animal realm.

2) Actually, [even while he speaks], the Buddha is not disturbed and is always resting in samādhi; but as a result of his merits acquired in earlier existences (pārāvājana), he utters sounds (lāba) and answers in the 797 The reading Souē-lan (170 and 13; 140 and 14) found in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 34, p. 736 under its homophone, Sowē-lan (170 and 13; 46 and 9), is probably in error and should be corrected to P'ī-lan (81 and 4; 140 and 14). It is actually the latter reading which is found in two other passages of the Mpp. 1) At k. 11, p. 139b-c: “The winds coming from the four cardinal directions cannot shake mount Meru, but at the end of the great kalpas, the Pī-lan wind arises and blows [upon mount Mount] like a pile of straw.” At k. 17, p. 188b: “The winds coming from the eight directions cannot shake mount Meru, but at the end of the kalpa, the Pī-lan winds arise and blow on Mount Mount like a pile of straw.”

---

These Pī-lan winds are the svāraṃbha or svāraṃbhabha of the Sanskrit texts (Dīvīyārāṇā, p. 90, 105; Kośa, VI, p. 155) and the svāraṇbha of the Pāli texts (Samyutta, II, p. 231; Aṭṭhaketa, I, p. 137; Jātaka, III, p. 255, 484, VI, p. 326). According to the Samyutta (i.e.), the svāraṇbha winds blow in upper space (upāri ḍhīla). When a bird encounters them, the svāraṇbha winds strike it and its claws, wings, head and body are scattered.

---

439

440
manner of an echo (pratiśruta). Like a heavenly musical instrument (divyatūrya) that emits sounds automatically (svatāḥ), like a precious stone (maṇi) that automatically gives people everything they desire in the way of clothing (cīvara), food (ākāra) or music (vidyā), the Buddha speaks automatically through all the pores (rasmipāta) of his body and preaches the Dharma according to the wishes [of his listeners] without any action, thought (manasthāna) or conception (vikalpa) on his part.

Thus it is said in the Mi t'ai k'in kung k'ung (Guhayakvajrapaśūtra):798 "There are three secrets (gūhyā) in the Buddha: the body secret (kāyagūhyā), the speech secret (vākagūhyā) and the mind secret (citraguhā). Neither gods nor men can grasp them or understand them.

a. The members of a given assembly (saṃgha) see the body of the Buddha [with its changing aspects]: his color (varṇa) is yellow-gold, silver-white or a mixture of precious colors; his size is one arm-span and six feet, one li, ten li, a hundred li, a thousand li, ten thousand li or one hundred thousand li, sometimes even it is infinite (ananta), immense (apramāṇa) like space (ākāśa). Such is the secret of the body.

b. Secret of the voice. - This does the voice of the Buddha as if he were quite close. In the universe where he had stopped, a Buddha was in the process of dining with his great assembly. One day Mou lien (Maṇḍūkāyāṇa)799 had this thought: "I would like to know the range of the Buddha's voice." Then, by virtue of his base of miraculous powers (rddhipāda), he passed through innumerable thousands of millions of buddha-universes (buddhalokadhātu) and then he stopped; he still heard the voice of the Buddha as if he were quite close. In the universe where he had stopped, a Buddha was in the process of dining with his great assembly.800 In that land, the people were large, and Maṇḍūkāyāṇa [coming from the Saṅgha universe where people are small] was standing in a begging bowl (pūtra). The disciples asked their Buddha: "Where does this insect-headed person come from? He is dressed like a śrāmaṇa." The Buddha replied: "Do not despise this man. In the west (paścaśaya dīrī) beyond innumerable buddha-lands, there is a Buddha named Śākyamuni and this man whom you see is a powerful disciple of this Buddha." Then the Buddha asked Maṇḍūkāyāṇa: "Why have you come here?" Maṇḍūkāyāṇa answered: "I have come to find out [the range] of the Buddha Śākyamuni's [128 a] voice." The Buddha said to him: "So you want to know the range of the Buddha's voice! If you distanced yourself [from him] for innumerable kalpas, you would never get to the limit of his range."

798 Here the Mppī gives some extracts from the third part of the Ratnakūta, of which we have two Chinese and one Tibetan translations. Cf. Mi t'ai k'in kung k'ung chou hou, T 310, k. 10, p. 53b seq.; De bhīṣī gīvā pūṁ guṇā (Tathāgatadīnityaguhānāmāśī) cf. Csoma-Feer, p. 214; OKC, no. 760, 3, p. 231.

799 In the sources mentioned in the preceding note, Maṇḍūkāyāṇa's experience is told in the following places: T 310, k. 10, p. 56c-57a; T 312, k. 7, p. 720b-721a. Later, the Mppī, k. 30, p. 284a, will refer to it also.

800 According to T 310 and T 312 (l.c.), the universe where Maṇḍūkāyāṇa stopped was called Kowung ming fan (Raimipatīkā, 'Banner of Rays'); it was led by the Buddha Kowung ming wæng (Raimirīṣa).

3) Finally, the Buddha appeared in the world and preached the Dharma to destroy the doubts of beings (sattvasamayamanucochedana): this cannot be denied. Just as one cannot ask the sun (śīra) why it chases away the shadows (∪dākātu), in the same way one cannot ask the Buddha why he respects [to questions that are asked of him].

Question. - Being alike one to another (ṣama), the Buddhas are said to be 'ālike enlightened' (ṣambuddha); then why speak here about the miraculous power (rddhipāda) of one [particular] Buddha?

Answer. - 1) Having proclaimed the non-existence of self (naśatmya) and [the vanity of distinctions] between this and that, [the Buddhas] have destroyed envy (ākarasu) and pride (māna).

2) Moreover, in the universe there are gods (deva) who claim superiority and, out of their pride (abhīmāna), claim to be the creators of the beings and the things in heaven and on earth. Thus Fan t'ien wang (Brahmadevarīja) said to the Brahmr gods: "It is I who have created you"; and the god Pi niou (Viṣṇu) said: "All the rich, noble and glorious men of the universe are parts of me. It is I who have created the universe and it is I who destroy it. Creation and destruction of the universe are my work."801 [By speaking thus], these gods destroy the law of causation (pratītyasamutpāda). On the other hand, the truthful speech (satyavāda) of the Buddhas does not destroy the law of causation; this is why the stūra speaks of the miraculous power of a particular Buddha.

*** *** ***

Sūtra: Then the bodhisattva Samantarāṣṭra said to the Buddha Ratnākara: Bhagavat, I will go [to the Saṅgha universe] to see the Buddha Śākyamuni, greet him and offer my services; I will also see the bodhisattva-Mahāsattva who will also accede to the state of buddhahood (bhūṣyasthena kumārabhūtaḥ), who have attained the dhāranī and the samādhi and acquired mastery over all the samādhis (Athā bhuva Samantarāṣṭram bodhisattva Ratnakaram tathāgatam etat avocat gamisyaṃ āham bhugavam tān Saṅhā lokadhātun tam ca śākyamunīn tathāgatam dharmadānaḥ paripūrabhādānāḥ saṃsadhiḥpukriṣṭalabdhiḥ sarvasaṃmādhiḥvaiḍūramāthān gatān)

Śāstry. - Question. - The Buddhas are all equal (ṣama) in regard to morality (śīla), samādhi, wisdom (prajñā) and skilful means. Why then does the bodhisattva Samantarāṣṭra want to go to see the Buddha Śākyamuni [when he is already at the side of the Buddha Ratnākara]?

Answer. - The bodhisattvas never tire (asamanta) of seeing the Buddhas or hearing the Dharma; they never tire of seeing the assemblies (saṃgha) of bodhisattvas. The bodhisattvas who all experience disgust (saṃvega) for the things of the world (lokhadharma) are never tired of the three things just mentioned.

801 For Brahmā and Viṣṇu whom the heretics consider to be creators of the world and of beings, see above.
Thus, leaving the pure abodes (śuddhavāsa), the vaisya Cheou (Hastaka), came to see the Buddha; he had a subtle (sūkṣma) body; he was flexible; like a straw, he could not stand upright. The Buddha said to the Bhataka: "Make a coarse body (udarikam ilmahāvham abhinimāthane) appropriate to this realm for yourself!" The vaisya followed the Buddha's advice and made for himself a body of a size appropriate for the earth. Having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, he stood to one side. The Buddha asked: "Of how many things (dharma) have you never wearied in order to have been reborn in the heaven of the āvaka?" He replied: "I took rebirth in the heaven of the Śuddhavāsa for never having tired of three things: i) I never tired of seeing the Buddhas (buddhānām aham darśanāya yātprabhāt); ii) I never wearied of hearing the Dharma (saddharmarāvavayāyātprabhāt); iii) I never tired of serving the community (sanyahypasthānayātprabhāt). When the Buddha dwells in Jambudvīpa, the four assemblies always follow him, listen to his Dharma and question him on the subject. In the same way, the Śuddhavāsa gods always follow me, listen to my sermons and question me about them." If the āvaka das do not tire of hearing the Dharma, what then could be said of the dharmakāya bodhisattvas (dharmatākāyabhodhisattva)? That is why the bodhisattva Samantāraśmi comes to see the Buddha Śakyamuni and the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who will accede to the state of Buddhahood (bhūjasatvena kumārabhāt) and who have obtained the dhrāmān and the sammādhi. In the chapter devoted to the praise of the bodhisattvas, we have said what should be understood by those who have "acquired mastery of all the sammādhis".

Question. - The Buddha is the only one to have obtained mastery (vaiśīṣa) of all the sammādhis. Why do you say here that the bodhisattvas also have obtained mastery of all the sammādhis?
Answer. - There are two kinds of sammādhi, those of the Buddha and those of the bodhisattva. The bodhisattvas in question have acquired mastery of the bodhisattvas sammādhi and not those of the Buddha.

had a subtle (sūkṣama) body; he was flexible, like a straw, he could not stand upright. The Buddha said to the vaisya Hastaka: "Make a coarse body (udarikam ilmahāvham abhinimāthane) appropriate to this realm for yourself!" The vaisya followed the Buddha's advice and made for himself a body of a size appropriate for the earth. Having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, he stood to one side. The Buddha asked: "Of how many things (dharma) have you never wearied in order to have been reborn in the heaven of the āvaka?" He replied: "I took rebirth in the heaven of the Śuddhavāsa for never having tired of three things: i) I never tired of seeing the Buddhas (buddhānām aham darśanāya yātprabhāt); ii) I never wearied of hearing the Dharma (saddharmarāvavayātprabhāt); iii) I never tired of serving the community (sanyahypasthānayātprabhāt). When the Buddha dwells in Jambudvīpa, the four assemblies always follow him, listen to his Dharma and question him on the subject. In the same way, the Śuddhavāsa gods always follow me, listen to my sermons and question me about them." If the āvaka das do not tire of hearing the Dharma, what then could be said of the dharmakāya bodhisattvas (dharmatākāyabhodhisattva)? That is why the bodhisattva Samantāraśmi comes to see the Buddha Śakyamuni and the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who will accede to the state of Buddhahood (bhūjasatvena kumārabhāt) and who have obtained the dhrāmān and the sammādhi. In the chapter devoted to the praise of the bodhisattvas, we have said what should be understood by those who have "acquired mastery of all the sammādhis".

Question. - The Buddha is the only one to have obtained mastery (vaiśīṣa) of all the sammādhis. Why do you say here that the bodhisattvas also have obtained mastery of all the sammādhis?
Answer. - There are two kinds of sammādhi, those of the Buddha and those of the bodhisattva. The bodhisattvas in question have acquired mastery of the bodhisattvas sammādhi and not those of the Buddha.

Thus, leaving the pure abodes (śuddhavāsa), the vaisya Cheou (Hastaka), came to see the Buddha; he had a subtle (sūkṣma) body; he was flexible; like a straw, he could not stand upright. The Buddha said to the Bhataka: "Make a coarse body (udarikam ilmahāvham abhinimāthane) appropriate to this realm for yourself!" The vaisya followed the Buddha's advice and made for himself a body of a size appropriate for the earth. Having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, he stood to one side. The Buddha asked: "Of how many things (dharma) have you never wearied in order to have been reborn in the heaven of the āvaka?" He replied: "I took rebirth in the heaven of the Śuddhavāsa for never having tired of three things: i) I never tired of seeing the Buddhas (buddhānām aham darśanāya yātprabhāt); ii) I never wearied of hearing the Dharma (saddharmarāvavayātprabhāt); iii) I never tired of serving the community (sanyahypasthānayātprabhāt). When the Buddha dwells in Jambudvīpa, the four assemblies always follow him, listen to his Dharma and question him on the subject. In the same way, the Śuddhavāsa gods always follow me, listen to my sermons and question me about them." If the āvaka das do not tire of hearing the Dharma, what then could be said of the dharmakāya bodhisattvas (dharmatākāyabhodhisattva)? That is why the bodhisattva Samantāraśmi comes to see the Buddha Śakyamuni and the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who will accede to the state of Buddhahood (bhūjasatvena kumārabhāt) and who have obtained the dhrāmān and the sammādhi. In the chapter devoted to the praise of the bodhisattvas, we have said what should be understood by those who have "acquired mastery of all the sammādhis".

Question. - The Buddha is the only one to have obtained mastery (vaiśīṣa) of all the sammādhis. Why do you say here that the bodhisattvas also have obtained mastery of all the sammādhis?
Answer. - There are two kinds of sammādhi, those of the Buddha and those of the bodhisattva. The bodhisattvas in question have acquired mastery of the bodhisattvas sammādhi and not those of the Buddha.

Thus, leaving the pure abodes (śuddhavāsa), the vaisya Cheou (Hastaka), came to see the Buddha; he had a subtle (sūkṣma) body; he was flexible, like a straw, he could not stand upright. The Buddha said to the vaisya Hastaka: "Make a coarse body (udarikam ilmahāvham abhinimāthane) appropriate to this realm for yourself!" The vaisya followed the Buddha's advice and made for himself a body of a size appropriate for the earth. Having bowed down to the Buddha's feet, he stood to one side. The Buddha asked: "Of how many things (dharma) have you never wearied in order to have been reborn in the heaven of the āvaka?" He replied: "I took rebirth in the heaven of the Śuddhavāsa for never having tired of three things: i) I never tired of seeing the Buddhas (buddhānām aham darśanāya yātprabhāt); ii) I never wearied of hearing the Dharma (saddharmarāvavayātprabhāt); iii) I never tired of serving the community (sanyahypasthānayātprabhāt). When the Buddha dwells in Jambudvīpa, the four assemblies always follow him, listen to his Dharma and question him on the subject. In the same way, the Śuddhavāsa gods always follow me, listen to my sermons and question me about them." If the āvaka das do not tire of hearing the Dharma, what then could be said of the dharmakāya bodhisattvas (dharmatākāyabhodhisattva)? That is why the bodhisattva Samantāraśmi comes to see the Buddha Śakyamuni and the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who will accede to the state of Buddhahood (bhūjasatvena kumārabhāt) and who have obtained the dhrāmān and the sammādhi. In the chapter devoted to the praise of the bodhisattvas, we have said what should be understood by those who have "acquired mastery of all the sammādhis".

Question. - The Buddha is the only one to have obtained mastery (vaiśīṣa) of all the sammādhis. Why do you say here that the bodhisattvas also have obtained mastery of all the sammādhis?
Answer. - There are two kinds of sammādhi, those of the Buddha and those of the bodhisattva. The bodhisattvas in question have acquired mastery of the bodhisattvas sammādhi and not those of the Buddha.
Thus, in the Tchou fo yao tsi king (Buddhasaṃgītisūtra), 803 it is said: Wen chou che li (Mañjuśrī) wanted to see the assembly of the Buddhas (buddhasaṃgīta) but did not succeed because the Buddhas were each returning to their starting point. Mañjuśrī went to the place where the Buddhas were gathered; a woman was seated beside the Buddha, deep in samādhi.104 Mañjuśrī bowed down to the Buddha's feet and asked: "Why should this woman be able to sit close to the Buddha when I cannot?" The Buddha replied: "Wake this woman, make her come out of samādhi and ask her yourself." Then Mañjuśrī snapped his fingers to rouse her but with no success. He shouted but did not succeed in rousing her; he pulled her by the hand but did not succeed in rousing her; by his bases of miraculous power (sādāṅdpāda), he made the trishrasamāhāhasralokadhātu shake but did not succeed in rousing her.

Then Mañjuśrī said to the Buddha: "Bhagavat, I cannot rouse her." Then the Buddha emitted great rays (raimit) that illuminated the universes at the nadir (adhodiglokadhātu) and at once a bodhisattva named K'i tchou kai (Apariśṭītratāraṇa) arose from the direction of the nadir and, bowing down to the feet of the Buddha, stood to one side. The Buddha said to bodhisattva K'i tchou kai: "Wake this woman up." Then the bodhisattva K'i tchou kai snapped his fingers and the woman came out of her samādhi.

Mañjuśrī asked the Buddha: "Why was I, who made the trishrasamāhāhasralokadhātu tremble, unable to rouse this woman, whereas the bodhisattva K'i tchou kai made her come out of samādhi merely by snapping his fingers once?"

The Buddha said to Mañjuśrī: "It is because of this woman that you first produced the thought (sītottāpāda) of anuttarasarasyaksambodhi, whereas it is because of the bodhisattva K'i tchou kai that this woman has for the first time produced the thought of anuttarasarasyaksambodhi. This is why you were unable to rouse her. In regard to the Buddha's samādhi, your power (anubhāvā) is incomplete (aparipātāna); you have acquired mastery (vāśita) over the bodhisattva's samādhi.

[128 c] Since you have rarely entered the Buddha samādhis, you do not have mastery over them."

*** *** ***

Śūtra: The Buddha said to Samantarasim: "Go then; know that the right moment has come." Then the Buddha Rāmatkara gave the bodhisattva Samantarasim golden lotuses with a thousand petals and said to him: "O son of noble family, scatter these lotuses over the Buddha Śākyamuni. The bodhisattva- mahāsaṅgata born in the Sahī universe are difficult to vanquish and difficult to attain; be careful when wandering about in this universe (Bhagavān āha: gaccha tvam kalapatṛa yasyed vitā kālan mañyase. aha khalu Rāmatkaras tagihātaya nava-rūvabhākāhana pratvṛtā pradhānā Samantarasiṃaye bodhisattvāya pruddī. etais tvam kalapatṛa padmaṃ taṃ Śākyamuninī tathagatam abhyavacāre. durjāya durataida ca te bodhisattvāya te tatha Śāhyām lokadhātava upaṇadh. samprajñānakāre ca tvam bhāyās taṃ niṣṭhān lokadhātavu carat)"

Śūtra: Question. - Why does the Buddha say: "Go now; know that the right moment has come"?

1) Because the Buddha has broken all fondness (anumaya) for his disciples and because his heart is free of attachment (saīrga) for his disciples.

2) Furthermore, the bodhisattva [Samantarasiṃ] who has not yet acquired omniscience (sarvaajñha) or the Buddha eye (buddhachakrā) feels some doubts about the qualities (gua), the worth and the power of the Buddha Śākyamuni. This is why the Buddha Rāmatkara says to him: "Go and see him."

3) Furthermore, the bodhisattva [Samantarasiṃ] perceives from afar that the Buddha Śākyamuni has a small body and he feels some pride (māna) in saying that his Buddha [Rāmatkara] is not as small as that. This is why the Buddha [Rāmatkara] tells him: "Go and see him without thinking about [the size] of his body or paying attention [to the ugliness] of the Sahī universe. Be satisfied with listening to the Buddha's sermon."

4) Furthermore, the [Rāmatvati] universe where the Buddha Rāmatkara and the bodhisattva Samantarasim live is very far away from the Sahī [home of Śākyamuni] for it is located at the eastern borders. The bodhisattva Samantarasim heard the Buddha Śākyamuni preaching a Dharma exactly the same as that of Rāmatkara and he had to confess that, although the universes were so far apart, the Dharma is the same. This will increase his faith (pradaśā) and his convictions will be confirmed.

5) Furthermore, because [of the actions] of his former lives (pātavajjān), the bodhisattva Samantarasim is forced to go to hear the Dharma [in the Sahī universe] despite his distant birthplace. He is like a bird (pakṣīn) tied by its feet: no matter how far it flies, the cord (rajja) restrains it and it must return.

6) Finally, the bodhisattvas of the Sahī universe, seeing Samantarasim coming so far to hear the Dharma, will think: If he has come from so far away, how could we not listen to the Dharma, we who are born in this universe?

For all these reasons the Buddha [Rāmatkara] says: "Go then, know that the right time has come."

Question. - The Buddhac have the same power (samudalba) and do not seek to [gain] merit (puniyakāma). If they do not seek [to gain merit], why then does [Rāmatkara] send lotuses [to Śākyamuni]?

Answer. - 1) It is to conform to the worldly custom (lokadhārmanuvartana). Thus, two kings mutually exchange gifts even though they are of equal power.

2) Moreover, he sends these lotuses instead of a letter (pattra) to express his friendship. According to worldly custom (lokadhāra), when a messenger (dītu) comes from afar, he should have a letter. The Buddha, who conforms to worldly custom, sends a letter. 3) Finally, it is in order to honor the Dharma that the Buddhac make offerings to the Dharma for the Dharma is their teacher (ācārya). Why is that? The Buddhac of the three times have as their teacher the true nature of dharmas.
Question. - Why do they honor the Dharma of other Buddhas instead of honoring the Dharma which they themselves embody?

Answer. - It is in order to conform to the usage of the world (lokadharmānuvartana). Just as the [129 a] bhikṣus, in order to honor the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmanartha), do not honor the Dharma which they embody in themselves, but honor others. Guardians of the Dharma (dharmanadhara), Knower of the Dharma (dharmanirājita) and interpreters of the Dharma (dharmanirāma), so the Buddhās, although they have the Dharma in themselves, only honor the Dharma of other Buddhās.

Question. - But the Buddha no longer seeks to [gain] merit (puṇya); why does he honor the Dharma (dharma) instead of giving it to others? Answer. - The Buddha, who has cultivated the qualities for innumerable incalculable periods (asamskṛťyaṣaṅkalpa), continues to practice the good always. It is not in view of any reward (vipāka), but out of respect for the [buddha] qualities that he venerates (pījāya) the Buddhās.

Thus, in the time of the Buddha, there was a blind (andha) bhikṣu whose eyes no longer could see.805 One day he was mending his robes and he could not thread his needle (ṣīla). He said: "May anyone who wants to gain merit (puṇya) thread my needle for me." The Buddha came and said to him: "I am a man who wants to gain merit; I am here to thread your needle." Recognizing the voice of the Buddha, the bhikṣu got up immediately, put away his robes and prostrated at the Buddha's feet, saying: "The Buddha fulfills all the qualities (paripūrṇa-puṇya); why does he say that he wants to gain merit?" The Buddha answered: "Even though my merits are complete, I recognize the deep cause (read yin = hetu) of the Buddhas. That is why I love them." Having praised the qualities, the Buddha then preached the Dharma according to his wishes. The bhikṣu obtained the purity of the Dharma-eye (dharmacaksurciuddhi) and his fleshy eyes (māṇusacakusas) recovered their sight.

Finally, the qualities are perfected in the Buddha; he has no further need of anything; but in order to convert disciples, he says to them: "If I have realized these qualities, why should you not be able to acquire them?" There was an old man of about a hundred years of age dancing in a variety theater. He was asked why he continued to dance at his age. The old man replied: "I have no need myself to dance; if I do it, it is only to teach dancing to my pupils." In the same way, in the Buddha, the qualities are perfected; it is in order to teach his disciples that he continues to practice these qualities and thus to venerate them.

Question. - If that is so, why does the Buddha [Ratnākara] not go in person to offer his lotuses on the Buddha Śākyamuni, but rather he sends someone in his place to venerate him?

Answer. - So that the bodhisattvas of the [Sahā] universe may receive Samanātrasāṁ. Moreover, the messengers (śīla) sent by the Buddhās have no fear of water, fire, soldiers, poison or the hundred thousand other dangers.

Question. - Why not use precious jewels (ratna), profound sūtras (gaṇabhārāśśātra), or Buddha or bodhisattva jewels as letter (pattra)? [Note by Kumārajiva: These jewels, invisible to the gods, produce all kinds of precious objects; thus the cūḍāmaṇi is called 'Buddha Jewel'.] Why is Ratnākara content to use lotuses, objects of little value, as a letter?

Answer. - 1) The Buddha Śākyamuni has no need of anything. He has no need of 'Buddha jewels' or divine jewels, or still less, human jewels. Since he has no need of them, [Ratnākara] does not send them. Since the Buddha Śākyamuni already has them, they are not sent to him. And it is the same for the profound sūtras (gaṇabhārāśśātra).

129b 2) Furthermore, these sūtras would have nothing profound for the Buddha [Śākyamuni]. The epithet 'profound' [applied to sūtras] concerns only ordinary people (bājaṇa). That which makes ordinary people hesitant is no obstacle for the Buddha; that which is difficult for ordinary people is easy for the Buddha.

3) Finally, by their perfume and their freshness, lotuses are very suitable as offerings (pījāya). It is as with human gifts where variety is desirable.

Question. - Why should lotuses be used and not other things?

Answer. - Worship (pījāya) uses flowers (puyya), perfumes (gandha) and banners (dhvaja) exclusively: flowers for a twofold reason, because of their color (varṇa) and their smell (gandha).

Question. - But other flowers also have color and smell; why does [Ratnākara] use only lotuses (padma) as offerings?

Answer. - In the Houa cheou king (Kuśalāmālasaṃprajñāhāśśātra)806 it is said: "The Buddhas of the ten directions offer flowers to the Buddha Śākyamuni."

Moreover, there are three kinds of lotuses (padma), human lotuses, divine lotuses and bodhisattva lotuses. The human lotus is a big lotus with ten petals (pattra), the divine lotus has a hundred and the bodhisattva lotus has a thousand. In [Ratnākara's] universe, there are many golden lotuses with a thousand petals (saṃstabilasatta nāhasaṃpratā radhāpadma). In [Śākyamuni's] Sahā universe, there are indeed thousand-petalled lotuses, but they are artificial (nirmita) and do not grow in the water. This is why [Ratnākara] sends him thousand-petalled lotuses golden in color.

Question. - Why does the Buddha [Ratnākara] ask Samanātrasāṁ to scatter (abhavyavake) these flowers on the Buddha?

Answer. - Just as the bodhisattvas of the [Sahā] universe may receive Samanātrasāṁ. Moreover, the messengers (śīla) sent by the Buddhas have no fear of water, fire, soldiers, poison or the hundred thousand other dangers.

Answer. - Why not use precious jewels (ratna), profound sūtras (gaṇabhārāśśātra), or Buddha or bodhisattva jewels as letter (pattra)? [Note by Kumārajiva: These jewels, invisible to the gods, produce all kinds of precious objects; thus the cūḍāmaṇi is called 'Buddha Jewel'.] Why is Ratnākara content to use lotuses, objects of little value, as a letter?

Answer. - 1) The Buddha Śākyamuni has no need of anything. He has no need of 'Buddha jewels' or divine jewels, or still less, human jewels. Since he has no need of them, [Ratnākara] does not send them. Since the Buddha Śākyamuni already has them, they are not sent to him. And it is the same for the profound sūtras (gaṇabhārāśśātra).

129b 2) Furthermore, these sūtras would have nothing profound for the Buddha [Śākyamuni]. The epithet 'profound' [applied to sūtras] concerns only ordinary people (bājaṇa). That which makes ordinary people hesitant is no obstacle for the Buddha; that which is difficult for ordinary people is easy for the Buddha.

3) Finally, by their perfume and their freshness, lotuses are very suitable as offerings (pījāya). It is as with human gifts where variety is desirable.

Question. - Why should lotuses be used and not other things?

Answer. - Worship (pījāya) uses flowers (puyya), perfumes (gandha) and banners (dhvaja) exclusively: flowers for a twofold reason, because of their color (varṇa) and their smell (gandha).

Question. - But other flowers also have color and smell; why does [Ratnākara] use only lotuses (padma) as offerings?

Answer. - In the Houa cheou king (Kuśalāmālasaṃprajñāhāśśātra) it is said: "The Buddhas of the ten directions offer flowers to the Buddha Śākyamuni."

Moreover, there are three kinds of lotuses (padma), human lotuses, divine lotuses and bodhisattva lotuses. The human lotus is a big lotus with ten petals (pattra), the divine lotus has a hundred and the bodhisattva lotus has a thousand. In [Ratnākara's] universe, there are many golden lotuses with a thousand petals (saṃstabilasatta nāhasaṃpratā radhāpadma). In [Śākyamuni's] Sahā universe, there are indeed thousand-petalled lotuses, but they are artificial (nirmita) and do not grow in the water. This is why [Ratnākara] sends him thousand-petalled lotuses golden in color.

Question. - Why does the Buddha [Ratnākara] ask Samanātrasāṁ to scatter (abhavyavake) these flowers on the Buddha?

805 This anecdote, which the Mppi will repeat at k. 26, p. 249b, is taken from the Śīhūtaka as it is told in the Avadūtakātaka, I. p. 182-183 (r. Feer, p. 124-125):

Buddha Bhagavan Śravastīvān viharati jetavejā 'nāthāpindakāyādṛṣṭe. tena khalu samayevam ... puṇyar labhathamo 'ham bhikṣu puṇyar ato me tyāti niḥātāti.

In the Shian tsi po yuan king, T 200, no. 33, k. 4, p. 218a, where the anecdote is also told, the blind bhikṣu is called Che po'sa (44; 38 and 8), i.e., Śīva.

806 Cf. T 657, k. 1, p. 130c. This sūtra is called Kuśalāmālasaṃprajñāhāśśātra in Sanskrit. It was translated into Chinese by Kumārajiva; this version bears different titles: Houa cheou king (Paupālanābhaśśātra) as here, but also Cheou chen ken king, or Cheou chen foun king (cf. Bagchi, I, p. 187). A Tibetan translation also exists, entitled Dge bals ba yin ba bcos su sbsa po, Mdo IV, 1 (cf. Csoma-Feer, p. 234, OKC, no. 769, p. 275).
was young. One day Upagupta went to her cell to ask her about the behavior of the Buddha when he was visiting. He had previously sent a pupil to the bhikṣuṇī and this pupil had announced to the bhikṣuṇī: "My great teacher Upagupta is coming to see you to ask about the behavior of the Buddha when he was visiting." Then the bhikṣuṇī filled a begging bowl (paṭra) with oil (taila) and set it under the fan at her door; she wanted to test the behavior of Upagupta and his mindfulness. When Upagupta entered, he pushed the fan at the door and a little bit of oil spilled. Upagupta sat down and asked: "You know the Buddha. Tell me: what was his manner when he was visiting." The bhikṣuṇī replied: "When I was young, I saw the Buddha entering a village (grāma) one day; the crowd shouted "There is the Buddha!" I followed the crowd outside and saw the Buddha's rays (rāmi). As I bowed before him, a gold pin (saṃvarṇapāną) that I had on my head fell to the ground into a thick bush. Immediately the Buddha illuminated it with his rays and, as all the dark corners were visible, I found my pin. As a result of that I became a nun." Upagupta questioned her further: "And, at the time of the Buddha, what were the manners (trīyāpañha) and courtesy of the bhikṣuṇī?" She replied: "At the time of the Buddha, there was a group of six impudent, shameless, wicked monks (saññāṇa bhikkhus). But, in regard to their manners, they were better than you; I have noticed that today. When they passed through my door, at least they did not spill my oil. Depraved though they were, they knew the rules of monastic courtesy. Walking, standing, sitting or lying down, they missed nothing. Although you are an arhat endowed with the six abhijñās, you do not measure up to them on this point." Hearing these words, Upagupta was very ashamed.

The bhikṣuṇīs of the Śāhi universe are difficult to reach (durākṣaṇa) and difficult to vanquish.

The Buddhas, pratyekabuddhas, arhats and all the āryas are all very mindful (saṃprajñātākāra), for Māra, Māra's army (mārajanā), the inner fetters (dālāyātimāsānājanā) and the multiformal retribution of the sins of previous lifetimes (māyāsattvavijñānakaravijñāpayāh) are like many brigands (cāvura) of whom one must be careful when they are approached. Thus, when one goes among the brigands and one is not careful, one is captured by them. This is why [Ratnākara] advises Sammytaraṇi to be very careful while going about in this universe.

Moreover, the human mind (citta) is often distracted (vikṣipta): it is like a madman or a drunkard. Resolve mindfulness (saṃprajñātākāra) is the entry way to all the qualities (guṇa). By concentrating the mind, one successively obtains dhīya, the wisdom (bhūtāprajñā), deliverance (vīryakāya) and finally the destruction of suffering (duḥkha-kāya): these are the advantages of mindfulness (ekacitā).

Thus, five hundred years after the Buddha's parinirvāṇa, there was a bhikṣu called Yeoe po [129] kiu (Upagupta); he was an arhat with the six abhijñās; at that time he was the great teacher of Jambubhpā.[807] At that time, there was a one hundred and twenty year-old bhikṣuṇī who had seen the Buddha when she 807 See the avadāna of Upagupta in the Tsa a han, T 99 (no. 640), k. 25, p. 177b; Divyāvadāna, p. 348 seq. (tr. Burnouf, Introduction, p. 336 seq.). A yu wang tchouan, T 2042, k. 3, p. 111b (tr. Przybiski). Aisoa, p. 308; A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 6, p. 149b. – The Buddha foretold to Ānanda the birth of Upagupta five hundred years after the parinirvāṇa: Ayān Ānanda Mathurāṃtipi nama vairajatipanirvityatayya ... arhatvarṇi sāvattivirunyati. The Mppī has Upagupta as a patriarch (ecaryā), calling him the great teacher of Jambubhpā. However, Upagupta appears in the list of the patriarchs only in the Sarvāstivādin sources (Aisokāvadāna, Mūlasārīvatīrīyadīn Vinaya, Fou fu ciong yin jiu k’ung) where he is in fourth place, after Mahākāyana, Ānanda and Śāriputra-Mahāyāntika (cf. Przybiski, Āisoa, p. 46-48). The Mahāsiddhāvikā Vinaya and the Ceylonese chronicles do not include him in the succession of teachers. We may note once again that the Mppī is inspired by the Sarvāstivāda and northern sources.

---

Upagupta was from the north, his monastery was at Mathurā (cf. Watters, Travel, I, p. 306-309; Tārāśāstra, p. 17) where his relics were preserved. It was noted a long time ago that Upagupta’s role with regard to Āisoa in the Sanskrit sources is the same as that of Tissa Moggaliśutta in the Pāli and Ceylonese sources. See Lav., Hitavāratnī, II, p. 137.

---

808 The A yu wang tchouan, T 2043, k. 5, p. 121b (tr. Przybiski, Āisoa, p. 371-372) and the A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 9, p. 163a, have an arhat-bhikṣuṇī who constantly bores Upagupta's disciples with her reprimands and who reproaches them for their wrong behavior. This is probably the bhikṣuṇī in question here. Nevertheless, I [Lamotte] have not found the source from which the Mppī has taken this story, surely taken from life.
[130 a] | 2) Furthermore, people born in the blissful abodes (sukhasthānāya) often lack exertion (vīrya), intelligence (mādhyā) and wisdom (prajñā). This is why people of Ya yan to vei (Uttarakuru) are so happy that among them there are no monks (pravrajita) or followers of the precepts (śīlamādāna). It is the same among the gods.

In the Śaṅkha universe, the causes for happiness (sukhavasunyayā) are rare; there are the three unfortunate destinies (durgati), old age, sickness, death (jāravyādhihitamaraṇa), and the exploitation of the soil is arduous. This is why [its inhabitants] easily feel disgust (nirveda) for this universe; at the sight of old age, sickness and death, their minds are filled with distaste; at the sight of poor people (dārśaṇa), they know that their poverty is a result due to previous existences (pūrvavajanna) and their minds feel great distaste. Their wisdom (prajñā) and their keen faculties (tikṣṇaṃdriṣṭa) come from this [disgust].

By contrast, the [Ratnāvati] universe is made out of seven jewels (saptarūpa) and full of all kinds of precious trees (rūpaṃvrikṣa); the bodhisattvas have whatever food (dāhāra) they desire at will. Under these conditions, it is hard for them to feel disgust (nirvedaśca); this is why their wisdom is not very sharp (tikṣṇaḥ). If a sharp knife (tikṣṇaśtrotra) is left in good food, the knife becomes rusty because although these foods are good, they are not suitable for the knife; but if the knife is rubbed with a stone and scoured with grease and ashes, the rust disappears. It is the same for the bodhisattvas. Those born in a mixed (miśra) universe [like the Śaṅkha universe] have sharp knowledge and are hard to approach (durbhāṣaḍa); on the other hand, for those who spare their efforts (āśeṣaṇa), suffering has too much power and too much effect. To feed a horse and not to ride it is to make it useless.

3) Finally, in the Śaṅkha universe, the bodhisattvas abound in skillful means (upāya); this is why they are difficult to approach. This is not the case in other universes. Thus the Buddha said: “I remember that in the course of my previous existences (pūrvavajanna) I offered a thousand human existences in order to save beings, but although I was endowed with qualities (guṇa), the six perfections (ṣaṭparamitā) and all the Buddha attributes (buddhajīva), I was unable to do the work of a Buddha. Indeed, it was only by skillful means (upāya) that beings are saved.” This is why the bodhisattvas in the Śaṅkha universe are difficult to approach (durbhāṣaḍa).

*** *** ***

Śūtra: Then, taking these thousand-petalled golden lotuses from the hands of Ratnākara, the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi went away with innumerable monastic (pravrajita) and householder (gṛhaṭha) bodhisattvas and with youths and maidens (ātha khalu Samanataraśiṃhi bodhisattvo Ratnākarasya tathāgataśca sakādā tān saharapratinātī sarvavrutvabhāsānām padmānī gṛhān, asaṃkhyeyair bodhisattvān pravrajitaṃ gṛhaṭhaśca ca dārakāḥ dārakāḥ bibhāḥ ca dārakāḥ prakārāṇāḥ).

Śāstra. - Question. - The bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi is able to travel by virtue of his great power (mahābala) and his ahiṃsā; but how can the monastic (pravrajita) and householder (gṛhaṭha) bodhisattvas, as well as the youths (dārakā) and maidens (dārakā), travel about? The Ratnāvati universe [which they had to traverse in order to get to the Śaṅkha universe] is large. [What power have they borrowed for that purpose?] Is it their own power? Or is it the power of the Buddha Ratnākara, or that of the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi, or that of the Buddha Śākyamuni?

Answer. - They use all of these four powers at the same time:

a. These monastics and householders can be non-regressing (asamvaśrīk) bodhisattvas endowed with the five superknowledges (pāṭhābhikṣaṃsattāvāya). By means of the four bases of miraculous power (āśeṣaṇaśca), they have cultivated the causes and conditions (hetupravṛtya) that must be fulfilled during earlier existences (pūrvavajanna) in order to be able now to go to the Buddha Śākyamuni. Therefore they use their own power (svarāha).

b. They also use the power of the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi. Why? Those whose power is too weak travel by means of the power of the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi. Thus, when a cakravartin king wants to fly, his army (caturāśrama), his officers (rājaśalādhyākara) and his stables accompany him in the sky; because his qualities (guṇa) are great, the cakravartin king can make his whole suite fly along with him. It is the same here: those whose power is too weak travel by way of the power of the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi.

c. They also use the power of the Buddha Ratnākara.

d. Finally, the rays of the Buddha Śākyamuni illumine them. If they had no other power, the rays of the Buddha Śākyamuni would be enough for them to be able to travel. What more can be said if they use the other three sources?

Question. - Why does the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi not come alone, instead of at the head of a numerous troupe?

Answer. - Because he needs a suite like a king who is traveling. Besides, the bodhisattva Samantaraśiṃhi and the Buddha Śākyamuni choose among people. How is that? In the great assembly there are two groups: those who fulfill the causes and conditions [permitting them leave], go; those who do not fulfill the causes and conditions, stay.

Question. - Why is this bodhisattva accompanied by householder (gṛhaṭha) and monastic (pravrajita) bodhisattvas, youths (dārakā) and maidens (dārakā)?

Answer. - The Buddha’s disciples (buddhaśravaka) are of seven categories: bhikṣu, bhikṣuṇī, śāṇku, śīlāṇeṣṭa, śrāmaṇera, śrāmaṇerī, upāsaka and upāsikā. The upāsakas and upāsikās are the lay people (gṛhaṭha); the five other categories are monastics (pravrajita). Among the monastics and the lay people there are two kinds, the old and the young. The young are the youths (dārakā) and maidens (dārakā), the others are the old.

Question. - [Only] the old ones should go. Why do the young ones go also?

Answer. - It is a matter of worthiness (guṇa) and not of age (dīya). The person who lacks qualities (guṇa) and practices evil (asakalaśadharma) is small despite their great age; the person who has the qualities and practices the good (sakalaladharma) is great despite their youth.
Furthermore, these young ones come from far away and those who see them admire the fact that, despite their youth, they are able to come from so far away to hear the Dharma.

This also proves that both young and old are capable of acquiring (pratipada-) the Buddhadharma, which is different from the heretical sects (tirthikadharma) where the brahmins alone are able to follow the rules and those who are not brahmans cannot. In the Buddhadharma, there is no old or young, no insiders (adhyāmite) and no outsiders (bījya); everybody can practice the Dharma. In the same way, when medicine (bhājaīya) is given, it is the cure to be attained that rules everything; whether the sick person is noble or commoner, old or young, is of no importance.

*** *** ***

Sūtra: [Before leaving], they express their homage (pūja), their respects (satkāra), their esteem (gurukāra) and their veneration (māna) to the Buddhas of the east.

Śāstra: Question. - They pay all their homage to the Buddhas of the east. But these Buddhas are very numerous; when will they be finished and when will they be able to start off for the Sakāh universe?

Answer. - These bodhisattvas do not pay homage in the manner of gods or men; they carry out the rituals (pājñādharma) current among bodhisattvas. Here is what it consists of: They enter among sāmādhi and they draw forth innumerable bodies from their own upright body (yādākṣaya pratidhāva); they create all kinds of objects of worship (pājñādhyāvaya) and fill the Buddha [130] e universes with them. They are like the nīga king who, at the moment of acting, raises his body from the water and causes rain to fall over an entire continent (dhvapaka).

Question. - These bodhisattvas wish to go to the Buddha Śākyamuni. Why do they pay homage to all the Buddhas on their way?

Answer. - The Buddhas are a supreme field of merit (paramapuṇyakṣetra); those who pay homage to them receive a great reward (vipāka). It is like the man who cultivates his field well and reaps a big harvest of grain. The bodhisattvas see the Buddhas and the worship (pājñā) which they pay to these Buddhas brings them the reward of the Buddhas. This is why they pay homage to them.

Furthermore the bodhisattvas always feel a respect (satkāra) towards the Buddhas comparable to that of a son for his parents; they have received instructions (delana dharma) from them and they have received sāmādhis, dārāṇī and miraculous powers (yuddhihalā) of all kinds from them. Out of gratitude, they pay homage to them. Thus, in the Fa hua king (Saddharmapuṇḍarīka),809 the bodhisattva Yo wang (Bhaiṣajyajīta) who had acquired the sāmādhi called 'Faculty of making all forms appear', had this thought: "How am I going to worship the Buddha and the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka?" At once, he entered into sāmādhi, rose up into the sky, and by the power of sāmādhi, caused a rain of lotuses made of seven jewels (saptaratnapuṇḍarīka), perfumes (gandha), banners (patikā) and bouquets (ālava) to pay homage to the Buddha. When he came out of sāmādhi, he felt that it was not enough, so for twelve hundred years he fed on [flammable] perfumes and drank perfumed oil (gandhatala); then he clothed himself in divine white garments and burned his own body (svam kāya prajñāvādayāna). He made the following vow (pranidhāna): "May the rays of my body illumine Buddha universes (budhalokadhatu) as numerous as the sands of eighty Ganges (aititganāmadivalakṣaṇa)." In these Buddha universes as numerous as the sands of eighty Ganges, all the Buddhas congratulated him (sādākramadadat sma): "Good, good, O son of noble family: the offering of the body (ātmabhavaparītyāga) is the foremost offering. Abandoning royalty (rajayaparītyāga), abandoning a wife and children (bhārātavyaparītyāga), does not equal a thousandth part of it." For twelve hundred years the body [of the bodhisattva] burned without, however, becoming consumed (tasyātmabhāvaya dīypato dvādaśavaraśaśāntāya attānāy abhāvan na ca praiṣamam gacchati sma).

Finally, the worship of the Buddhas (budhapūjā) assures glory (yati), merit (puṇya) and immense benefits (ārtha); all the bad dharmas (aksadaladharma) disappear (nirudyante) and all the roots of good (kaśāla) show progress (vedhikām āpadyante); in the present (tīha) lifetime as in future (paratva) lifetimes, one is always rewarded for this worship; long afterwards, one comes to be able to do the Buddha's work. Thus, the worship of the Buddha assures all kinds of immense benefits. This is why the bodhisattvas pay homage to the Buddhas.

ACT X

Sūtra: With flowers (puṇya), incense (dhāpa), garlands (māla), powders (cārna), perfumes, aromatics and unguents (vīlepāna), with robes (cīvra), flags (dhvaja) and banners (patikā), he went to the Buddha and, having approached him, bowed his head to the Buddha's feet (bhāgavatah pādua ītarsadbhivanda) and stood to one side (ekānte 'tsthath).

Śāstra: Question. - It should be said that "he saluted the Buddha"; why is it said that he 'bowed his head to the Buddha's feet'?" Answer. - 1) The head (īsāra) is the noblest part of the human body, for it is the seat of the five feelings (rājas) and is on top (ārddham); the feet (gāda) are the lowest part, for they tread an impure soil and are below (adhad). This is why, by saluting the lowest part to the noblest part, the homage is doubled. [131 a] 2) Moreover, there are three salutes, lower (avara), medium (madhya) and higher (agra). The lower salute consists of joining the hands (ūtri jātīpa); the medium salute, of kneeling (jñanupāda); and the higher salute, of prostrating (īsāra puṇnapanam). Saluting [someone's] feet with one's head is the highest 809 The bodhisattva Sarvaśrutipriyadarśana, who would later become the Buddha Bhaiṣajyajīta, had heard the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka from the mouth of the Buddha Candrasena-vimalaprabhāśrī and acquired, thanks to this teaching, the sarvarūpasarvanaraprasamādhi "faculty of making all forms appear". Out of gratitude, he cremated his own body to pay homage to the Tatḥāgata and the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka. The legend is told in the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, chap. XXII, p. 415-418; here is the original text:

homage (pāṭī) there is. This is why, in the Vinaya, the newer bhikṣus (nava-bhikṣus) take the feet of their superior in their two hands and bow their head to them (iva-sābhivandani).

Question. - There are four bodily positions (kāyavṛtiṇaḥ); sitting (āsana), standing (sthāna), walking (gaunan) and lying down (ādaya). Why does the bodhisattva stand (cīraṭhi) to one side (ekānte)?

Answer. - Since he has arrived [near the Buddha], he does not have to walk; since he wants [to pay] his respect (sakkāra) and his homage (pāṭī), he cannot lie down before him. That is very clear; have you finished questioning me? The sitting position is not very respectful, whereas the fact of standing up is a mark of respect (sakkāra) and homage (pāṭī).

Moreover, in the Buddha-dharma, mendicant heretics (dīthikaparivājaka) and all lay people (avuddāsavana) sit when they come to the Buddha. The heretics, belonging to a foreign (paradaṁharma) sect, sit out of suspicion (avamāṇa) of the Buddha; the lay people sit in their quality of hosts (dāntu). But the five assemblies, attached to the Buddha by body and spirit, remain standing near him. The arhats in possession of the Path (mārgapṛṣṭa), such as Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Subhūti, etc., have done what needed to be done (krākṛtya); this is why they are permitted to sit down [before the Buddha]. The others, although they have obtained the threefold Path, are not permitted to sit down because their great work has not yet been completed and their fetters (handhāna) have not yet been cut. [The arhats] are like the king’s ministers (saḍāndita) who, because of their great qualities, have the right to a seat. Even though there may be lay people (avuddāsavana) amongst these bodhisattvas, they remain standing before the Buddha because they have come from far away to pay homage to him.

*** *** ***

Śāra. [Samantarāsim] said to the Buddha [Śākyamuni]: “The tathāgata Ratnakara asks you if you have but little anguish (alpāndhat) and but little suffering (alpāntaṅkātaṃ), if you are healthy (yatud) and alert (laṅghaḥnāṭaḥ), if you are strong (hala) and if you are enjoying your ease (su-khavāhṛata);810 he offers to the bhagavat these golden thousand-petalled lotuses” [Samantarāsim bodhiṣṭaṁ bhagavanto Śākyamunin etad avacat: Ratnakaro bhagavān bhagavanto alpāndhatāṃ alpāntaṅkātaṁ yātrāḥ laṅghaḥnātāḥ bhāmā su-khavāhṛataṃ ca āpi prapitchchati imāni ca bhagavātā Śākyamunā tathāgataṃ suvarnaṁbhādānāṃ sahasraṅgagrataṁ paṁdaṁ prastūtiṁ bhagavatā].

Śāra. Question. - The Buddha Ratnakara is omniscient (sarvajñā); why does he ask if the Buddha Śākyamuni has but little anguish and but little suffering, if he is healthy and alert, strong and in a joyful state?

Answer. - 1) It is customary for the Buddhas to ask about what they already know. It is told in the Vinaya811 that the bhikṣu Ta eu (corr. ni) kia (Dhanika) had built a hut of red brick (lokeṣaṭhakālaḥ). The Buddha, who had seen it and knew about it, nevertheless asked Ānanda: "Who did that?" Ānanda replied: "It is the son of the potter (gūṭhakabhaddanaka), the monk (prāvacita) called Dhanika. He had made a hut of leaves which was destroyed over and over again by the cowherders (gopallaka); he built it three times, three times it was destroyed. That is why he made this brick house." The Buddha said to Ānanda: "Destroy this brick house. Why? Because if the heretics [see it], they would say: When the Buddha, the great teacher, lived here, the Dharma came from a dirty place."812 Similarly, in many other places, the Buddha asks about what he already knows.

2) Moreover, although the Buddha is omniscient, he conforms to worldly customs (lokadharmāṇuṣṭhāna). Like men, the Buddha asks questions. Born among men, the Buddha takes on the conditions of human life: like them, he suffers cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa), birth (jaṭi) and death (maṁṣa); like them, he has the habit of asking questions.

3) Moreover, in the world, it is not suitable for nobles to have dealings with the peasantry, but [131 b] the Buddhas, who are of equal power (sāmabula), can question one another.

4) Finally, the Ratnāvati universe is a pure fairy-land (viśuddhavāyuḥ); the Buddha [Ratnakara] who governs it has a big body (kāya), his color (varṇa), his aspect (samsthāna) and his rays (raśmī) are large. If he did not ask Śākyamuni, people would think that he scorned him. Besides, Ratnakara wants to show that although he surpasses Śākyamuni in various points, in his Buddha universe, the color of his body and his rays, yet he is absolutely identical with him in regard to wisdom (prajñā) and miraculous power (rddhiḥala). That is why he questions him.

Question. - Why does he ask him if he has but little anguish (alpāndhat) and but little suffering (alpāntaṅkāta)?

Answer. - There are two kinds of torments (alpāngahaṇa), those having an external cause (ākhyātanapratyaya) and those having an internal cause (ākhyātanapratyaya). The external torments are cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa), hunger (kaṇḍuḥ), thirst (pīṭā), armies (caturāṅgabala), weapons (avarnadana); all these external accidents of this kind are called torments (ākhyātaḥ). The inner torments are the 404 illnesses (vyūthāḥ) that come from improper food or irregular sleep; all the sicknesses of this kind are called inner sicknesses. Corporeal beings (dehin) may suffer only from these two kinds of illnesses. This is why [Ratnakara] asks Śākyamuni if he has but little torments and suffering.

---

810 Traditional form of greeting which is also found in the Pāli texts (e.g., Dīgha, I, p. 204; II, p.72; III, p. 166; Majjhima, I, p. 437, 473; Anguttara, III, p. 65, 103; Milinda, p. 14) as well as in the Sanskrit (e.g., Mahāvastu, I, p. 154; Aśvinīstakā, I, p. 168, 325-326; II, p. 90, 93; Saddharma-pundarīka, p. 429; Divyavadāna, p. 156; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 6284-6288). In Pāli: appābhadāna appatānkanalābhaḥ pāvhaśīvāraṃ pucchita.

811 The story of Dhanika (in Pāli Dhānīya) is told in all the Vinayas in respect to the second pāṭīkadharmi: Pāli Vinaya, III, p. 40-41 (tr. Horner, I, p. 64-67); Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 1, p. 9b; Mo ho song k5 liu, T 1425, k. 2, p. 238a; Sien fen liu, T 1428, k. 1, p. 572b; Che song liu, T 2635, k. 1, p. 3b; Ken pen chou, p′n1 nai yu, T 1442, k. 2, p. 633c. As always, it is the Che song liu or the Sarvatvādi Vinaya that the Mppdf follows here.

812 The Buddha forbade the construction of brick huts because the baking of the bricks, which involved the death of small insects, made the hut impure. What Buddha reproaches Dhanika for is cruelty: cf. Pāli Vinaya, III, p. 41: na hi nīma tassā moghapurisassā pāṇeṣu anudāyadā naśkaṁ praveśaḥ bhavissati.
Question. - Why does he not ask him if he has no torment and suffering instead of asking if he has but little torment and little suffering?

Answer. - The wise (ārya) know very well that the body (kāya) is a source of suffering (duḥkhamālā) and that it is never without sickness.813 Why? Because the body is an assemblage (sanghāta) of the four great elements (caṇṇamahābhūtā) and the earth (gṛthviḥ), water (āpasa), fire (tājas) and wind (vīyasa) that compose it are naturally in dis harmony and struggle with one another. Thus an ulcer (gūdha, vīpākha) is never without pain, but it can be improved, not cured, by a medicinal unguent. It is the same for the human body: always sick, it requires constant care; with care, it can live; deprived of care, it dies. This is why [Rāmahāra] cannot ask [Śākyamuni] if he has no suffering because [he knows that Śākyamuni] is a victim [as everyone is] of these eternal outer torments (bhūyaḥdāhā) which are wind (ānīla), rain (varṣa), cold (śīla), heat (sauna). Moreover, there are the four bodily positions (kṣīryalapaka), sitting (ātsana), lying down (jayasana), walking (gamana) and standing (sthāna), [which Śākyamuni] is obliged to take up like everyone else. To stay sitting for a long time is a great torment; prolonging the other three positions is also painful. This is why Rāmahāra asks him if he has but little torment and suffering.

Question. - It would be enough to ask if he has but little torment and suffering; why does he also ask if he is healthy (yatrā) and alert (jayāhānādā)?

Answer. - Although he is convalescing, the sick person has not yet recovered his health; this is why he asks if he is healthy and alert.

Question. - Why ask him if he is strong (hala) and enjoying his ease (sukhavihārādā)?

Answer. - There are convalescents who can walk, sit and rise, but whose strength is not sufficient to allow them to fulfill their occupations, to work, to carry light (laghu) objects and to lift heavy ( guru) things; this is why he asks if he is strong. There are people who, although convalescent and able to lift heavy things and carry light things, do not, however, enjoy their ease (sukhavihārādā); this is why he asks if he is enjoying his ease.

Question. - If one is well and strong, why would one not enjoy one's ease?

Answer. - There are poor people (durādā), frightened people and sad people who do not enjoy their ease; this is why he asks if he is enjoying his ease.

Moreover, there are two ways of asking: asking about the physical (kāya) and asking about the mind (citta). Asking someone if they have but little suffering or torment, if they are healthy, alert and strong, is asking about the physical; asking if they are enjoying their ease is asking [131 c] about the mind. All the inner (ādhyātyāntikā) and outer (bhūya) sicknesses are called bodily sicknesses (kṣīryayādā); desire (ridge), hatred (dveya), envy (tṛṣya), avarice (matsurya), grief (arati), fear (bhaya), etc. as well as the 98 anusayas, the 500 paryavasthitānas and all types of wishes, hopes, etc., are called sicknesses of the mind (cittayādā). In order to ask someone about each of these sufferings, we ask them if they have but little torment and little suffering, if they are healthy and alert, if they are strong and if they are enjoying their ease.

Sūtra: Having taken these golden thousand-petalled lotuses, the Buddha Śākyamuni then threw them to the Buddhas of universes of the east as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (ātitha khalu bhagavā Śākyamunīn tathāgatas tāni sakaramatānāni savarnanirbhāsāni padmāni gṛhitā yena te pārvatayānāt dīkṣi gautgēndadīvākṣaṃ pameṣu lokadhātuḥ buddhā bhagavantas tena prākṣiptat)

Sūtra: Question. - The Buddha is unsurpassable; why does he throw flowers as offering to the Buddhas of the east?

Answer. - It is in order to conform to worldly customs (lokadharmānuvartana) that [Samantabhadra] borrows the rules of human etiquette to question [Śākyamuni]. Sending someone to ask, [as Rāmahāra] does), also conforms to human etiquette.

813 See Hobogirin, Byō, p. 232: "The body, this illness."
Question: If Śākyamuni is truly the greatest of beings, why does he want to worship (pūjā) the Buddhas of the east?

Answer. - I) The Buddha is without superior (amaturasa); in the three times (traya), the ten directions (daśa.daṭṭha), in heaven and on earth, no one surpasses him; nevertheless, the Buddha can pay worship (pūjā) [to what he considers good]. Pūjā is higher (agra), medium (madhyas) and lower (avara). Lower pūjā consists of honoring someone who is beneath oneself; higher pūjā consists of honoring someone who is above oneself; medium pūjā consists of honoring someone who is one's equal. The pūjā performed by Śākyamuni with regard to the other Buddhas is medium pūjā. [But Śākyamuni has also practiced the lower pūjā in the following circumstance]:

When the bhikṣuṇī Ta ngai tao (Mahāprajāpati) and her five hundred arhat-bhikṣuṇīs entered nirvāṇa all at the same time,814 the upakāsas in possession of the threefold Paths set up five hundred beds (khāvī) for the bhikṣuṇīs and the Ātītamaḥārīḍākas set up a bed for Mahāprajāpati, Buddha's step-mother and nurse (dīkṣī). The Buddha himself placed before her body an incense-burner to burn perfumes in her honor. He said to the bhikṣuṇīs: "Help me to pay homage to the body of my nurse." Immediately, these arhat-bhikṣus, each by virtue of his bases of miraculous power (vidhīpāka), went to Mount Mo li (Malaya) to gather 'cow'-head(?) sandalwood (goṣṭi.yacanā) and other aromatics and helped the Buddha build the funeral pyre. [For the Buddha,] this was a lower pūjā; in this way, without looking for any reward, the Buddha practices the pūjās.

2) Moreover, the Buddha alone can pay [suitable] pūjā to the Buddhas, for other people do not know the qualities (guna) of the Buddhas. A stanza says:

[Only] the wise can esteem the sciences,

The books of the sciences and the joy of the sciences.

[Only] the wise know the sciences

Like the snake [alone] knows the snake's feet.

This is why the Buddhas, who are omniscient (sarvajñā), can render [suitable] pūjā to the omniscience [of the other Buddhas].

3) Finally, the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśa.daśīg.buddha) from age to age have aided (apakaroti) the Buddha Śākyamuni:

814 Mahāprajāpati Gautamī, the Buddha's aunt, hearing the Buddha sneeze, wished him a long life. The Buddha remarked that wishing harmony in the sangha would be preferable. Then Gautamī made the resolution to enter nirvāṇa before anyone could leave the sangha. Five hundred nuns entered nirvāṇa along with her. Gautamī's nirvāṇa is told in the Pāli Āgāthā, tt, p. 529-543; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 50, p. 822b-823b; Ta ngai tao pan ni yu an king, T 144, p. 867a-869b; Fo mou pan ni yu an king, T 145, p. 869b-870c; Ken pen chou., tsa che, T 1451, k. 10, p. 248a-249a (tr. S. Lévi, Alivaghos, le Sūtrālamkāra et ses sources, JA., Jul.-Aug. 1908, p. 161-163); Ta tchoang yen lou king, T 201 (no. 68), k. 14, p. 333a-338a (tr. Huber, Sūtrālamkāra, p. 386-402). - The scene is located either at Kapilavastu in the Nyagrodhārāma (T 1451) or at Vaśāla in the Kūṭāgāraśalā (T 125, T 144, T 145, and Hiuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 7, p. 908b28.

a. When Śākyamuni was a bodhisattva of the seventh būmī (saptamabhūmī),815 he saw that all dharmas are empty (śūnya), nonexistent (asat) without birth and cessation (anupānamūrdhā): seeing this, his mind became detached from all the universes (lokadūḥa), he wanted to abandon the practice of the six virtues (ṣaṭpāramīśa) and enter into nirvāṇa. He was like a man who, in a dream (svamā), builds a raft (kiśa) to cross over a big river and who feels sick because his arms are tired; in the middle of the stream, he wakes up out of his dream and says to himself: "Why do I imagine there is a river and that I must cross it?", and at once his worries have disappeared. In the same way, the Bodhisattva, having reached the seventh būmī, acquired acceptance of the teaching of nonarising (anupattikadharmaṇākṣīti), the course of his mind (cīṇaprayāṇa) stopped and he wanted to enter into nirvāṇa. When Śākyamuni was at this stage, the Buddhas of the ten directions emitted rays (rajin) that illuminated the Bodhisattva's body, and with their hands caressing his head, they said to him: "O son of good family (kalapatru), do not make that decision; remember your previous vow (pūrṇavānāhā) which was to save beings. Without any doubt, you know emptiness (śūnya), but beings are not liberated (śūnyatā). You have not yet acquired the golden-colored body (svaṇvarnamākṣītā) or the thirty-two major marks (lakṣāna) or the eighty minor marks (anyavātjanā) or the immense rays (aṭṭhāraṇa) or the thirty-two acts [producing the marks]. You have just attained the Dharma relating to non-production (anupāḍadhamaparāyāṇa). Do not rejoice too much." Then, hearing the encouragement of the Buddhas, the Bodhisattva returned to his first decision, practiced the six virtues and set himself to save beings. Such was the help (upakāra) that he received from the Buddhas when he reached Buddhahood.

b. Moreover, when the Buddha had attained enlightenment, he had this thought: "This Dharma is very profound (gambhirā); beings are stupid (mādhā) and of little merit. What can I do, I who have also been born into the world of the five poisons (kaśāya)?" Having had this thought, [he said to himself]: "Within this single Dharma, I will make three parts (bhūga), and these parts will be the three Vehicles (yūna) by means of which I will save beings."816 When he had thought thus, the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśa.daśīg.buddha) caused rays to appear and they congratulated him, saying: "Good, good! When we were in the world of the five poisons, we too divided the single Dharma into three parts to save beings." Then hearing the voices of the Buddhas of the ten directions, the Buddha felt great joy (ānanda) and cried: "Homage to the Buddhas (namo buddhānā)." This is how the Buddhas of the ten directions rendered him great services by encouraging him and helping him several times, and [now], out of gratitude for all these benefits, Śākyamuni offers flowers to the Buddhas of the ten directions.

815 The story of the Bodhisattva in the seventh būmī is told in the Mahāvāna, I, p. 127-136.

816 It is the rule that the Buddhas preach the three Vehicles if they appear when the human life-span is decreasing from one hundred to ten years, i.e., when the five poisons are very strong (cf. Kośa, III, p. 193).
directions are a supreme field of merit (paramapuṇyakṣetra), in turn offers [these same lotuses] whose value is thus doubled. Why? Because it is a Buddha who is offering them to the Buddhas. Actually, in the Buddha-dharma, there are four types of gifts (dakṣina): 1) The donor (ādiyaka) is pure and the recipient (pratigraha) impure; 2) The donor is impure and the recipient is pure; 3) Both the donor and the recipient are pure; 4) Both the donor and the recipient are impure.317 Here the gift is made to the Buddhas of the east; it is doubly pure, both [in its donor and its recipient]; its merit (punya) is very great. This is why Śākyamuni offers flowers to the Buddhas of the ten directions.

Question. - But the noble individuals [who make such meritorious gifts] will receive no reward because they will not be reborn; why do you say that the merit of this gift is very great?

Answer. - Although there is no-one to enjoy this merit, it is great in itself; if anyone enjoyed it, the reward they will not be reborn; why do you say that the merit of this gift is very great?

This is why Śākyamuni offers flowers to the Buddhas of the east.

Answer. - 1) This is due to the Buddha's abbhijñā; by virtue of the first eight, he can transform the dharmas at will, make small that which is big, make big that which is small, make heavy that is light, make light that which is heavy, freely move at will without hindrance, shake the great earth, realize wishes. The great arhats possess all these eight masteries (vaśīta); this is why the Buddha is able to fill the universes of the east that are as numerous as the sands of the Ganges with just a few flowers.

2) Moreover, he wants to show beings that the future reward of their merits (anīgatasupapuṇyāpāka) is comparable to these few lotuses that succeed in filling the universes of the east.

3) Finally, he encourages the bodhisattvas of the east by saying to them: "Plant your merits in the Buddha-field (buddhakṣetra) and the reward you will receive will be like these lotuses that fill innumerable lands. Although you come from afar, you will have joy (ānanda). The reward for encountering this great field of merit (punyakṣetra) is immense.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: These lotuses thrown [by Śākyamuni] filled the Buddha universes of the east as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (taiś ca padmair ye pārvarṣyān diśi gajghronadībārakāpanād buddhalokadhātavas te pariṇāmabhāvān).

Śūtra: Question. - How can these few lotuses fill so many universes?

Answer. - Previously, it was a question of lotuses created by the Buddha; this is why there were Buddhas seated on them. Here it is a matter of lotuses offered by the bodhisattva Samantarakṣita; this is why there are bodhisattvas seated on them. Previously, beings had to see the seated Buddhas in order to be saved; here they must see bodhisattvas in order to be saved. These bodhisattvas, seated cross-legged, are preaching the six virtues, and those who hear them are settled in supreme perfect enlightenment.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: These monastic (pravrajita) and lay (grhasta) bodhisattvas, youths (ādiraka) and maidens (ādirā), bow their heads down to the feet of the Buddha Śākyamuni. Each of them express their worship (saṃpūjā), obedience (saṅkāra), veneration (saṃmāna) and respect (gurukāra). These bodhisattvas, monastic and lay, youths and maidens, one after another, by the power of their roots of good (kalalamāla) and their merits (punya), pay homage to Śākyamuni, Buddha, [133a] arhat, samyaksambuddha.

---

317 Here the Mppi is reproducing a well-known canonical formula, without any reference, which may be found with some variations in Dīgha, III, p. 231-232; Majjhima, III, p. 256; Aṅguttara, II, p. 80; Ta τι to men king, T 12, k. 1, p. 228c27; Tcheng a han, T 26, (no. 180), k. 47, p. 722b28. - Here, acc. to Dīgha (1c.) is the Pāli formula: Catusso dakkhināv cittānāvāni. Atha āvase dakkhināmaṇyakata vinījhati ... vinījhati patigrahayakato ca. - The Majjhima and Aṅguttara explain that, in order to be pure, the donor and the recipient must be moral and of good quality (cīvāvā kalyāṇadhāma).
Śāstra: Here are the stanzas which they spoke:

The Path which the arhats have travelled
The Buddha has followed in the same way (tathā-gata).
True nature and point of arrival
Are the same for the Buddha and not otherwise.
The āryas speak the truth
The Buddha also speaks the truth.
This is why the Buddha is given
The epithet of Tathāgata: “Speaking the Truth”.

With patience as breast-plate, his mind is firm;
With exertion as bow, his strength is bent [like the bow]
With the sharp arrow of his wisdom
He slays his enemies (ari + han), pride, etc.

He has the right to the complete worship
Of gods and men;
The is why we give to the Buddha
The epithet of Arhat: “Having the Right”.
He knows full well the true nature of suffering,
He also knows the origin of suffering,
He knows the true nature of the cessation of suffering
He knows also the Path of cessation of suffering.

Completely (samyak) understanding the four truths,
He dwells in equanimity (sama) and is immovable.
This is why, in the ten directions,
He is call Samyak - sam- buddha.
He has obtained the three subtle sciences (vidyā).
He is also endowed with pure practices (caraṇa);
This is why we call this Bhavagavat

Vidyā - caraṇa - sampanna: “Endowed with the Sciences and Practices.”
Knowing all the dharmas
He has followed (gata) the marvellous Path.
At the desired time, he preaches skillfully
Because he has compassion for all.
He has destroyed old age, sickness and death,
To arrive at the place of safety (yogakṣema):
This is why we give to the Buddha
The epithet of Sugata: "Well-Gone".
He knows the origin of the world
And also knows its cessation;
This is why we give the Buddha
The epithet of Lokavid: "Knower of the World".
In regard to samādhi, śīla, prajñā and sampalyānta,
He has no equal and, still less, no superior;
This is why we give to the Buddha
The epithet of Anuttara: "Without Superior".
He saves beings with his great compassion,
He guides them with his good Dharma;
This is why we give to the Buddha
The epithet of Purusamityārathi: "Guide of Beings to be Converted".
With wisdom free from the passions (kleśa),
He preaches supreme deliverance (vimokṣa);
This is why we give to the Buddha
The epithet of Śāstā devamanusayāṇam: "Teacher of Gods and Men".

That which is mobile or immobile in the threefold world,
Perishable or imperishable,
He learned under the bodhi tree;
This is why we call him Buddha.
Sūtra: In the south (dakṣīṇasyāṃ dīśi), beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gandhānadhālukāpānām lokadhiṭṭhive aṭikramya) and at the extreme limit of these universes (tebhya yah sarvāvānśuṅkaḥ), there is the universe called Li yi tr’ë yeou (Sarvasaikāpapata); its Buddha is named Wou yeou tô (Aisokaiśri) and its bodhisattva Li yeou (Vigatāsoka). - In the west (paścimāśyāṃ dīśi), beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and at the extreme limit of these universes, there is a universe called Mie ngo (Upaïanta); its Buddha is called Pauo chan (Ratnāciras) and its bodhisattva Yi pi (Chitrīmattai). - In the north (uttarāśyāṃ dīśī), beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and at the extreme limits of these universes, there is the universe called Cheng wang (Jayendra) and its bodhisattva Tō cheng (Jayadatta). - In the region of the nadir (adhistād dīśi), beyond universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges and at the extreme limit of these universes, there is the universe called Hī (Nandāśri); its Buddha is called Hi tī (Nandāśri) and its bodhisattva Tō hi (Nandādatta).

In these universes everything occurred just as it did in the east.

Sūtra: Question. - According to the Buddhadharma, the directions (dīśī) do not really exist. Why? Because they are not included (samgrhita) in the list of the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eighteen elements (dhātu) [that embrace the totality of existent things].

Neither is there any mention of the directions in the four baskets of the Dharmapiṭaka.821 Similarly, one would search in vain for the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) that would make these directions into real things. Then why speak here about the Buddhas of the ten directions and the bodhisattvas of the ten directions?

Answer. - It is in order to be in harmony with the traditions of conventional language (lokasamvyāti) that we speak of directions; but regardless of the search, their reality cannot be demonstrated.

---

819 This universe is called Chao "Good" in the Chinese text, but Padma "Lotus" (Chin. Houa) in the original Sanskrit of the Pañcaśīnīṣṭāṇi, p. 17. This last reading is the proper one (note that the names of all the universes are feminine: this is why Padma ends with 'śi').

820 This Buddha is called Chan tō "Beauty of the Good" in the Chinese text (Chin. Houa tō), but Padmāśri "Beauty of the Lotus" (Chin. Houa tō) in the Sanskrit text of the Pañcaśīnīṣṭāṇi, p. 17. This last reading is the proper one.

821 Understand: there is no mention of these directions as truly existent things (dharma).

Question. - How can you say that they do not exist? If the directions are not in your four baskets of the Dharmapiṭaka, they are mentioned in my six baskets of the Dharmapiṭaka;822 if they are not contained in your list of skandhas, āyatana and dhātu, they are contained in my own dhāraṇīs.

Moreover, by virtue of its nature of existence, the dharmas 'direction' exists and is eternal. Thus it is said in a sūtra: "The place where the sun rises is in the eastern direction; the place where the sun sets is in the eastern direction.823 The sun has a threefold conjunction (samavṛta): prior conjunction, actual conjunction and later conjunction. It is divided according to direction. The first direction with which it enters into conjunction is the east, then the south, and finally the west. The place where the sun does not travel is not counted. The specific nature (lakṣana) of the direction is the distinction between 'there' and 'here', between 'here' and 'there'. If the directions did not exist, these distinctions would be wrong and, since these distinctions constitute the specific nature of the direction, there would be no directions.

Answer. - That is not correct. Mount Sumeru is situated at the center of the four continents; the sun makes a circuit around Sumeru and [successively] lights up the four continents (dīśāsīka). When it is noon (madhyahast) in Uttarākuru (northern continent), the sun is rising in Pārvavindha (eastern continent) because, for the inhabitants of Pārvavindha, Uttarākuru is east. - When it is noon in Pārvavindha (eastern continent), the sun is rising in Jambudvīpa (southern continent) because, for the inhabitants of Jambudvīpa, Pārvavindha is east.824 Therefore there is no initial term. Why? Because according to the course [of the sun], all directions are [successively] east, south, west and north.824 Therefore it is not true, as you said, that "the place where the sun rises is the eastern direction, the place where the sun sets is the western direction, the place where the sun travels to is the southern direction and the place where the sun does not travel to is the northern direction." Moreover, the place with which the sun does not enter into conjunction [namely, north] is not a direction because it is lacking the specific characteristic (lakṣana) of direction [namely, conjunction].

Question. - I was speaking of 'direction' in reference to one single country and you are basing your objection on four countries [namely, the four continents]. This is why the direction of the east is not without initial term.

822 We know from k. 11, p. 143c that these four dharmapiṭakas are the Sutrāptika, the Vinaya-piṭaka, the Abhidharmapiṭaka and the Mixed Basket (Tsa tsang); for this last one, see Przyłęski, Concile, p. 119-120. As for the six baskets, this is the first time [Lamotte] have heard of them.

823 These facts are taken from the Cosmology of the Dhīgha. Tél’ang a han, T 1 (no. 30), k. 22, p. 147c: "When it is noon in Jambudvīpa, the sun is setting in Pārvavindha, rising in Godānīya, and it is midnight in Uttarākuru. - When it is noon in Uttarākuru, the sun is setting in Godānīya, rising in Pārvavindha and it is midnight in Jambudvīpa. - When it is noon in Pārvavindha, the sun is setting in Uttarākuru, rising in Jambudvīpa and it is midnight in Godānīya." - See also Kośa, III, p. 157.

824 Tél’ang a han, T 1 (no. 30), k. 22, p. 147c: When Jambudvīpa is east, Pārvavindha is west. When Jambudvīpa is west, Godānīya is east. When Godānīya is west, Uttarākuru is east. Uttarākuru is east, Pārvavindha is east."
There are four more kinds of jewels: 1) gold; 2) silver; 3) lapis-lazuli; 4) crystal; 5) Tcheâ k’iu (musaragalya) car’s-eye; 6) Ma nuo (aismargabha) emerald; 7) Tcheâ tchen tchou (lohitamakati), red pearl. [Note by Kumānājīva: This pearl is very precious; it is not Chan hou (pravāda, vidruma), coral;]

There are yet other jewels: 1) Mo lo k’iu t’o (marakata), emerald [this pearl is extracted from the beak of the golden-winged garuḍa bird; it is green in color and it counteracts poisons]; 2) Yin t’o ni lo (indranfita), sapphire [pearl of celestial azure]; 3) Mo ho ni lo (mahānta) ‘great blue’ pearl; 4) Po mo lo k’iu (padmarāga), ruby [bright red pearl]; 5) Yue chō (vajra) diamond; 6) Long tchou (nāgamani), nāga pearl; 7) Jou yi tchou (cintāmaṇi), precious stone that grants all the wishes of its owner; 8) Yu, jade; 9) Pei (sāṅkha) conch; 10) Chan hou (pravāda, vidruma), coral; 11) Hou p’ei (ṭṭiṇaṇaṇi) amber, etc. All these are called jewel (ratna).

These jewels are of three types, human jewels (manuyarata), divine jewels (dīyaratna) and bodhisattva jewels (bodhisattvaratna).

Human jewels have minimum power and have merely a bright pure color; they combat poisons (kṣut, thirst (pīṇāsā), cold (ṭūta) and heat (ṣana).

Divine jewels are larger and more powerful; they always accompany the gods; one can give orders to them and communicate with them; they are light and not heavy.

Bodhisattva jewels surpass the divine jewels; they combine the benefits of human and divine jewels. They allow all beings to know the place of their death and birth, their history (nīdāna), their beginning and their end (pārārddhavatā): it is like a clear mirror (pariṣuddhāraddhā) where a person can contemplate their reflection. Moreover, the bodhisattva jewels can emit the various sounds of the Dhamma (dharmaśvara). As for the crown jewel (ratnamukata) that adorns their head, it rains down flags (āṭtiga), banners (jastika), bouquets of flowers (paspadāna) and all kinds of offerings (pāṭiparīkṣāra) onto the Buddhas of the innumerable universes of the ten directions; it is a way of paying homage to the Buddhas. It also rains down clothing (vastva), coverlets, beds (sāvana), seats (iasm) and means of livelihood ( quàva): everything it causes that answers the needs of beings to rain down and gives them to beings.

These various jewels remove the poverty (dārādya) and the suffering (udkhā) of beings.

Question. - Where do these marvellous jewels come from?

Answer. - Gold (suvēra) comes from rocks, sand and red copper. - [Red] pearls (lohitamakati) come from fish stomachs, bamboo and snakes’ heads. - Nāga pearl (nāgamani) comes from the heads of nāgas. - Coral (pravāda, vidruma) comes from petrified trees found in the sea. - Conch (sāṅkha) comes from insects. - Silver (rajata, rūpya) comes from burned rocks. - The other jewels, lapis-lazuli (vāṭariya), crystal (ṣphoṭika), etc., come from caves. - The Cintāmaṇi comes from the Buddha’s relics (buddhāsaṅgata).

---

Answer. - If, in one single land, the sun enters into conjunction with the east, that is limited (antaṃvrat); if it is limited, it is not eternal (aniyata); if it is not eternal, it is not universal (vaśīpa). This is why the directions have only nominal existence and are not realities.

Sūtra: Then this triśūramahāsthānasalokādhūtā was transformed into jewels; it was strewn with flowers, decorated with fabrics, banners and bouquets, adorned with perfume-trees and flowering arbors (Aṭṭha khalo ayaṃ triśūramahāsthānasalokādhūtā ratnamāṇuḥ samśkritāḥ bhūtā punābhiḥkṛtāḥ. avasaktapattadīnapatālo gandhārvikṣaḥ puspavṛttaḥ copalībhūtāḥ bhūtā).

Sāstra: Question. - What is the miraculous power (rādhīhāla) that transforms the earth into jewels?

Answer. - This transformation (parināma) is brought about by the immense miraculous power of the Buddha. People versed in spells (mantra) and magic (māyā), the asuras, the nāgarjñas, the devas, etc., are able to transform small objects, but no-one other [than the Buddha], including Brahmā devaṃtā, has the power to transform the triśūramahāsthānasalokādhūtā into precious jewels. When the Buddha is in the fourth dhyāna, the four minds of metamorphosis (nirmanācchita) adorn (ālanakta) the triśūramahāsthānasalokādhūtā, with its flowers, perfumes and trees, in all its superiority. All beings in perfect agreement [at this sight] turn their minds to the good.

Why does the Buddha adorn this universe? In order to preach the Prajñāpāramitā and also to honor the bodhisattvas of the ten directions who have come to visit him accompanied by gods and men. When the master of a household invites a noble individual, he adorns his home; if it is the leader of a country, he adorns his kingdom; if it is a cakravartin king, he adorns the four continents (caturdvararāga); if it is Brahmā devaṃtā, he adorns the triśūramahāsthānasalokādhūtā. The Buddha himself adorn his universe for the chiefs of the universes of the ten directions - universes as numerous as the sands of the Ganges - i.e., for the foreign bodhisattvas (devantarādiṣṭhātra) and for the gods and men who have come to visit him. The Buddha also wants people, on seeing the fairyland of the metamorphoses (parināmavāyu) that he has produced, to produce the great thought of enlightenment (mahābhodhīcchita), feel pure joy (visiddhāhamūḍā), be inspired by the thought of enlightenment to accomplish the great acts (mahākarma), obtain a great reward (mahābhikṣa) from these great acts, profit from this great reward by producing the great thought of enlightenment more and thus, successively (paramparapavṛti) they succeed in attaining supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttaravasanyaksambodhi). This is why the Buddha adorns this universe and transforms it into jewels.

Question. - What is meant by jewels (ratana)?

Answer. - There are four types of jewels: 1) Kin (suvarṇa), gold; 2) Yin (rajata, rūpya), silver; 3) [134 a] Pī liou li (vāṭariya), lapis-lazuli; 4) Pō li (ṣphoṭika), crystal.

---

825 Classic list of seven jewels, occurring in, e.g., Milinda, p. 267; Divyāvadāna, p. 297; Suddhāmapiṣuddhika, p. 151; Sukhāvatīyūha, v. 16; Samgraha, p. 318; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 5943 seq. - See Burnouf, Lotus, p. 319-321; Finot, Les lapidaires indiens, Paris, 1896.
when the Dharma will have disappeared, all the Buddha's relics will change into cintāmani. Similarly, at the end of a thousand years, water will change into crystal (upshotka) pearls.

All these jewels are the usual jewels found among mankind; but the universes adorned (alaṃkāra) by the Buddha have far more value and cannot be obtained even by the gods. Why? Because they come from the great qualities of the Buddha.

The perfumed trees (gandhavṛkuṣa) are: 1) the A k'ie lou (agaru), A gallocloche [tree with the perfume of honey]; 2) the To k'ie lou (tagaru), Tabernaemonatana coronaria [very perfumed tree]; 3) the Tchan t'an (candana), sandalwood, and other species of perfumed trees.828

The flowering trees (puşpavṛkuṣa) are: 1) the Tchan p'ou (jambhu), Eugenia jambolana [tree with white flowers]; 2) the A chou kia (nioka) Jonasia avoka [tree 'without a care']; 3) the P'o ho kia lo [tree with red flowers], and others.

*** *** ***

Śūtra: The universe Houa tsī (Padmāvatī) has been mentioned which belongs [to the Buddha] P'o houa (Samantaksusma), where the bodhisatva Miao tī (Mahājñātī), the bodhisattra Chan tchoy yi (Susthotamati) and other very powerful bodhisattvas dwell (tadyardhipī nāma Padmāvatī [134 b] lokadhīnā Sanmatukasamayasya taṁādyatya buddhakṣetram yatra Mahājñātīḥ kumārabhūtāḥ prativasavat Susthitamati ca bodhisattvāḥ anya ca mahāajākāḥ bodhisattvāḥ).

Śūtra. - Question. - Why compare the [Sahā universe thus transformed] with the Padmāvatī universe?

Answer. - Because the [Padmāvatī] universe always has pure lotuses and the [Sahā] universe, after it has been transformed, resembles it. In making comparisons (upamāna), we customarily compare the smallest with the biggest; in this way we compare the beauty of a man's face with the full moon (pārnamāsa).

Question. - But in the ten directions, there are other pure universes (parīluddhalokadhīnā) such as the Ngā lo (Sukhavatī) of the Buddha A mi t'ō (Amitābha), etc. Why take only the Padmāvatī universe as comparison?

Answer. - The universe of the Buddha Amitābha is not like the Padmāvatī universe. Why? Although the Buddha [Lokeśvaraśānti] guided the bikṣu Fa tsī (Dharmākara) in the ten directions to contemplate the pure universes, the qualities (guna) and the power (bala) of this bhikṣu were [too] weak and he was unable to see the supremely pure universes.829 This is why the universes are not alike.

Furthermore, when the Buddha [Śākyamuni] transforms the [Sahā] universe, he gives it a resemblance (sākhyeyu) to the Padmāvatī universe. This is why it is compared here to the Padmāvatī universe.

Question. - There are other great bodhisattvas such as Pī mo lo Kī (Vimalakīrti), Kieu che yin (Avulōkiteśvara), Pien kī (Samatunabhadra), etc. Why mention only the bodhisattvas who reside in the Padmāvatī universe and be limited to citing the bodhisattvas Wen chou che li (Mahājñātī) and Chan tchou yī (Susthitamati)?

Answer. - From all the pores of his skin (ekakaronamukāpa), the bodhisattva Samatunabhadra ceaselessly emits buddha-universes with Buddhas and bodhisattvas who fill the ten directions; as he transforms beings, he has no fixed residence. Dividing and transforming his body, the bodhisattva Mahājñātī penetrates into the five destinations (pakhaṣagati) and sometimes acts as a śrāvaka, sometimes as a pratyekabuddha and sometimes as a Buddha. It is said in the Cheou leng yen san mei king (Śārigaramasamādhīśūtra):830 "The bodhisattva Mahājñātī in the past was the Buddha Long chong tsoou (Nāgā...); for 72 koṭi of lifetimes, he was a pratyekabuddha"; his previous abodes [can be listed and described]. But for the bodhisattva Samatunabhadra, it is impossible to count, describe and know his [successive] abodes because, if he abides anywhere, it is in all the universes [without distinction]. This is why the śūtra does not mention him here.

Besides, by speaking of 'other very powerful bodhisattvas', the śūtra refers to Samatunabhadra and all the great bodhisattvas as a whole (śūnāmāyataḥ).

---

828 See Mppō, k. 50, p. 418a-b: "The Buddha Che tseu tai wung (Lokeśvaratūṭī) led the bhikṣu Fa tsī (Dharmākara) in the ten directions and showed him the pure universes:" This bhikṣu is none other than the future Buddha Amitābha whose births are told in the Sukhāvatīvyūha (ed. M. Müller and N. N. Jéquier in Anecdota Osseniensia, vol. I, part II, Oxford, 1883; tr. M. Müller, Buddhaḥ Mahāyāna Śūtras, SBE, vol. 49, part II and its six Chinese translations T. 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 310[5]). The Hoobqin, Anma, p. 26, summarizes this work as follows: At the time of the Buddha Lokeśvara, the 53rd Buddha after Dipāṃkara, a king had the thought of enlightenment having heard the sermons of this Buddha. He abandoned his throne and became a monk under the name of Dharmākara. Upon the prayer of this monk, the Buddha Lokeśvaratūṭī showed him the good and the evil of gods and men and the merits and demerits of the different realms of the 210 million Buddha realms which he showed him. The monk spent five kalpas reflecting in order make a choice and to acquire the pure practices with which one can adorn a Buddha realm; then he went again to the same Buddha and pronounced the 48 vows, the main one of which is the 18th, formulated by T. 360 as follows: "Supposing that I succeed in becoming Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha, if beings of the ten directions, believing in me and loving me wholeheartedly, make the wish to be a Buddha..."

829 In Sanskrit, agaru or agaru (cf. Avadānaśataka, l. p. 24; Divyāvadāna, p. 158, 315, 327); in Pāli, akala or agala (cf. Milinda, p. 338). The word also occurs in Hebrew and Greek.

830 Most likely Tagara, attested in Vinaya, l. p. 303; trivutakka, p. 68, Milinda, p. 338, Divyāvadāna, p. 158, 327.

827 These gandhavṛkuṣa furnish precious essences used as perfumes. Milinda, p. 338, tells of a man whose body is anointed with agaru, tagara, tālīsaka (Placouria cataphracta) and red sandalwood (akalutagaru, tālīsakajitaṇḍamudāraṭtagatu).
Sūtra: Then the Buddha knew that all the universes, with the world of the gods (devaloka), the world of Brahmā (brahmaloka), the āramanās and the brāhmanās, the gods (deva), the gandharvas, the asuras, etc., and the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas who are to accede to the state of Buddhahood (kumārabhūta) were all gathered together (saṃsaptitā).

Sūtra: Question. - The miraculous power (vyādhībala) of the Buddha is immense (aṇgamāṇa). If the beings of the ten directions all came to the assembly, all the universes would be empty (śūnya); on the other hand, if they did not all come, the immense power of the Buddha would betray its powerlessness.

Answer. - It is impossible that they all come. Why? Because the Buddha universes are infinite (ananta) and limitless (aṇgamāṇa). If all their inhabitants came [to the assembly], they would be limited.

Besides, the ten directions each have their Buddhas who also preach the Prajñāpāramitā. Thus, in the 43rd chapter of the Prajñāpāramitā, a thousand Buddhas appear in each of the ten directions and they each preach the Prajñāpāramitā. This is why it is impossible that all beings come [to Śākyamuni's assembly].

Question. - If the Buddhas of the ten directions each preach the Prajñāpāramitā, why do the bodhisattvas of the ten directions [visit Śākyamuni]?

Answer. - As we have already said in the chapter on the coming of bodhisattva Samantaraśīni, these bodhisattvas come on account of Śākyamuni. Moreover, these bodhisattvas were bound by their previous vow (patrānapratīkṣā): "If there is a place where the Prajñāpāramitā is being preached," [they had said], "we will go there to listen and pay homage"; this is why they come from afar to accumulate the qualities (gīna) themselves. They also want to give a teaching (dēśāna) to beings, [saying to them]: "We have come from afar to pay homage (piṭjā) to the Dharma; why do you, who live in this universe, not pay homage to it?"

Question. - The Buddha does not cling (saṅkha) to the Dharma. Why then does he manifest his miraculous power (vyādhībala) seven times to guide beings to come together as a crowd?

Answer. - The Prajñāpāramitā is very profound (gamabhūta), difficult to know (dārjeyā), difficult to understand (dāravighṛtha) and inconceivable (acintyā). And so, [when the Buddha wants to preach it], he gathers the great bodhisattvas together around himself. Thus the beginners (navaśrānaprasthitā), [seeing these grave bodhisattvas listening to the Buddha], are led to have faith [in the evidence] of grave important people.

Answer. - The gods who have the divine eye (diyavacaka) the divine ear (diyavirota), keen faculties (tikṣṇendrā) and wisdom (prajñā) have flocked together voluntarily. This is why the sūtra mentions the world of gods (devaloka) here.

Question. - The ‘world of gods’ already includes the Māras and the Brahmās. Why does the sūtra mention the Māras and the Brahmās separately?

Answer. - There are three great leaders832 among the gods:

1) Śakra devanām indrah is the leader of two classes of gods, [the Caturmahārājika and the Trītyaśrāṇi].
2) King Māra is the leader of six classes of gods of the world of desire or kāmadhūta: [Caturmahārājika, Trītyaśrāṇi, Yāma, Tuṣṭa, Nirmāṇarati and Paranirmitavāsāvārānti].
3) Mahābrahma is the leader of the Brahmaloka.

Question. - The Yāma, Tuṣṭa and Nirmāṇarati gods also have leaders; why are there only three leaders of the gods?

Answer. - [A special mention is reserved for these three great gods because they are the best known]: Śakra devanām indrah resides above ground like the Buddha; he is constantly near the Buddha; he is very famous (vaivas) and people know him well.

King Māra constantly comes to bother the Buddha and he is leader of the whole world of desire (kāmadhūta); the Yāma, Tuṣṭa and Nirmāṇarati gods all depend on him. Moreover, the gods of the threefold world (trāśādāhata) are included (saṃghṛtha) in the ‘world of gods’, and as Māra is leader of [the first of these worlds], namely, the world of desire (kāmadhūta), the sūtra mentions [135 a] him separately (prahā). Finally, Māra usually torments the Buddha, but today he has come to listen to the Prajñāpāramitā so that the other people may progress (vyādhā) in their faith (śraddhā).

Question. - The second world, i.e., the form realm (rupadhūta), involves a large number of heavens; why does the sūtra mention only the brahmā heaven (brahmaloka) here?

Answer. - The gods who surpass [the Brahmaloka] are without awareness and do not like distractions (citartikṣa); they are less well-known. On the other hand, the Brahmaloka, which does involve the four kinds of consciousness (viśīlātā), is easily known. Besides, the Brahmaloka is closer. Furthermore, Brahmā 831 This concerns the 43rd chapter of the Padavavimaśīti by Kumārajīva, T 223, k, 12, p. 310b. "By his miraculous power, the Buddha saw in the east a thousand Buddhas who were preaching the Dharma. Having such and such characteristics and such and such names, they were preaching this chapter of the Prajñāpāramitā... In the south, the west, and the north, in the four intermediate directions and at the zenith and the nadir, there were groups of a thousand Buddhas of this kind in each of the directions.

---

832 In order to understand the following discussion, the division of the gods into the six heavens of kāmadhūta and the seventeen heavens of rūpādhūta should be remembered. See, e.g., Koša, III, p. 1-2; Kirfel, Kosmographie des Indos. p. 190-198.
is synonymous with the purity of renunciation (vairāgya-viśuddha); by speaking of Brahmāloka here, we include all the gods of the form realm as a whole (sāmānyatā).

Furthermore, the other gods have no entourage. At the beginning of the kalpa, when he was born, Brahmā devaṛatva was dwelling alone in the palace of Brahmā (brahmaviśuddha) without any companion. Feeling bored, he thought: "Why should I not give birth to some companions?" At this moment, some Ābhāsvara gods whose life had come to an end, were reborn surrounding him as he had wished. King Brahmā then thought: "These gods previously did not exist; they are born according to my wish; I am able to engender these gods." At the same moment, the Ābhāsvara gods also on their part had this thought: "We are born from king Brahmā; king Brahmā is our father."833 - This is why the sūtra limits itself to mentioning the Brahmāloka here.

Finally, the gods of the second, third and fourth dhyānas (i.e., the gods higher than the Brahmāloka who are identified with the first dhyāna), see the Buddha, hear the Dharma or assist the bodhisattvas in the desire realm (kāmadhātu), whereas visual consciousness (caṇḍāraja), auditory consciousness (uṣṇīsāraja) and tactile (kāyavāṣṭra) exist in the Brahmāloka.834 This is why the brahmāloka is mentioned separately.

Question. - Why does the sūtra mention only Ārāmanas and brāhmaṇas and not speak about kings (rājan), householders (gṛhapati) and other kinds of people?

Answer. - Wise people of two kinds, Ārāmanas and brāhmaṇas. The monastics who have left home (pravrajita) are Ārāmanas; the lay people who remain at home are called brāhmaṇas.835 Other people give themselves up to worldly pleasures (lokadukha); this is why the sūtra does not speak of them. The brāhmaṇas use wisdom (prajñā) and look for merit (punya) those who have left home all seek the Path (mārga); this is why the sūtra limits itself to talking about the Ārāmanas and brāhmaṇas. We call those of pure family up to seven generations and who have taken the precepts (śīlādāna) at the age of six years brāhmaṇas. - The qualities of the Path and wisdom are found among the Āraṇanas and the brāhmaṇas, this is why they are spoken of here.

Question. - Why does the sūtra, which sometimes speaks of ‘the realm of the gods’ (devaloka), again speak of ‘the gods’ (deva) here?

Answer. - The ‘realm of the gods’ designated the heaven of the Cāturmāraḥṣākṣas and Sakra gods; ‘Māra’ designated the Paramārthaivaśāṅvita and ‘Brahma’ gods, the form realm (rūpadhātu). Here the words ‘gods’ (deva) means the gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) [who have not yet been mentioned], namely, the Yānams, Tūṣitas, Nīmāṇarathis, the Ngai chen (?), etc. The Ngai chen reside at the top of the six classes of gods; as their shape and color are very fine, they are called Ngai chen "Admirable Forms".836

Question. - Why does the sūtra mention only the gandharvas and not the other asuras or the nāgarajas?

Answer. - The gandharvas are divine artists who accompany the gods;837 their predispositions are gentle and other kinds of people?

The king of the gandharvas is called Druma,841 [in the Ts’iin language, ‘Tree’]. Gandharvas are identified with the first dhyānas.838 In order to be reborn among the gandharvas, it is enough to have practiced a lower form of bhikṣu asceticism,839 and the present passage of the Mānas nears this out, - 473

833 This episode which illustrates the naive pride of Brahmā is drawn from the Brahmajāla sutta: Dīgha, I, p. 17-18, retold in Dīgha, III, p. 28-29; Tei’tang a han, T 1, no. 21, k. 14, p. 906-c; ibid. no. 30, k. 22, p. 143a; Fan wang liou ch eu kien king, T 21, p. 266b. Here are some extracts from the Pāli text:

Hoti kha so, bhikkhave, samayo yaṃ kumāra karhasi dīghava addhāna ... mayam pana amhā pacchā upapannā it."
The corresponding Sanskrit text is cited in full in the Kośavyākhya, p. 448; here are some extracts:

"Bhavati, bhūtavihāva, su samayo yad ayah lokah samavartate. Samavartāmaṇā loke ... nimitād. Eko 'somākāṃ asya sattva Ēśvara yāvat pịṭḥānā bhāvano."

For a discussion of this sūtra, see P 1 p’o cha, t 1545, k. 98, p. 508 seq.

834 The six gods of kāmadhātu and the gods of the first dhyāna (the world of Brahmā) who are “different in body and concept” (nāmātivādakasamāṇitā) are directly in contact with the desire realm by means of their faculties. This is not the case for the higher gods who must change their level in order to communicate with material beings. See the theory of ānāpānasaṃñāna in Kośa, III, p. 16. In agreement with these ideas, it should be recalled that, according to the Vighajālamīrata school, Sanskrit, the language of the gods, is spoken only among the gods of the first dhyāna; from the second dhyāna on, there is no longer any reasoning, therefore no language either (cfr. Hobgurin, Bon, p. 119).

835 The expression ‘Āraṇana-brāhmaṇa’ is often used in Buddhist texts, sometimes the Āraṇanas are contrasted with the brāhmaṇas, sometimes the two words are used together to designate, in a general way, the ‘leaders in religious life’. On this subject, consult the note by T.W. Rhys-Davids, Dialogues of the Buddha, II, p. 165, the study of R.O. Franke, Dīghanākāya in Anawil, p. 305 seq., the information collected in Hobgurin, Baranom, p. 52-54, and the bibliography on this subject in Lav., Dogme et Philosophie, p. 165-166. Nowadays we have a tendency to think of the Āraṇanas as disidents and heretics and the brāhmaṇas as orthodox. Actually, - and the present passage of the Mānas nears this out, - 837 To my [Lamotte’s] knowledge, these Ngai chen are not mentioned elsewhere. It must be remembered that originally Buddha knew only six levels of heavens, occupied by the Ānāpānaśamjñākas, both groups come into the category of wise people (prajñākaras).

838 Ngai chen reside at the top of the six classes of gods; as their shape and color are very fine, they are called Ngai chen "Admirable Forms".840 The kinnaras also are divine artists who depend on the gods.

839 Druma, king of the gandharvas and not of the gandharvas, is completely ignored in the Pāli sources, but well-known in the Sanskrit sources. He appears in the Dīkṣatāramajā-Sūtra, of which there are two Chinese translations due respectively to Tche tch’ān (T 624) and Kumārajīva (T 625) and one Tibetan translation entitled Mi ham cīḥ ṛgaḥ po ṛjan.
and kinnaras habitually reside in two places: their usual residence is on the Ten-Jewel Mountain (daśaratnagiri); but sometimes in the heavens, they play music for the gods. These two types of beings are not subject to the alternations of high and low. [By contrast], the people who inhabit the four continents (caturdhālapaka) have four different lifespans: those who have a very long life (ādityāghyuṣya) can live an incalculable number of years, those who have a very short life (atyaḥpīyuṣa) live only ten years.842 The asuras are malevolent (dāṣṭacitā) by nature and quarrelsome, but they do not break the precepts (illa) and cultivate merit.843 They are born in dwellings at the edge of the ocean and also have cities and palaces.844 The asura kings are named Pī me teče (Vemacitra asurinda)845 and Lo heou lo (Rāhu).846

It is said847 that once Rāhu asurinda wanted to swallow Yue (Candima, god of the moon). The devaputra Candima, frightened, went at once to the Buddha and spoke this stanza:

pas ȗs ȗa, Māo XII, 6 (Cusma-Feer, p. 325f.; OKC, no. 824, p. 314). The Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, p. 4, knows four kinnara kings: Druma, Mahādhāma, Sudharma and Bhadradhāra. - But Druma is best known from the adventures of his daughter, the kinnari Manohara, captured by the hunters of king Sucandima, wed by prince Sudhana (Sudhama), pursued by her father-in-law Sudhū, retrieved in the Himalaya by her husband and finally brought back in triumph to Hastipūra. This story, where Druma plays a very minor rôle, occurs in the following sources: Sanskrit sources: Mahāvīma, II, p. 94-115; Śrīśīmaṭhā, - Aṣṭādākapalatī, ch. LXIV, vol. II, p. 518-413: Sudhākīmīravatīdīna, - Bhadrakīpavatīdīna, chap. XXX. Chinese sources: Lien ou tsi king, T 152, no. 83, k. 8, p. 44b-46b (tr. Chavannes, Conies, I, p. 292-304). - Ken pen chou yao che, T 1448, k. 13-14, p. 59b16-64c25. Tibetan sources: Schiefner-Ralston, Tibetan Tales, p. 44-74. Iconography: Barabudur: A. Foucher, Notes d’archéologie bouddhique, BÉFEO, IX, 1909, p.12-18 and fig. 6-9; - Nāgārjunikonda: J. Ph. Vogel, The Man in the Well and some other Subjects illustrated at Nāgārjunikonda, RAA, XI, 1937, p. 119-121 and pl. XXXVI. 842 In Uttarakuru, the human life is a thousand years; in Godālaśāya, five hundred years; in Pāvaśādeva, two hundred and fifty years; in Jambudvīpa, it is incalculable at the beginning of the cosmic age, but diminishes progressively down to ten years at the end of the kalpa. Cf. Kośa, III, p. 172. 843 On the rôle of the asuras in Buddhism, see Hobogiri, Asoha, p. 172. 844 Their dwellings are described in Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 20, p. 129b-130a. 845 Asurinda is a common name designating a chief or a king of the asuras; it is sometimes applied to Vemacitra, sometimes to Rāhu. 846 The last character, lo, is superfluous and should be removed. 847 Here the Māppi is quoting the Candimasutta, but its text differs both from the Chinese version of the Tsa a han, T 99, no. 583, k. 22, p. 155a-b) cf. T 100, no. 167, k. 9, p. 436a) and the Pāli version of the Samyutta, I, p. 50 (tr. Kindred Sayings, I, p. 71-72; Geiger, I, p. 80-81). To facilitate the comparison, here is the translation of Tsa a han and the Pāli text of the Samyutta:

Tsa a han, T 99, k. 22, p. 155a: Thus have I heard. Once the Buddha was dwelling at Śāvatī in the Jetavana, in the garden of Asāḷhāpadānā. At that time, Rāhu, king of the asuras, was blocking Candima, the devaputra. Then full of terror, Candima devaputra came to the Buddha and having bowed his head to the Buddha's feet, stood aside and spoke these stanzas of praise to the Buddha:

"Homage to you, great hero Who triumphs over all your obstacles.

I am exposed to suffering, That is why I take refuge [in you].
I, the devaputra Candima Take refuge in the Sugata; May the Buddha, who has compassion for the world Liberate me from the asura."
Endowed with great wisdom, Buddha Bhagavat,
I take refuge in you. Homage to you!
This Rāhu is tormenting me;
I would like to ask the Buddha to grant me his protection out of his compassion.
The Buddha spoke to Rāhu with this stanza:
The moon (candra) is resplendent in illumining the shadows,
In space (ākāśa) it is a great lamp.
Its color is pure white; it has a thousand rays.
Do not swallow the moon; let it go immediately.

Then Rāhu, sweating with fear, let go of the moon at once. Vemacitra asurinda, seeing Rāhu frightened and releasing the moon, spoke this stanza:
O Rāhu, why then
Do you release the moon in your fear?
You are sweating drops of sweat like a sick man.
What is this fear and this anxiety?

Then Rāhu replied with this stanza:
The Bhagavat has given me this command with a verse:
If I do not release the moon, my head would split into seven pieces.
This is why I release the moon.

Vemacitra spoke this stanza:
The Buddhas are very difficult to meet,
It is only at distant intervals that they appear in the world.
Since (the Buddha) has spoken this pure stanza Rāhu has released the moon.

---

848 In order to understand the discussion which follows, it should be noted that the 'Questioner' assumed here represents the side of Kātyāyana and defies the theories of the Sarvāstivādin Abhidharma. The latter accept only five gati or destinies (see, e.g., the Saṃgharakṣita, T 1536, k. 31, p. 415a); doing this, they are faithful to the canonical teachings which, with a few exceptions (Dīgha, III, p. 264) recognize only five gati (cf. Dīgha, III, p. 234; Majjhima, I, p. 73; Samyutta, V, p. 474; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 459); these are first the three bad destinies (durgati) - the damned (naraka), the animals (tiryagyonī) and the pretas - which must be placed among the eight okasana, the conditions in which it is difficult, if not impossible, to see the Buddha or hear the Dharma; these are the two good destinies (śaṅkha) and of men, humans (manoṣaya), where it is easy to acquire the Path. The scholars who accept only five gati find it difficult to place the asuras. Here, our 'Questioner' places them, along with the gandharvas, in the preta gati, and the Viśālaka (T 1545, k. 172, p. 867a-c) does the same. Others, such as the author of the Yogacarabhūmi (T 1570, k. 4), place them among the gods. But most often the asuras belong to several gati at the same time, either the preta and the animal (Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, T 721, p. 18-21) or preta, animal and gods (Gūḍhārthī, cited in T 1723, k. 2), or preta, human, gods and animal (Sūtramārakū, T 945, k. 9). These references are from Hoëbeke, Aspara, p. 42. See also P. Maus, La lumière sur les six Voies, p. 155, 175, etc.
The position adopted by the Mppī is quite different. It criticizes the Sarvāstivādin Kātyāyana for wanting to put into the lower destiny of the pretas an asura as pious as Pururavas’s mother, a yakṣa as famous as Vaiśravān, a kinnara as powerful as Dharma. Then it comments, wrongly it is true, that the Buddha had never fixed at five the number of the gati and that such a limitation is the doing of the Sarvāstivādin school. Finally, calling on the Viṃśatiśatupāṭhi as witness, it proclaims the need for a sixth gati where the asuras and gandharvas “whose merits are many” are placed and which cannot be confused with the damned, the animals and the pretas who populate the lower gati. Returning later (k. 39, p. 280a) to this subject, it will conclude: “Previously, five gati were spoken of; today we must add the asura gati.” Yet other texts accept six gati in place of five: an isolated passage of the Dīgha (III, p. 264); Petavatthu, IV, 11: the Asadaka and Uttapatiṭhaka of the Kathāvatthu, VIII, p. 360 (cf. Rh. D., Points of controversy, p. 251); the Sudatāḥakā, stanzas 94, which accepts the asura gati (cf. P., Mūla sūtras, p. 282; T 726, p. 437b); the Dharmasamgraha, v. 135, 346, 372 (but five gati on p. 131). It may be asked if Nāgārjuna of the Mppī, who here shows himself to be a strong partisan of six gatis, is the same as the nihilist Nāgārjuna, author of the Madh. kārikā who accepts only five (cf. Madh. vṛti, p. 269, l. 9; p. 304, l. 4). On the other hand and contrary to the assertion of Poussin in Kolla, III, 11, the Nāgārjuna of the Sūtrīlēkha lists six gatis (cf. T 1673, p. 750c1).
Answer. - The Buddha did not say that; why do you claim that they are included in this destiny? That is an [unwarranted] statement by Kio t'ouen yen tou (Kātyāyaniputra), etc. The asuras have a power equal to that of the gods, sometimes in their battles, they even win over the gods. The gandharvas are the divine artists who enjoy happiness equal to that of the gods; they have wisdom (prajñā) and can distinguish the beautiful from the ugly. Why could they not receive the Dharma of the Path? See for example, in the Tsu a han (Sanyuktāgama), in the chapter about the gods (devasanyukta), the story of the mother of the asura Fou na p'o seou (Panavarasu). In the course of his travels, the Buddha spent the night in her home; when the Bhagavat was preaching the ambrosia (amṛta) of the holy Dharma, her two children, daughter and son, began to cry. The mother quieted them with this stanza:

Do not cry, Yu tan lo (Uttarikā),
Do not cry, Fou na p'o seou (Panavarasu),
So that I can hear the Dharma and find the path.

You too should find it like this.

This is why we know that, even among the asuras, there are some who obtain the Path.

Furthermore, in the Mahāyāna, the hero (vīra) Mūśi tin kung (Guhayaka Vajrapāṇī) prevails over all the bodhisattvas and all the more, over all men.

When T'ouen louen mo (Druma), king of the kiṃnaras and gandharvas, came to the Buddha to play the lute and praise the Buddha, three thousand universes were shaken; even Mahākāśyapa was uncomfortable on his seat. How could such individuals be unable to obtain the Path?

When the asurājjas and the nīgarājjas come to the Buddha to question him about the profound Dharma (gambhīradharma), the Buddha is flexible to their questions and answers their queries on the profound meaning (gambhīra). How can you say that they are unable to obtain the Path?

Question. - Of the five destinies (pātisāsana), the Buddha, teacher of gods and men (lātā devamanusaśādāna), does not include the three bad destinies (duṛgāt i). As they have no merit and do not participate in the Path, the nāgas all fall into the bad destinies.

Answer. - The Buddha never spoke explicitly about the five destinies. The five destinies are an invention of the school of the Chou yi t're yeu (Sarvāstivāda), but the school of the P'o t'ou fou tou lou (Vātsipatrya) accepts the existence of six destinies.

Moreover, there must be six destinies. Why? Because the three bad destinies are exclusively (ekāntena) places of punishment (paścātāna). But if the merits are many and the sins (āpañña) are rare, as is the case for the asuras, gandharvas, etc., the place of birth (apapattisādāna) should be different. This is why six destinies must be posited.

Finally, even in the three bad destinies, there are beings who obtain the Path; but, as their merits are rare, [in general] we say that they do not possess the Path.

As for the expression bodhisattva before acceding to the state of Buddhahood, see what has previously been said.

849 The battles between the asuras and the gods are a band theme told in stereotypical formulas: Dīgha, II, p. 285; Majjhima, I, p. 253; Sanyutta, I, p. 216, 223; IV, p. 201; V, p. 447; Aśguttara, IV, p. 432. - References to Chinese sources in Hobogirin, Aishou, p. 43.

850 The beginning of the Panakhāsuttanta of which we have the Pāli version (Sanyutta, I, p. 209-210) and two Chinese translations: Tsu a han, T, 99, no. 1322, k. 49, p. 362c-363a; T 100, no. 321, k. 15, p. 481a. There are a few differences between these sources:

Sānyutta, I, p. 209: Ekam saṃsaeva Bhagavā Sāvatthiḥyaṃ viharati. Jetavanānāthapindaśakaṃ āramaṃ... dharmam sevami samānaṃ //

Tsu a han, T, 99, k. 49, p. 362c: Thus have I heard. Once the Buddha was dwelling among the people of the Magadha kingdom with his great assembly. He came to the place where the mother of the young yakṣa Panarvāva was dwelling and spent the night there. Then the Bhagavat preached a sermon about the noble truths (āryasaṃyukta dharma) to his bhikkuś: the noble truths of suffering (dukkha), the origin of suffering (dukkhasamudaya), the cessation of suffering (dukkhirodhā), and the path leading to the cessation of suffering (dukkhirodhagaminī pratipāṭā). At that time, the two young children of the yakṣi, her son Panarvāva and her daughter Uttarikā, began to cry during the night. Then the mother of Panarvāva scolded her son and daughter with these stanzas:

"You, Panarvāva, and you, Uttarikā, do not cry.

So that I may be able to hear the Dharma preached by the Tathāgata."

Other details may be found in Sarathī, I, p. 309-311.

851 Vajrapāṇi, of the yakṣa clan, thunder (vajra)-bearer and tutelary spirit of the Buddha (cf. Lalitavistara, p. 66, 219). He has already appeared in the canonical sources (Dīgha, I, p. 95; Majjhima, I, p. 231) and his importance increases with time. See Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 48-64.

852 The Mppī will return twice to this episode: k. 11, p. 139b, and k. 17, p. 188b: "When Druma, king of the kiṃnaras, along with 84,000 kiṃnaras, came to the Buddha to play the lute, sing verses and pay homage to the Buddha, Sumeru, king of mountains, all the trees on the mountain, the people and animals, all began to dance. The assembly surrounding the Buddha, including Mahākāśyapa, could not sit still on their seats. Then the bodhisattva Tissi sin asked the ayumati Mahākāśyapa: Old man, previously you were foremost among those who observed the twelve ācāras: why do you not sit still on your seat? - Mahākāśyapa answered: "The five desires of the threefold world do not shake me, but the obhāja of the bodhisattva [Druma], by virtue of the fruit of retribution of the qualities (g-specifiability), put me in such a state that I can no longer stay quiet." - This episode is taken from the Drumākīṃnarājjasūtra-pariṇāma, T 624, k. 1, p. 351c; T 625, k. 1, p. 371a.

853 The order of the words should be corrected, I [Lamotte] read: yon tsaw tse che chou yi ts'ee yeou pou seng so chou.
INTRODUCTION .............................................................................................................. 490
SUPPLEMENT TO ABBREVIATIONS VOL. II ................................................................. 496
CHAPTER XVI: THE STORY OF ŚĀḤIPTA ................................................................. 499
I. ŚĀḤIPTA AT THE FESTIVAL OF GĪYĀGRĀMASĀJA (p. 621F) ........................................ 499
II. ŚĀḤIPTA AND MAUDGALYĀYANA AT SAṆIṆAYA (p. 623F) ....................................... 500
III. CONVERSION OF ŚĀḤIPTA AND MAUDGALYĀYANA (630F) .............................. 505
IV. ORIGIN OF ŚĀḤIPTA’S NAME (636F) ................................................................. 510
V. SARVĀKĀRA (p. 640F) .............................................................................................. 513
VI. SARVADHARMA (p. 642F) ...................................................................................... 514
VII. WHY DOES ŚĀḤIPTA QUESTION? (p. 646F) ....................................................... 517
CHAPTER XVII: THE VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY (p. 650F) ......................................... 520
I. DEFINITIONS OF PRAJĀṆĀPĀRAMITĀ ................................................................. 520
II. THE METHOD OF NON-DWELLING (p. 656F) ......................................................... 525
CHAPTER XVIII: PRAISE OF THE VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY (p. 658F) ....................... 526
CHAPTER XIX: THE CHARACTERISTICS OF GENEROSITY (p. 662F) ......................... 529
I. DEFINITION OF GENEROSITY ............................................................................... 530
II. VARIOUS KINDS OF GENEROSITY ........................................................................ 530
1. Gifts belonging to the three realms, ........................................................................ 530
2. Pure generosity and impure generosity .................................................................. 530
3. Other kinds of generosity ....................................................................................... 539
4. Inner generosity .................................................................................................... 548
CHAPTER XX: THE VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY AND GENEROSITY OF THE DHARMA (p. 692F) ................................................................. 552
I. GENEROSITY OF THE DHARMA ............................................................................. 552
II. VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY, ..................................................................................... 559
III. PERFECTION OF GENEROSITY ........................................................................ 564
IV. NON-EXISTENCE OF THE THING GIVEN ................................................................ 574
NON-EXISTENCE OF THE OUTER OBJECT ......................................................... 575
1. Debate with the Realist, ....................................................................................... 575
2. Debate with the Atomist ....................................................................................... 578
3. The object, subjective creation and emptiness ...................................................... 579
V. NON-EXISTENCE OF THE DONOR ..................................................................... 581
NON-EXISTENCE OF THE ĀTMAN ........................................................................... 582
1. The ātman is not an object of consciousness ...................................................... 582
2. Debate with the Personalist ................................................................................ 583
VI. GENEROSITY AND THE OTHER VIRTUES .......................................................... 593
1. Generosity and the virtue of generosity, .............................................................. 593
2. Generosity and the virtue of morality .................................................................... 594
3. Generosity and the virtue of patience ................................................................. 596
4. Generosity and the virtue of exertion .................................................................... 596
5. Generosity and the virtue of meditation .............................................................. 601
6. Generosity and the virtue of wisdom .................................................................... 604
CHAPTER XXI: DISCIPLINE OR MORALITY (p. 770F) ............................................. 607
I. DEFINITION OF DISCIPLINE ................................................................................. 607
II. VARIOUS KINDS OF MORALITY .......................................................................... 608
III. BENEFITS OF MORALITY .................................................................................... 608
IV. DISADVANTAGES OF IMMORALITY .................................................................... 613
CHAPTER XXII: THE NATURE OF MORALITY (p. 782F) ........................................ 615
I. Abstaining from murder ......................................................................................... 616
II. Abstaining from theft ............................................................................................ 624
III. Abstention from illicit love .................................................................................. 627
IV. Abstention from falsehood ................................................................................... 631
V. Abstention from liquor .......................................................................................... 640
SECOND PART: THE MORALITY OF PLEDGE (SAMĀḌĀṆAŚILA) ......................... 643
I. Morality of the lay person or avadātavasana ................................................................. 643
II. Morality of the monastic or pravrajita ................................................................. 658

CHAPTER XXII: THE VIRTUE OF MORALITY (p. 853F) ............................................... 668

I. DEFINITION AND DIVISION OF MORALITY .................................................. 676
II. PATIENCE TOWARD BEINGS ........................................................................ 677
1. Indifference toward sycophants .................................................................. 677
2. Indifference toward benefactors .............................................................. 686
3. Indifference toward women ....................................................................... 687
4. Withstanding persecutors .......................................................................... 694

CHAPTER XXIV: PATIENCE TOWARD THE DHARMA (p. 902F) ....................... 703
I. GENERAL DEFINITION .................................................................................. 703
II. ENDURING OUTER AND INNER SUFFERINGS AND THE AFFLICTIONS:
   [A. Enduring outer sufferings] ...................................................................... 704
   [B. Enduring inner sufferings] ..................................................................... 705
III. PATIENCE IN REGARD TO THE BUDDHĀDHARMA .................................. 710

CHAPTER XXV: THE VIRTUE OF PATIENCE ................................................... 721
I. EXERTION, FOURTH VIRTUE ........................................................................ 721
II. THE BENEFITS OF EXERTION .................................................................. 725
III. PROGRESS IN EXERTION .......................................................................... 727

CHAPTER XXVI: EXERTION (p. 927F) .............................................................................. 736
I. THE NATURE OF EXERTION ........................................................................ 736
II. THE VIRTUE OF EXERTION ........................................................................ 737
III. EXERTION AND THE OTHER VIRTUES .................................................... 750
IV. BODILY AND MENTAL EXERTION ............................................................. 751

CHAPTER XXVIII: THE VIRTUE OF MEDITATION (DHYĀNA) (p. 984F) ............ 762
I. NECESSITY FOR MEDITATION .................................................................. 762
II. MEANS OF ACQUIRING MEDITATION ...................................................... 765
   A. First Method: Eliminating the sensual desires ........................................ 765
   B. Second method: removing the obstacles ............................................... 768
   C. Third method: Practicing the five dharmas ............................................. 779
III. DEFINITION OF THE VARIOUS DHYĀNAS AND SAMĀPATTIS ................. 793
IV. QUESTIONS RELATING TO THE DHYĀNAS .................................................. 802
V. DHYĀNA-PARAMĀTMA .......................................................... 809

CHAPTER XXX: THE VIRTUE OF WISDOM (p. 1058F) .......................................... 819
I. 'GREAT' PRAJÑĀ ............................................................................. 827
II. PRAJÑĀ AND THE PRAJÑĀS ...................................................................... 827
1. Prajñā of the śrāvakas .................................................................................. 827
2. Prajñā of the pratyekabuddhas .................................................................. 829
3. Prajñā of the Buddha and bodhisattvas ..................................................... 830
4. Prajñā of the heretics, ................................................................................ 830
III. THE PRAJÑĀ AND THE TEACHING OF THE DHARMA .................................. 833
1. The teaching of the Prākya ....................................................................... 833
2. The Teaching of the Abhidharma ............................................................... 835
3. The teaching of emptiness ....................................................................... 836
IV. UNDERSTANDING IDENTICAL AND MULTIPLE NATURES ..................... 844
   1. Identical characteristics in every dharma ................................................. 848
   2. Multiple nature ...................................................................................... 852
3. Characteristics and emptiness of self nature ............................................. 854
V. WAYS OF ACQUIRING PRAJÑĀ-PARAMĀTMA ............................................. 856
   1. By the successive practice of the five virtues ......................................... 856
   2. By practicing just one virtue .................................................................. 857
   3. By abstaining from any practice .............................................................. 859

INTRODUCTION

In Volume II, the reader will find an attempted translation of chapters XVI to XXX of the Mahāprajñāpāramitāśāstra. These fifteen chapters, which make up a consistent whole, comment at great length on a short paragraph of the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra (Pañcapārami, p. 17-18; Śatasahasrākāra, p. 55-56), of which the following is a translation:

"Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Śrīputra: ‘O Śrīputra, the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to know all dharmas in all their aspects completely should exert himself in the Prajñāpāramitā.’ Then the venerable Śrīputra asked the Blessed One: ‘O Blessed One, how should the Bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to know all dharmas in all their aspects exert himself in the Prajñāpāramitā?’ At these words, the Blessed One said to the venerable Śrīputra: ‘The Bodhisattva-mahāsattva who abides in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-abiding should fulfill the virtue of generosity by the method of refraining, by abstaining from distinguishing the thing given, the donor and the recipient; he should fulfill the virtue of morality by being based on the non-existence of evil deeds and their contrary; he should fulfill the virtue of patience by being based on non-agitation [of the mind]; he should fulfill the virtue of exertion by being based on the non-slackening of physical and mental energy; he should fulfill the virtue of rapture by being based on the non-existence of distraction and rapture; he should fulfill the virtue of wisdom by being based on the non-existence of good and bad knowledges (variant: by not adhering to any system).’

The main interlocutors of the Buddha in the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra are Śrīputra and Subhūti; chapter XVI of the Treatise is dedicated to their story: it contains a detailed biography of Śrīputra and a short note on Subhūti (p. 634F). But it may seem strange that the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra, which belongs to the literature of the Greater Vehicle, should be preached, not by the bodhisattvas affiliated with the Mahāyāna, but by śrāvakas, adepts of the Lesser Vehicle. The reason for this is simple, as the Treatise explains (p. 636F): the bodhisattvas, called upon to dwell among beings whose conversion is their mission, have not entirely eliminated their passions and do not enjoy indisputable authority among men; if they were responsible for teaching the Prajñā, their word could be open to doubt. On the contrary, śrāvakas like Śrīputra and Subhūti who have attained arhathood and destroyed every impurity (keśakāra) are assured of an unequalled prestige and their testimony cannot be disputed: therefore it is to them that the Buddha entrusted the task of preaching the Prajñā. Among all the śrāvakas, the Buddhas chose Śāriputra and Subhūti who excelled over all the others, the first by the extent of his wisdom, the second by his acute vision of universal emptiness.

1. Tārakha Bhagavānādhyāyasāṃgraha (ed. S. Thākura) pp. 3–16; Sarvadharmaṃ abhidharmadharmān abhidhitvābhidhitvān abhidhitvābhāvavipākavipākapāpaḥpāpasūnatvātānātānānātānānātānānātānānānātānātānānātānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānानānानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानानānānānānānānānānānानानānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānानānānānānānānānानānानānānānānānānānānānानānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānानानानानānānānānानānानānानानानानānानānानānानानānānानānानānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānānानānānānānānānān

489
490

The religious ideal of the āryavaka is the destruction of the passions, the arrival at arhathood and the attainment of nirvāṇa; to this end, he practices the Noble Path in its threefold aspect: morality (śīla) which keeps him from any wrong-doing, concentration (samādhi) which purifies his mind, wisdom (prajñā) by means of which he understands the general characteristics (sāmānyalakāraṇa) of dharmas, impermanence, suffering, emptiness and lack of self. The practice of the virtues occupies only a subsidiary place in the career of the āryavaka; his excellent qualities are, however, contaminated at the base by the essentially individualistic and egocentric character of his effort. The religious ideal of the bodhisattva is quite different: renouncing entry into nirvāṇa for the moment, he seeks to obtain the supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarānyavamsabodhi) which characterizes the Buddhhas, to conquer the knowledge of all things in all their aspects (sarvadhirmanān sarvārṣikājñānam), knowledge that permits him to dedicate himself entirely to the benefit and welfare of all creatures. In order to attain this omniscience, the bodhisattva must exert himself throughout his career in the six perfect virtues (pāramitā) which liken him to the Buddha. Among the heretics and āryavakas, the practice of the natural virtues is marred by errors and egotism; among the bodhisattvas, on the other hand, the practice of the virtues attains perfection because it is disinterested and based on Prajñāpāramitā.

Chapter XVII explains what this Prajñāpāramitā means and how to use it. The Prajñāpāramitā is not an entity of metaphysical order, an absolute existent to which one could become attached; rather, it is a state of mind, a mental turning of mind which assures a radical neutrality to the person who adopts it. Transcending the categories of existence and non-existence, lacking any characteristic, the Prajñāpāramitā can be neither affirmed nor denied: it is faultless excellence. The bodhisattva adheres to it by not grasping it or, to use the time-honored expression, “he adheres to it by not adhering to it” (tātāy asthānāyogena). Confident in this point of view which is equally distant from affirmation and negation, he suspends judgment on everything and says nothing whatsoever. Practiced in this spirit, the virtues which, among the religious heretics and āryavakas, are of ordinary and mundane (lauku) order, become supramundane perfections (lokottarāparamitā) in the bodhisattva. Besides, since the bodhisattva refuses to conceive of the said virtues and to establish distinctions amongst them, to practice one pāramitā is to practice them all; not to practice them is also to practice them.

However, as the bodhisattva resides of choice in the world where he daily rubs shoulders with beings intoxicated by the three poisons of passion, hatred and ignorance, it is important to explain to people what distinguishes the pāramitās from the profane virtues. This is the subject of chapters XVIII to XXX.

Chapter XVIII-XX. - Generosity (dāna), for which great rewards are promised, consists of giving, in a spirit of faith, a material object or a spiritual advice to ‘a field of merit’, i.e., to a beneficiary worthy of receiving it. The pāramitā of generosity makes no distinction between donor, recipient and gift because, from the point of view of the Prajñā, there is no person to give or to receive, there is nothing that is given. To understand that is “to give everything at all times and in every way.”

Chapters XXI-XXIII. - Morality (śīla) makes one avoid the wrong-doings of body and speech that are capable of harming others. Apart from the general morality making up the rules of innate honesty essential to everyone, it is appropriate to distinguish the morality of commitment by means of which lay people and monastics of all classes solemnly undertake to follow a certain number of rules proper to their condition. The pāramitā of morality singularly surpasses this restricted framework: it is based on the non-existence of wrong-doing and its opposite. The sinner not existing, the sin does not exist either; in the absence of all sins, the prohibitions forbidding it have no meaning. The sinner does not incur our contempt; the saint has no right to our esteem.

Chapters XXIV-XXV. - Although early Buddhism condemned anger, it did not attach great importance to patience (kṣānti). On the other hand, the bodhisattva raises it to the rank of pāramitā. Nothing moves him, neither people nor things: he keeps a cool indifference towards the people who flatter him, the benefactors who cover him with their gifts, the women who seek to seduce him, the enemies who persecute him. He endures with equal facility the external sufferings caused by cold or heat, wind or rain, and the internal sufferings coming from old age, sickness and death. It is the same insofar as his own passions are concerned: although he does not give himself up to them unreservedly, he avoids cutting them so as not to be hemmed in like an arhat in an egotistic complete quietude; whatever the case, his mind stays open to movements of great pity and great compassion. But it is by means of dharmaṃkṣānti that he attains the pinnacle of patience: he tirelessly investigates the Buddhadharmas which teaches him not to adopt any definite philosophical position, which shows him universal emptiness but forbids him to conceptualize it.

Chapter XXVI-XXVII. - Throughout the entire Buddhist Path, the adept of the Lesser Vehicle displays a growing exertion (vīrya) in order to ensure himself the conquest of the ‘good dharmas’ or, if you wish, spiritual benefits. But the bodhisattva is much less preoccupied with the paths of salvation; in his pāramitā of exertion, he ceaselessly travels the world of transmigration in order to bring help to beings plunged in the unfortunate destinies. As long as he has not assured the safety of an infinite number of unfortunates beings, he will never relax his bodily and mental exertion.

Chapter XXVIII. - For the purification of the mind, the āryavaka had built up a discipline of rapture (dīhāna), a grandiose but complicated monument of religious psychology in which India excelled. The de-intoxication of the mind is a long-winded job: the candidate for sainthood must resolutely turn away from the five sense pleasures and triumph over the five faults which constitute an obstacle to concentrating the mind by means of an appropriate method. Then he must ascend one after the other the nine successive absorptions (navānapāramitās) which lead to the destruction of consciousness and sensation (samjñāvedayatanaśrota), a state which constitutes nirvāṇa on earth. In addition, a large number of secondary absorptions become grafted onto these main concentrations. In the pāramitā of dīhāna, the bodhisattva manifests a virtuosity much superior to that of the āryavaka; he enters at will and whenever he wishes into the concentration of his choice, but his complete disinterestedness prevents him from enjoying its flavor. The principal aim of his mental form of asceticism is to introduce ignorant and unfortunate beings to the purity of mystical states. Personally, he is disinterested because, from the point of view of the Prajñā, distraction and concentration of the mind are equal; the sole motive that guides him is his great pity and great compassion for beings.
Although the Treatise comes under the literature of the Greater Vehicle, the reader will see all the major individuals of early Buddhism pass under it. In unedited detail, the Treatise tells the twofold assault against Śākyamuni by Māra and his daughters (p. 880-884F); 986-987F, the return of the Buddha to Kapilavastu and the freeing of Eivyōharā to win him back (p. 1001-1008F), the Devavatāra and the culmination in Saṃkṣatāya (p. 634-638F), the schism of Kauśāmbī (p. 896-908F) and the various attempts perpetrated by Devadatta to supplant the Buddha and to take his life (p. 868-878F). The Treatise dedicates a whole chapter to the story of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana (p. 621-623F); it tells the slander of which these two great disciples were the victims on the part of Koṅkali (p. 806-813F); it gives the reasons that determined Śāriputra to renounce the Greater Vehicle (p. 701F). It narrates several episodes marking the life of the disciples and contemporaries of Śākyamuni; the temptation of Aniruddha by the goddesses of charming body (p. 651-653F), the involuntary dance of Koṅkali (p. 654F, 1046-1047F), the ostentatious charity of Veḷāna (p. 677-688F), the punishment of Devadatta and Udāraka (p. 693-694F, 875F), the inquisitive and futile questions of Māhālikaputra (p. 913-915F), the fabulous wealth of Meṅgālā (p. 930-931F), the misadventures of the arhat Losaka-tisya (p. 931-932F), the laziness and frivolousness of the bhikṣu Āśīvakā
d and Puravasavāka (p. 937F), the visit of king Bimbisāra to the courtesan Ānupallī (p. 990-992F), the cruelty of king Udayana towards the five hundred rṣis (p. 993F), the punishment incurred by Udāraka Rāmaputra, immediately attached to his absorption (p. 1050-1052F), the anxieties of the Śākyā Mahānāma (p. 1082-1083F), the humiliating defeat of the brahmācārin Viṭāvalīda reduced to silence by the Buddha (p. 1084-1090F), the entry into the religious life of the brahmācārin Mārgasīra (p. 1085-1088). By contrast, the present volume is strangely reticent on the lofty individuals of the Mahāyāna: it mentions only in passing the name of the bodhisattvas Sarvasattvapriyadarśana (p. 751F), Mahājadūrī (p. 754, 903F), Vajrapātra
(p. 802F), Vimalakirti (p. 902, 1044F), Dharmasthithi (p. 902F) and Maṅgālā (p. 930F); it is to the latter and to Mahājaudūrī that it attributes, without firmly believing it, the compilation of the Mahāyānasūtras (p. 940F).

*** *** ***

The Treatise cites, at length or in extracts, about a hundred sūtras of the Lesser Vehicle; the majority are borrowed from the Āgama collections; when the Sanskrit version departs from the Pāli version, it is always the former that is adopted; furthermore, the Treatise often refers to unknown Pāli sūtras, such as the Nandikāsūtra (p. 792-793F, 798F, 803F, 815-816F, 817-818F) and the sūtra on Cosmogony (p. 835-837F).
Several sūtras are cited in the elaborated form which they have received in the post-canonical scriptures:
this is notably the case for the Veḷānasūtra (p. 677-688F) taken from a certain Avaṇḍāsūtra, for the Āśīvakāsūtra (p. 702-707F) taken from the Ta pan pīn avatāra (see note, p. 705F), and for the Koṅarakā (p. 896-898F), probably borrowed from the versified account in the Ta chouàn yen louen king.
Although it abundantly cites the sūtras of the Lesser Vehicle, the Treatise occasionally calls upon the Mahāyāna sūtras of which it is the interpreter. We will note only a loan from the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka (p. 752F), two quotations from the Vimalakīrtinirdesaśīrṣā (p. 902, 1044F) and a few vague references to the Pañcavimśatā (p. 1060F, 1091F, 1112F). However, the Treatise reproduces fully (p. 1060-1065F) the well-known Priyājīpatramiśrīstotra of Rāhuśabhadra, teacher or disciple of Nāgārjuna. As P. Déméville has noted, the original Sanskrit of this stotra is reproduced at the head of many manuscripts of the Priyājīpatra. Otherwise, the author of the Treatise is by no means sectarian: he understands that many fragments of truth may be found outside works properly Buddhist, free of contradicting them; he does not hesitate to cite the Upaniṣads (p. 744F, 1073F) and other sūtras of the heretics (p. 1073F).

In the course of Volume I (see, for example, p. 104F, n. 1), we have noted that the Treatise uses the Sarvāstivādin and Mālasarvāstivādin Vinayas in preference over all the others. The present volume has frequent recourse to the second; it borrows from it the essence of the teachings on Śrīputra (p. 621-633F), Devadatta (p. 868-878F) and Yasiđharī (p. 1001-1012F). On the other hand, the author of the Treatise undoubtedly has never had the Pāli Vinaya in his own hands.

This volume also contains a good sixty jātakas, avadīnas, fables and apologies. The author has drawn heavily from collections such as the Kalpanāmanḍāštikā, the Aśokavādinā, the Vībhāṣa, the Tsa p’i yu king, the Tchong king, etc. Although most of these stories are already familiar to us from the works of Chavannes, the version of the Treatise claims the reader’s attention by means of important variants. Among the tales which, under various titles, are most interesting, we may mention the story of the painter of Chavannes, the version of the Treatise claims the reader’s attention by means of important variants. Among the tales which, under various titles, are most interesting, we may mention the story of the painter of Chavannes, the version of the Treatise claims the reader’s attention by means of important variants.

The present volume has been greatly benefited by help and support which, as a result of circumstances, was cruelly missing from the previous volume. New tools of research have been used; the list may be found in the supplement to the abbreviations. P. Déméville has been kind enough to review several passages that gave me difficulty and has given me precious references; my colleagues, Professor A. Monin and J. Mogenet, have corrected the proofs; the Fondation Universitaire of Belgium has generously continued its financial support. To all my devoted friends I give my deepest thanks.

Ét. Lamotte.
FOUCHER, La route de l'Inde = A. FOUCHER, La vieille route de l'Inde de Bactres à Taxila, 2 vol. (Mem. de la Délégation arch. franç. en Afghanistan, T. I), Paris, 1942-47.

Koiskārīkā = The text of the Abhidharmakośaśāstra of Vasubandhu, ed. By V. V. GOKHALE. Reprint from the Journ. of the Bombay Branch, RAS, N. S., vol. 22, 1946, p. 73-102. [edition of the manuscript of the Abhidhamma-kośaśāstra discovered in 1935 in the Tibetan monastery of Ngor by RAHULA SAMKRTYAYANA].

LAW, India in Early Texts = B. C. LAW, India as described in Early Texts of Buddhism and Jainism, London, 1941.

LAW, Pañchulas = B. C. LAW, Pañchulas and their Capital Abhichchatra (MASI, no. 67), Delhi, 1942.

LAW, Rājaçrīka = B. C. LAW, Rājaçrīka in Ancient Literature (MASI, No 58), Delhi, 1938.

LAW, Śrāvasti = B. C. LAW, Śrāvasti in Indian Literature (MASI, No 50), Delhi, 1935.

LONGHURST, Nāgārjunakonda = A. H. LONGHURST, The Buddhist Antiquities of Nāgārjunacanḍa (MASI, no. 54), Delhi, 1938.

MARSHALL-FOUCHER, Mon. of Sanchi = Sir J. MARSHALL, A. FOUCHER, Monuments of Sanchi, 3 vol., Delhi, no date (1938?).

MASC = Memoirs of the Archaeological Survey of Ceylon, Colombo, from 1924.

P. P. Ṛṣayā = E. CONZE, Text, Sources and Bibliography of the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra, JRAS, 1948, p. 38-51.

RAY, Maurya and Śāṅkga Art = N. R. RAY, Maurya and Śāṅkga Art, Calcutta, 1945.

SASTRI, Nālanda = H. SASTRI, Nālanda and its Epigraphic Material (MASI, no. 66), Delhi, 1942.

Traité, I = Vol. 1 of the present work.

VÖGEL, Budd. Art = J. PH. VÖGEL, Buddhist Art in India, Ceylon and Java, Oxford, 1936.

CHAPTER XVI: THE STORY OF ŚĀRIPUTRA

Sūtra: The Buddha said to Śāriputra (Tatra khalu Bhagavān āyuṣmanataṃ Śāriputram ṣaṃpravṛṭām āsada). Śāstra: Question. – The Prājñāpāramitā is the system (dharmā) of the bodhisattva-mahāsattvas. Why does the Buddha address himself here to Śāriputra and not to the bodhisattvas?

Answer. - Of all the disciples of the Buddha, Śāriputra is by far the foremost in wisdom (prajñā). A stanza of the Buddha says:

“Except for the Buddha Bhagavat, the knowledge (jñāna) of all beings would not equal a sixteenth part compared with the wisdom (prajñā) and learning (bhuhūrata) of Śāriputra,”

I. ŚĀRIPUTRA AT THE FESTIVAL OF GIRYAGRAMĀSĀJA

Furthermore, by his wisdom (prajñā) and his learning (bhuhūrata), Śāriputra possessed great qualities (guna). In his youth, at the age of eight, he recited the eighteen kinds of sacred books and understood the meaning of all the treatises. At that time, there were two nāga-kings (nāgarāja) at Mo k’ie’o (Maghadā): the first was called Ki lī (Giri) and the second A k’i’e io (Agra). They brought the rain at the proper time and the country did not experience the years of famine. The people were grateful to them and regularly, in the second month of spring (citra), they went in a crowd to the nāga to hold a great festival (mahāsamāja): they played music (vadya) and palavered the whole day. From early times up until today, this assembly was never missed and to this reunion was given the same name as that of the nāgas [namely, giriyagramāsāja].

On that day, it was customary to set up four high seats (bāṣya), the first for the king, the second for the crown prince (kumāra), the third for the prime minister (mahāmāyūra) and the fourth for the scholar (vādīya). One day, Śāriputra, who was eight years of age, asked the crowd for whom were the high seats set up. They answered that they were for the king, the crown prince, the prime minister and the scholar. Then Śāriputra reviewed (parīkṣate) the people of his time [and saw] that, among the brahmins, etc., nobody surpassed him in intelligence (abhijñā), charm (prasadā) and beauty of appearance; he therefore mounted the seat of the scholar and sat there cross-legged (paravyakhān buddhīva). The people were astounded; some said: “He is a young fool who does not know anything”; others said: “The measure of his wisdom surpasses that of men”.

While admiring his bravery, everyone felt uneasy and, out of regard for his young age, abstained from debating with him. Then they sent their young students to engage him in conversation and question him: Śāriputra’s answers were perfect and his arguments conclusive, the scholars cried out at this wonder (ādbhuta). A stanza of the Buddha says:

“Of all the disciples of the Buddha, the Buddha address himself here to Śāriputra,”

The conversion of Śāriputra (= Upatissa) to this new faith, Śāriputra went immediately to find his friend Giri and Agra: again, a false etymology has given rise to a myth. In reality, Giryagrasamāja means simply a festival reunion on the summit of the mountain. Buddhaghosa was not deceived by it and correctly explains: Giryagrasamāja ti girinī aṣāsamājanam givita eva padade samajī. On the nature of this festival, see E. Hardy in Album Kau, p. 61-66. It was a great seasonal festival (Ta tāe hōe) celebrated at Rājagaha and in turn (T 1444, k. 1, p. 1024a19) on each of the five great mountains surrounding the city (T 190, k. 48, p. 874a). The Mppsi tells us that it lasted the entire day and took place ‘in the second month of spring’, i.e., the month of Citra; this indication allows us to correct the reading of the Avadannāsāka, ii, 24, girīvalgusamājanam to girīvalgusamājanam: “reunion [of the month] of Phālāgana on the mountain”. Like all reunions (samajī) of this kind, the festival included spectacles, songs, dancing and music (Mahāvata, iii, p. 57; Mppsi, ii, 24-25; Dīkṣa, iii, p. 183); special seats were reserved for individuals (T 1444, k. 1, p. 1024a).

This is probably the natal village of Śāriputra, situated a half-day’s journey from Rājagaha: it was called Nīlā or Nīlandā (Mahāvata, iii, p. 56, 1, 6; Fo pen hing tāi king, T 190, k. 47, p. 277e; Kṃ pen chōo... t’h’o kia che, T 1444, k. 1, p. 1022b; Fa hiem, tr. Legge, p. 81); Kālāpunaka (Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 924c14); or also Upatissa (Dhammapadattā, i. p. 99).

The conversion of Śāriputra (= Upatissa and Maudgalyāyana (= Kolita) is well-known in Buddhism; in search of the Immortal, the two friends began first at the school of Sañjaya who was not slow in making them his disciples; one day on the outskirts of Rājagaha, Śāriputra met the blinding Aśvāmit (= Upasena) who taught him one stanza, the Buddhist credo: ye dharmā hetaṃvabhūdāḥ; converted to this new faith, Śāriputra went immediately to find his friend Maudgalyāyana and they both went to the Buddha who preached his Dharma to them and conferred ordination on them. – This tale has been the object of a twofold tradition: in the old tradition, Sañjaya is presented in an unfavorable light, as an obstinate heretic; in the more recent tradition, to which the Mppi adheres, Sanjaya appears as a precursor of the Buddha.

Chinese sources: Wen fen liu, T 1421, k. 16, p. 110b-c; Seu fen liu T 1428, k. 33, p. 796c-799b; P’ou yao tchou chin li, T 193, k. 1, p. 4b; Tchou sen liu, T 1464, k. 1, p. 81b; Tch ou pen li k’i king, T 196, k. 1, p. 153b; Ta tai king, T 397, k. 19, p. 129a; Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 924c-925a (tr. Beal, II, p. 177-179).

According to various sources, Sañjaya, Śāriputra’s and Maudgalyāyana’s precursor, is none other than Sañjaya Vaiśravāṭṭha (Mahāvastu, III, p. 59, l. 9), Śāriyāja Belathiputta in Pāli, one of the six well-known heretic masters. The agnostic doctrines which he professed (cf. Dīgha, I, p. 58) connect him closely with the Amārāvīlikēpika, crafty sophists who, in debate, “brash about like eels” (Dīgha, I, p. 27). Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana soon surpassed their teacher and the latter entrusted some of his disciples to them (Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 90). Informed about the Buddha by Āsajitṛa, Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana decided to embrace the new faith and invited their former teacher to follow them; but Sañjaya tried to hold them back (Vin. I, p. 42; Mahāvastu, III, p. 65). Fo pen hing tsi king, T 190, k. 49, p. 877b), or at least refused to accompany them on the pretext that a teacher such as he could no longer learn from anyone else (Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 94). Finding himself abandoned by Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana and five hundred other disciples, Sañjaya became sick: “hot blood spurted forth from his mouth” (unham kolitam mukhatu uggacchi; Vi, I, p. 42; Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 95). The Fo pen hing tsi king (T 190, k. 48, p. 877b) adds that this spitting of blood cost him his life; but according to the Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 95, he recovered and those of the disciples who had abandoned him returned. Subsequently, he engaged in debate with the Buddha (Dīvīyavādaṇa, p. 145).

II. More Recent tradition. – It is represented by several late texts, such as the Mppi (k. II, p. 136b-c; k. 40, p. 359a, k. 42, p. 368b), the Mīlāsanavāṭṭhī Vinaya (T 1444, k. 2, p. 102sa-c; Rockhill, Jas, II, p. 44-45) and also perhaps the Tch’ou fen liu chouo king, T 498, k. 2, p. 768a-b. Sañjaya, the teacher of Śāriputra and M.; in front of them, he maintains that he has found the Path, but he announces to them the birth of the Buddha at Kapilavatūta, recommends that they join him and enter his order. Śāriputra and M. conduct a splendid funeral for Sañjaya for they suspect him of having discovered the immortal path (prasannyātā) and let themselves be led by desire (kāma). This sickness of desire (viprasanendriya) causes them to suffer. Upatissvādaṇa, II, p. 561-566.

Here is the translation of the passage of the Mīlāsanavāṭṭhī. Vin. relating to Sañjaya. It is similar in all details to the story of the Mppi.

Ken pen chou...tch’ou kia che, T 1444, k. 2, p. 1026 a-c: At that time there was a teacher called Chan chu ji (Sañjaya). Upatissvādaṇa (Śāriputra) and Kolita (= Maudgalyāyana) went to him and asked: “Where is the master resting?" They were told: “The master is in his room.” Hearing this, they had this thought: “We have been here for a long time; we have not heard that he is resting.” Then Kolita [and his companion] thought again: “This man is resting; we should not wake him suddenly; let us wait near his bed and then we will see him.” Having said that, they hid behind a screen. Then Sañjaya woke from his sleep and his senses were calmed (viprasanendriya). The two friends, seeing him, approached and said: “Sir, do you have the Dharma-eye (dharma-cakṣa)? What doctrine do you profess? What are your benefits (viśayas)? What bhūmikā conduct (bhūmikacaryā) do you practice? What fruition (phala) have you received?” He answered: “This is what I see and this is what I say: Avoid falsehood (mriṣṭitva); do no harm to beings (satyavr̥ti); do not be born (anupāda), do not die (anuvāpa) and do not disappear (aniruddha); be reborn among the two [classes] of Brahmādevās.” The two friends asked him the meaning of these words. He answered: “To avoid falsehood is the religious life (pravrajyā), to do no harm is the root (nīdāṇa) of all the dharmas; the place where there is neither birth nor death, neither falling nor disappearance, etc., is nirvāna; to be reborn among the two [classes] of Brahmā is the bhūmikā conduct (bhūmikacaryā) practiced by the bhūmis: all seek this place.” Having heard these words, the two friends said to him: “O Venerable One, we would like to embrace this religious life and practice bhūmikā conduct. They entered the religious life under him and at once the news spread everywhere that Kolita and [his friend] had entered into religion with Sañjaya.

One day, Sañjaya, who possessed great wealth (dīlāḍhi), had this thought: “I used to belong to the Xiao thou (Kaṇḍāṇya) family and still today, as a member of this family, I have great wealth. I should not forget these two virtuous companions. That would not be good on my part.” Having thought thus, Sañjaya, who had five hundred disciples under his direction, gave them to the two friends; each of them received two hundred and fifty pupils and they agreed to teach them the doctrine.

Then Sañjaya became sick. Upatissvādaṇa said to Kolita: “The master is sick. Would you go and look for medicines or do you want to care for him?” Kolita answered: “You have wisdom (prajñā), you should care for him; I will go to find medicines.” Kolita went to look for herbs, roots, stems, flowers, etc., he gave them to his teacher to ate them. But the illness grew worse.

One day, the master laughed softly. Upatissvādaṇa said to him: “Great men cannot laugh without reason, but our teacher has just laughed; what is the reason?” The master replied: “It is just as you said: I need to laugh. In Kaśmīra (Svarapati), there was a king called Kin chou (Svarapati); he died and was going to be cremated; his grieving widow threw herself into the fire. People are fools (māndaka) and let themselves be led by desire (kāma). This sickness of desire (viprasanendriya) causes them to suffer.” Upatissvādaṇa asked him in what year, what month and what day this event had taken place. Sañjaya specified the year, the month, the day and the hour. The two friends took note of this revelation.

Again they asked their teacher: “We have left the world (praprajñātā) in order to cut transmission (samsīlua) and the master has welcomed us. We would like him to tell us if he has succeeded in cutting samsīra.” Sañjaya answered: “When I left the world, it was for the same purpose as you; but I have obtained nothing. However, during the posada of the fifteenth, a group of devas in the sky (ākāsika) spoke the following prediction: In
At that time, the master of the oracles had a son whose name was Kiu liu t'o (Kolita)9 and the name of the family was Ta mos k'ien lian (Mahāmaudgālayana). Shiriputra was his friend. Shiriputra was outstanding for his talents and his intelligence, Maudgalyāyana for his fearlessness and vivacity. These two children were equal in talent and wisdom and also in qualities and conduct. [They were inseparable] when they went out, it was together; when they returned, it was together. When they were a little older, they made an agreement of eternal friendship. Then, both of them experiencing disgust for the world (lokasaṃsarga), they left home (pravaśa) to practice the Path (mārga), became disciples of a brahmacarin and diligently sought entry into the Path (margadvāra). For a long time this had no result. They questioned their teacher, Chan chô ye (Sahājaya) by name, who answered: “I myself have spent long years seeking the Path and I do not even know whether the fruit of the path (mārgaphala) exists or not. I am not the man you need; I have found nothing.” One day their master fell ill. Shiriputra stood at his head and Maudgalyāyana at his feet; the teacher gasped for breath and his life reached its end. Suddenly he smiled with pity. The two friends, with one accord, asked him why he smiled. The teacher replied: “The customs of the world (lokasaṃsvrity) are blind and affected by the emotions (amanaye). I see that the king of Kin (Suvarṇabhumi) has just died and his main wife has thrown herself on the funeral pyre to join him; but for these two spouses, the retribution for actions (karmanipāla) is different and the places where they will be reborn (jannasahātā) will be different (vāsita).” Then the two disciples put down their teacher’s words in writing in order to verify their accuracy [later]. Some time later, when a merchant from Suvarṇabhumi came to Magadhā, the two friends questioned him discretely; the things their teacher had said had actually occurred.10 They uttered a sigh of 9 Kolita is also the name of the village where he was born (Mahāvastu, III, p. 56; Dhammapadāthā, I, p. 88); it was located a half-yojana from Rājagaha. The reading Kolikā is found in the Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 47, p. 874a5; and the Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 9, p. 924b17; Lin yuan “Forest garden” in the Ken pen chouo tch’ou kia che, T 1444, k. 1, p. 1023c18.

---

10 If this story is correct, it proves that the practice of sutter, the widow offering her life in the flames of the funeral pyre consuming the corpse of her husband, was current in Suvarṇabhumi at the time of the Buddha. This is of interest because, in all the Vedic literature and even in the sūtras, this cruel practice is rarely mentioned, and the epics of the Rāmaśāstra and the Mahābhārata mention it only exceptionally (cf. J. Jolly, Recht und Sitt, p. 67-69). The oldest and most important evidence is that of the classical writers: Aristotle, contemporary of Alexander the Great, cited by Strabo, XV, 1, 63; Cicero, De nat. deorum, V, 77-78; Valerius Maximus, II, 6, 14. The Mppi reproduces here almost word-for-word the story in the Mīlasavātīdīn Vinaya (see below, p. 626f as note); but, while Kumārajīva, translator of the Mppi, locates the fact in Kin ti, “Land of Gold” (Suvarṇabhumi), Yi tsing, translator of the Mīlasavātīdīn Vinaya, locates it in Kin tchou “Golden Island” (Suvarṇadvipa). As it is a matter of the same story, we must conclude – and this is suspected – that Suvarṇabhumi is synonymous with Suvarṇadvipa. We know exactly what Yi tsing means by Suvarṇabhumi in two passages of his Ta t’ang si yu k’iou fa kao seng tcheun, T 2066, k. 2, p. 11c, lines 5 and 7, lines 5 and 11, he identifies it as the land of Fo che (cf. Chavannes, Religieux éminents, p. 181 and 182; and 186 and 187). But at the time of Yi tsing (635-713), the state of Fo che on the or frontier countries, i.e., Suvarṇabhumi, was current in Suvarṇabhumi, Aiy angar, p. 62, which Chavannes, Religieux éminents, p. 56, which Chavannes, Religieux éminents, p. 62, which went to Rājagṛha together to welcome the news. At this time, a bhikṣu named Aśvajit,\(^{13}\) one of the first five disciples, wearing his robes (cīvara) and carrying his begging bowl (pātra), entered the city to beg for his food. Śāriputra, noting his fine manner and his meditative faculties, came to him and asked: “Whose disciple are you? Who is your teacher?” Aśvajit answered: “The crown prince (kumāra) of the Sākya clan, disgusted by the sufferings of old age (jarā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (marana), has left the world (pravrajita), exerted himself on the Path and has attained complete perfect enlightenment (anuttarasaṃyaktābhisamābhinītā). He is my teacher.” Śāriputra said: “Tell me what is your teacher’s doctrine?” He replied with this stanza:

---

503

I am still young,
My instruction in it is still at its beginning

[136c] How could I speak truthfully
And explain the mind of the Tathāgata?
Śāriputra said to him: “Tell me its essence in summary (samskṛtavāṇa).”
Then the bhikṣu Aśvajit spoke this stanza:
All dharmas arise from causes;
He has taught the cause of these dharmas.
Dharmas cease due to causes;
The great teacher has taught the truth of them.\(^{14}\)

When Śāriputra heard this stanza, he attained the first fruit of the Path [the state of srotāpāṇa]. He went back to Mahāyāna who, noticing the color of his complexion and his cheerfulness, asked him: “Have you found the taste of the Immortal (amṛtasaṃsāra)? Share it with me.” Śāriputra communicated to him the stanza he had just heard. Mahāyāna said to him: “Repeat it again”, and when he had heard it again he also attained the first fruit of the Path.

\(^{13}\) This bhikṣu is named Aśvajit (in Pāli, Asājo) in most of the Chinese and Pāli sources, whereas the Mahāvastu (III, p. 60) calls him Upāwana. He was one of the five Paticcasamuccayabhikṣus, who were the first to embrace the Buddha dharma (Vinaya, I, p. 1).

\(^{14}\) Free translation of the famous stanza of Pratītyasamutpāda, the original Pāli of which is in Vinaya, I, p. 40:

\[yo \text{ dharmān hetuprabhāvā āhān teśām teśām hetaññātā āhāna} \]
\[teśām ca yo nirodho evanvālā mahābhūtamo.\]

The Sanskrit is in Mahāvastu, III, p. 62:

\[yo \text{ dharmān hetuprabhāvā āhān teśaṃ hetaññātā āhāna} \]
\[teśām ca yo nirodho evanvālā mahābhūtamo.\]

In this form, which goes against the meter, the stanza means: The Tathāgata, the truly great ascetic, has proclaimed the cause as well as the cessation of dharmas that arise from a cause. – For the interpretation, see Kern, Histoire, I, p. 299-300.

III. CONVERSION OF ŚĀRIPUTRA AND MAUDGALYĀYANA\(^{12}\) (630F)

At that time the Buddha, having converted the Kaśyapa brothers and their thousand disciples, was traveling about in various countries and came to the city of Rājagṛha where he stayed at the Venuvana. The two brahmācārin masters (Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana), hearing that a Buddha had appeared in the world, (Gavāṃpati) had brought thirty-two teeth of the Buddha and placed them in a dzedi (caya) on Mount Ind-Danou north-west of Thanam (in Pāli, capital of Burma, between the mouths of the Sittang and the Saloum).” (Biqander, Gaudama, p. 371). Even today, Gavāṃpati, under the name Gavompade, is one of the favorite saints of the Mons and the Taingon sof Burma (cf. Dansóile, cited in Przylucki. Concile, p. 241). – After the third council at Pātaliputra, Sonya (the Prakrit word for gold) and Uttara went to Suvannabhūmi, rid the land of the piēcas and converted many people there (cf. Dīpavamsa, VIII, v. 12; Mahāvamsa, XII, v. 6, 44 seq.; Samantapāṇidīkā, I, p. 64.

- In the first century of our era, Pomponius Mela (III, 70), Pliny the Elder (VI, 55, 80), the Périple of the Eurythean Sea (I 56, 60, 63) and Josephus (Ant. Jud., VIII, 6, 4) were only vaguely aware of the Chryé Cerosenes.

“Whereas the Périple (§ 60) places at Kamara (Khabari of Pulemy = Kāvāri-pāṭhama at the mouth of the Kaver), at Podouke (Podonchei) and Sopatama, the three great ports, close to one another, from which the big ships called kolanda (kola in Buddhist Sanskrit texts) set sail for Chryse, Pulemy (VII, 1, 5) locates further north, near Chacicalo, the port of departure (spharonion) of travelers destined for the Golden Cerosenes. It is at Tānmulūpip (Tānulūpip at the mouths of the Ganges) that the Chinese pilgrims, Fa hien at the beginning of the 5th century and Ysina at the end of the 7th century embarked in the return voyages from India to China. Without a doubt, it is also at Tānmulūpip that, at the time of the compilation of the Jātakas, the merchants [Śāṅkha and Mahā Janaka] left Benares or Cambū, in the Ganges valley, took to sea destined for Suvannabhūmi, the land of gold (Jātaka, IV, p. 15; VI, p. 34. Finally it is certain that the great ports of the western coast: Bhabaraka (Greek Barygasa, modern Broach), Śāripūra (Sopparā, Soparā) were connected with the Golden Cerosenes” G. Coedès, États hindouisées, p. 35.

This is the case notably for the musician Saγga in his search for the beautiful Sussond, who embarked at Barakaccha destined for Suvannabhūmi (Jātaka, III, p. 188). The merchants of the Mahākāmarāvibhāga went down to the great ocean, sailed for the Land of Gold and other countries, visited the Archipelago and made their fortunes (p. 51: mahākāmarāvibhāgaḥ attavyata Suvannabhūmīnāpaveśitāḥ dasāvaraṇaṁ gatārūpāvaśitān ca pāyati dvaraprayaṇān ca karanti); or also: “They visited the Land of Gold, the island of Ceylon, and the rest of the Archipelago” (p. 53: Suvannabhūmīni śīlahalāśpam ca prabhūtāt ca deśaṣṭhānaṁ ca pāyati). But the voyage is dangerous: when the sailors have traveled “seven hundred leagues in seven days”, it is not rare that the ships take on water everywhere and sink in mid-ocean.

11 This covenant between the two friends is also noted in the other sources: cf. Vinaya, I, p. 39: yo pathama anamata additthaca now devetet; Mahāvastu, III, p. 59: yo maha prathamastaram sādhyaṁ savvāhīyataṁ dharmavivekana... tena aparaya dikkhyavayam.

12 Cf. the parallel sources noted above, p. 623F, n.2

13 Free translation of the famous stanza of Pratītyasamutpāda, the original Pāli of which is in Vinaya, I, p. 40:

\[yo \text{ dharmān hetuprabhāvā āhān teśām hetaññātā āhāna} \]
\[teśām ca yo nirodho evanvālā mahābhūtamo.\]

The Sanskrit is in Mahāvastu, III, p. 62:

\[yo \text{ dharmān hetuprabhāvā āhān teśaṃ hetaññātā āhāna} \]
\[teśām ca yo nirodho evanvālā mahābhūtamo.\]
The two teachers, each accompanied by 250 disciples went together to the Buddha. Seeing these two men coming with their disciples, the Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “Do you see these two men at the head of these brahmācārins?” The bhikṣus answered that they saw them. The Buddha continued: “These two men will be foremost among my disciples by their wisdom (prajñā) and by the bases of miraculous powers (rājādāyā).” Arriving in the crowd, the disciples approached the Buddha, bowed their head and stood to one side. Together they asked the Buddha: “We wish to receive, in the Buddhādharma, the leaving of the Dharma (dhamarājya), and in the stage of aspirant (śākyabhiṣēka), penetrate directly (abhūvakṣam) all dharmas and recognize them in all their various aspects (nārāyana). This is why Śāriputra attained arhathood at the end of a fortnight. His qualities (guna) of all kinds were very numerous. And so, although Śāriputra was an arhat [and not a bodhisattva], it is to him that the Buddha preached the profound doctrine (gabhūvadharma) of the Pāḷitājñatāmata.

Question. — If that is so, why does the Buddha preach a little to Śāriputra and then a lot to Śūra p’ou i t’i (Subhūti)? If Śāriputra is foremost in wisdom, it is to him he should have mainly preached. Why does he also address himself to Subhūti?

Answer. — 1) Among the Buddha’s disciples, Śāriputra is the first of the sages (ago maḥapādānā), and Subhūti is the first of those who have attained the concentration of tranquility (ago arunāsavādānā). By this practice of tranquility, he ceaselessly considers (mahāpānā) beings in order to prevent them from experiencing any passion whatsoever [for him], and he always practices great compassion (karunā). This compassion is like that of the bodhisattvas who take the great vow (mahāprajñāpāramitā) to save beings. This is why the Buddha directs him to teach.

[137a] 2) [Subhūti and Upalavarnā at Śāṃkāvū.] Furthermore, Subhūti excels in practicing the concentration of emptiness (śūnyatāmādī). Having spent the summer retreat (varsa) among the Tao li (Trāyastriyā) gods, the Buddha came down into Jambudvīpa. Subhūti, who was then in a rock cave (Dīrghanakha), Śāriputra attained arhathood. Now he who finds the Path at the end of a fortnight should, following the Buddha, turn the wheel of the Dharma (dhammacakra), and in the stage of aspirant (śākyabhiṣēka), penetrate directly (abhūvakṣam) all dharmas and recognize them in all their various aspects (nārāyana). This is why Śāriputra attained arhathood at the end of a fortnight. His qualities (guna) of all kinds were very numerous. And so, although Śāriputra was an arhat [and not a bodhisattva], it is to him that the Buddha preached the profound doctrine (gabhūvadharma) of the Pāḷitājñatāmata.

507

508
śailaguhā), said to himself: “The Buddha is descending from the Trāyastriṃśa heaven; should I or should I not go to him?” Again he said to himself: “The Buddha has always said: ‘If someone contemplates the dharmakāya of the Buddha with the eye of wisdom (prajñākarṣṇa), that is the best way of seeing the Buddha.’” Then when the Buddha descended from the Trāyastriṃśa heaven, the four assemblies of Jambudvīpa had gathered; the gods saw the people and the people saw the gods; on the platform were the Buddha, a noble cakravartin king and the great assembly of the gods: the gathering (samajjha) was more embellished (aṃjñāka) than ever before. But Subhūti said to himself: “Even though today’s great assembly is quite special (viśīṣṭa), its power (prabhava) will not last for a long time. Perishable dharmas (nirvāṇadharmas) all return to impermanence (aniyatā).” Thanks to this consideration of impermanence (aniyataparikṣā), he understood that all dharmas are empty (śūnya) and without reality (asaññha). Having made this consideration, he at once obtained the realization of the Path (mūḍhaśāntākāra). At that moment, everyone were wont to see the first to see the Buddha and to pay their respect (sankhriṣṭa) and homage (piṭjñā) to him.

In order to disguise her disreputable sex, the bhikṣuṇi Hou sa śū (Utpalavāra) transformed herself into a noble cakravartin king with his seven jewels and his thousand sons. When people saw him, they left their seats and moved away [to give him place]. When this fickle king came near the Buddha, he resumed his former shape and became the bhikṣuṇi again. She was the first to greet the Buddha. However, the Buddha said to the bhikṣuṇi: “It is not you who has greeted me first; it is Subhūti. How is that? By contemplating the emptiness of all dharmas, Subhūti has seen the dharmakāya of the Buddha; he has paid the true homage (piṭjñā), the excellent homage. To come to see my birth-body (janamakāya) is not to pay homage to me.”

This is why we said that Subhūti, who ceaselessly practices the concentration on emptiness, is associated (saṃprasyukan) with the Prajñāpāramitā, empty by nature. For this reason, the Buddha entrusted Subhūti to preach the Prajñāpāramitā.

3) Finally, the Buddha entrusted him to preach it because beings have faith in the arhats who have destroyed the impurities (śūnya). Finally, the Buddha entrusted him to preach it because beings have faith in the arhats who have not destroyed the impurities and if they were taken as evidence (śūnya).

IV. ORIGIN OF ŚĀRIPUTRA’S NAME (636f)

Question. – Where does the name Śāriputra come from? Is it a name given to Śāriputra by his father and mother, or is it a name coming from some meritorious action that he had accomplished?

Answer. – It is a name given to him by his father and mother. In Jambudvīpa, in the very fortunate [region], there is the kingdom of Mo k’ie t’o (Magadha); there is a great city there called Rājagaha; there was a king there named P’in p’o so lo (Bimbisāra) and a brāhmaṇa, master of teaching (upadeśa) [137b] named Mo i’ lo (Māthura). Because this man was very skillful in debate, the king had given him as a privilege a large village situated not far from the capital. This Māthu married and his wife bore a daughter; because the eyes of this young girl resembled those of the Chāli li (śāri, the heron) bird, she was called Śāri; later the mother bore a son whose knee-bones were very big, and for that reason he was called Kiu hi lo (Kautilha). After this brāhmaṇ married, he was busy raising his son and daughter; he forgot all the holy books he had studied and he did not put his mind to acquiring new knowledge.

At that time, there was in southern India, a brāhmaṇ, a great master of teaching, named T’i ch’o (Tisyā); he had penetrated deeply into the eighteen kinds of great holy books. This man came to the city of Rājagaha; on his head he was carrying a torch and his belly was covered with copper sheets; when he was asked the 24 This rock cave, adorned with jewels, is on the Gṛdhūkaṭaparvata, near Rājagaha: cf. Tseng yī a han, T 125, k. 6, p. 575h1-2; k. 29, p. 707c12.

25 This is also what the Buddha said to Vakkali (Sannyutta, III, p. 120): “What is the use of seeing this body of rotteness (piṇḍāyā)? He who sees the Dharma sees me...”

26 This paragraph has been translated by Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 290-294, the translation of which is reproduced here. - Śāriputra, also called Upāsiṣṣa, was the son of Tisyā and Śāri. The latter’s father was Māthu, a brāhmaṇ from Nalanda, and her brother was Mahākauṭhula, surnamed Dirghanaṅka. Cf. Mālasar. Vin. (N. Dutt, Gilgit Ms. of the Vāsinā Pūjā, IHQ, SIV, 1938, p. 422-423; Ken pen chou... tsh’ou kia che, T 1444, k. 1, p. 102b seq.; Rockhill, Life, p. 44); Avadānasāstra, II, p. 186; Po yuan king, T 200, k. 10, p. 255a; Treatise, I, p. 47-51F.

27 On the theme of the brāhmaṇ who carries a torch in full daylight, see Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 392-393.
Having become pregnant, this woman saw in a dream a man who, wearing a breastplate and a helmet and carrying a thunderbolt (vajra) in his hand, crushed the ordinary mountains and stood upright at the side of a very high mountain. When she awoke, she told her husband the dream she had had. Tiṣya said to her: “It is a sign that you will give birth to a son who will crush all the masters in the art of debate; there will be only one man whom he will not be able to overcome and he will become his disciple.” During her pregnancy, because of the son she was carrying, Śāri herself became very intelligent and very skillful in debate.\(^{28}\) Each time that her younger brother Kauṣṭhila debated with her, he was defeated; he said to himself: “The son whom my sister is bearing is certainly of high intelligence; if he shows himself in this way even before he is born, what will be like when he is born?” Then Kauṣṭhila left his family, gave himself up to study and went to the south of India; he did not cut his fingernails until he had read the eighteen kinds of holy books and had completely mastered them; this is why the people of that time summed him the Brāhmaṇ with Long Nails (Dīghanakha).\(^{29}\)

Seven days after he was born, the baby boy was wrapped in white cotton to be shown to his father who thought: “I am called Tiṣya; [this child] will drive out my name; therefore I will call him Yeou po i čhö (Upatiṣya), he who casts out Tiṣya.” Such was the name given to this child by his parents. But other people, considering that it was Śāri who had given him birth, with one accord agreed to call him Chī li fōu (Śāriputra), the son of Śāri.

Later, thanks to the previous vows he had made in many successive lifetimes, Śāriputra became foremost of Śākyamuni’s disciples in his wisdom; his name was Śāriputra; this name thus came to him from the causes and conditions that consist of his previous vows. That is why he is called Śāriputra.

Question. - Why not say Upatiṣya and why limit oneself to saying Śāriputra?

Answer. - People then highly honored his mother (Śāri) who was the most intelligent of all women, and that is why they called this man Śāriputra.

\[\cdots\] \[\cdots\] \[\cdots\]

Sūtra: The bodhisattva who wants to cognize all dhammas in all aspects must exert himself in practicing the Prajñāpāramitā (Sarvākṣarām Śāriputra sarvadharmān abhisambodhiḥkāmāna bodhisattvaḥ sarvadharmānā mahābhūtānā prajñāpāramitādīvīṃ yogāḥ karunāḥ).

Śāstra: See what has been said above on the bodhisattva-mahāsattva in the chapter dedicated to the praise of the bodhisattva (Chap. VIII).

\(^{28}\) On the theme of the woman intelligent because she is pregnant with a sage, see Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 241-244; Traditio, I, p. 47-48f.

\(^{29}\) The story of Kauṣṭhila, alias Dīghanakha, has been told above: Traditio, I, p. 47-51f.
4. In the inbreath and the outbreath (ānāpāna) there are also sixteen aspects:33 (i) attention to the inbreath (āsaṃsāmi prajñātī); (ii) attention to the long and the short breath (dīgham hrasvam āsāmi prajñātī); (iii) attention to the inbreath (āsaṃsāmi prajñātī); (iv) [knowledge that one is breathing in the entire body] (āvāsāmi prajñātī); (v) [knowledge that one is breathing] while having eliminated the bodily factors (prāthiṣṭhānaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (vi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while experiencing joy (śāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (vii) [knowing that one is breathing] while experiencing bliss (śukhaāsāmi prajñātī); (viii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while feeling the mental factors (cittamukhaśāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (ix) [knowledge that one is breathing] while gladdening the mind (vedaṃ gṛhaṃ kāyamānāsāmi prajñātī); (x) [knowledge that one is breathing] while liberating the mind (mānāśāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (xi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while liberating the mind (vedaṃ gṛhaṃ kāyamānāsāmi prajñātī); (xii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating impermanence (anityaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (xiii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating disappearance (vyavaharāśūmi āsāmi prajñātī); (xiv) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating renunciation (pratīcchāntarāśūmi āsāmi prajñātī); (xv) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating egotism (sattasaṃsāronti āsāmi prajñātī); (xvi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating depression (vyadhikṣānti āsāmi prajñātī).

V. SARVĀKĀRA (p. 640F)

4. In the inbreath and the outbreath (ānāpāna) there are also sixteen aspects:33 (i) attention to the inbreath (āsaṃsāmi prajñātī); (ii) attention to the outbreath (prātiṣṭhānaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (iii) attention to the long and the short breath (dīgham hrasvam āsāmi prajñātī); (iv) [knowledge that one is breathing in the entire body] (āvāsāmi prajñātī); (v) [knowledge that one is breathing] while having eliminated the bodily factors (prāthiṣṭhānaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (vi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while experiencing joy (śāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (vii) [knowing that one is breathing] while experiencing bliss (śukhaāsāmi prajñātī); (viii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while feeling the mental factors (cittamukhaśāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (ix) [knowledge that one is breathing] while gladdening the mind (vedaṃ gṛhaṃ kāyamānāsāmi prajñātī); (x) [knowledge that one is breathing] while liberating the mind (mānāśāntayaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (xi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while liberating the mind (vedaṃ gṛhaṃ kāyamānāsāmi prajñātī); (xii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating impermanence (anityaṃ āsāmi prajñātī); (xiii) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating disappearance (vyavaharāśūmi āsāmi prajñātī); (xiv) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating renunciation (pratīcchāntarāśūmi āsāmi prajñātī); (xv) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating egotism (sattasaṃsāronti āsāmi prajñātī); (xvi) [knowledge that one is breathing] while contemplating depression (vyadhikṣānti āsāmi prajñātī).

V. SARVĀKĀRA (p. 640F)

Answer. — The doors of wisdom (prajñākāra) are called aspects (ākāra).34 [138a] There are people who contemplate dharmas under a single prajñākāra; others contemplate it under two, three, ten, a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand prajñākārakas, even under a number of prajñākārakas as inaculable (asamudaya) as the number of sands of the Ganges (gaṅgānamālākāra). Here, it is by entering by all the prajñākārakas in all the aspects that we contemplate all the dharmas. This is what is called contemplating under all the aspects (sarvākāram).

1) Among ordinary people (prattāhāra), there are three kinds of contemplations (anupāya). To try to escape from desire (kāma) and form (rūpa), they contemplate the coarseness (pānasya), deceitfulness (vañcana) and corruption (kañciya) of the desire realm (kāmadhātu) and the form realm (rūpadhātu).

2) Among the Buddha’s disciples, there are eight kinds of contemplations (anupāya):35 [for them, everything] is impermanent (anītā), suffering (ādukkha), empty (āniyā), egoless (ānditamuca), like a sickness (āgosa), an ulcer (āgosa), like an arrow (ākāra) stuck in one’s body, like an agony (āgha).

3) These eight kinds of contemplations, applied to the four noble truths (āryasatyā), make sixteen aspects (ākāra) grouped into fours.36 These are:

The four aspects of contemplation on suffering (ādukkhasamudaya): (i) anītā, impermanent; (ii) ādukkha, suffering; (iii) āniyā, empty; (iv) ānditamuca, egoless.

The four aspects of the contemplation on the origin of suffering (ādukkhatasmudaya): (i) āryasatya, origin; (ii) ānitya, impermanent; (iii) ānditamuca, egoless; (iv) ānitya, condition.

The four aspects of contemplation on the cessation of suffering (ādukkhaśānta): (i) āryasadha, cessation; (ii) āniyā, empty; (iii) ānditamuca, egoless; (iv) ānitya, condition.

The four aspects of the contemplation on the Path (mārga): (i) mārga, Path; (ii) ānitya, origin; (iii) ānditamuca, egoless; (iv) ānitya, condition.

31 As the scriptures repeat ad nauseam: Bhikkhu ... te dhāmme aniccate ādukkhato rogato gaṇḍato sallato aghato abhādhiṇaḥ parato pañcho tathā hoti anātato samamupasattā. See, e.g., Majjhima, I, p. 435, 436, 500; Āsutta, II, p. 128; IV, p. 422.

32 For the sixteen aspects of the four truths, cf. Kośa, VI, p. 162; VII, p. 30-34; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 1190-1205; Obermiller, Doctrine of P. P., p. 18.

33 The sixteen aspects of ānāpāna are enumerated in many texts, e.g., Majjhima, I, p. 425; Sanyutta, V, p. 311-312; Pucaśāsana, I, p. 204-205; Tāru, I, no. 375, k. 29, p. 206a-b; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 1173-1188; they fully commented on in Visuddhimagga, I, p. 266-293. For a modern adaptation, see G. C. Louveney, La meditation bouddhique, Paris, 1935, p. 161-169.

34 The six recollections have as object, respectively, the Buddha, the Dharma, the Sangha, ānāpāna, ānuśaya, and the devatās (cf. Dīgha, III, p. 240-280; Āsutta, III, p. 284, 312 seq., 452, V, p. 329 seq.); Visuddhimagga, I, p. 197-228, dedicates a chapter to them.

35 Cf. Kośa, VI, p. 142.

VI. SARVADHARMA (p. 642F)

1. The expression sarvadharmā means all the dharmas that are the object (ālambana) of the consciousnesses (vijñāna):
The visual consciousness (cakṣuvijñāna) concerns color (rūpa); the auditory consciousness (śrotravijñāna) concerns sound (śabda); the olfactory consciousness (ghrāṇavijñāna), odor (gandha); the gustatory consciousness (jihvāvanijñāna), taste (rasa); the tactile consciousness (kāyavijñāna), touch (ṣprasāvatva); the mental consciousness (manovijñāna), dharmas. [This last one] concerns equally the eye (cakṣu), color (rūpa) and the visual consciousness (cakṣuvijñāna), the ear (śrotra) and sound (śabda), the nose (ghrāṇa) and smell (gandha), the tongue (jihvā) and taste (rasa), the body (kāya) and touch (ṣprasāvatva), and so on up to: it concerns the Manas, dharmas and mental consciousness (manovijñāna).19

This is what is meant by ‘all dharmas’: these are the dharmas that are the object of the consciousnesses.

2. Furthermore, ‘all dharmas’ means the dharmas that are the object of the knowledges (jñāna): the knowledge of suffering (dukkhavijñāna) knows suffering; the knowledge of the origin (samudayajñāna) knows the origin (samudaya); the knowledge of cessation (niruddhajñāna) knows cessation (niruddha); the knowledge of the Path (parinirvāṇajñāna) knows the Path (parinirvāṇa);15 the mundane knowledge (laṅkālaṅkajñāna) knows suffering, the origin [of suffering], the cessation [of suffering] the Path, and also space (ākāśa) and the apratisamkhyānirodha. These are the dharmas that are the object of the knowledges.16

3. Furthermore, the groups17 of two dharmas include (saṃghṛtaṃ) ‘all dharmas’. These are the dharmas having form (rupadharmas) and the dharmas without form (arūpadharmas); the visible (saṃsārītya) dharmas and the invisible (anidākara) dharmas; the resistant (upradhāna) dharmas and the non-resistant dharmas (apradhāṇa); the impure (uśūra) dharmas and the pure (aśūra) dharmas; the conditioned (bhāṣyata) dharmas and the unconditioned (aṃśyakṛta) dharmas; the dharmas associated with the mind (cittavipaśyata) and the dharmas not associated with the mind (cittavipaśyakṛta) the dharmas associated with action (karmasamayatva) and dissociated from action [138b] (karmavipaśyakṛta); near dharmas

36 Classical theory of consciousness frequently explained in the scriptures, e.g., Majjhima. III. p. 221. There are six consciousnesses. The first five, viz., the visual, auditory, olfactory, gustatory and tactile, each depends on a particular organ simultaneously with it (eye, ear, nose, tongue and body) and each bears upon a special object (color, sound, smell, taste and tangible). The sixth consciousness, the mental consciousness (manovijñāna), depends upon the Manas, i.e., on whichever of the six consciousnesses that has just occurred and which immediately precedes it in time (cf. Kośa, I, p. 31): saṃsāra ananta-sāriyam vijñānam yat adhi tan manadhir. It has as object all dharmas, viz., the six consciousnesses, the six organs and the six objects, perceptible objects, color, etc., as well as non-perceptible objects (dharmas properly called the 46 caitas, the 14 citta-vipaśyakṛtas, the 3 aṃśakṛtas and the avijñāpti). Cf. Sīlārākyā, Central Conception, p. 97. Thus, whereas the first five consciousnesses are strictly limited to their own object, the mental consciousness also bears upon the objects of the other five consciousnesses. This is expressed in an oft-repeated canonical formula (Majjhima, I, p. 205; Sāntān, V, p. 217-218): “The five organs, each their own object and their own field, do not perceive the object-field of the others, whereas the Manas perceives the object-field of all of them.” (pate’ indriyāni naivāsyaśātiindriyapravāriśāni na ahaṃmataṃ saṃsāraṃ gacchaviṣayam paccaubhuhoti ... manu ca nemā gacchaviṣayam paccaubhuhoti.) See W. Geiger, Pali Dharmas, München, 1926, p. 80.

33 On these four knowledges, see Kośa, VII, p. 5.

38 Obviously the mundane knowledge (laṅkālaṅkajñāna) acquired consecutively (prsthalaḥdhana) to the supramundane knowledge (lokeśarajñāna); cf. Kośa, VI, p. 142.

34 The Treatise, I, p. 53-54F, has already enumerated these various groups of dharmas.

15 On this last knowledge concern equally the five consciousnesses, viz., the visual, auditory, olfactory, gustatory, and tactile, viz., the Mtadākharajñāna knows suffering; the saṃsāra khyāna knows the origin (samudaya); the saṃsāra nākhyāna knows cessation (niruddha); the saṃsāra ajanadārjñāna knows the Path (mārga); the mundane knowledge (laṅkālaṅkajñāna) knows suffering; the origin [of suffering]; the cessation [of suffering]; the Path; and also space (ākāśa) and the apratisamkhyānirodha. These are the dharmas that are the object of the knowledges.26

3. Furthermore, the groups17 of two dharmas include (saṃghṛtaṃ) ‘all dharmas’. These are the dharmas having form (rupadharmas) and the dharmas without form (arūpadharmas); the visible (saṃsārītya) dharmas and the invisible (anidākara) dharmas; the resistant (upradhāna) dharmas and the non-resistant dharmas (apradhāṇa); the impure (uśūra) dharmas and the pure (aśūra) dharmas; the conditioned (bhāṣyata) dharmas and the unconditioned (aṃśyakṛta) dharmas; the dharmas associated with the mind (cittavipaśyata) and the dharmas not associated with the mind (cittavipaśyakṛta); the dharmas associated with action (karmasamayatva) and dissociated from action [138b] (karmavipaśyakṛta); near dharmas

19 [antike dhammāḥ] and distant dharmas (āhare dhammāḥ)]. These various groups of two dharmas include dharmas [Note: close dharmas are present dharmas (pratyayapanna) and the Asamksara; distant dharmas are future (anāgata) and past (ātita) dharmas].

4. Furthermore, the groups of three dharmas include ‘all dharmas’. These are good (kṣālā), bad (adkaśāla) and indeterminate (asayācāra) dharmas; the dharmas of the saṅkṣāra, the aśīka and the naivaśīkaśākṣa; the dharmas to be abandoned by seeing the truths (sattiyadāranāheya), to be abandoned by meditation (bhāvanāheya) and not to be abandoned (ahāya). There are again three sorts of dharmas: the five aggregates (skandha), the twelve bases of consciousness (āyatana) and the eight elements (dhatu). These various groups of three dharmas include all dharmas.

5. Furthermore, there are groups of four dharmas: past (atitva), future (anāgata), present (pratyayapanna) and neither past nor future nor present dharmas; dharmas belonging to the desire realm (kāmadhātuvacara), to the form realm (rupadhātuvacara), to the formless realm (arūpadhātuvacara), belonging to no realm (anavacara); dharmas resulting from a good cause, a bad cause, an indeterminate cause, a cause neither good nor bad nor indeterminate; dharmas that are object condition (ālañkanāropaścayata), that are not object condition, that are both object condition and not object condition, that are both neither object condition and not object condition. These groups of four dharmas include all dharmas.

6. There are groups of five dharmas: substance (rūpa), mind (citra), dharmas associated with the mind (cittavipaśyakṛta), dharmas dissociated from the mind (cittavipaśyakṛta) and unconditioned (asamksara) dharmas. These various groups of five dharmas include all dharmas.

7. There are groups of seven dharmas: dharmas to be abandoned by seeing suffering (dukkhādamānaheya); dharmas to be abandoned, respectively, by seeing the origin (samudaya), the cessation (niruddha) and the Path (mārga); dharmas to be abandoned by meditation (bhāvanāheya) and dharmas not to be abandoned (ahāya). These various groups of six dharmas and the innumerable other [groups] of dharmas include all dharmas.

That is what is meant by sarvadharmā.

Question. – The dharmas are very profound (gambhṛta), subtle (āṭikṣma) and inconceivable (acīntyā). If all beings together do not succeed in cognizing them, how then could a single person claim to cognize them all? Is it as though one wanted to measure the earth (prthvī)? count the drops of water (binda) in the ocean (samudra), weigh Mount Sumeru, know the limits of space (ākāśānta) and other similar things, likewise unknowable. How can all dharmas be known in all their aspects?

Answer. – The darkness of ignorance (mohatama) is very painful (dakkhikā), and the brilliance of wisdom (prajñākāraṇa) is very blissful (sukhā). Now all beings try to avoid suffering and seek only happiness. This is why the bodhisattvas wish above all to have great wisdom (maha-prajñāpāda) and wish to know all dharmas from every point of view. The bodhisattvas who have produced the great mind (mahācittotpāda) seek great wisdom in the interest of all beings. This is why they wish to know all dharmas in all their aspects. If a physician (vaidyā) takes care of one or two sick people, it is enough for him to use one or two remedies (bhaisajya); but if he wishes to cure all beings who are sick, he has to use all the types of remedies. In the same way, the bodhisattva who wishes to save all beings wishes to know all dharmas in all their aspects and, since the dharmas are profound (gambhīra), subtle (sīkṣa) and innumerable (aprāmāṇa), the wisdom of the bodhisattva, it too, will be profound, subtle and immense. Above, (Traité, I, p. 153f), in replying to attacks directed against the Omniscient One (sarvajñā), we have already treated the subject fully: [where we commented] that if the letter is big, the envelope also will be big. [138c] Furthermore, if all dharmas are examined unsystematically (nyāya), nothing will be found; but if the search is methodical, the results will be faultless. In the same way, if in order to produce fire by friction, arati is used, fire is the result; but if one tries to make fire with damp wood, the fire will not catch. Similarly also, the great earth (mahāprthī) has limits (anta); but, if one is not omniscient (sarvajñā) and one does not have great miraculous power (ṛddhīdala), one will not know them. On the other hand, if the power of the superknowledges (abhijñāśāla) is great, one knows that the trishasramahābhāsralakādhūthu is the limit of the earth, that this great earth rests on [the circle] of diamond (stūramandala) and that at the four sides of the trishasramahābhāsralakādhūthu there is space (ākāśa). This is knowing the limits of the earth. And it is the same when one wishes to weigh Mount Sumeru. As for wishing to measure space, that is out of the question [for the question does not come up] “Space not being a dharma, there can be no question of measuring it.”

VII. WHY DOES ŚĀRIPUTRA QUESTION? (p. 646F)

Śūtra: Śāriputra said to the Buddha: Bhagavat, how must the bodhisattva-mahāsattva who wishes to know all dharmas in all the aspects exert himself in practicing the Prajñāpāramitā? (Evam uskṛty evamūṣmān Śāriputra bhagavantam etad acarat: Katham bhagavān bodhisattvam mahāsattvam sarvākārām sarvadharmām abhisambuddhākāmaya prajñāpāramitauṣmān yogah karanaiḥ.)

Śāstra: Question. – The Buddha, who wanted to preach the Prajñāpāramitā, manifested all kinds of miracles (prābhāṣāya). Having manifested them, he ought to speak. Why was he questioned by Śāriputra first and then speaks?

Answer. – 1) Because the answer comes after the question; it must be so in the Buddhist texts [as everywhere else].

2) Furthermore, Śāriputra knows that the Prajñāpāramitā is profound (gambhīra) and subtle (sīkṣa), and that this doctrine without characteristics (alaksānādharma) is difficult to understand (ādīrgādhyāya) and difficult to know (ādūryeṣa). By the power of his knowledge (ākāśalāha), he meditates on it (bhāvyatati) in various ways; he wonders if contemplating impermanence (anitiṣṭa) of dharmas is indeed Prajñāpāramitā; but he is unable to decide by himself. This is why he asks.

3) Finally, Śāriputra is not omniscient (sarvajñā); in wisdom he is but a little child compared to the Buddha.

[Avadāna of the pigeon]. Thus it is told in the A p’o t’un na king (Avadānasūtra): The Buddha was in the Jetavana; towards evening (śāyāmasaṃaya), he started out with Śāriputra walking behind him. At that moment a hawk (akāra) was chasing a pigeon (kapota); the pigeon fell in front of the Buddha; when the Buddha, continuing his walk, came abreast of it and it shadow covered the pigeon, the bird became calm (śanātī), its fears disappeared and it stopped crying. Later, when Śāriputra’s shadow covered the pigeon, it began to cry and tremble again. Śāriputra asked the Buddha: “The Buddha and myself are both myself are both free of the three poisons (trīśva). Why does the pigeon stop its fear and crying when the Buddha’s shadow covers it and begin to tremble and cry when my shadow covers it?” The Buddha said: “In you the impregnations (vāsana) of the threefold poison (trīśva) are not yet destroyed (śanātī); that is why, when your shadow covers it, the pigeon’s fears do not disappear. Examine the avadānas of the pigeon in its previous existence (pūrvaśāya); for how many lifetimes has it been a pigeon?” Then Śāriputra entered into the concentration of knowledge (which has as its object) previous existences (pūrvaśāyaḥkāsamāždāḥ) and saw that the pigeon had always been a pigeon for one, two, three lifetimes and so on, for 80,000 great kalpas; but beyond that, he stopped and could see no further. Having come out (vyatikrāya) of the concentration, Śāriputra said to the Buddha: “This pigeon has always been a pigeon for 80,000 great kalpas, but beyond that, I do not know.” The Buddha continued: “If you cannot know to the very end of past existences (asthaṭṭhaṃ), try then to see after how many future existences (asthaṭṭhaṃ) the pigeon will escape [from its animal destiny].” Śāriputra then entered into the concentration of the knowledge (that has as its object) aspirations (prajñāḥṣāyāḥkāsamāždāḥ) and he saw that this pigeon would not escape its destiny as a pigeon for one, two, three existences, and so on for 80,000 great kalpas; but beyond that, he stopped and could see no further. Having come out, he asked the Buddha: “I see that this pigeon will not escape from its destiny as a pigeon for one, two, three existences, and so on for 80,000 great kalpas; but beyond that I know no further. I do not know the limits (moryāḥ) of the past and the future, I do not know when this pigeon will escape [from its animal destiny].”

The Buddha said to Śāriputra: “The [existences] of this pigeon surpass the limits knowable by śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. This [pigeon] will constantly have pigeon existences for great kalpas as numerous as the grains of sand of the Ganges (gautgānaḥvīśakopama). When its sin (āpatti) has been expiated, it will come out and will transmigrate (saṃvāryatī) in the five destinies (pālcapari); then it will be a human (manuṣya) and, at the end of five hundred [human] existences, it will acquire keen faculties (tilkṣenendṛṣṭaṇa). At that time there will be a Buddha who, having saved innumerable (aprāmāṇya) and incausalizable (asamkhyayena) beings, will enter into nirvāṇa without residue (nirupakhīṣeṣanirvāṇa), but his spiritual legacy will remain in the world and our man will become a lay adherent observing the five precepts (pālaśeṣakarigrahakopama), hearing a bhikṣu praise the qualities of the Buddha, he will first produce the mind of bodhicitta (pāramacittotpāda), then make the aspiration (pāramāṇaḥ) to become a Buddha; then for three incalculable periods (asamkhyayakalpa), he will practice the six virtues (ṣaṭpūrṇamāṇa); finally, when he has attained the tenth bhūmi, he will become Buddha and, after having saved innumerable beings (aprāmāṇyaḥsaṃsattva), he will enter into nirvāṇa without residue (nirupakhīṣeṣanirvāṇa).”

48 See Kośa, III, p. 138 seq.
CHAPTER XVII: THE VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY  (p. 650F)

Śāriputra: The Buddha said to Śāriputra: The bodhisattva-mahāsattva who abides in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-abiding (avabhāsa-gānātāma) should fulfill the virtue of generosity by the method of refraining (aparyupapratīkhatā) from refraining from distinguishing the donor, the recipient and the gift given (Evam ukte bhagavān āsyaṃ samāñuḥ Śāriputram evad avocat: ita Śāriputra bodhisattvavān mahāsattvavān praṇītānām aparicchedikātā apanānuśīḥ ṣatśīrīyasya vijñānānātām vijñānānuśīḥ upākāryatā).

I. DEFINITIONS OF PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀ

Śāriputra: Question. – What is Prajñāpāramitā?

Answer. – 1. Some say: The root (mūla) of pure wisdom (andhavākṣa-prajñā) is the distinctive characteristic of Prajñāpāramitā. Why? Because the foremost of all the wisdoms (prajñā) is called Prajñāpāramitā. The root of pure wisdom is the [139b] foremost wisdom. This is why the root of pure wisdom is called Prajñāpāramitā.

Question. – How can the bodhisattva who has not cut the bonds (bandha) practice a pure wisdom (andhavākṣa-prajñā)?

Answer. – a. Although the bodhisattva has not cut the bonds, he practices a semblance of pure Prajñāpāramitā; this is why it is said that he practices pure Prajñāpāramitā. It is like the śīvaka who practices the four nivṛtta-abhāngādharmas called heat (uṣṇa), summit (uṣṇaḥ), patience (ksanti) and supreme mundane dharma (laukikadharma): at the beginning, he practices a semblance of the pure dharmas (andhavākṣa-dharma) and later it is easy for him to produce the acquiescence that gives rise to the knowledge relating to suffering (dukkhe dharma-nakṣaṇa). 42

b. Furthermore, some say that there are two kinds of bodhisattvas: the one who has cut the fetters (saṁyogana) and is pure (vīrūdhha), and the one who has not cut the fetters and is impure. Only the bodhisattva who has cut the fetters and is pure can practice the pure Prajñāpāramitā.

Question. – But if the bodhisattva has cut the bonds and is pure, why does he still practice the Prajñāpāramitā?

---

42 These definitions are continued and developed below in chapters XXIX and XXX.

43 The four nivṛtta-abhāṅgādharmas are the preparatory path (pravacanārtha) leading to “understanding of the truths” (satyādhiśiśa-saṃsāra). This understanding is a pure (andhavākṣa) prajñā involving sixteen thoughts; the first is dukkha dharma-nakṣaṇa by means of which the practitioner destroys any doubt that may remain relative to the suffering of Kāmadhātu. Cf. Kośa, V, p. iv-v; VI, p. 179; above, Treatise, I, p. 214F, 395F.
Answer. – a. Although he has cut the bonds, he has not yet perfected the ten bhūmis (daśabhūmi) [which constitute the great bodhisattva’s career], nor has he adorned (viśayaṇa) the buddhakṣetra, nor converted (vinayayī) beings; this is why he still practices the Prajñāpāramitā.

b. Furthermore, there are two ways of cutting the bonds: 1) cutting the three poisons (trīvīṣa) [of passion, aggression and ignorance] and detaching one’s mind from the five objects of enjoyment (pañcika kāṇṇaguna) favored by men and gods; 2) while being detached from the five objects of enjoyment favored by men and gods, not being detached from the five objects of enjoyment that are the fruits of retribution (vipākaphala) of the bodhisattva qualities (gūṇa). This is why the bodhisattva must still practice the Prajñāpāramitā.

The temptation of Anuruddha.44 – Thus, when the āyuṣmat Anuruddha (Anuruddha) was sitting in the āyuṣmat Anuruddha (Anuruddha) was sitting in white garments and white ornaments. Then he thought: “May they become all yellow (sukha) ... all white (raudha), with white faces, white garments and white ornaments.” Immediately, knowing his mind, they transformed themselves according to his wishes.

Then one of the goddesses sang (gīyā), another danced (aucca), yet another snapped her fingers (accharukān válesi) ... But the venerable Anuruddha averted his senses (indhīyān okkhipi) from them. At once, understanding that the venerable Anuruddha was displeased, they disappeared.

Other details may be found in the Anuruddhasutta of the Saṅgītapiṭaka, I, p. 200 (cf. Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1336, k. 50, p. 368c; T 100, no. 356, k. 16, p. 490b), and in the commentary of Buddhaghosa in Sāratthapakāsīni, I, p. 293-294. Here, in italics is the translation of the sutta, and in roman letters, the translation of the commentary.

Once the venerable Anuruddha was dwelling among the Kosalas in a forest.

And those who desire the daughters of the gods have an unfortunate destiny, established in a corporeal existence... And those who desire the daughters of the gods have a bad destiny.

[Jālinī] answered:

Those who do not see the Nandana [park], the abode of divine heroes, the glorious Thirty-three Gods, do not know bliss.

[Amaranaddha replied]

O foolish one, you do not understand the meaning of the arhats’ saying: All formations are transitory, given up to arising and cessation; As soon as they arise, they cease; to pacify them is bliss.

[For me] now there is no further rebirth among the gods.

When he had said this, the goddess Jālinī felt a powerful attraction for the venerable one and she did not have the strength to separate from him. Endlessly returning, she swept his cell, brought water for him to rinse his mouth, a toothpick, food and drink. The venerable one did not spurn her but accepted her gifts. One day, the venerable one, absorption (bhūṣṇa) in a forest, some goddesses (devatā), the beautiful Ygai (Ṭriṣṇā), etc., with their beautiful and wonderful pure bodies, came to tempt him. Anuruddha said: “Let these sisters (bhagnī) become blue (niḷavasana) and not show any mixed colors (mūravasana).” He wanted to contemplate the impurities (asiṭṭidas) [of their bodies] in this way, but he did not succeed in seeing any. And it was the same when, at his request, they took on a yellow (piṭha), red (lohiṇa) and white (asatiṭṭa) color. Then Anuruddha closed his eyes and did not look at them. He said: “May these sisters go away.” At that moment, the goddesses disappeared. – If their celestial shapes (divaṃsasamsthānas), the reward of their merits (puṇaṃvijuka) intruded [on Anuruddha] in this way, what could be said about the five objects of enjoyment (pācā kāmagnānas) that are the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) of the immense qualities (aṇuṃmānagnānas) of the bodhisattvas, [except that they solicit the bodhisattva even more]?

[The Dance of Mahākāliyapā].⁴⁵ - When [Drumā], king of the Kinnaras along with 84,000 Kinnaras came to the Buddha to play the lute, sing verses and pay homage to the Buddha, Sumeru, king of the mountains, all the trees on the mountains, the people and animals started to dance. The assembly surrounding the Buddha, including Mahākāliyapā, could not sit still on their seats. Then the bodhisattva T’ien sin asked the lyusmat Mahākāliyapā: “Old man, previously you were foremost among those who observe the twelve dharma; why can you not sit still on your seat?” Mahākāliyapā answered: “The five objects of enjoyment of the threefold world (traiḍhūtās) cannot make me agitated, but the superknowledges (āṣṭājiḍā) of the bodhisattva [Drumā], by virtue of the fruit of retribution (gusvarājñikabhalā), put me in such a state that I am no longer myself and I cannot stay still.”

whose robe was worn out, was making his begging round; she laid a celestial garment on a pile of garbage and went away. Seeing this garment, the venerable one gathered it up; examining it and recognizing that it was a garment that would suit him, he took it away. Out of it he made the threefold monastic robes: two disciples of high rank joined Anuruddha in making the robe; the teacher furnished the needle. The robe having been made, when the venerable one went on his begging round, the goddess procured alms for him. Sometimes alone, sometimes with another, she stayed close to the venerable one. Finally, with two companions, she went to the cell of Anuruddha and said to him: “We are the [goddesses] of charming body (manipūkāyika) and we take every imaginable shape.” Anuruddha said to himself: “They speak thus; I must test that; may they become all blue (niḷaka).” Knowing the venerable’s mind, they became all blue. Then they became yellow (piṭhā), red (lohiṇa) and white (asatiṭṭa). They thought: “The venerable one appreciates our beauty,” and they began a show: the first one sang (gāyā), the second danced (naccī) and the third one snapped her fingers (ascharvav pahati). But the venerable one averted his senses (ānubhīvad akkhiṇa). Then, understanding that the venerable one did not appreciate their beauty and, not receiving any affection or sweetness from him, they gave up and went away. Seeing them depart, the venerable one wished that they would never return and, defining his arhathood, he spoke this stanza:

\[\text{The cycle of births is destroyed, there now is no further rebirth.}\]

⁴⁵ On Kāliyapā’s dance to the music of Drumā, see above, Treatise, I, p. 615F, n. 2. – On Drumā, Jālīnī, p. 609F, n. 4.

³⁹ The winds that arise from the four cardinal directions cannot shake mount Sumeru, but, at the end of the great kalpa, the P’ī lan (Vairāmba) winds⁴⁶ arise and blow on mount Sumeru like a pile of straw. This is why we know that [in the bodhiṣṭavā] one of the two categories of bonds has not been broken. The bodhisattva must therefore still practice the Prajñāpāramitā. This is what the A p’ī lan (Abhidharma) explains.

2. Others also say: The Prajñāpāramitā is an impure wisdom (aṇuṣṭārayajñā). Why? Before the Bodhisattva cut his bonds under the bodhi tree, he already had great wisdom (mahāprajñā) and immense qualities (aṇuṃmānañāna), but his passions (kālā) were not yet cut. This is why they say that the Bodhisattva’s Prajñāpāramitā is an impure wisdom (aṇuṣṭārayajñā).

3. Others also say: During the interval of time between the first production of the mind of bodhi (pratiharamucottisūkṣa) until his [enlightenment] under the bodhi tree, the wisdom possessed by the Bodhisattva is called Prajñāpāramitā; but once the Bodhisattva becomes Buddha, this Prajñāpāramitā changes its name and is called Sa p’ī la (avajñā or omniscience).

4. Yet others say: Impure wisdom (aṇuṣṭārayajñā) and pure wisdom (aṇuṣṭārayajñā) are together called Prajñāpāramitā. Why? The bodhisattva contemplates nirvāṇa and travels the Path of the Buddhas; this is why his wisdom (prajñā) is necessarily pure (aṇuṣṭāva). On the other hand, as he has not yet cut the fetters (samyojanas) and thus has not yet done what has to be done (aṃaṃkṛtya), his wisdom must have the quality of being impure (aṇuṣṭāva).

5. Others also say: The bodhisattva’s Prajñāpāramitā is pure (aṇuṣṭāva), unconditional (aṃsukṛta), invisible (aṇiśaśvāsana) and free of opposition (aṇuṣṭāvagāra).

6. Others also say: This Prajñāpāramitā does not have a nature that is perceptible (aṇuṇaṃlakalākāša); [it cannot be said to be] existent (sat) or nonexistent (asat), eternal (nitya) or transitory (anitya), empty (duṇya) or real (bhūta, satya). This Prajñāpāramitā is not included in the list of aggregates (skandhas), elements (ātātu) and bases of consciousness (āyatanas). It is neither conditioned (aṃskṛta) nor unconditioned (aṃskṛta), neither a dharma nor a non-dharma; it is neither grasped (grhyā) nor abandoned (bātā), neither arisen (aṭṭhāna) nor ceased (niruddhā); it eludes the four alternatives (citthākāśīlā) of existence; it encounters no attachment. Just as the flame of a fire (agnīvāla) cannot be touched (aṃṣṭa) anywhere because it burns the hand, so the Prajñāpāramitā cannot be touched because the fire of false views (miṣṭāvādy) would burn [the person who would want to grasp it].

Question. – Among all those who have just defined the Prajñāpāramitā, who are correct?

Answer. – a. Some say that each of them is right and that they are all true. This is like in the sitāra where five hundred hīkūs are debating, each in turn, on the two extremes (antaṣṭrayās) and the Middle Way (madhyamapratipadā) and where the Buddha declares: “All are right.”

b. Others say that it is those who have answered last who are right. Why? Because they can be neither contradicted nor refuted. If it concerned some dharma, no matter how trifling, those who would admit its…

⁴⁶ These winds have already been mentioned above, Treatise, I, p. 559F, n. 1.
CHAPTER XVIII: PRAISE OF THE VIRTUE OF GENEROUSITY (p. 658F)

Question. – What are the benefits (anuśaṃsa) of generosity (dāna) that make the bodhisattva dwelling in the Prajñāpāramitā perfect the virtue of generosity (dānapāramitā)?

Answer. – Generosity presents all kinds of benefits. Generosity is a precious treasure (ratnakosā) that always follows its originator; generosity destroys suffering and brings happiness to people; generosity is the kind tutor who shows the path to heaven (svargamārga); generosity is the good prefect which seduces (sanghadhitī) honest people; generosity is a safe haven (yogakṣema) when the end of life approaches, the mind [of the donor] is free of fear (visśudhā); generosity is a mark of loving-kindness (maitrīmita), capable of saving all beings; generosity is an accumulation of happiness (sukhasamuccaya), capable of destroying suffering; generosity is a great general (vandāpan), able to vanquish avarice (mātasya); generosity is a wonderful fruit. Loved by gods and men, generosity is a pure path (ānuttāna), beloved by gods and men; generosity is an accumulation of happiness (sukhasamuccaya), industry, and friendliness (nīlāśā). Generosity is the good prefect who seduces (sanghadhitī) honest people; generosity is a wonderful fruit. Loved by gods and men, generosity is a pure path (ānuttāna), and friendliness (nīlāśā).

Question. – What does this phrase mean?

Answer. – The bodhisattva who sees (samanupajji) that all dharmas are neither eternal (niyata) nor transitory (aniyata), neither painful (dukkha) nor pleasant (sukha), neither empty (śūnya) nor real (bhūtā), nor self (ātman) nor selfless (anatman), nor arising-cessing (uppannā-niruddha) nor unarising-cessing (ānuppannā-niruddha), dwells in the profound Prajñāpāramitā without grasping at its characteristics (nimittadṛṣṭa). This is called residing in it by the method of non-dwelling (āsthdānayogena).

Question. – If one does not grasp the characteristics (nimitta) of Prajñāpāramitā, the mind is without attachment (ādhipati, adhitva). Thus the Buddha has said: “All dharmas have desire (dānu) as their root.” How can the person who does not grasp [the characteristics] perfect (paripūra) the six virtues? That is why it can [140a] be entered by the noble (niraśa), that is why it is said to seduce them; generosity is a safe haven (yogakṣema): when the end of life approaches, the mind of the donor is free of fear (visśudhā); generosity is a mark of loving-kindness (maitrīmita), capable of saving all beings; generosity is an accumulation of happiness (sukhasamuccaya), capable of destroying suffering; generosity is a great general (vandāpana), able to vanquish avarice (mātasya); generosity is a wonderful fruit. Loved by gods and men, generosity is a pure path (ānuttāna), and friendliness (nīlāśā). Generosity is the good prefect who seduces (sanghadhitī) honest people; generosity is a wonderful fruit. Loved by gods and men, generosity is a pure path (ānuttāna), and friendliness (nīlāśā).

Answer. – Out of compassion (karuṇa) for beings, the bodhisattva first makes the vow (prasiddhihāna) to liberate all beings. By the virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitā), and even though he knows that all dharmas are unborn (anupanna), unceasing (aniruddha), like nirvāna (nirvānasamudg, he continues to exert his qualities (guna) and he fulfills the six virtues. Why? Because he abides in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-dwelling. This is what is called abiding in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-dwelling.

“Abiding in the Prajñāpāramitā by the method of non-dwelling (āsthdānayogena), the bodhisattva is able to perfect (paripūra) the six virtues (satpāramitā).”

Question. – What are the benefits (anuśaṃsa) of generosity (dāna) that make the bodhisattva dwelling in the Prajñāpāramitā perfect the virtue of generosity (dānapāramitā)?

Answer. – Generosity presents all kinds of benefits. Generosity is a precious treasure (ratnakosā) that always follows its originator; generosity destroys suffering and brings happiness to people; generosity is the kind tutor who shows the path to heaven (svargamārga); generosity is the good prefect which seduces (sanghadhitī) honest people; those who denied its existence could also be contradicted; those who denied its existence could also be contradicted. But in this Prajñā, there is neither existence nor nonexistence, neither nonexistence nor not-nonexistence. In this way, speech (vyavahāra) is no longer valid; it is called tranquility (śūnti), immensity (apramāṇa), dharma eluding vain proliferation (nirāśa). This is why it can [140a] be neither contradicted nor refuted; it is called the true Prajñāpāramitā. It is faultless excellence (pravāja). Just as a noble cakravartin king subdues his enemies without ever boasting, so the Prajñāpāramitā can contradict all speech (abhilāpa) and vain proliferation (prapaicca) without itself ever being contradicted.

c. Finally, in the following chapters, all kinds of explanations (ārthamukha) will deal with the Prajñāpāramitā and its true nature.

II. THE METHOD OF NON-DWELLING (p. 656F)

The five benefits of generosity (dāna) have been pointed out by the Buddha in the Sīhasattra (Aṅguttara, III, p. 38-41); Tsieng yi a han, T 125, k. 24, p. 680c; k. 51, p. 826a; the first four concern the present life (satiyādā); the fifth, the future life (samparipraviśa) of the bodhisattva (ākāra); the generous teacher of generosity (dānakāra) is cherished and appreciated by many people bahana janasa piyo hoti mundāsa; good honest people love him (santo sappuris bhajantī) (14a); another excellent repute is attached to his name (kalyanāni kṛitiśuddho abhagogyacchati); whatever assembly he enters, he enters fearlessly and without worry (satiśā eva pariśam apasaṅkatāmaḥ viśatā eva aparajātī); after the destruction of his body after death, he is reborn in a blessed heavenly realm (kalyanāni bhāva pariśam apasaṅkatā). This chapter of the Mppī develops these five points somewhat; this is one of the homilies on generosity so often encountered: cf. Śīlaśāsana, p. 39-34, Bodhicaryavatāra, chap. II, v. 2-23; Dīvyāvadāna, chap. XXXIV, p. 481-483; sermons on generosity, morality, heaven, praised to lay people, Kośa, IV, p. 70, n. – Modern works: Oltramare, Théosophie, p. 408; Dutt, Aspects, p. 297; Lav., Morale bouddhique, p. 50-51.
[The sage and the fool in the fire]48 – When a house is burning, the sharp-witted man perceives clearly under what conditions the blaze is developing and, before the fire reaches him, he hastens to retrieve his wealth; although his dwelling is completely consumed, he has saved all his precious belongings; he can then rebuild a new home. In the same way, the generous man knows that his body is perishable and fragile and that his wealth is not eternal; he profits from the right moment to cultivate merit (puṇyabhāvanā), just like the man who saves his wealth from the fire; in his future existences he will enjoy happiness, just like this man who rebuilds his home, resumes his business and quite naturally enjoys happiness and profit. As for the stupid man, he knows only how to hold greedily onto his house; in his haste to make plans to save it, he panics, loses all acuteness and, under the action of the violent wind and inaccessible flames, the earth and bricks of his house are completely burned; in the space of a murmur, the destruction is complete. As he has saved nothing in his house, his wealth also is destroyed; suffering from hunger and stiff with cold, he is unhappy and attacked by suffering until the end of his life. This is likewise the miserly man (matasariṇī); he ignores the fact that his body and his life are not eternal and that, in the space of a moment, it becomes impossible for him to save them; instead of (buying himself) with that, he amasses (riches) and guards them jealously; but death overtakes him unexpectedly and suddenly he dies; his physical shape melts away into the earth; his wealth with all its appurtenances leave him; he is like the fool who is unhappy and crushed by suffering for having lacked foresight. The man with clear intelligence, on the other hand, is able to understand; he knows that the body is like a magic show (māyā), that wealth cannot be kept, that everything is impermanent (antya) and that only meritorious action (puṇya) offers stable support; therefore he works to draw men from the ford of suffering and he penetrates into the great Path.

Furthermore, the great man who, with his great mind, practices great generosity, serves himself; but the mediocre man who, out of weakness, serves nobody does not even assure his own interest.49

And just as a hero (śūrya), seeing his enemy, is inevitably drawn to destroy him, so the wise man who, in his prudence, has understood his duty well, no matter how violent his enemy greed (māṅsya) is, he is capable of subduing it and will inevitably bend it to his wishes. Finding a field of merit (puṇyasikṣeta) and meeting the propitious occasion [note: i.e., the time when it is proper to give; when one encounters it and does not give, one ‘misses the opportunity’], and he understands what has to be done and with the right mind (samyakcitta), he practices great generosity.

Finally, the man who practices sublime generosity is venerated (sakṛtya) by people; like the newly arisen moon that everyone admires, his good renown (140c) and fame spread throughout the world; he is trusted by everyone. The person who practices sublime generosity is esteemed by the noble ones and respected by the lowly; when the end of his life approaches, his heart has no fear.

These are the fruits of reward (vipakaphala) obtained in the present existence (ḥaṇjanma): like the flowers and fruits of the trees, they innumerable (aprameya). Likewise in the future existence (pararajjanma), the merit [will be rewarded]. When the wheel of samsāra turns, one is led to the five destinies (pañcagati); there are no relatives to support one; there is only generosity that counts. If one is reborn among gods (deva) or men (manuṣya) and one obtains a pure fruit (vistuddhaphala), it is due to generosity; if, as an animal (tiryagyoni) - elephant or horse - one is well-stabled and well-fed, that too is a result of generosity. The virtue of generosity (dāna) is [to procure] wealth, nobility and joy. The person who keeps the precepts (ṣīla) is reborn among the gods; trance (āțhāna), knowledge (jñāna), purity of mind (cittavīśuddhi) assure nirvāṇa. The merit inherent in generosity is the equipment (sambhāra) for the Path of nirvāṇa: indeed, by thinking of the gifts [which one has made], one rejoices; by rejoicing, one settles one’s mind (vātsala); by settling the mind, one contemplates impermanence (antiyatā) of birth and death (ūpākānirvṛddha); by contemplating the impermanence of birth and death, one obtains the Path (mārga).

When one wants to have shade (chāyā), flowers (puṣpa) or fruit (phala), one plants a tree. It is the same when one is looking for reward (vipakā) by means of generosity: happiness in the present lifetime (ḥaṇjanma) and future lifetime (pararajjanma) is like the shade; the state of īśavaka and pratyekebuddha is like the flower; the state of Buddha is like the fruit.

These are the various qualities (guṇa) of generosity.

48 Here the Mppē reproduces the text of the first page of the Tchong king siuan tsa p’i yu, T 208, no. 1, k. 1, p. 531 (cf. Chavannes, Costes, II, p. 68-69, the translation of which is used here). This compilation is the work of the Indian (?) monk Tao tsi; It was translated by Kumārajiva in 405, the same year as the Treatise.

49 Kośa, IV, p. 234, explains in what conditions generosity is of benefit to oneself, to others, to both, to none.
CHAPTER XIX: THE CHARACTERISTICS OF GENEROSITY (p. 662f)

I. DEFINITION OF GENEROSITY

Question. – What is dāna?

Answer. – Dāna means generosity; it is a good volition associated with the mind (cittasamprasyakusalacitekutanda). Some say that a physical or vocal action (kāyavikarman) that comes from this good volition is also called dāna.\(^{58}\)

According to others, when there is a person endowed with faith (śraddhā), a field of merit (puṇyatukera) and a material object (ānisastra), and when these three things are brought together, the mind (citta) produces a thought of renunciation (parityāgadharma) capable of destroying avarice (mātsarya), which is called dāna. Just as by means of the dharma of loving-kindness (maitrāthādharma), the mind conceives loving-kindness (maitri) by considering the happiness of others (satvaśucca), so by means of the mental event (citta or caitaskhadharma) generosity, when the three things come together, the mind produces a dharma of renunciation (parityāgadharmā) that is able to destroy greed (mātsarya).\(^{51}\)

1. Gifts belonging to the three realms.

There are three types of gifts: those that belong to the desire realm (kāmadhātvacarana), those that belong to the form realm (rupadhātvacarana) and those that do not belong to any realm (anucaaracarana).

Generosity, a dharma associated with mind (cittasamprasyadharmā), functions with the mind (cittaparivartan) and arises with it (cittasahaja). This is not a substantial dharma (rupadhāma) playing the role of condition (prataya); it is not an action (karman) or an associate of action (karmasamprasya) functioning with the action and arising with it; it does not come from retribution of previous actions. This is all explained fully in the Abhidharma.

2. Pure generosity and impure generosity

There are two other kinds of generosity, pure generosity (viśuddhabhāna) and impure generosity (avipṣuddhabhāna). Impure generosity is generosity [141a] improperly carried out. Generosity that has as its motivation interest, arrogance, aversion, fear, desire to seduce someone, fear of death, teasing, the wish to claim equality with wealthy people, rivalry, jealousy, pride (abhīmāna) and the desire to elevate oneself (ānukarṣa), desire for fame, spells, the anxiety to avoid misfortune and to gain benefit, the wish to influence an assembly, or again generosity carried out in a trifling and disrespectful way, all these are also called impure generosity.\(^{52}\)

58 Generosity is an action consisting essentially of “the volition to give”; from this volition there can follow a physical action, the gesture of giving a gift, or a vocal action, e.g., the preaching of the holy Dharma. It is in this way that the volition of giving, which constitutes the properly called generosity, can be completed by an effective action, the gift or the preaching. This is in agreement with the definition given by the Buddha in Abhidatta, IV, p. 45; Cetānāham bhikkhave kammam vaddi, cetayitvā kammam karoti kāyaṃ vācikā manasā: “I say, O monks, that action is volition; having wished, one acts with body, speech or mind.” The correct interpretation of this text is in Madh. kārā, XVII, v, 2-3: Cetānā cetayitvā ca karmaṃ paramarśyitān ... tatra yac cetane yāt karman tānaṃ svetum, cetayitvā ca yat tīkāṃ tat tu tāyikavacin: “Volition and action-after-having-willed, the supreme Sage has said ... On the one hand, the action called volition is called mental (manava); on the other hand, the action-after-having-willed is physical (kāya) or vocal (vācika).” And the Madh. vṛtti explains (p. 306-307): “Because it is achieved by the mind (manas) alone, because it does not depend on the activity of the body and the voice, volition (cetānā) associated with just the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) is called “mental action” (manasav karman). However, the second, called “action-after-having-willed” (cetayitvā karman) is, for its part, physical (kāya) and vocal (vācika). The action that one carries out after having mentally said to oneself: “I will act in such and such a way with body and speech”, this action is called “action-after-having-willed”. The latter is twofold, physical and vocal, because it is related to the body and to the speech and because it is achieved thanks to them. Thus, action is threefold: bodily, vocal and mental.” – On this subject, see also Kathāvatthu, II, p. 393; Āthasaṅgīti, p. 88; Kāmaiddhiḥprakaraṇa, p. 8, 63; Madh. avatara, p. 190 Tr. Muséon, 1911, p. 245; Patijākī, p. 472; Kosā, IV, p. 1-2. – Modern works: Lav. Morale bouddhique, p. 122-126.

51 In other words, when there is a donor (āditya), a thing to give (āyata) and a recipient (pratigbhakā), in the donor’s mind there is produced a dharma of renunciation (parityāgadharmā), i.e., a willingness to give which constitutes the gift properly speaking. The merit produced by means of abandoning (tyāgānasutta) results from this willingness to give, a merit which results from the sole fact of abandoning. To the latter, may be added another: the merit produced by rejoicing (parībuddhānasutta), the merit that results from the enjoyment, by the person who receives, of the object given (cf. Kosā, IV, p. 244). But it is not indispensable and often will be absent, e.g., in the gift given to a caitya, where no one is favored by the gift. Nevertheless, because of the devotion of the faithful one who is giving to the caitya, the gift to the caitya keeps the fundamental merit resulting from the fact of renunciation. This is similar to the meditation on loving-kindness (maitri) where no one receives and yet a merit is born for the benevolent one by means of the very power of his mind of loving-kindness (Kosā, IV, p. 242-245).

52 The various motivations that can inspire the giver are listed in a list of eight dharma that may be found, with some variations, in Dīgha, III, p. 258; Abhidatta, IV, p. 236-237; Kosā, IV, p. 239. According to the latter source, the following should be distinguished: i) the āsava gift (the gift between persons close to one another; ii) the gift given out of fear (what a person does who sees that the object is about to cease); iii) the gift given “because he has given to me” (adhān me ādān iti ādān); iv) the gift given “so that he will give to me” (ādātva); v) the gift given “because my father and my grandfather gave” (dattāpiyam me pitbhīti ca pūnamahit ca ādān); vi) the gift given to attain heaven (svargārthaṃ); vii) the gift given with an eye to repute (kāyottaraṃ); viii) the gift given to adorn the mind (cittalokarūpam) of the ādātika; to riper the mind (cittapāralokarūpa) of members of the Path; to equip with the view of practice (yogasambhārūpa); to attain the supreme goal (uttamaṃbhārūpa); Pure generosity is that which shows characteristics opposite to those just mentioned. Furthermore, pure generosity is the gift made in view of the Path (mūrga); having arisen from a pure mind, (visuddhācittotpānena), free of the fetters (samyojanarūhita), not looking for happiness here below or up above (bhairatrasukha), a gift made with respect (satkāra) and out of compassion (karuṇā).53 This pure gift is a provision (sambhāra) for the Path and for nirvāṇa; this is why we said that it is made in view of the Path. Although one has not attained nirvāṇa, generosity is the cause of a happy retribution (saṁkāvaraṇa) in the world of men (manuṣya) and of gods (deva). The perfume (vāsana) of the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) obtained by pure generosity, made in view of nirvāṇa, is comparable in its purity and its freshness to the fragrance of a garland of flowers (papaṇamukha) barely opened and not yet faded. The Buddha said: “In the world, there are two men hard to find (parāṇaḥ paramaḥ) i) among the mendicants (pravrajitā), a definitively liberated (asamāyamukha) bhikṣu; ii) among the householders (gṛhahṛdayaṁcittavasana), a man who knows how to practice pure generosity.”54 This pure generosity extends over innumerable lifetimes (apravayujjanaṇam). It does not disappear from lifetime to lifetime; it is like a contract that never expires.55 This generosity bears its fruit [when it meets] the complex of conditions (prātyasamuddālaṇa) and favorable time (kālā);56 it is like the tree (yaks) that, in season, produces leaves (parua), flowers (pupua) and fruit (phalā); even though the season has not come, the cause (heṅa) remains, but there is no fruit.

This dharma of generosity favors the adept (read Tao jen) if he seeks the Path. Why is that? Nirvāṇa is called the cessation of the fetters (samyojanavrūṭha). Now, when generosity is practiced, the afflictions (klesa) diminish.57 Thus generosity favors nirvāṇa. Actually, i) by sacrificing the thing to be given (dyaḥpavāraṇa), greed (mātavya) is opposed; ii) by honoring the receiver of the gift (pratigāhaka), envy (śīya) is opposed; iii) by giving with the right mind, hypocrisy (mṛṣa) is opposed; iv) by giving resolutely (ekacita), discursiveness (read Tāo, 64 and 8 = audiḥbhartu) is opposed; v) by giving after deeply reflecting (gambhirāmanasikāra), regret (kaṇṣya) is opposed; vi) by appreciating the qualities of the receiver, lack of respect (anarcandā) is opposed; vii) by concentrating the mind, shamelessness (āśīrya) is opposed; viii) by knowing the fine qualities (gana) of people, impudence (unaprātya) is opposed; ix) by being detached from material goods (śīmaviḍayāraṇa), craving (tṛṣṇā) is opposed; x) by having compassion (karuṇā) for the receiver, anger (krodha) is opposed; xi) by paying respect to the receiver, pride (abhimāna) is opposed; xii) by knowing how to practice the good dharma, ignorance (avidyā) is opposed; xiii) by believing in the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala), wrong view (mātyādṛṣṭi) is opposed; xiv) by knowing the inevitability (niyama) of retribution (vipāka), doubt (vicikṣita) is opposed. All these kinds of bad afflictions are decreased when generosity is practiced and all kinds of good dharman are acquired.

When generosity is practiced, the six sense organs (saṁdṛḍhi) are purified (prasaṅga) and a good mind of desire (kasalaśākmacitta) is produced. When this is produced, the inner mind (adhyatmacitta) is purified. When the virtues (gana) of the fruit of retribution (vipākaphala) are considered, a mind of faith (ṛuddhacitta) is produced. The body (kāya) and the mind (citta) become softened (mrddhatu), joy (ānanda) arises. Joy having arisen, a ‘single-mindedness’ (ekacita) is obtained, thanks to which real wisdom (bhūtārūpāla) is produced: these are the good dharman that are acquired. Furthermore, when generosity is practiced, the mind realizes a type of eightfold noble Path (dātāgīkāmagṛha).58 i) by believing in the fruit of generosity (dānaphala), right view (saṁyagvyāśrī) is obtained; ii) because the thinking (manasthāra) inherent in this right view is not disturbed, right concept (saṁyaksamkāla) is obtained; iii) because physical activities are purified (kiṃyacarita), right action is obtained (saṁyakkarminna); iv) because reward (vipāka) is not sought after, right livelihood (saṁyaggyūdāla) is obtained; vi) because one gives with diligence, right effort (saṁyagvyādulāma) is obtained;

“Actions do not perish even after millions of cosmic periods. Meeting with the complex of conditions and the favorable time, they bear fruit for the possessor of the body.”

53 The excellence of a gift is partially due to the excellence of the donor; the good donor is the one who gives with faith (traddhācita), with respect (satkāra), with his hand (svabhāva) at the right time (kālā), without harming anyone (parān amapuṣṭha). Cf. Dīgha, II, p. 357; Anguttara, III, p. 172; Kosā, IV, p. 235.

54 Anguttara, I, p. 49: Dve māṁ bhikṣhe pāṭahātāni dūrahasthasambhāvāni lokasūtaṁ. Katamāni dve? Ya ca ghiṁma ugram añjñāvastuva Caitau ca nojñapādaḥ saṃkālayitaṁ kāṭhaṁ añgūpādānātmānāṁ pāṭahātāni, ya ca anajñayam añgūpām pāṭahātānaṁ sabādhiṣṭānaṁ ajagūpādānāvāhāryaṁ pāṭahātāṁ: “Two kinds of efforts, O monks, are hard to realize in the world: the exertion of householders to provide clothing, food, seats, medicines and provisions; the exertion of those who have left home and embraced the wandering life to escape from all the conditionings of existence.”

55 The comparison of action to a contract, a debt, is used by the Śrīnīvāsa in order to illustrate their doctrine on the ‘non-cessation’ (aviprāsaṇa) of actions; cf. Madh. vṛtti, p. 317-318: “When action arises, it engenders a non-cessation (aviprāsaṇa) in itself of the series of the agent, an entity dissociated from the mind and comparable to the page on which debts (rupapattas) are recorded. Therefore we know that the aviprāsaṇa is like the page and the action giving rise to this entity called aviprāsaṇa is like the debt. And just as a rich man does not lose his money when he lends it because the debt is written down on the page, just as he will recover his money fivefold at the desired time, so the action that has ceased, being recorded in the aviprāsaṇa entity, brings the proper fruit to the agent. Just as the page on which the debts are inscribed expires when the money is repaid to the lender and is no longer able – whether it exists or no longer exists – to cause the money to be repaid again, so the aviprāsaṇa – whether it exists or no longer exists – is incapable of causing a new retribution, like an expired debt.” On this theory, on which all the Buddhist schools reject, see also Madh. avatāra, p. 126, 1. 12 (tr. Musón, 1910, p. 318); Karmanidhiprakarana, p. 86 seq.; above, Tattvāt, I, p. 347F.

56 A reminiscence of the well-known stanza of the Vinayas, the Dīvyāvadāna and the Avadūtānātaka: na prāśaṁyanti kārmikā kalpaṇikāśitaṁ api, sāmāyram pūpya kālam ca phalānte khalu dehinām.

57 Great fruits are promised for the generosity accomplished by a person endowed with morality (ākāra) who, according to the Anguttara, is free of the five faults and provided with five qualities. The five faults, viz., sensual desire (kāma) and the desire of action (chanda), maliciousness (vipāśāla), laziness (tyāga) and languor (mūrdha), agitation (audiḥbhartu) and regret (kaṇṣya) and finally, doubt (vicikṣita) are borrowed from the list of paravyaśātināḥ which the practice of generosity helps to eliminate. The Mppi has already given a complete list of the (cf. Tattvāt, I, p. 424F).

58 This dātāgīkāmagṛha is frequently mentioned and explained in the canonical scriptures; see Rhys Davids-Stede, s.v. magga.
13) As one gives according to the wishes of the supplicant and without waiting for him to speak, one obtains the marks consisting of having [one’s] privy parts enclosed in a sheath (ḥotigatavastiguhya).

14-15) As one gives fine garments (vastrā), seats (sālayāstana), gold and silver (savrarnaṣaṇa), pearls and jewels (maṅśiraṇa), one obtains the marks consisting of having a golden-colored (savrarnaṇa) body and fine skin (ākṣmacchāvari).

16-17) As one gives in such a way that the recipient (pratigrāhaka) alone enjoys full ownership (aṅśvārya), one obtains the marks consisting of having a hair growing from each of one’s pores (ekakarōma) and a tuft of white hair between the eyebrows (ārṇa bhūruv madhye jāta).

18-19) One finds out what the supplicant wants and gives it to him. For this act, one obtains the marks consisting of having a chest like a lion (sīmhapūrvarākalyāṇa) and perfectly rounded shoulders (saumvṛttaśankhaṇa).

20-21. Because one has given medicines (bhaisajya) to the sick (gāna) and food (āhūra) to those who are hungry and thirsty, one obtains the marks consisting of having the bottom of the armpits plump (citāntarāmaṇa) and obtaining the best of tastes (rasaratvasaptakāṇa).

22-23) When one is giving, one encourages people to take comfort by practicing generosity. Thus preparing the way for generosity, one obtains the marks consisting of having the head crowned by a protuberance (aṇuśūla) and the body rounded like the nyagrodha tree (nyagrodha śārīravindula). When one agrees to give what the supplicant wants and if one expresses oneself delicately with gentleness in true words (sāyavadā), without resorting to lying (maśvadā), one obtains the marks consisting of having a broad tongue (prabhātañjāvā), a brahmic voice (brahmavāra) and a voice pleasant like that of the sparrow (kalavīśakāhāna).

24-26) When one agrees to give what the supplicant wants and if one expresses oneself delicately with gentleness in true words (sāyavadā), without resorting to lying (maśvadā), one obtains the marks consisting of having a broad tongue (prabhātañjāvā), a brahmic voice (brahmavāra) and a voice pleasant like that of the sparrow (kalavīśakāhāna).

[141c] 27) While giving, when one expresses oneself in words in harmony with the truth and loving-kindly speech, one obtains the mark consisting of having the jaw of a lion (sīmhanum).

28-29) When one gives, one honors the recipient and, as the mind is pure (viśuddha), one obtains the marks consisting of having white teeth (śūlālantaka) set very close together (aṅkāvalīkālīka) and a voice pleasant like that of the sparrow (kalavīśakāhāna).

30) When giving, if one expresses oneself truthfully (sāyavadā) in coherent speech (sāmghātāvāda), one obtains the mystical mark of having forty teeth (caṭaṭvṛtāśuṇḍana).

31-32) While giving, if one is not irritated, is detached, has an even mind (ekacittena), one obtains the marks consisting of having blue eyes (aḥhindlanetra) with eyelashes like those of the king of the oxen (gopaksmanetra).

Thus generosity plants the causes and conditions (hetupratyāyā) for the thirty-two marks.
Finally, by means of the generosity of the seven jewels (saptaratna): people (jana), vehicles (yāna), gold and silver (savarṇaraṇa), lamps (ālāpa), houses (gha), perfumes (gandha) and flowers (puṣpa), one becomes a cakravartin king furnished with the seven jewels.62

535

Furthermore, the reward (vipāka) attributed to generosity increases (vurdhāte) in the following cases:63

1. When the gift is made at the appropriate time (kālañcana). The Buddha said: "Giving to the one who is going afar (gana), giving to the one who gas come from afar (āgantuka), giving to the sick (gālana), giving to the care-giver (glanopasthāyaka), giving during difficult times of wind (vātalālikā) or cold (dhitalālikā): these are gifts given at the desired time (kālañcana)."64

2. When one is directed, in one's gifts, by the needs of the region.

3. When one gives on a desert trail.

4. When one gives ceaselessly and uninterruptedly.

5. When one gives according to the desires of the requester.

6. When one gives things of value.

7. When one gives gardens (ārūma), pools (bhrada), etc., to the good people of the monasteries (vihārā).

8. When one gives to the Community (sa'gha).

9. When the giver (ādayaka) and the receiver (pratigrāhaka) are both virtuous.65

10. When one honors the recipient in all manners of ways.

11. When one honors the recipient in all manners of ways.

12. When one gives absolutely all that one has.

---

62 The seven jewels of the cakravartin are the wheel (vālaka), the elephant (bāstita), the horse (śīva), the treasure (muni), the queen (suvrata), the majordomo (ghrapati) and the minister (purāṇyaka). They are listed in Dīgha, II, p. 16 seq., II, p. 172 seq., III, p. 59; Majjhima, III, p. 172; Satyavātara, V, p. 99; Lalitavistara, p. 14-18; Mahāvastu, I, p. 108.

63 The question of the increase of merit (punyatvāryāh) is studied in Mahācudānāsūtra, which has nothing in common with the Mahācudānāsūtra of the Āguttara, III, p. 355 seq. nor with the Cundaśutta of the Suttanātha, verse 83-90, but has been preserved for us in the Kośavyākhya, p. 353-354, and in two Chinese translations: Tchong a han, T 26, no. 7, k. 2, p. 427c; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 35, p. 741c. Here is a summary: “There are seven meritorious material actions (aupadihikā punyatvāryāh); ... when a faithful person (śuddhabhik), a son or daughter of noble family, is invested with them, whether he is walking, standing, sleeping or waking, the merit increases (abhisarutthāte) with unceasing intensity (tattāsvāsaṃvāna): the merit adds up (opaccayanto eva punyatvārya). What are these seven material acts? The son or daughter of noble family: 1. gives a garden to the Assembly of monks of the four directions (cuddālaya bhikkhasaṃghālāma prajātiparāsāvat); 2. builds a monastery in this garden (tassmin svārāme vihāram prajātiparāsāvat); 3. provides seats for this monastery (tassmin eva vihāre śaṇayanānām pratiparāsāvat); 4. provides generous alms for this monastery (tassmin eva vihāre dhravabhhikām prajātiparāsāvat); 5. gives gifts to strangers and travelers (āgantukāyā gamikāya eva dānam dadditi); 6. gives gifts to the sick and to the care-taker (gālāya glanopasthākāyā eva dānam dadditi); 7. when it is cold (vātalālikā), windy (vātalālikā) or raining (vāsikā), he provides and gives food, sweets or boiled rice (bhaktiṃi vā tarpaṇaṃ v ā yuvādpānaṃ eva tāσi sanghāya)mānaṃ pratiparāsāvat).”

64 In the explanation that follows, the Mppi will mention more of these material virtuous acts.

65 In this definition of kālañcana, the Mppi mentions the fifth, sixth and seventh material meritorious actions listed in the preceding note. Another definition occurs in Āguttara, III, p. 41: "Pāde 'indriya bhikkhe kāladānaṃ. Kastamāni pācāna" āgantukassā dānam deti. gamikassā dānam deti. gālāsaṃva dānam deti. yānī tāσi navasasāṃva navapathālāṃ. tāσi pathamānāṃ śaṇavanamā prajātiparāsāvat. "There are, O monks, five gifts at the appropriate time. What are these five? One gives to the one who is arriving, one gives to the one who is departing, one gives to the sick, one gives at time of famine, the first fruits of field and orchard one gives first of all to virtuous people." - The same phrase in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 24, p. 681b, with the following gloss: “the first fruits of field and orchard are presented first of all to virtuous and vigorous (vīryavṛpan) people; only afterwards does one eat them oneself.”
The complete gift of the painter Karna.66 - Thus in the city of Fou kai lo (Puṣkarāvatī) of the Ta Yue tche, there was a painter (citrākāra) named Ts’en na (read Kie na = Karna)67 who went to the kingdom of To tch’a che lo (Takṣaṇīl)68 of the eastern region (pārvadēsa). Having painted there abroad for thirty years, he returned thirty ounces of gold. Returning with it to his own native land, Puṣkarāvatī, he heard the drum being beaten to announce a great gathering (maṇiparīṣad). He went to see the assembly (sambhāha) and in the purity of his faith (śraddhācittavittudihi) he asked the karmadāna:69 “What is needed to feed this assembly for a day?” The karmadāna answered: “Thirty ounces of gold is enough to feed them for a day.” Then the painter gave his thirty ounces of gold to the karmadāna, saying: “Furnish the assembly with food for me for one day; as for myself, I will go away tomorrow.” And he went home empty-handed. His wife asked: “During these twelve years, what did you earn?” He replied: “I earned thirty ounces of gold.” His wife said: “Where is this gold?” He answered: “I have planted it in a field of merit (puruṣyaśeṣa).” His wife asked what was this field of merit. He replied: “I gave it to the Assembly (sambhāha).” Then his wife bound his chains and brought him before the judge to punish him [142a] and decide the matter. The great judge asked what was the problem. The woman said: “My husband is a madman: in twelve years abroad he earned thirty ounces of gold and, having no compassion for his wife and children, he gave it all away to strangers. Basing myself on the law, I immediately bound him up and brought him here.” The judge asked the husband: “Why did you give to strangers instead of bringing it back to your wife and children?” He answered: “During my previous lifetimes (pārvavajāmna), I had never practiced virtue (guna) and that is why, in the present lifetime (ṣaśاjanman), I am poor (daridra) and suffer all the hardships (ārta). In the course of this lifetime, I have come across a field of merit (puruṣyaśeṣa): if I had planted nothing in it, I would still be poor during my future lifetimes and my successive poverty (cārdiṣu) would still be poor during my future lifetimes and my successive poverty (cārdiṣu).”

66 The story of Karna is told in the following sources: A very mutilated fragment of the Kalpaṇāṃdittiśākṛta, ed. Lüders, p. 148-149; Ta tche lo yen loun kien, T 201, no. 21, k. 4, p. 279a-280a (tr. Huber, Sūtraśāṅkāra, p. 117-119); Tsa pao tsang kien, T 203, no. 42, k. 4, p. 468a-b (tr. summarized in Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 40); Ling lu yi siang, T 2121, k. 44, p. 226 (reproducing the present passage of the Mpīs).

67 Karna was a native of Puṣkarāvatī (T 201), “of the country of Gāndhāra and the city of Puṣkarāvatī” (T 201). Here the Mpīs is more precise: Karna is a native of the city of Puṣkarāvatī ‘of the Ta Yue tche’; he came to the kingdom of Takṣaṇīl ‘in the eastern direction’ there, “abroad”, he painted for twelve years. This passage sheds some light on the place of origin and the date of the Mpīs. A text that situates Takṣaṇīl in the eastern direction can hardly have been composed anywhere but in Kapiśa or in Gāndhāra. According to the Chinese custom, Kumāravīra, the translator of the Mpīs, here means, by Ta Yue tche, the Kusāna monarch. Actually, whereas “various countries all call [this land] the country of the king of Kusāna (Kusāna), the Chinese, departing from the old name, [continue to] say the Ta Yue tche” (Heou-Han chou, , tr. P. Pelliot, Takshan et Koutche, JA, 1934, p. 38). The story of Karna takes place at a time when the Kusāna already reigned in Gāndhāra but did not yet extend their sovereignty over Takṣaṇīl. Thus we are in the reign of the Kusāna monarch Kujula Kadphises. Actually, K'ewe tsiou h'lo (Kujula Kadphises) is the sovereign who “invaded the Ny-an (Parthia), seized the territory of Kao-foo (Kapiśa) and conquered P'ou-ta and Ki-pin (Kasmir)” (cf. E. Chavannes, Les pays d’Occident d’après le Hayou Han chou, T’oung pao, series II, VIII, p. 190 seq.). A little later, the same monarch added Gāndhāra and probably also Takṣaṇīl to his crown; the inscription of Panjāū (south of Mahān) in eastern Gāndhāra tells us that: “In the year 122, the first day of the month of Śrīnava, under the reign of the great king Gauana, the eastern region of [Ku] pu na was made propitious ground by Moška, son of Urmama (“Stron Konov, CLI, II, p. 70). Although this inscription uses the era of Azae I (57 B.C.), it establishes that in the year 122-57, i.e., the year 65 A.D., Gāndhāra belonged to the great Kusāna king Kujula Kadphises (cf. B. Ghirshman, Bégaram, Cairo, 1946, p. 106, 124).

68 The name of the painter was indeed Karna, as the fragment of the Kalpaṇāṃdittiśākṛta, p. 148 (aham Karna īśi) and the transcriptions Ki na (122 and 12; 163 and 4) and Kie na (123 and 9; 163 and 4) of the T 203 and 201 say, 1c.

69 The Ts’a pao tsang kien (1c.) does not mention Takṣaṇīl; it says only that Karna worked abroad for three years. According to the Ta tche lo yen loun kien (1c.), Karna had decorated a vihāra in the kingdom of Che che (112; 40 and 6); in these two characters which mean ‘House of stones’, Huber (Sūtraśāṅkāra, index, p. 473) sees Āmauka or Āmauparanā; others see Taskent (Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, II, p. 644; Ghirshman, Bégaram, Cairo, 1946, p. 149), but comparison with the Fa tō’a che lo transcription of the Mpīs indicates that Che che, the first character of which means ‘stone’ (in Sanskrit, śilā) conceals an original Takṣaṇīl.

Here Kumāravīra renders Takṣaṇīl by To tch’a che lo (16 and 3; 18 and 6; 70 and 5; 122 and 14); whereas in his translations of other works (e.g., T 201, k. 5, p. 282a19-20), he uses the more usual transcription To tch’a che lo (60 and 8; 20 and 1; 44; 122 and 14) which also occurs in the Chinese Ekottara (T 99, p. 253c1; 162c29) and in the legend of Alokā (T 2042, k. 1, p. 100c2; T 2043, k. 1, p. 133a6); Huian tsiang (T 2087, k. 3, p. 884a28) uses the characters Ta tō’a ch lo (30 and 5; 29 and 1; 38 and 5; 122 and 14). Besides these transcriptions, there are also Tō’ou che (167 and 19; 112) ‘Dressed stone’ in T 2043, k. 10, p. 166c7; T’ou che (32, 112) ‘Earth and stone’, i.e., construction materials (nakama) in T 2043, k. 10, p. 166c12; Sio che (18 and 7; 112) ‘Cut stone’ in T 190, k. 38, p. 831b11.
This is why it is said that to dedicate completely the goods that one has earned with hardship constitutes very great merit.

3. Other kinds of generosity

There is also mundane generosity (laukikadāna) and supramundane generosity (lokottaradāna), the generosity approved of by the āryas (āryavarnātināna) and the generosity disapproved of by the āryas (āryavarnātināna), the generosity of the buddhas and bodhisattvas (buddhabodhisattvadāna) and the generosity of the śrīvakas (śrīvakadāna).

1) What is mundane generosity (laukikadāna)? Mundane generosity is the generosity of ordinary people (pṛthagjanaadāna) and also the generosity used by the āryas with an impure mind (śrāvavacittā). Some say that [only] the generosity of worldly people constitutes mundane generosity, whereas the generosity of the āryas, even though carried out with impure mind, is supramundane because their fettters (sanyojana) are cut (chinnā).

Why? Because these āryas have obtained the concentration of non-thought (apraṇaśītīsamādhi). Furthermore, mundane generosity is impure (āvisuddha), whereas supramundane generosity is pure (vīśuddha). There are two kinds of fettters (sanyojana): 1) those that depend on craving (ṣṛṣṭipāka); 2) those that depend on wrong views (dṛṣṭapekṣa). When these two kinds of fettters are present, the generosity is mundane; when they are absent, the generosity is supramundane.

When the three obstacles (śrāvāna) fettter the mind, the generosity is mundane. Why? Dharmas, resulting from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) are truly without substantial self (anatmāca); nevertheless, we say: “I am giving and someone is receiving”; this is what is called mundane generosity. Besides, [the notion] of self (ātman) has no precise attribution (anuvatāsthāna): sometimes it is the self that is taken as ātman and not as other; sometimes it is other that is taken as ātman and not as self. As a result of this imprecision, there is no true ātman. Moreover, the thing given (deṣadāna) exists solely as a result of the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayavatāmārga) and all the dharmas are in themselves nonexistent (anupalabdhi). They are like a cloth (pata) that results from a collection of causes and conditions but which ceases to exist as soon as one pulls out the silken thread or threads of which it is composed. In the same way the dharmas have as sole characteristic the absence of own-characteristic ([142b] anumānakaranā); they are eternally empty of self nature (svabhāvakālanā). But people have hallucinations (abhijñāya) and take them to be existent. This mistake (viparyāsa) and this error characterize the mundane generosity. – But when the mind is free of the three obstacles (śrāvāna), the characteristic of dharmas (laksanaādhara) is truly cognized and the mind is free of error (viparyāsa): then generosity is supramundane.

2) Supramundane generosity is the generosity approved of by the āryas (āryavarnātināna); mundane generosity is the generosity disapproved of by the āryas (āryavarnātināna).

Moreover, pure (vīśuddha) generosity free of stains (vimula) and conforming to the true nature (bhūtalaksana) of dharmas is the generosity approved of by the āryas; the impure (āvisuddha) generosity, mixed with fettters (sanyojana), errors (viparyāsa) and obstinacy (cittasaṅgha) is the generosity disapproved of by the āryas.

Finally, the generosity associated with the knowledge of the true nature (bhūtalaksanaśrīyā) is the generosity approved of by the āryas; in the contrary case, it is disapproved of by the āryas.

3) When one gives without seeking [the welfare] of beings or without wanting to know the true nature (bhūtalaksana) of dharmas, but only for the purpose of escaping from birth (jīva), old age (jīva), sickness (vyādhi) and death (marana), this is the generosity of the śrīvakas. When one gives for all beings or again in order to know the true nature of dharmas, this is the generosity of the Buddhās or bodhisattvas.

When one is incapable of fulfilling (paripārana) all the qualities (gunas) [required for true generosity] but one is seeking to obtain a small portion of them, this is generosity of the śrīvakas. When one wishes to fulfill all the qualities, this is generosity of the Buddhās or bodhisattvas. At this point, the story of the P’ou sa pen cheng king (Bodhisattvajñātakasūtra) should be told.

Assembly. His wife was won over and she acknowledged that “as soon as one has decided to give alms, the reward is already imminent.”

72 See above, Treatise, I, p. 322-323F.

73 Impure generosity, practiced by worldly people, rests on belief in the ātman and in dharmas, for the donor says to himself: “It is I who am giving something. Actually, there is no ātman and no dharmas, for everything is transitory (aniyata), impure (asiha), empty (śunya) and without substantial self (anatmaka). The supramundane generosity, which the Mppā has described above (Treatise, I, p. 297F), the ‘higher gift’, is based essentially on knowledge without concept (nirvāśiṭakṣānāna) which makes it truly pure (trīṃadalaparaiśuddha) and which consists of making no distinction between giver (dīyaka), the thing given (ākṛṣṭa) and the recipient (vratānāka). Cf. Patavāsī, p. 264, Śatāśasāvakā, p. 92; Bodhicaryāvatāra, IX, st. 168; Paliśa, p. 684; Uttarastūra, p. 120, 254; Samgraha, p. 185, 225; Siddhi, p. 629 as note.

74 See above, Treatise, I, p. 424F.

75 The three obstacles that render the gift mundane consist of the belief in the ātman and dharmas which makes the donor say: “It is I who am giving something to someone.” The supramundane gift makes no distinction between donor, recipient and gift, is free from these three obstacles and is “triply pure” (trīṃadalapariśuddha). See also below, p. 724F.

76 One of the four errors (viparyāsa) consists precisely of taking as self that which is not the self (anatman antā, i.e. vipālaśa); cf. Abhugata, II, p. 52; Kośa, V, p. 21; Śikṣasamuccaya, p. 198, l. 11.

77 Generosity of the bodhisattvas has as its aim the welfare of all beings and perfect buddhahood; cf. Kośa, IV, p. 238.
The distractions of the mind are often compared to the gamboling of a monkey; cf. Treatise, I, p. 489f.

The Bodhisattva Velāma understood that he made incapable of receiving his gifts. Thus it was no longer out of esteem for this assembly only a Buddha or a future Buddha was worthy to receive them. Velāma understood that the brahmins assembly “was incapable of receiving his gifts.” For twelve years, he distributed floods of cream (śvayambhūrā) covered with lion skins, tiger skins and leopard skins (simhanāyuddhavālīvicharaparāvīra), provided with magnificent hangings... of white linen (pāṇḍukambala) and other varied ornaments; 84,000 palanquins (paryaṅka) with ribbons of various colors (miraṇvarṇajāla) and all kinds of rugs (dāṣṭarana), soft and fine, as ornaments; cushions of red silk (lokiṣṭapadhāna) were placed at both ends of the palanquins, cloths and precious garments were also piled there; 84,000 golden vases filled with silver (suvarṇapūralītipaṛśāpaṇa); 84,000 silver vases filled with gold (rājyapūra suvarṇaprāpaṇa); 84,000 vases of beryl with crystal (vaṣṭiśapātaṇa suvarṇaśaṇḍāpāṇa); 84,000 crystal vases filled with beryl (ṣapāṭṣaṇḍāpāṇa); 84,000 cows (dhenu) giving a bucketful of milk at one milking (kāṃśyaspadhalana), their horns and hooves adorned with gold and dressed in white cotton; 84,000 young maidens (kanyā), beautiful and virtuous, their bodies decorated with rings set with pearls and precious stones (sūmakamāṇyatattatukalā). This is a summary of [the great gifts made by Velāma; the details could not be described. Simultaneously, king Vāsava (read पो su p'o) and the 84,000 minor kings, together with the ministers (amārya), the people, soldiers and merchants, each offered a hundred thousand gold pieces.

When Velāma had made the usual offering (dharmaṇyaḥ)52 and prepared these gifts, Che t'i p'o na min (Śakra devānāma indra), spoke this stanza to the bodhisattva Velāma:

The wealth of the universe, so difficult to acquire,
Can make the whole world rejoice.
Today, all that you have acquired,
You have given to attain buddhahood.
At the same time, the gods of the pure abodes (śādādvāsadeva), appearing in corporeal form, praised him and spoke this stanza:

You have opened the gate to the great gifts.
That which you have done
Is out of compassion (ānukampā) for beings,
And in view of attaining buddhahood.

Then the gods had this thought: “We will block up his golden vase (suvarṇabīrīḍaga) in such a way that the water cannot flow out of it. Why? Although there is a donor (dāyukha) here [namely, Velāma], there is no field of merit (pasyuṣkṣetra) [i.e., an individual worthy of receiving his gifts].”53

Then king Mo (Māra) said to the Śuddhavāṣika gods: “But all the brahmīns [invited here by Velāma to receive his gifts] have all gone forth from home (pravrajita), observe the pure precepts (śīluśuddhi) and have entered the Path (marga). How can you say that they are not a field of merit?” The Śuddhavāsika gods said: “The bodhisattva [Velāma] is giving gifts with the view of obtaining buddhahood, whereas all these men are [blinded] by wrong views (mīhyati). This is why we say that there is no field of merit.” King Māra replied: “How do you know that Velāma is making these gifts in view of obtaining buddhahood?”

Then the Śuddhavāsika gods created, by metamorphosis (nirmāna), a brahmin carrying a golden vase (suvarṇabīrīḍa) and holding a golden red (suvarṇadaṇḍa) who approached the bodhisattva Velāma and said: “What benefits do you hope to obtain by means of these great gifts, by renouncing things that seek that. – “Are you seeking to become Note: In the translation of the epithet kamūpaṭṭhātāna, applied to the milk-cows, I [Lamotte] have departed from Buddhaghosa’s interpretation: saravatayabhīpaticchāke "having milk-buckets made of silver" and the translations proposed by T. W. Rhys-Davids (Dialogues, II, p. 221): “with horns tipped with bronze”, Nyāyatākāra (Reden des Buddha, V, p. 201: “mit Bronzeglocken behängt”, and E. M. Hare (Gradual Sayings, IV, p. 263): “with milkpails of silver”. The correct interpretation of kamūpaṭṭhāna “giving a full bucket of milk at one time”, proposed by H. Kern, Voorlopers 1 Woordboek van Childers, Amsterdam, 1916, p. 142, should be adopted.

Chinese versions of the Velāmasutta have understood the text. – As for this description of Velāma’s fabled generosity, it is made up of borrowed pieces and fragments that may be found throughout the texts; cf. Dīgha, II, p. 187-188; Samyutta, III, p. 144-145; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 94. The description of the palanquins occurs even in the Sanskrit Sukhāvatīvyūha, § 41, but in a very corrupted form.]
Then the fictive brahmin said: “Master of generosity [patron] (dānapati), it is good (sādhu), it is very good; then the bodhisattva spoke this stanza:

I seek the place free of desire,

Escaping from birth, old age, sickness and death.

I want to save all beings;

Therefore I seek buddhahood.

The fictive brahmin (nirmitabhṛḍamaṇa) answered: “Master of generosity (dānapati), buddhahood is difficult (durlabhā) to attain and demands great hardships (āstāna). Your mind is soft (meduka), accustomed to pleasure, and is certainly not capable of aspiring to that state. As I said before, the states of noble cakravartin king, of Śakradevānāminda, of king of the six classes of Kāmadhātudeva and of Brahmaidāvarta are easy to obtain. It’s not necessary to seek buddhahood.” The bodhisattva answered:

“Listen then to my fully considered oath (ekacittaparindhat): Even if a wheel of burning iron (samāyucake)53 was spinning on top of my head,

I would seek buddhahood resolutely (ekacittena)

With no regret.

Even if I had to undergo immense sufferings

In the three bad destinies (durgati) or among men,

I would resolutely seek buddhahood

And never depart from this resolve.

53 Mira is king of the Purāṇimitavasavantins and consequently the head of the six classes of gods of the desire realm; cf. above, Treatise, I, p. 348ff, 695f.

54 A well-known punishment which Maitrakanyaka (Maitraya) once saw in front of him, himself becoming the victim of it; cf. Dīvyāvāda, p. 604; Avadānaśāstra, I, p. 202; Karmavibhaṅga, p. 53. Here is the description of the punishment in the Avadānaśāstra, I, c., p. 304f; 695f.

Then the fictive brahmin said: “Master of generosity [patron] (dānapati), it is good (sādhu), it is very good; then seek to become Buddha.” And he added this stanza of praise:

The power of your exertion (vīrṣa) is great,

Your have compassion for all beings.

Your wisdom (prajñā) is free of hindrances (āvarana)

You will become Buddha before long.

Then the gods rained down flowers to worship the bodhisattva. As for the Śuddhāvāsika gods who had blocked up Velāma’s vase so that the water did not flow out, they had hidden themselves and disappeared. Then the bodhisattva went to the brahmin who was the oldest (cakravartin king, of king of the six classes of gods of the desire realm; cf. above, Treatise, I, p. 340F, 695F.

“I seek the place free of desire,

Escaping from birth, old age, sickness and death.

I want to save all beings;

Therefore I seek buddhahood.

The fictive brahmin (nirmitabhrāmaṇa) answered: “Master of generosity (dānapati), buddhahood is difficult (durlabhā) to attain and demands great hardships (āstāna). Your mind is soft (meduka), accustomed to pleasure, and is certainly not capable of aspiring to that state. As I said before, the states of noble cakravartin king, of Śakradevānāminda, of king of the six classes of Kāmadhātudeva and of Brahmaidāvarta are easy to obtain. It’s not necessary to seek buddhahood.” The bodhisattva answered:

“Listen then to my fully considered oath (ekacittaparindhat): Even if a wheel of burning iron (samāyucake)53 was spinning on top of my head,

I would seek buddhahood resolutely (ekacittena)

With no regret.

Even if I had to undergo immense sufferings

In the three bad destinies (durgati) or among men,

I would resolutely seek buddhahood

And never depart from this resolve.

In men, the net of wrong views (mītyādyajñā)lā)

And passions (kleśha) have destroyed right knowledge (samyagdhiñā).

Having wandered away from pure morality

These wretches will fall into various [bad] destinies.

“This is why,” they added, “the water [that you wanted to pour over their hands] is blocked and does not flow.” Having said this, they suddenly disappeared.

53 In order to make the transfer irrevocable, the donor pours a little water over the hands of the receiver (cf. Jolly, Recht und Sitt, p. 112). See, e.g., the gift of the Jetavana in Nidānakāra, p. 93: Andhaśeṣikā... samāyubhrāmaṇaṁ upāya Dasaubalaṁ hatte adakam pāmbhāt “imam Jetavanavrāhām āgatanāgataca cāndhadaṁcāc buddhayapramahāsī samphussa damati” adhiṣṭha, - the gift of the Veyavan in Vîsīya, I, p. 39: Atha kho vajā Mañcagado Sesiyo Bimbacāḥ sarvanamayam bhākām gahaṁ bhagavatām ēkaṁnām bhante Veyavanam uyyānam buddhayapramahākṣaṁ bhākākṣasamphussa damatī; - the gift of his wife by Ugra in Aiguattara, IV, p. 210: Atha kīvakārṇam sam puraṇam pakṣakalavānī vācena hattena pājapatiṁ gahaṁva dakkhīnena hatthena bhīgovam gahaṁva tassā puraṇacau ujjyate - Lacking the golden vase, Veyavatara used a gourd to give his two children to a brahmin; cf. Jānakārī, p. 62: Bodhisattva... bhāpuṣṭiverite brāhamasva pāṇuva kumandalam āvarjavaṁ ñca, tassā yāmāvārṇoḥa pāṇaṁsaḥ kumandalo - The vase that serves to accomplish the ritual of aspersions is often represented on Buddha’s monuments; cf. Fouche, Art Gréc–bouddhique, I, p. 474, 475, 487, 491.
At that moment, the six classes of gods of the realm of desire (kāmadhātu) shone rays of light (raśmi) of all kinds and lit up the assembly; addressing themselves to the bodhisattva, they spoke this stanza:

Wandering in the ocean of evil
They are not following your straight path.
Of those who receive your gifts
There is no one like you.

Having said this, they suddenly disappeared.

Hearing this stanza, the bodhisattva had this thought: “In this assembly is there really nobody who is my equal, and is that why the water is blocked and does not flow?” And he spoke this stanza:

In the universes of the ten directions,
If there are marvellous pure beings,
I take refuge (śaraṇa) in them and I bow down to them
Holding the vase in my right hand,
I pour the water into my left hand
And I take the vow (prajñāli) to be the only man
Who is worthy to receive such great gifts.

At once the water in the vase rose up into space (ākāśa) and, falling from above, poured into the bodhisattva’s left hand.

At the beginning, Velāma had given alms to the assembly of brahmīns with the idea that they were equal, and is that why the water is blocked and does not flow?” And he spoke this stanza:

Filled with respect and joining their hands as a sign of homage, the great assembly took refuge (ārcaṇa, satkāra) and spoke this stanza:

Great master of brahmīns
Water the color of pure beryl (vaidūrya)
Flowing down from above
Has fallen into your hand!

Filled with respect and joining their hands as a sign of homage, the great assembly took refuge (śaraṇa) in the bodhisattva.

Then the bodhisattva spoke this stanza:

The gifts that I make today
Do not have as their goal the merits of the threefold world (traiḍhātu); They are for [the benefit] of all beings
And in order to seek for Buddhahood.

When he had said this, the great earth (mahāprthī), the mountains (parvata), the rivers (naḍī) and the trees (vṛkṣa) trembled in six different ways (sākṣīkāram akampantā).88

At the beginning, Velāma had given alms to the assembly of brahmīns with the idea that they were worthy of receiving his homage (ācārya); afterwards, when he had understood that this assembly were unworthy, it was out of compassion [and no longer from respect], that he gave them gifts that they had already received.89

Jñatas and avādhanas of this type relating to all kinds of gifts could be cited at length here. Those are outer gifts (bhāyādāna), but what are inner gifts (ādhyātmikādāna)?

4. Inner generosity

Inner generosity consists of giving one’s life (ājīva) to others without any regret, as is told in the Jñatas and Avadhanas.

87 In the Manoratha, IV, p. 183, there is no fictive brahmīn and things happen in a more simple way: Velāma had filled a golden vase with water the color of crystal, he made the following vow: “In this world, if there is a person worthy of homage, able to receive this gift, may the water coming from this vase spread over the earth, if there is no one, may the water remain in the vase.” At once he turned the vase upside down; the water was retained as if by a filter. The Bodhisattva then said: “So Jambudvīpa is then empty; there is not even a single person capable of receiving my offering.” Nevertheless, without regret he added: “If my offering is purified by the action of the donor, may the water coming out of the vase spread over the earth.” At once, the water, flowing out of the vase like crystal, spread out over the earth. He resolved then to fulfill his alms and distributed his gifts. The distribution lasted for seven years and seven months.”

88 On this sixfold trembling of the earth, see above, Traité, I, p. 471-474F.

89 See the interpretation proposed above, p. 679F, note.

90 Outer and inner gifts are defined in Bodh. bhūmi, p. 114-115: tatra sarvadānam kathatam: sarvam ucyate sāmadūto dvīdham deyāvatu. ādhyātmikam ca bhāyam ca tate śū kṣīkāram ucyate. tadāh kṣīkāram ucyate. idamaṁ sūktam sthāpayeyat pariṣṭadeyastaparyāyena bhāyadeyastaparyāyena evety ucyate.
The Buddha was once a pigeon (1). [The king who set fire to his body so as to hear a Buddhist stanza].

– The Buddha Śākyamuni... into a yakṣa, in order to hear the stanza: priyebhyo jāyate śokaḥ, priyebhyo jāyate bhayam; priyebhyo...

549

The king who set fire to his body so as to hear a Buddhist stanza

81 – The Buddha Śākyamuni

... into a yakṣa, in order to hear the stanza: priyebhyo jāyate śokaḥ, priyebhyo jāyate bhayam; priyebhyo...

2. [Jātaka of the Pigeon]. – The Buddha was once a pigeon (kapota) living in the Snow Mountains (himālaya). On stormy day, a man lost his way; miserable (dārādva) and exhausted (ārthā), hunger (bhūṣaka) and cold (śīla) had brought him to his last moments (mukhātra). Seeing this man, the pigeon... flew to look for fire (agni), collected some kindling (indhana) and lit it. Then the pigeon threw itself into the fire and gave its body to the famished man.

In the same way, the Bodhisattva gave his head (ṭīras), his eyes (nayana), his marrow (majjā) and his skull (mastaka) to beings. It would be necessary to list fully the various Jātakas and Avadhanasūtras here. All of that is called inner generosity. The immensity of these inner (ādhityānīka) and outer (bāhyya) gifts is the nature of generosity.

CHAPTER XX: THE VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY AND GENEROSITY OF THE DHARMA (p. 692F)

I. GENEROSITY OF THE DHARMA

Question. - What is meant by generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna)?

Answer. - Here are various opinions:

1. All speech well-spoken (subhāsita), all useful (arthaśastra) speech constitutes generosity of the Dharma.

2. Generosity of the Dharma consists of teaching the Holy Dharma (saddharmā) explained by the Buddha (budhakānḍhoka) to people.

3. Generosity of the Dharma consists of teaching people the threefold Dharma: 1) the Sićou tou lou (Sūtra); 2) the Pā yi ni (Vinaya); 3) the A pī i ṭ an (Abhidharma).

4. Generosity of the Dharma consists of teaching people the four Baskets of the Dharma (dharmapiṇikā): 1) the Sićou tou lou tsang (Sićrapitaka); 2) the Pā yi ni tsang (Vinayapitaka); 3) the A pī i ṭ an tsang (Abhidharmapitaka); 4) the Tsā tsang (Sāmyutapitaka).

5. Generosity of the Dharma consists of teaching in brief form the twofold Dharma: 1) the śrīvaka Dharma; 2) the Mahāyāna Dharma.

---

94 The distinction between material (ādiṣadāna) generosity and generosity of the Dharma (dharmadāna) is of canonical origin: cf. Aṅguttara, I, p. 91; Itivuttaka, p. 98; Tsong ti a han, T 125, k. 7, p. 577b. To these two types of generosity, the Mahāyāna treatises, especially those of the Vījñānavādin school, add a third, namely, the generosity of safety (abhaya-dāna): cf. Dharmasamgraha, chap. CV; Saṃhidhirmocana, IX, § 12; Saṃgraha, p. 190-191; Abhidharmasamuccaya-vākhyā, T 1606, k. 12, p. 740c; Siddhi, p. 620; Bodhi. Bhāmi, p. 133: ādiṣadānam dharmadānam abhaya-dānam ca samāsatah. "Hāmātraśuṣakūnaṃ ādiṣadānam dharmadānam abhaya-dānam cāsaṃāsatah. Hāmātraśuṣakūnaṃ dānam saṃbhājanānāṃ. Vaijñānavādināṃ, satvāṃvaṃhaṃ saṃbhājanānāṃ. Vaijñānavādināṃ satvāṃvaṃhaṃ saṃbhājanānāṃ. Vaijñānavādināṃ satvāṃvaṃhaṃ saṃbhājanānāṃ.

95 The question has already been raised (Traité, I, p. 590F) of the four Dharmapiṇikās; on the fourth “the Mixed Basket”, see Przyłuski, Concit, p. 119-120.
good mind (kulaśalacita), so also the gift of the Dharma is not generosity of the Dharma without a pure mind and good intention. Moreover, preaching the Dharma (dharmanirdeśa) inspired by a pure mind and a good intention praises the Three Jewels (triratna), opens the door of sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya), teaches the four noble Truths (āryasya), converts beings and introduces them to the Buddhist path (buddhadharmārga): this preaching constitutes the authentic generosity of the Dharma.

Finally, in brief (samastāh), preaching the Dharma (dharmanirdeśa) is of two types: the first, which avoids tormenting beings (sattvān anapāhaya) and is inspired by a good mind (kulaśalacita) and compassion (karunā), is the cause and condition for reaching Buddhahood; the second, which perceives (samanapāhaya) the true emptiness (śūnyatā) of dharmas, is the cause and condition of the path of nirvāṇa.

When one preaches this twofold Dharma in the midst of a great assembly (mahāparaya) with feelings of compassion (karunā), without aiming at fame (śalas), wealth (lābha) or honors (sattāra), one is practicing generosity of the Dharma of the pure Buddhist path (viśuddhabuddhārga).

[Āloka and the bhikṣu with the pleasant breath]

It is said: King A ccholo kaśa (Āloka) built eighty-four thousand Buddhist stūpas one day. Although he had not yet seen the Path, he had faith (prasāda) in the Dharma. Each day, he invited the bhikṣus to his palace and paid homage (pūjā) to them; each day he had beside him, in turn, a Dharma teacher (dhammañcārya) who preached the Dharma to him. There was a young tripiṭakadhammācariya, intelligent (medhāvī) and handsome (abhīrūṇa); when his turn came to preach the Dharma, he was seated beside the king and his mouth exhaled a thousand perfumes (gandha). Astonished, the king said to himself: This is not good. With 96 Ho to (30 and 5; 36 and 3) may transcribe an original Hatto (cf. Akamāṇa, p. 222a); but the censure addressed here to Ho to does not fit in any way the famous disciple of the Buddha Hatthaka Āḷavaka (cf. Tsai, I, p. 562-565f); it actually does apply to Udákā (cf. Mahāvastu, II, p. 200; Lalitavistara, p. 244). See references in Traité, I, p. 407, note. If Ho to (Hatthaka, should be Udaka) is used, the sins of wrong view (māyādhyakṣa) in Devadatta were numerous; [Their sins] did not constitute a gift of the pure Dharma (viśuddhadharmadāna), made with the Path (mārga) in view; they sought only honors (śalas), wealth (lābha), the signs of respect ( sakāra, arcaṇa) and homage (pūjā). Because of these bad intentions, Devadatta was reborn in the hells (niraya).

97 Note that the Mahāvastu (II, p. 200) uses a different formula: “Although Udraka Rākṣasa has taken away from Kāsaṇa and the bhikṣas the eighty-four thousand Buddhist stūpas that he would have preached the Dharma in the first place (Vinaya, I, p. 7; Mahāvastu, III, p. 322-323; Lalitavistara, p. 403), but that does not prevent him from disputing Udraka’s false pretenses in Sāmanya, IV, 83:Tom kha ponetum bhikkhave udāko Rāmaputta avadeu yevam samāne vedegusthī bhāṣati asa bhāṣā yevam samāne sabhajomiti bhāṣati. apakākitaṃ yevam gandhamālam pāyitum iti bhāṣati: “Although Udāka Rāmaputta had not attained supreme wisdom, he pretended to have attained it; although he was not a universal conqueror, he pretended to be one; although he had not uprooted the root of evil, he pretended to have uprooted it.” We may note also that the Mahāvastu, no. 3516, places Udāka Rāmaputta in the list of the Tīrikhas.

98 A sermon of Devadatta is mentioned in the Ts a han, t 99, no. 499, k. 18, p. 131; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 402-403; Candākāpura summarizes it for Sariputta in these words: Devadatta āvāso bhikkhunī evam dhammaṃ deseti: yato kha āvoc āvoc bhikkhu cetaṃ citam paricītām hoti tass'ite bhikkhaṇikātāṃ veṣyakaranāya: bhūtā jāti, varūsam bhūmacaritum, kariṇām viṁśātā niḥārāyā niḥārāyā citam: “Here is how Devadatta preaches the Dharma to the monks: When the mind of a bhikṣu, O monk, is full of understanding, he is allowed to say: Rebirth is destroyed, saintliness is fulfilled, duties are accomplished; there is no further return to this world.” We may add that the orthodoxy of this sermon is indisputable.

Udāka taught the doctrine professed by his father Rāma, a doctrine that led to the state of neither perception nor non-perception (nīvaśasamjñāna-samjñāntaṇa); but, finding it insufficient, the Buddha renounced it (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 165 sq; Dhammapaddhattha, I, p. 85; Mahāvastu, II, p. 200; Lalitavistara, p. 244).
this perfume, he will trouble my palace people." And speaking to the bhikṣu, h said: "What do you have in your mouth? Open your mouth so I can see." The bhikṣu opened his mouth and the king saw that there was nothing there. He made him rinse his mouth with water, but the perfume remained as before. The king asked: "Bhadante, have you always had this perfume?" The bhikṣu replied: "I have had it for a long time." The king asked: "Since when?" The bhikṣu answered with this stanza:

Since the time of the Buddha Kaśyapa
I have had this perfume;
It has lasted since then
And seems always to be renewed.

The king said: "Bhadante, you speak [too] briefly (samāsatah), I do not understand; explain more fully (vistarāḥ)." The bhikṣu replied: "O king, listen carefully (ekacintena) to my words. Once, at the time of the Buddha Kaśyapa, I was a bhikṣu preacher (dharmadeśaka). In the great assembly (mahāparṣad), I always had great pleasure in describing the immense qualities (apramāṇa) of the bhagavat Kaśyapa as well as the true nature (bhūtalakṣaṇa) of dharma; in innumerable sermons (dharmaparyaya) I took care to celebrate [the Buddha] and teach all beings. Since then I have always possessed the wonderful fragrance that [144b] comes from my mouth; from lifetime to lifetime, without interruption, it has been as it is today." And the bhikṣu spoke this stanza:

This fragrance surpasses and eclipses
The perfume of all the flowers of the vegetable kingdom;
It can make all hearts rejoice;
From lifetime to lifetime, it continues ceaselessly.

Then the king, with mixed shame (aspatrāpa) and joy (prīti), said to the bhikṣu: "It is wonderful (adbhuta) that the virtue of preaching (dharmadeśānuguna) can bear such great fruit!" The bhikṣu answered: "That is its flower (puṣpa) but not its fruit (phala)." The king said: "What are its fruits? Please explain to me." The bhikṣu answered: "In brief (samāsatah), its fruits are ten in number: listen well, O king." And the bhikṣu spoke these stanzas:

1) Great reknown (mahāyaśas),
2) beauty (prasāda),
3) The conquest of happiness (sukhalābha),
4) the signs of respect (sakāra),
5) A majestic light like the sun and the moon,
6) The love of all people,
7) The art of speech (pratibhāna),
8) possession of great knowledge (mahājñāna),
9) Disappearance of all the bonds (sarvabandhakṣaya),
10) Destruction of suffering (duḥkhanirodha) and acquisition of nirvāṇa:

These are the ten fruits [of preaching]."

The king asked: "Bhadante, by celebrating the qualities of the Buddha, how did you obtain the ten fruits as reward?"

Then the bhikṣu answered with these stanzas:

In celebrating the qualities of the Buddha,
I did it so that everyone heard everywhere.
As reward for this merit
I obtained great fame.

In celebrating the true qualities of the Buddha
I did it so that everyone rejoiced.
Because of this merit,
I have always, from one lifetime to the next, been handsome.

In speaking to people about sins (āpatti) and merit (puṇya),
I made them obtain the place of happiness (sukhavatī).
As a result of this merit,
I enjoy happiness and am always content.

In celebrating the power of the Buddha’s qualities,
By the breaking of the two types of bonds
I have realized Nirvāṇa.
Thus, when the rain pours down
The fire is extinguished, there is no more heat.

By lighting the lamp of preaching,
I illumined all beings.
Because of this merit,
My majestic light shines like the sun.

In celebrating the Buddha’s qualities in all ways,
I satisfied all beings.
As a result of this merit,
I am always loved by people.

In celebrating the Buddha’s qualities with skillful speech
I have set neither bounds nor limits.
As a result of this merit,
My eloquence (pratibhāna) is inexhaustible.

In celebrating the wondrous attributes of the Buddha
I commit no errors.
As a result of this merit,
[I have acquired] great purity of knowledge.

[144c] In celebrating the Buddha’s qualities
I have decreased people’s afflictions (kleśa).
As a result of this merit,
My bonds are broken and my stains destroyed.

By the breaking of the two types of bonds
I have realized Nirvāṇa.
Thus, when the rain pours down
The fire is extinguished, there is no more heat.

He spoke again to the king: “If there is something you have not understood, this is the time to overcome the army of your doubts (sānchiyusena) with the arrows of knowledge (piṇḍaśiṣṭa).”

The king said to the Dharma master: “I have understood well; I have no more doubt. The Bhadanta is a virtuous man, skilled in celebrating the Buddha.”

Preaching the Dharma by means of all kinds of Nīdnas of this kind is to save people and this is what is called generosity of the Dharma.

Question. – Which is more important, material generosity (āmiṣadāna) or generosity of the Dharma (dhammadāna)?

Answer. – As the Buddha has said: “Of the two generositys, generosity of the Dharma is more important.”

Why?

1) The fruit of retribution (phalavipāka) of material generosity occurs in the desire realm (kāmadhātu), whereas the fruit of retribution of generosity of the Dharma is in the threefold world (traśīdhātu) or above the threefold world.\[102\]

2) Moreover, words (voc) that are pure (viśuddha) reach the central point of the reasoning (sukti) and the mind (citta) attains it also. This is why they surpass the threefold world.

3) Moreover, material generosity is limited (apramāṇa); material generosity is exhausted, whereas generosity of the Dharma is inexhaustible: it is like a fire (agni) fed by kindling (indhana), the light of which is always increasing.

4) Moreover, the retribution (vipāka) of material generosity involves mediocre purity (viśuddhi) and many stains (maśa), whereas the retribution of generosity of the Dharma has few stains and great purity.

5) Moreover, carrying great gifts requires (apokekṣate) a great show of power, whereas the gift of the Dharma depends on nothing other than realization.

6) Moreover, material generosity can bring about the increase (vṛddhi) [only] of the four great elements (caturmahābhūta) and material organs (indriya), whereas generosity of the Dharma leads to the perfection

\[102\] Compare Bodh. Bhūmi, p. 133: āmiṣabhavādānāṃ suprabhādantaṃ ihasakham, dhammadānāṃ puñāḥ suprabhādantaṃ anumattakham.

(paripūri) of the pure organs (anāsravendriya), the powers (bala) and the Path of enlightenment (bodhimārga).

7) Moreover, whether there is a Buddha [here below] or not, material generosity always exists in the world; on the other hand, generosity of the Dharma can be practiced only if there is a Buddha in the world. This is how we know that generosity of the Dharma is very rare. Why is it rare? Even the pratyekabuddhas [do not practice it], because they cannot preach the Dharma. They [are limited] to practicing mendicancy (piṇḍapāta) correctly and to converting beings by flying (pasunā) or by transforming themselves (parināma).101

8) Moreover, material gifts can be derived from generosity of the Dharma, and one can equal the śrīvakas, pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas and even the Buddhas.

9) Finally, generosity of the Dharma can analyze (vibhaj-) all dharmas: impure (ādṛṣṭava) and pure (ādṛṣṭava) dharmas, material (ādhvādharmas) and immaterial (ādravyadharmas) dharmas, conditioned (samskṛta) and unconditioned (asamskṛta) dharmas, good (kṣa-la), bad (akṣa-la) and indeterminate (avyākta) dharmas, permanent (aitya) and impermanent (aniyata) dharmas, existent (asat) and non-existent (asat) dharmas. The true nature (bhūtakalaksana) of all dharmas is pure (viśuddha), indestructible (abheda) and unchangeable (avyaya). The brief explanation (samkeṣa) of all these dharmas makes up the eighty-four thousand expressions (vyākaraṇa). All these dharmas are analyzed (vibhāsā) and cognized (vijñāta) thanks to the generosity of the Dharma; this is why generosity of the Dharma is the higher gift.

These two generosities, [material and Dharma], together form “Generosity”. When one practices this twofold generosity while wishing to become Buddha, one is able to lead people to the state of Buddha and, all the [kā., 12, p. 145a] more so, to other states.

Question. – Four kinds of abandonings (tyāga) constitute generosity, namely: abandoning material goods (ābhaññatī), the gift of the Dharma (dharmatī), the gift of safety (abhayaatī) and abandonment of the affections (kleśatī). Why mention only the [last] two tyāgas here?

Answer. – Because the gift of safety (abhayaatī) is not distinct from the virtue of morality (śīla), we do not speak of it here. On the other hand, as [we will deal later with the virtue] of wisdom (prajñā), we do not speak of the abandonments of the passions (kleśatī) here. If we were not going to deal with the six virtues (pārami), it would be necessary to mention these four abandonments together.

II. VIRTUE OF GENEROSITY

Question. – What is meant by Dānāpārami (Virtue of generosity)?

101 For the etymology of the word pārami, see Koša, IV, p. 231; Madh. avatāra, p. 30 (tr. Lav., Muséon, 1907, p. 277); Samudhindimoksa, IX, §13; Śīléśvarakāśā, ed. Lévi, XVI, 15, 16; Sañc. sañc., p. 186; Abhidharmamasuccāavyākhyātā, T 1606, k. 11, p. 748a; Siddhi, p. 628.

102 The story of the downfall of Śāriputra, who abandoned the Greater Vehicle to return to the Lesser Vehicle, is repeated in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 14, p. 69b.

103 On the sixteen kalpas of Śāriputra’s career, cf. P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 71, p. 366c; k. 101, p. 525b.

104 For this expression, see above, Traité, I, p. 212-215F.

5. Finally, there are two types of gifts: the gift of Māra and the gift of Buddha. Māra’s gift is accompanied by fetters (sanyojana), theft (harana), sadness (daurmanasa), confusion (upādya) and fear (bhīma); it is called “this shore”. Buddha’s gift is pure generosity (viśuddhadāna), free of fetters and objects of fear, leading to Buddhahood; it is called “the other shore” and it constitutes the Paramīthă.

[Āśīvīposamasūtra] 189 -

189 The Āśīvīposamasūtra is taken from the Sanskritta, IV, p. 172-174 (tr. Woodward, Kindred Sayings, IV, p. 107-110). It also occurs in the Sanskritta and the Chinese Ekkottar: Tsara a han, T 99, n0. 1172, k. 43, p. 313b-315a; Tsing yi a han, T 125, k. 23, p. 696c-670. These two versions correspond in essence to the Pāli text.

The Pāli Samyutta and the Tseng yi a han place the Āśīvīposamasūtra in Śrīvatsta, in the Jatavani in the Anāthapindadārāma, while the Tsara a han places it at Kaudāmbī in the Ghosālīrama.

The Chinese versions have some details lacking in the Pāli text but which appear in the Mppi. The Tsara a han and the Tseng yi a han note that the four venomous snakes are in a trunk (kṣu) or a chest (kaula), symbolizing the human body, the receptacle of the four great elements. Moreover, the Tseng yi a han, like the Mppi, has a king ordering the hero of the story to feed and bathe the snakes at a certain time.

In the Pāli Samyutta and the two Chinese versions, the hero, in his flight, successively meets five deadly enemies (pañcaudadhakacaccādhā), a sixth individual the burglar assassin (chattha antaracaravadhā), an empty village (saṭṭha gāmā), robber pillagers of villages (cūḷa gāmāvā ṭakā), a vast expanse of water (mahā udākanava). In the Mppi, the adventures are slightly different: the hero successively meets five hired assassins sent by the king to catch him, a false friend, a empty village, a good counsellor, a great river.

Moreover, the interpretation of the parable varies from one source to the other: the Pāli Samyutta and the two Chinese versions see in the vast expanse of water an allegory symbolizing the four streams of desire (kāma), existence (bhava), wrong view (adhisthāna) and ignorance (avijñā), whereas the Mppi sees, in the great river, a figure indicating thirst (tīrṇa).

These significant differences show that the Mppi instead of being directly inspired by the canonical texts of the Pāli Samyutta, the Tsara a han or the Tseng yi a han, has borrowed its parable from other sources. In fact, the Āśīvīposamasūtra, as told here by the Mppi, is taken almost textually from a chapter of the Mahāpurūṣavīmasūtra (T 374, k. 23, p. 499a-b; T 375, k. 21, p. 742c-743a), of which here is the translation:

A king filled a trunk with four venomous (āśīva) snakes and commanded a man to feed them, put them to sleep and wake them, rub their bodies. He ordered: “If anybody injures one of these snakes, I will take steps to have him put to death and his body exposed in a public place.” Then on hearing the royal decree, the man became frightened, abandoned the trunk and fled. At once the king ordered five candallas to draw their swords and pursue him. Looking back, our man saw them and fled more quickly. Then the five men, resorting to a trick, hid their swords which they were carrying and sent after him an individual who, pretending to be his friend, said to him: “You can turn back.” But our man did not believe them and took refuge in a village (gāmā) where he tried to hide. Coming into the village he furiously inspected all the houses, but saw no one; he took some containers (dhālana) but they were empty, without contents. Seeing nobody and not finding any provisions, he sat down on the ground. In the sky he heard a voice that said: “Hey, man! This village is empty and without inhabitants, but tonight six great thieves (udānās) will come; If you ever encounter them, your life will not be spared. How then will you escape them?”

Then our man, his fear increasing, took flight. On his road he found a river with choppy water, but he had no boat [to cross it]; feverishly, he gathered all kinds of material and built a boat (kaula). He thought: “If I stay here, I will be the victim of the four poisonous snakes, the five candallas, the false friend and the six great thieves; if I cross the river and my boat does not hold, I will fall in the water and drown. I prefer to fall in the water and die rather than be the victim of the snakes and the robbers.” At once, he pushed his straw raft into the water, seated himself on it and paddling with his hands and feet, he reached the other shore [where he found] peace (keṣaṇa) and safety; his mind (citta) was calm and his fears disappeared.

The Mahāpurūṣavīmasūtra follows this apologue with a long interpretation that can be summarized as follows: the body is like the trunk; earth, water, fire and wind the four venomous snakes; the five candallas; the false friend, nīrghatā; the empty village, the city (ādhānākāśyatan); the river, the klesa; the raft, viṃukti, jīvāna-dārāma, the sixty-seven bodhpākkhādharmanas; the other shore, nītāsādānīvāna.

The Āśīvīposamasūtra seems to have been particularly well-known in north-west India, a region with which the Mppi shows much acquaintance. According to the Suanaputta-liṅghikā, I, p. 66, the Chan ken liu p'i p'o ch'u, T 1462, k. 2, p. 685c; and the Mahāvamsa, XII, v. 26, the štavira Madhyāntika (there Mañjñatika) preached it to the nāga king Avavalla and the people of Kasiṭṭha-Gandhāra; eighty-four thousand listeners were converted to Buddhism and a hundred thousand received ordination.

It should be noted, however, that this preaching of the Āśīvīposamasūtra is not mentioned in the Sarvāstivādin texts dealing with the conversion of Kasiṃt by Madhyāntika: Ken pen chou... tsa che, T 1451, k. 49, p. 410a-411b (tr. Prazulski, Le Nord-Ouest de l’Inde, JA, 1914, p. 533-537); A yu wang tcishou, T 2042, k. 4, p. 116b (tr. Prazulski, Aṣoka, p. 340-342); A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 7, p. 156a-b.

The Āśīvīposamasūtra should not be confused with the Āśīvīvasāna of the Āśīvīposamasūtra, II, p. 110-111) tr. Woodward, Gradual Sayings, II, p. 115-116 another important slītra, which has no parallel in the Chinese Tripiṭaka, but which is often cited in the Pāli sources; cf. Puggalapaññatti, p. 48, Suttaniputta, comm., p. 458.

Finally, we note that the four great elements entering into the bodily composition are often compared to poisonous snakes; cf. Traiśikī, I, p. 8; Sūtra-liṅghikā, tr. Huber, p. 153, 387; Vimalakīrtiśāstra-sūtra, T 475, k. 1, p. 539b28. Gold particularly deadly, recalls the same comparison. Sūtra-liṅghikā, tr. Huber, p. 171.

The Mahāpurūṣavīmasūtra, containing the Āśīvīposamasūtra, shows traits in common with the parable of “the man in the well”, which has four snakes (i.e., the four elements) threatening to bite a man clinging to a root on the edge of a well; cf. Cramaṇas, Contiś, II, p. 83-84, III, p. 257; IV, p. 158, 235-238; J. Ph. Vogel, The Man in the Well, RAA, XI, 1937, p. 109-115.
river; on the other shore of the river (pāra), there was a foreign land, a very happy country (sukhāvatī), peaceful, pure and free of torment. Immediately, our man gathered materials and ropes and built himself a raft. Using his hands and feet, he paddled across the river and reached the other shore, Sukhāvatī, free of torment. The king is king Māra; the chest is the human body; the four poisonous snakes are the four great elements (catumahābhūtā); the five soldiers with drawn swords are the five aggregates (pālaviskandha); the individual with fine words but bad intentions is attachment (sāngā); the empty village is the six attractions (ruci); the thieves are the six sense objects (saḍbhāvyātana); the honest man who addresses him with compassion is the good teacher; the great river is thirst (ṭṛṇāḥ); the raft is the Noble eightfold Path (lāṃgūṭikāryamārga); paddling with hands and feet is exertion (vṛṣya); this shore is the world (loka); the other shore is nirvāṇa; the man who crosses over is the arhat who has destroyed the defilements (kāśādūraya).

It is the same for the bodhisattva. If his generosity comes up against three obstacles (āvarāṇa) [which consist of saying]: “It is I who am giving such and such a thing to this recipient”, he falls under Māra’s power and he does not escape from difficulties. But if the bodhisattva’s gift is triply pure (trimandala pariśuddha) and free of these three obstacles (āvarāṇa),110 he reaches the other shore and is praised [145c] by the Buddha: this is called Dānapāramitā; this is arriving at the other shore [of generosity]. The six Pāramitās allow people to cross the great ocean of the afflictions (kleśa) – greed (mātsurya), etc. – and attachment (saṅgū) and lead them to the other shore.

*** *** ***

Question. – But arhats and pratyekabuddhas also reach the other shore. Why do we not speak of the Pāramitās [in their regard]?

Answer. – The arhats and pratyekabuddhas reach the other shore just like the Buddha reached the other shore; but, although the words are the same, the reality is different. The shore [that they leave] is saṃsāra; the shore [that they reach] is nirvāṇa; however, they do not reach the other shore of generosity [like the Buddha and the bodhisattvas]. Why? Because they are not able to give everything (sarva) at all times (sarvatra) in every way (svarupa). Even supposing they do give, they are not motivated by the great mind [of Bodhi]. Practicing generosity, sometimes with a neutral mind (avyākta-citta), sometimes with a good but impure mind (sāvrakāśālaya citta), sometimes with a pure mind that lacks compassion (andraśva-citta mahākārana-rūpiti), they are unable to “give for all beings”. But when the bodhisattvas give, they know that the gift has no birth (anapannā), does not perish (aniruddha), is free of stains (anāvata), is unconditioned (asamsrta) and like nirvāṇa (nirvānasam), and they know they are giving for all beings. This is what is called dānapāramitā.

Others call dānapāramitā the fact of dedicating all wealth, all inner and outer goods to generosity, without seeking for reward (phalavipāka).

Finally, the fact of being inexhaustible (aksayatva) constitutes dānapāramitā. Why? When one knows that the thing given (deṣayāvara) is absolutely empty (ajñatātya), like nirvāṇa (nirvānasam), and in this spirit, one gives alms to beings, the reward of generosity (dānapāramitā) is called dānapāramitā. Just as a sage (yuṣṭi) having the five supernatural powers (abhiṣākā) hides a precious object in the rock and, to preserve it, he crushes diamonds and coats it so as to make it indestructible, so the bodhisattva coats his generosity with the wisdom of the true nature of nirvāṇa so as to make it inexhaustible. Moreover, the bodhisattva gives for all beings and as the number of beings is inexhaustible, his gift also is inexhaustible. Finally, the bodhisattva gives in order to acquire the attributes of Buddha and, as these attributes are immense (apramāṇa) and infinite (ananta), his gift too is immense and infinite. This is why, although the arhats and pratyekabuddhas reach the other shore [of nirvāṇa], it cannot be said that they have reached the other shore [of generosity].

III. PERFECTION OF GENEROSITY

Question. – What is meant by perfection of generosity (dānaparipūrāṇa)?

Answer. – As we have said above, the bodhisattva practices all the generosity. Whether it is a matter of inner (bhūyāmāna) goods or outer (bhūya) goods, great (mahā) or small (purīta), numerous (sambhulita) or few (alaśa), coarse (sūkhā) or subtle (sūkṣma), valued (adhyavastita) or scorned (anadhyavastita), useful (artha) or useless (apardhita), the bodhisattva abandons all of these. His mind is without regret (vipratāsa) and even (sama) towards all beings. He does not make considerations such as the following: “It is necessary to make large gifts, not small gifts; one should give to monastics (pravrajya) and not to lay people; one should give to humans (manussya) and not to animals (tīrāgona).” He gives to all beings with [146a] perfect equanimity (samacittādhismita); he gives without seeking any reward (vipāka) and realizes the true nature (bhūtādhismita) of generosity. This is what is understood by perfection of generosity.

Furthermore, he keeps no count of time (kāla), day (ahut) or night (nirat), winter (hemanta) or summer (grīma), favorable or unfavorable moment; he gives equally at all time, and his heart feels no regret. He even goes so far as to giving up his head (śiras, his eyes (nayana), his marrow (majjā) and his skull (cf. Traité, I, p. 143F). This is the perfection of generosity.

Furthermore, some say: During the interval of time between the first production of the mind of Bodhi (pratikramanottapa) up to the thirty-four minds under the Bodhi tree,111 the generosity practiced by the bodhisattva is perfect generosity.

110 See above, p. 676F, n. 2.

111 For these thirty-four minds, of which sixteen are darśanamārga and eighteen are bhūvanāmārga, see above, Traité, I, p. 434, n. 2.
Furthermore, in the seventh bhūmi (saptamabhūmi), the bodhisattva obtains the knowledge of the true nature (satyalakṣaṇa) of dharmas. From then on, he adorns (āsanakaroti) the buddhafields (buddhaksetra) converts (vinayatī) beings, worships (pījāyati) the Buddhas and acquires great miraculous powers (mahābhūjātī); he divides his own body into innumerable bodies and rains down the seven jewels (saptatani), flowers (gaṇapīṭha), perfumes (gaṇandha), banners (patakā) and garlands (nicāyā) from each of these bodies; he transforms himself into a great lamp (sīka), like Mount Sumeru and pays homage to the Buddhas and assemblies of bodhisattvas of the ten directions. Then in marvelous accents, he celebrates the qualities of the Buddhas in verse; he pays homage (vandana) to them, worships (pīja), respects (sukārī) and welcomes them (pratyasūtgamana).

He causes a rain of all kinds of food (āhāra) and clothing (vastra) to fall on innumerable lands of the hungry ghosts (pretaśāya) of the ten directions, enough to fill them fully. Having been filled to satisfaction (ārṇita), all the pretas produce the mind of supreme and perfect enlightenment (anuttarāsamyaksambodhi).

Then he goes to the animal realm (āṁtyagonyon); he commands the animals to improve themselves and to cast aside all feelings of mutual hostility; they chase away their fears (āṁtyagonyaṇa); all the animals produce the mind of anuttarasamyaksa (anuttarāsamyaksa).

To the poor people (daśaśāya) of the ten directions, the bodhisattva gives good fortune; as for the rich (āhāra), he rejoices them by satisfying them with various flavors (rātu) and colors (rūpā); this is why they all produce the mind of anuttarāsamyaksambodhi.

The bodhisattva goes to the gods of the desire realm (kāmāvāstha) and makes them renounce their heavenly sense pleasures (kāmaśūkha); he rejoices them by giving them this wondrous jewel that is the bliss of the Dharma (dharmaśūkha); this is why they all produce the mind of anuttarāsamyaksambodhi.

Finally, he goes to the gods of the form realm (rūpaśāya) and destroys their attachment to pleasure of meditative concentration (samādhiśīkhaśuddhavāda); he rejoices them by means of the abhyāsa appropriate to bodhisattvas. This is why these gods produce the mind of anuttarāsamyaksambodhi.

This [activity] which is continued until the tenth bhūmi (dāśamabhūmi) is called the perfection of the virtue of generosity (dānapramidhipāti).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva has two kinds of bodies (kāya): 1) a body born from bonds and actions (bandhanakarmajākāya) and 2) a body of the Dharma (dharmaśāya). The perfection of the virtue of generosity that he practices in these [146b] two bodies is called parīrṣaṇadānapramidhipāti.

Question. – What is meant by virtue of generosity belonging to the body born of bonds and actions?

Answer. – Without having attained the Dharmaśāya and without having broken his fetters (kālaṇasamyojana), the bodhisattva is able to give all his precious goods (ratnaśāya) unreservedly, his head (utara), his eyes (naṇa), his marrow (mahaja), his skull (masta), his kingdom (rāja), his wealth (dhanā), his wife (dāra), his children (putra), his internal (ābhyāsa) or external (bhāya) possessions, without his mind feeling emotions.

[Vivantarájñākāla114] – Thus the prince (kumāra) Siu t’î na (Sudhinna[1]), in the language of Ts’in “Excellent Generosity”, gave his two children (putra) to a brahmin, and then he gave his wife, in the language without his heart being upset by emotion.

112 For the conduct of the bodhisattva in the seventh bhūmi, called “Far-Gone” (āṅguramāṇi bhūmi), see Dukkhumikasūtra, p. 55-63 and Introduction by J. Rahder. Other references in Saṃgraha, p. 38-39.
Thus, king Sa p'o ta (Sarvada), “Universal Generosity” in the language of Ts’in, having been conquered by an enemy kingdom, hid in a forest. A Brahmin of a distant region arrived and gave back to him the hero his family and his goods.” (R. Grousset).

Here is a summary of the main sources:

Chinese sources: Lieou tou ti king, T 152, no. 14, k. 2, p. 7c-11a; T’ai tsui siu na king, T 171, p. 418c-420b; Song Yun, L o yang k’ie lan ki, (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 416-421), Tsa p’i yu king, T 207, no. 34, p. 530a-c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 59-61). In these two collections, the story has a favorable ending: the usurper king re-establishes Sarvada on the throne and goes home. On the other hand, in the Lieou tou ni king, T 102, no. 10, k. 1, p. 8a6 (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 8-45), the good king is put to death by the usurper. In the same collection, T 153, no. 11, k. 2, p. 6lc (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 46-49), the good king, called Po, at this time, does not wait to be handed over to the brahmin, but gives him his head on which a reward had been set: the conqueror, touched by such virtue, replaced the head of the former king back on his body, covered his entire body with gold leaf and seated him in the place of honor. See also Po ou sa pen yuan king, T 153, k. 1, p. 55aq; King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 26, p. 141b-142b; Huan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 3, p. 883a (tr. Beal, l. 124; Watters, I, p. 232-235), locates the feat of Sarvada at the Mahāvamsa monastery on the side of a mountain two hundred li south of Mahāgāra; archaeologists place Mahāvamsa at Sonishigrām.

Here the Mppās seem to have grouped into a single story two jātakas from the Ramākīta (cf. Ta pao tai king, T 310, k. 111, p. 66a,9-63la22; Maitreyapariprjñā, T 349, p. 188b21-188b8; see also King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 10, p. 59b17-55c21): the first jātaka tells how the prince Kien yi a ye yi (Sarvadārthacariya) took his own blood to give a sick man a drink; the second, how prince Mao houa ou Lien houa (Upatī) broke one of his bones and took the marrow to smear over a sick man. The Mppās attributes both of the exploits to prince Candraprabha, also mentioned in the Ramākīta (T 310, k. 111, p. 66a125-63l12; T 349, p. 188c9-188c18) as having given his eyes to a blind man. However, Upatī seems to have the monopoly of “the gift of the marrow,” for it is he again who writes a text of the holy Dharma with one of his broken bones as pen, his marrow as ink and his skin as parchment (see traité, l. p. 144-145, as note: The gift of the marrow).
By giving his life, his wife and his children in this way, the bodhisattva spares them no less than he would pieces of rubbish. Considering the things that he gives, he knows that they exist due to conditions (pratītya) and that, if one looked for a reality in them, one would find nothing: [indeed] everything is pure (vīśuddha) and like nirvāṇa. Until he attains the acquisience of the non-production of things (anupattikadharmakāranti), this is how his body born of bonds and actions (bandhanakarmaṇa) practices the perfection of generosity (dānapramitāparipūrṇa).

Question. - How does the Dharmakāya bodhisattva practice the perfection of generosity?

Answer. - Having reached the end of the fleshy body (mānasakūya), the bodhisattva attains the acquisience of the teaching of the non-production of things (anupattikadharmakāranti); he abandons his fleshy body and acquires the body of the Dharma (dharmakāya). In the six realms (saddhāna) of the ten directions, he converts beings by means of emanated bodies (nirmāṇakūya) and avatars (avatāra); he gives all kinds of pearls and jewels (maniratna), clothing (vastra) and food to all; he gives his head (lītra), his eyes (nayana), his bow (mahijā), his skull (mañstaka), his kingdom (rājya), his wealth (dhanā), his wife (ādīra), his children (pūtra), his inner (ādhyātyāma) and outer (ādhyāta) possessions unreservedly.

117 For this well-known jātaka, see the following sources: Pāli sources: Jātaka, no. 514, vol. V, p. 36-37.

Sanskrit sources: Kalpadrumavadānamāla, no. 22 (cf. Mitra, Nep. Buddh. Lit., p. 301-302); Avadāna-śāstra, no. 49, but this avadāna is absent from the Paris MS (J. Filliozat, Catalogue du Fonds Sanskrit, p. 4, no. 8) and in the edition of the Avadānākālapālī in the Bibliothèque Indica by S. C. Das and H. M. Vidyabhusana, 1888 and 1918; it may be found in the Cambridge MS, Add. 1306 and 913 (cf. Foucher, Beginnings of B. Art, p. 204, n. 1).

Chinese sources: Liou tou tsı king, T 152, no. 28, k. 4, p. 17a-ε (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 101-104); Tu tchouang yin lon king, T 201, no. 10, k. 2, p. 336a-338a (tr. Huber, Siitrālānkāra, p. 403-411); tua pao tsung king, T 203, no. 10, k. 2, p. 453c-454b (tr. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 100-102); Mo ho song k'i liu, T 1425, k. 2, p. 240b-241a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 289-293); Ken pen chou... yao che, T 1448, k. 15, p. 71a-72a; Hiuan tsang, Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 7, p. 906a (tr. Beal, II, p. 49; Watters, II, p. 53).

Iconography: Cunningham, Barhut, pl. 26 (6); cf. also Lüders, Bharhut und die buddh. Literature, p. 155-159; Marshall-Foucher, Mon. of Sanchi, I, pl. 224; II, pl. 15, 29, 55: Coomaraswamy, Bodhisāṃ. p. 27-28, pl. 48 (1); Sivaramamurti, Amarāvīti, pl. 26 (2), but see note p. 218; Ramadhandram, Sculptures from Golīkī, pl. 1 (c, d); Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, p. 272, fig. 138; Griffiths, Ajantā, cave X, col. I, pl. 41 and fig. 21; cave XVII, vol. I, pl. 63 and p. 37, fig. 73.

Works: L. Feist, Le Chaddanta jātaka, JA, 1895, p. 31-85; 1895, p. 189-223; J. Speer, Über den Bodhisattva als Elefant mit sechs Hauzähnen, ZDMG, LVII, p. 305-316; A. Foucher, Mélanges S. Lévi, 1911, p. 231, or The Six-Tusked Elephant, in Beginnings of Buddhist Art, 1917, p. 185-204. In this work, Foucher shows how this jātaka has evolved in a parallel way in the literary texts and the archeological documents.

1) The hunter cuts the elephant’s tusks with a knife: Suanzas from the Pāli jātaka.

2) The hunter cuts the elephant’s tusks with a saw: Bharhut medallion (2nd century B.C.), Amarāvīti medallion, fresco from groto X at Ajantā and Gandhāran bas-relief (2nd century A.D.), Golf frieze (3rd century A.D.). Liou tou tsı king (translated into Chinese in 280).

3) The elephant himself saws off his tusks: Pāli prose commentary 5th century.

4) The elephant himself breaks his tusks against a rock (Kalpadrumasūtra, Mahāprajāpāramitāsūtra (translated into Chinese between 402 and 405).

5) The elephant himself breaks his tusks against a tree: Tsā pao tsung king (translated into Chinese in 472).

6) The elephant himself tears out his tusks with his trunk: Śūlālānkāra (translated into Chinese about 410), fresco in cave XVII at Ajantā (6th century). For the Bharhut medallion, see also Lüders, Bharhut und buddh. Lit., p. 155-159.
There was a time when the men of Jambudvīpa were unaware of the respective ages, these three animals went to a large tree, either a anyagrodha (Ficus religiosa) or a pippala (Ficus religiosa) which some sources locate on the side of the Himalayas, others on the shore of the sea.

A comparative study of the various sources allows us to classify them as follows:

1st Three Vinayas, the Pāli Vin. (II, p. 161-162), the Mahākāśaka Vin. (T 1421, k. 17, p. 121a), the Dharmapṛthivī Vin. (T 1421, k. 17, p. 121a) as well as the Tél’én yao king (T 212, k. 14, p. 686a) present the apocryphal in the form of a simple fable.

2nd The Mahākāśaka Vin. (T 1425, k. 27, p. 446a-b) presents the exploits of the psoas and his friends in the form of a jātaka, in the sense that the parts played by the heroes of the fable are proposed as having been lived by the Buddha and his contemporaries in the course of a previous life. According to this Vinaya, the elephant was not other than the Buddha.

3rd The Sarvāṅga Vin. (T 1435, k. 34, p. 242c-b) and the MPS (T 1509, k. 12, p. 146c) both show the story in the form of a jātaka, but identify the psoas as the Buddha this time. Moreover, they develop the apocryphal considerably, the three animals, preched on on top of the other, go to preach to the other animals and to people.

4th The Tittirījātaka of the Pāli Vin. I, p. 218-219) reproduces, almost word for word the text of the Pāli Vin., but adopts the samadāna of the Sarvāṅga Vin. in identifying the elephant as Maudgalyāyana, the monkey as Śāriputra and the psoas as the Buddha.

5th The Mūlasarvāṅga Vin. (original version in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, part 3, p. 125-131); Tibetan version in Scheiefer-Rahlston, Tibetan Tales, p. 302-307) has four animals: a francolin (kapila), a bird (cīra), a monkey (marukū) and an elephant (gaja), which it identifies (p. 131) with the Buddha, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana and Ānanda, respectively. This Vin. brings a new detail: it is the king and the people of Benares who are converted by the example of the four animals.

6th The oral traditions collected by Hsuan t’ung also relate this jātaka with Benares. According to the Li ʻp (T 2053, k. 3, p. 235c) and the Memoirs (T 2087, k. 7, p. 906a) of this pillar, there was a stūpa built to commemorate the virtuous psoas in the neighborhood of Benares.

Most of the Vinayas add that the elephant places the monkey on his head and the monkey places the psoas on his shoulder; they walked together from village to village preaching the Dharma. The Sarvāṅga Vin. continues: Earlier, these three animals enjoyed killing living beings (prāṇaśāraṇa), stealing (adattālāma), engaging in sex (kamāniśyādaśe) and lying (mudāśaśa). They had this thought: “Why do we not renounce our bad actions?”

Thinking thus, they renounced killing, stealing, sex and falsehood; among the animals they were unequalled in observing the four precepts. After their death, they were reborn in the heavens. At that time, the code of the psoas was propagated and spread, it was manifested among gods and men People thought: “Why do the animals do good deeds and not pilfer our crops to feed themselves?” And they also thought: “If the animals show so much respect, all the more reason we should show mutual respect.” From then on, people showed respect to one another, practiced due to the venerable aged ones (vyākhyaśuddana); it was impossible to convert them by words. Then the Bodhisattva changed himself into a kīva pîn chô lo bird (kapilājala or francolin). This bird had two friends (mitra), a great elephant (mahākāsa) and a monkey (markata); they lived together under a pi po la tree (pippala or Ficus religiosa). One day they wondered: “We do not know who is the oldest of us.” The elephant said: “Earlier, when I saw this tree, it came to under my belly (udaśa) and today it is the size that you see. From that I conclude that I am the oldest.” The monkey said: “Once, when I was kneeling on the ground, my hand reached the top of this tree; from that I deduce that I am the oldest.” The bird said: “In a gig-tree forest, one day I was eating a pippala fruit; a seed sprouted from my droppings (varcas) and that produced the tree that you see; from that I deduce that I am by far the oldest.” The bird also said: “The antiquity of my previous births (sīravajjananayaśatra) gives me the right of respect (pījā).” At once the great elephant put the monkey on his back, the bird perched on the monkey and they went to walk about. All the birds and animals, seeing them, asked: “Why are you doing this?” They answered: “This is how we pay respect (sakāra) and homage (pījā) to the elders.” The birds and animals accepted the lesson and began to respect [their elders]; they stopped invading the fields of people and destroying the lives of animals. People found it strange that all the birds and animals had stopped doing harm. Having entered the forest, a hunter (hahākaka) saw the elephant carrying the monkey who was carrying the bird; he told the country people that the practice of [mutual] respect had transformed beings and that all of them were busy doing good. The people rejoiced saying: “Today the great peace begins; the birds and animals are becoming civilized.” In turn, the people imitated the animals and all practiced respect [toward their elders]. From that ancient event until today, the thousand lifetimes have elapsed; we should know that this [francolin] was the Dhammakāya Bodhisattva.

Finally, in the space of a moment, the Dhammakāya Bodhisattva transformed himself (parinayama) into innumerable bodies (asamkhyeyakaśyā) and pays homage (pījaya) to the Buddhas of the ten directions (daśadhūgīvaddha); in one moment, he can create immense riches (apramadāna) and give them to beings; in the space of one moment, he can preach the Dharma to all in harmony with high, medium or low tones (aśramaśāvāvālaḥ) and the Bodhisattva follows these practices until he sits under the Bodhi tree (bodhiśyrṣya). It is by means of these kinds of practices that the Dhammakāya Bodhisattva practices the perfection of the virtue of generosity (dānāpāramīśāpāramī).

Furthermore, there are three kinds of generosity: 1) material generosity (dārayuddha), 2) the generosity of homage and respect (pījātipattadāna), 3) the generosity of the Dharma (dharmaśudda). What is material generosity? Material [147a] generosity consists of giving unreservedly all the inner (śāhāyānaka) and outer (bībhyā) goods that one possesses, such as precious stones and jewels (maṇīcatu), clothing (vasuṭa), food (āṭakha), head (īrajas), eyes (nayana), marrow (maṇja) and skull (mastaṇa). – The generosity of respect consists of shows of respect (sakāra) and veneration (vandana) inspired by pure faith (prāśadakāśavaddha); to accompany (parivāra) someone, to go to meet them (pruryadgamanu), to load them with praise (varamu), to pay homage to them (pījaya) and other things the code of the psoas widely and carefully observed the five precepts (pucchalī). After their death, they were reborn in the heavens.

571
of this type. – The generosity of the Dharma, having as object the beauty of the Path (mārga), consists of instructing (upadeśa), teaching (upadāna), explaining (bhāṣya), discoursing (lapana), removing hesitations (vicikṣitānubhūta), replying to questions (pratipakṣakarana) and telling people about the five precepts (pañcaśīla): all these instructions given with the view of Buddhahood are called generosity of the Dharma. The perfection of these three kinds of generosity is called the perfection of the virtue of generosity.

Furthermore, three causes and conditions give rise to generosity: 1) the purity of the mind of faith (prāvadacatuvāśīvuddhi); 2) the material object (āmiśadravya); 3) the field of merit (punyakṣetra).\(^{119}\)

a. There are three kinds of minds: compassion (karuṇā), respect (sattāra), and respect joined with compassion. Giving to the poor (daridra), to the humble (bhūta) and to animals (śṛṇyagonya) is a generosity inspired by compassion (karuṇādāna); to give to the Buddha and bodhisattvas is a generosity inspired by respect (sattāradāna); to give to the arhats and pratyekabuddhas, to the elderly (ṛṣiddha), the sick (gītāna), the poor (daridra) and the exhausted (ārā) is a generosity inspired by both respect and compassion.

b. The object given (āmiśadravya) is pure (vīśuddha) when it is neither stolen, nor pilfered but given at the proper time (kāle), without seeking for renown (yasyā) or gain (labha).

c. The greatness of the merit (punya) obtained comes either from the mind (citta), or from the field of merit (punyakṣetra) or from the value of the gift given:

It comes first from the mind when, for example, [the latter has] the fourfold evenness of mind (saṃtañācitta) or the meditative stabilization of the recollection of the Buddha (buddhāṃvetāṃsaṃādāna).\(^{120}\) Thus, when the [Bodhisattva] gives his body to the tigress (vīḍghri),\(^{121}\) it is the mind that provides the greatness of his merit.

There are two kinds of fields of merit (punyakṣetra): 1) the pitiful field of merit (karuṇāpunyakṣetra), 2) the venerable field of merit (sattāradunyakṣetra). The pitiful field of merit provokes minds of compassion, whereas the venerable field of merit provokes minds of respect: this was the case for the king A chou k'ie (Āśoka), “[Without Care” in the language of T's'in], when he gave to the Buddha the gift of earth (pāṇāśīprādāna).\(^{122}\)

Finally, [the greatness of the merit] is derived from the object given. Thus the woman whose wine (madaya) had disturbed her mind and who heedlessly gave her necklace made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamala) to the stūpa of the buddha Kāśyapa, was reborn among the Trayāstrimśa gods by virtue of this merit. Gifts of this kind are called material gifts (dṛṇyadāna).

IV. NON-EXISTENCE OF THE THING GIVEN

Question. – Generosity is the renunciation of wealth (dhanapaśīya); why then do you say that the perfect gift (paripāra) involves a thing to be abandoned (pariyuktadhāra)?

Answer. – 1. There are two kinds of generosity, supramundane (lokottara) and which is not supramundane.\(^{123}\) Here we are talking about supramundane generosity, which is without marks (animitta); being without marks, it does not involve anything abandoned. This is why we say that perfect generosity does not involve renunciation.

2. Moreover, it does not involve renunciation because the material object (āmiśadravya) is non-existent (ānapalabha); this object is empty (āśaya) in the future (anāgata) and the past (āstha); in the present (pratyayapanna), it has no defined property (niyatadhāra). This is why we say that there is no renunciation.

3. Moreover, the agent (kāraṇa), when he renounces his riches, says to himself: “My alms have great value (mahāśūnyata)" and thereby gives rise to pride (abhimāna) and bonds of thirst (ṛṣṇabhandhana). This is why we say that [the perfect gift] does not involve a thing abandoned. Since nothing is abandoned, all pride is excluded; pride being absent, the bonds of thirst do not arise.

\(^{147b}\) 4. Moreover, there are two kinds of donors (āstakṣa), mundane (laukika) donor and supramundane (lokottara) donor. The mundane donor renounces his riches (ādha) but does not renounce his generosity they put into the granaries with earth. The two children, seeing the Buddha, were filled with joy. Then Jaya, taking from the granary the earth which he called grain, he, respectfully offered it to the Buddha, while Vijaya, with palms joined, agreed with his friend. Having given alms with the earth, young Jaya, made the vow of having the power in the future to protect the entire universe under his royal umbrella, to recite gāthās and to build 84,000 precious stupas (stūpa), "Without Care" in the language of Ts'in, when he gave to the Buddha the gift of earth (pāṇāśīprādāna).
(dāna), whereas the supramundane donor renounces both his riches and his generosity. Why? Because the material object (āmisa-dravya) and the concept of generosity (dānacittu) are both non-existent (anupalabha). This is why we say that the perfect gift does not involve renunciation.

5. Finally, in the Prajñāpāramitā, it is said that three things do not exist (anupalabha), namely, the object given (āmīsa), the donor (dāyaka) and the recipient (pratigrāhaka).124

NON-EXISTENCE OF THE OUTER OBJECT125

1. Debate with the Realist.

The Realist. – But these three things must be joined in order that there be generosity (cf. p. 663F), and now you say that they do not exist! What is meant by the perfection of the virtue of generosity

124 Cf. the passage of the Pañcarāmapitā, p. 264, relative to lokottara dānapāramitā: Tatra katamā lokottarā dānapāramitā yate tu dharmadānapāramitā dharmadānapaḥ; tatra katamā ṛṣṇapāramitā tatra katamā ṛṣṇapāramitā iha bodhisattva mahāsattva dānaḥ datā nāmānām upalabhāḥ pratigrāhākam nopalabhe dānaḥ ca nopalabhe.

125 In this section, the Mpp begins by attacking massive rūpa, accepted by the Sarvāstivādin who, adopting the positions of certain heretics, Vaisēṣika and others, claim that massive rūpa (e.g., a piece of cloth) is real (a) because it bears a name (nāma) or a producer of an idea (e.g., the name of cloth), (b) because it is the seat of certain qualities (size and color in the case of cloth) and the result of certain causes (the thread making up the composition of the cloth). - Borrowing its refutation from the Saunālikas, the Mpp comments: (a) there may be a name, an idea, without a corresponding reality (we have the notion of the horns of a rabbit, while the rabbit has no horns); (b) the qualities that we find in the objects have only relative value and these objects, since they do not exist apart from the ultimate atoms of color, smell, taste and touch that constitute them, have only nominal existence.

Then the Mpp begins to attack these ultimate atoms which, the Saunālikas claim, are derived from a complex of causes and conditions like the cloth but constitute the final result of the analysis of the substance. According to the Sarvāstivādin, the atom has no extension – is just a point – and these atoms do not touch one another (cf. Kośa, I, p. 89); on the other hand, according to the Saunālikas, the atom, which entails spatial division (dibhedavādha, digyabhāga), is extended, and the atom touch one another as a result of their extension (Kośa, I, p. 89). It is this last definition which the Mpp opposes mainly; it shows that the concept of an extended atom is intrinsically contradictory.

Finally, in the spirit of the Greater Vehicle, the Mpp shows that the object, being capable of giving rise to different contradictory concepts, has only subjective value and is essentially empty (śūnya).
There can be two kinds of causes and conditions for the arising of a concept: some concepts stem from a reality, others from a non-reality, such as the visions in a dream (svapna). The moon reflected in water (udaka) is an example of this. The ultimate atom is not divisible and thus is not an atom. Conditioning is not fixed (niyata) and it cannot be said that, because a concept is produced, there exists a corresponding substance. Real existence must not be sought in that which exists by virtue of causes and conditions productive of a concept. Thus, when the eye sees the moon reflected in the water, a concept is produced which is expressed by saying: “This is the moon”, but the so-called moon resulting from this concept is not a real moon.

Refration of the 2nd argument. – Furthermore, there are three kinds of existence (bhūva): 1) relative existence (parasparāpaksikabhūva), 2) nominal existence (prajañaptibhūva), 3) real existence (dharmanabhūva).

1) For example, length (dṛghartha) and shortness (krostra), the quality of being “this” or “that”, etc., have relative existence. In reality, there is neither length nor shortness, neither distance nor closeness; it is because of mutual relationship that we speak thus. Length exists as a result of shortness, and shortness exists as a result of length; “that” exists as a result of “this” and “this” exists as a result of “that”. If I am east of an object, it will be looked upon as “western”; if I am west of an object, it will be looked upon as “eastern”; distinctions (bheda) between east and west exist in relationship to one and the same object; but even though they have a name, they are not reality. That is what is meant by relative existence; no true reality is found there and they are not comparable to colors (rūpa), smells (gandha), tastes (rasa) tangibles (sṛṣṭavyāva), etc.

2) Nominal existence (prajañaptibhūva), milk, for example, which has four factors: color (rūpa), smell (gandha), taste (rasa) and touchable (sṛṣṭavyāva). When these causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) come together, we commonly speak of milk. The milk exists, but not in the way dharmas coming from causes and conditions (prajñaptiavatpannaśāstra) exist; the milk does not exist, but not in the way that the horns of a rabbit (śālivāhana) or the hair of a tortoise (kāmaroma) are non-existent. It is only as a result of the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasyātmikṛta) that we commonly say that milk exists. It is the same for the cloth.

3) Moreover, it is as a result of color, smell, taste and tangible in the state of ultimate atoms (paranirūpa) that particles of hair (romuhāga) exist; as a result of the particles of hair, there are hairs (roman); as a result of hairs, there is fluff; as a result of fluff, there is thread (tana); as a result of thread, there is cloth (pata); as a result of cloth, there is a garment (vastra). - If the causes and conditions, namely, color, smell, taste and tangible in the state of ultimate atoms were lacking, there would be no hair particles; the hair particles not existing, there would be no hair; the hairs not existing, there would be no fluff; the fluff not existing, there would be no thread; the thread not existing, there would be no cloth; the cloth not existing, there would be no garment.

2. Debate with the Atomist.

The Atomist. – It is impossible that every object (dṛṣṭavya) exists indiscriminately only by virtue of the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasyātmikṛta). Thus, the ultimate atoms, because of their extreme subtlety (paratmakammatvā), have no parts (bhūja, avayava), and, having no parts, have no complex (samgrha). Being coarse (sthāla, audārīka), cloth is susceptible to being torn (ṛūpaṇa), but how could the ultimate atom, that has no parts, be broken?

ANSWER:

1. The extremely tiny does not exist; this is said mistakenly. Why? Because coarseness (sthālāvāra) and subtleness (sthānavatva) are relative concepts (pararūpāpikāsika). The subtle exists in contrast with the coarse and this subtle always has something more subtle than itself.

2. Moreover, if there existed a substance (ṛūpa) in the state of ultimate atom (paranirūpa), it would entail tenfold spatial division (dasaśabdaśabdamātra); but if it entailed the tenfold spatial division, it would not be a question of the ultimate atom. On the other hand, if there is not tenfold spatial division, it is not a question of matter. 129

127 In his Wei chieh chu Hou (T 1959, p. 76a15), Hsuan tsang renders the expression dhīghābhūgahasta of the Vinikā (ed. Lévi, p. 7, l. 19) as Fang fen (70, 18 and 2). Here the Bhāsī speaks of daisadābhābhuhasta, tenfold spatial division in reference to the four cardinal directions, the four intermediate directions, the zenith and the nadir (cf. Traisi, I, p. 446F, note). – We have just seen that, according to the Saurāntikas (cf. Kośa, I, p. 92), the atom entails spatial division or “extension”

128 The concept of material atom is intrinsically contradictory. The atom, not susceptible to deterioration, not susceptible to resistance (paṛtigaha) is, by definition, free from breakage (ṛūpana) and is indivisible (cf. Kośa, IX, p. 25). Matter (ṛūpa), on the other hand, is essentially subject to deterioration, breakage, by virtue of the definition rūpanaḥśaḥ rūpana (Kośa, I, p. 24).

129 For svapna and udaka as above, Traisi, I, p. 364F, 373F.

128 Compare Kośa, IX, p. 239.
3. Furthermore, if the ultimate atom existed, it would have spatial subdivision (ākāśapariccheda);\(^{131}\) but if there is subdivision, it cannot be a question of the ultimate atom.

\(^{148a}\) 4. If the ultimate atom existed, color (rūpa), smell (gandha), taste (rasa) and touchable (sparśayus) would occur as a function of the parts (bhūga); but it cannot be a question of the ultimate atom where color, smell, taste and touchable function as parts.\(^{132}\)

Try as one may to argue about the ultimate atom, this is why it cannot be established. The sūtra says:

“All matter (rūpa), whether coarse (audārīka) or subtle (uktāmya), inner (adhyātman) or outer (bhūrīdha), if considered generally, is transitory (anītya) and non-substantial (anatmaka),”;\(^{133}\) but it does not say that ultimate atoms exist. This is called the emptiness of the division into parts.

3. The object, subjective creation and emptiness.\(^{134}\)

Moreover, for those who contemplate emptiness (śūnyadārīṇi), matter exists as a function of the mind (cittanuparvāvartin). Thus these contemplatives (dhyāyin) see matter as being earth (prthivī), water (ap), fire (teja) or wind (vāya), as being blue (nīla), yellow (piṇḍa), red (lohitā) or absolutely empty (atyantuśīnya).\(^{135}\) And in the same way they can contemplate the ten views of the object as totality of the object (kṛtydhyāyena).\(^{136}\)

[Dārakhandhakacaturta.]\(^{137}\) - The Buddha, who was dwelling on Grdhṛkātāpavarta, went one day to the city of Rājagaha along with the assembly of bhikṣus. Seeing a large piece of wood (change ta hou e “great water” to ta mou “big piece of wood” or “mahaḥdarśanakanda”) in the middle of the path,\(^{138}\) the Buddha spread out his mat (niṣpadana), sat down and said to the monks: “A bhikṣu entered into trance (dhyānāpavāsī) and, endowed with mastery of mind (cetoṣaiśārpaṇa), would be able to change this big piece of wood (read ta mou) into earth (prthivī) and this would be real earth. Why? Because the earth element exists in the wood. He would also be able to change it into water (ap), into fire (teja) into wind (vāya), into gold (suvarṇa), into silver (vīraṃ) and into all kinds of precious substances (nīṃdhīvāravatadāraya); and they would all be real. Why? For the elements (dhātus) of all these things exist in the wood (read mou).”

2. Moreover, it is the same as in the case of a beautiful woman; the voluptuous man (kāmeṣu mithyādīrīṇi) who sees her, takes her to be a pure wonder and his heart clings to her; the ascetic given to contemplation of the disgusting (asadhardhīvāna), on looking at this woman, finds all sorts of defects without any beauty; her rival, when she sees her, feels jealousy (īryā ṣaūdha) and bad feelings; she does not want to look at her, as if she were ugly.\(^{139}\) On looking at this woman, the voluptuous man

\(^{131}\) There is ākāśa-fon-tai (18 and 2; 210), i.e., ākāśapariccheda or ākāśaparavibhāga, according to Suzuki, Index to the Laṅkāvatāra, p. 238.

\(^{132}\) One can reply to that, along with the Kośa, II, p. 148-149, note) that an atom never exists in isolation, but that there is a minimum of seven atoms. The molecule of derived matter (atom of color, or atom of smell, etc.) entails 1379 atoms, and as all derived matter has color, smell, taste and touchable, this number must be multiplied by four to obtain the smallest part of matter existing in the isolated state.

This paragraph seems to take its inspiration in part from the “Śūtra of Four Knowledges”, popular in the idealist school; cf. Saṃghāra, p. 104-105, 250-252, 421-423. The bodhisattva who possesses the four knowledges takes into account the non-reality of outer objects:

1) Viruddhavijñānapānā: he knows that one and the same object can give rise to absolutely opposite concepts.

2) Adhānambharajariprayogapādhetāvyāśayena: he knows that one may have concepts that do not conform to any reality.

3) Dpratiprathyavāpyatāvyāśayena: he knows that if the object were real, his consciousness would require no effort and would not be subject to error.

4) Trividhajñānapānā: he knows that the object can be bent to the needs of three kinds of minds: (a) to appear as they wish to bodhisattvas and meditators endowed with mastery of mind (cetoṣaiśārpaṇa); (b) to appear to yogins endowed with samatha and vipāsyanā at the moment when they think of it; (c) to not appear at all to the saints who have acquired concept-free knowledge (nīvīṣkalpaśajñāna).

\(^{135}\) The contemplatives (dhyāyin) who practice the trance states (dhyānā) obtain mastery of mind (cetoṣaiśārpaṇa), a mental capability (cintanamāṇyā) that makes them able to cause whatever they wish to appear by the power of their aspiration (adhyātmaśānti) alone; they change earth into water, etc. Cf. Madh, avadāna, p. 163 (tr. Lav., Musèon, 1916, p. 346-347); Saṃghāra, p. 106, note. – The power of the contemplative is described by the Bodh. bhūta, p. 352, in the following way: yatoṣitaṃ ca sarvāddhīvānti karoti, sarvāddhīvāntaṃ edeṣa yathākāmam sasadhīvānti, yado eva vastu yathākāmavatā tat tathāvata bhavati: “He performs all his miracles according to his wish, all his wishes come about as he desires; every object becomes exactly what he wants it to be.”

3) The ten āśrons are studied in Kośa, VIII, p.213-215.

\(^{136}\) The ten āśrons are studied in Kośa, VIII, p.213-215.

\(^{137}\) Cf. the Dārakhandhakacaturta of Anugṛha, III, p. 340-341 (tr. Hare, Gradual Sayings, III, p. 240-241), or Tsa a han, T.99 no. 494, k. 18, p. 128c-129a, and Kośa, II, p. 147. But according to the canonical version, this sūtra was pronounced by Sariputra and not by the Buddha.

\(^{138}\) The reading of the Taśā: Ta hou e (37; 85) “large piece of water”, is unacceptable. It is absurd that the Buddha would have spread out his mat on a piece of water and that then he would proclaim, as an extraordinary feat, the possibility of changing this piece of water into water. All these absurdities disappear if we adopt the variant Ta mou (37; 75) “large piece of wood”! This variant is attested in the Yuan, Ming and Sung editions as well as the Tenpyō Ishiyama-dera monastery Mus; besides, it is the reading adopted in the Pīli and Chinese versions of the Dārakhandhakacaturta.

\(^{139}\) If the object were real, it would not be the object of such diametrically opposite conceptions, but it would be seen by everyone in the same way. Now the concepts relating to one and the same object vary according to the categories or dispositions of the perceiving subjects. In order to illustrate the theme, the texts resort especially to two examples, that of the woman and that of water.
feels pleasure (sukha); the jealous, sadness (duḥkha); the ascetic finds the Path (mārga); the unprejudiced man feels no pleasure (anapaśā). A given woman is a beauty to her lover, a frightful skeleton to the ascetic, a horror to her rival, a tasty mouthful for the dog, etc. A well-known stanza, cited in the commentary to the Saṃghaṭa, p. 106, note, and in the Sarvadarśana-saṃgraha, ed. of the Ānandaśīla, p. 12, says:

Parivṛtthādāvāyana ekṣayān pramādaśīlānā / kaṇḍapūrṇāt kālmūrya iti tūrto viṣayoṣāṇaḥ //

“The ascetic, the lover and the dog have three different conceptions of the same female body: for the ascetic, it is a corpse; for the lover, it is his mistress; for the dog, it is a good mouthful.”

As for the example of the water, here is the commentary of the Saṃghaṭa, p. 105, n. 3: “There where the pretas, by the power of retribution of their actions, see a river full of pus, the animals — fish, etc., — see a drink, a home, and they settle down in it. People see delicious, pure and clear water; they use it to wash, to quench their thirst and acts, when it walks, stops, sits down or arises, we commonly (pratīkṣayitā) call it a man (pudgala). But considering it part by part, it is non-existent (anupalabdha).

Moreover, the ātman is absent in all the aggregates (skandha), elements (dhatu) and bases of consciousness (āyatana). Since the ātman does not exist, the donor does not exist. Why? Because the ātman is given all kinds of names (nāmāsanaketa): man (manasya), god (deva), male (purusa), female (śrī), donor (dāyaka), recipient (pratigraha), suffering person (dūkhahastva), fortunate person (sukhasamveda), animal (tīryagvoni), etc.; there are only names (nāman), there is no true reality in them (bhūtadharma).

[1488] Question. — If the donor does not exist, who is this bodhisattva who is practicing the virtue of refutation of the ātman to the Madh. kārikā of Nāgārjuna, and, in a word, seems to ignore it whereas, in other

V. NON-EXISTENCE OF THE DONOR

1. The ātman is not an object of consciousness.

Answer. — We have already said above [when we were explaining the phrase] Evaṃ mayā ātman ekaśmin samaye (cf. Traité, I, p. 67-69F), but we will repeat it.

The Buddhist spoke of six consciousnesses (viśijñāna): 1. the eye consciousness (caukṣurviśijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the eye consciousness (caukṣurviśijñāna-dharmas) together take color (rūpa) as object (ālayamba), but are not concerned with houses (ghru), cities (nagara) and other nominal fictions of all kinds; 2-5) similarly, the consciousnesses of ear, nose, tongue and body (śrotārgha, nāgharīja, gāndharīja, jātā) (are concerned with sound (śabda), smell (gandha), taste (rasa) and touchable (spaṣṭartha); 6. the mental consciousness (manoviśijñāna) and the dharmas associated with the mental consciousness (manoviśijñāna-dharmas) cognize the eye (caukṣu), places, it frequently has recourse to it (cf. Traité, I, p. 36F, 37F, 69F, 376F, 378F, 396F). We have already determined above, Traité, p. 614F, n., that the Mppī, at certain places, departs from the doctrines of the Madh. kārikā.
The Personalist. - How do you know there is no ātman?

1st Argument. – Each person in particular conceives the idea of ātman in respect to his own person (svakāya), and not in respect to that of another. Therefore if he wrongly considers as ātman the non-ātman of his own person, he ought also to wrongly consider as ātman the non-ātman of another.

2nd Argument. – If there is no inner (ādhyātmika) ātman, (given that) the cognition of colors arises and perishes from moment to moment (kṣaṇoppananiruddha), how does one distinguish and recognize the color blue (ānīla), yellow (pṛtha), red (lohitā) or white (avāduṭṭa)?

3rd Argument. – If there is no ātman, and since the evolving human consciousnesses (pravṛtti-vijñānā), constantly arising and ceasing, all disappear with the life of the body, who is bound by the actions – sins (āpatti) or merits (puṇya)? Who endures sufferings (duḥkha) or happiness (suḥkha)? Who is liberated (vivakṣa)?

For all of these reasons, we know that the ātman exists.

ANSWER:
Refutation of the 1st Argument. – 1) The difficulty is common to us, for if the man conceived the idea of ātman with reference to another person, one must still ask why he does not conceive the idea of ātman in reference to his own person.

2. Furthermore, arising from causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpādana), the five aggregates (skandha) are empty (ānīya) and are not ātman. But because of ignorance (avijñā), the twenty kinds of satkāryātā (belief in “me” and “mine”) arise. This satkāryātā arises relative to the five aggregates. Since it arises from the five aggregates, it is these five aggregates and not the person of another that is considered to be the ātman, and that is due to the impregnations (ūsānā) of ignorance.

3. Furthermore, if there were any ātman [whatevsover], the ātman of a third person should exist; but without even knowing if your own ātman exists or not, you are questioning me about the ātman of a third person. It is as if somebody, questioned about the horns of a rabbit (haivatākṣaṇa), should answer that they are like the horns of a horse (alakṣaṇa). If the horns of a horse really existed, one could resort to them to establish [the existence] of the horns of a rabbit; but if the horns of a horse are also uncertain (avaiṣṭa), how could one resort to them to establish the horns of a rabbit?

4. Furthermore, it is because the man conceives the idea of ātman in reference to his own person that he himself affirms the existence of the ātman. But you are speaking of a universal (vaśyātm) ātman which should also be attributed to other people. This is why one cannot say that the fact of conceiving the idea of ātman in reference to one’s own person and not in reference to [148c] another person proves the existence of the ātman.

143 Āyādeva meets this objection in his Caturśhīlaka, v. 228 (cited in Mahā. vrīti, p. 199):

yas tattvānām maṃśādī tattvānām nīyamān na saḥ, naṃ viśeṣeṇa bhūtyeṣa nāma jñāte.

“What is self for you is non-self for me; therefore it is not certain that it concerns a self. Do these hypotheses not arise on the basis of impermanent things?”

144 To understand the discussion that follows, one should remember that the idea of the self applies to the five skandhas, the elements constituting the individual, namely, substance or body (rūpa), perception (saṃjñā), feeling (vedanā), formations (saṃskāra) and consciousness (vijñāna). A synonymous expression is “name-and-form” (nāma-rūpa) which the Mppī will use later. Ātman is the four non-material skandhas, perception, feeling, formations and consciousness; Rūpa is the material skandha, the body or substance.

145 Saññāyātā, the etymology of which is obscure (cf. Kośa, p. 44, n. 2) means the belief in “me” and “mine” (ātmaneṣa-vijñāna). See Mahābh. I, p. 17; Sautrāntika, III, p. 16; Viśhila, p. 364; Dhammasaṅgārāṇī, p. 320; Patrīsambhāldi, I, p. 143-149; Mahāvyutpatti, nos. 1684-1704; Ājīvagīti, Y. 1545, k. 8, p. 36-49 (tr. J. Rahber, Le satkāryātā d’après Viśhila, 3, in MCB, I, 1951-32, p. 227-239; Kośa, p. 15-17; Siddhi, p. 348

The satkāryātā takes as ātman either the five skandhas or one of the five skandhas: it has twenty aspects or “points” on which scholars disagree; the Pāli system counts four different aspects for each of the five skandhas: 1) rūpa is ātman, 2) ātman is endowed with rūpa, 3) rūpa is within the ātman, 4) the ātman is within rūpa, and so on for each of the other four skandhas. The Abhidharma system is explained in Mahāvyutpatti and Viśhila (l.c.) and is more complicated.

According to the Kośa, IX, p. 258, the Vātsāpatīyās believes that the ātman or pudgala is cognized by the visual consciousness. When the visual consciousness, they say, cognizes color and shape, i.e., the body, they secondarily discern the pudgala (vātkāravijñāna-rūpāni pratīti-pudgala pratīti-vibhāvyayati). – Here the Mppī establishes that the object belonging to the six consciousnesses is empty and does not constitute an ātman, it will add that there is no seventh consciousness to cognize the ātman. This difficulty will later lead the idealist school to posit a seventh consciousness which they call the kālāmanas. Stained by belief in a self, this kālāmanas has the store-consciousness (ālayavijñāna) as object which it wrongly takes to be an ātman (cf. Sāmghraha, p. 16-22; Śrīnīvāsa, p. 22-24; Siddhi, p. 225-288).

These asamākṣa dharman are space (ākāsa), cessation (= nirvāna) due to wisdom (pratītyasamutpādodhā) and the cessation not due to wisdom (pratītyasamutpādodhā); cf. Kośa, I, p. 8.
5. Furthermore, there are people in whom the idea of atman arises in reference to something [other than themselves]: thus, heretic contemplatives (tṛṭhikādhyāsin), practicing the seeing of the totality of earth (prthivikṛtāyatanā), see the earth as being the ātman and the ātman as being the earth,146 and the same also for water, fire, wind and space. But it is out of error (viparyāśa) that the idea of ātman is conceived in reference to another.

6. Moreover, there are circumstances (samaṇavatva) where the idea of self is conceived in reference to another. The bhikṣus said: “This man knows for himself the non-existence of a self; he will easily be liberated.”

Speaking to him, they said: “From the very beginning until today, your body was always without ātman, and it is not just coming to the present moment [that is so]: it is simply because the four great elements were combined that you thought: ‘This is my body.’ There is no difference between your previous body and that of today.” The bhikṣus converted him to the Path (mārga); he cut through his passions and became an arhat.

Thus there are circumstances where one conceives the idea of self in reference to another. But under the pretence that there are distinctions between “that” and “this”, one cannot say that there is a “me”.

7. Finally, the true nature (bhūtavabhratva) of the ātman cannot be established with precision (niyamuna); one cannot establish whether it is eternal (nitya) or transitory (anitya) independent (svatatratva) or dependent (asvatratva), [149a] active (kāraṇa) or inactive (akāraṇa), substantial (ārtikor) or non-substantial (ārtikāṁśa), and other characteristics (niśītha) of this kind. Where there are characteristics (niśītha), there is reality (dharma); but without characteristics, there is no reality. Since the ātman has no characteristics, we know that it does not exist.

585 a. If the ātman were eternal (niyam), the sin of murder (vadhāpattī) would not exist. Why? The body can be killed because it is transitory, whereas the ātman would be indestructible because eternal.

Question. – Without a doubt, the ātman which is eternal cannot be killed, but the sin of murder is only killing the body.

Answer. – If killing the body were murder, why does the Vinaya say that suicide (ātmanaṃvadhāna) is not murder?”

146 Sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya) result from evil done to another (parasvavedhana) or good done to the assembly all that had happened. The bhikṣus said: “This man knows for himself the non-existence of a self; he will easily be liberated.”

147 [Laumotte] strongly doubt that the Vinaya says that “suicide is not murder”, but it is certain that Buddhism has never condemned suicide as such. It seems that it is wrong that de La Valette Poussin, in his article Suicide in ERE, XIII, p. 25, claimed the contrary. In fact, the third Patālakkhyā, to which he refers, does not condemn suicide itself, but the encouraging of others to kill themselves, which is quite different: “If a bhikṣu gives a knife or had a knife given to someone and tells them to kill themselves; if he praises death to them; if he says for example; “What use is this miserable life? It is better to die than to live”... and afterwards this man, because of that, dies, this bhikṣu is guilty of a pārājika sin” (Vinaya, III, p. 72; L. Finot, Le Pratīkamokṣastava des Sarvāstivādin, JA, Nov.-Dec., 1913, p.477-478).

148 On the power of these contemplatives, see above, p. 731F.

149 In its version of this macabre story, the Mṛpī is very close to Teogōng sīuang tu p’j yu khing, T 208, no. 3, p. 531c-532a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 72-74). The story is summarized in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 46, k. 46, p. 241a-b. – According to the legend of Ašoka, the victim of the story was the son of a noble family of Mathurā: he had become a monk under Upagupta, but decided to return to the world; on going home, he stopped for the night in the temple of a deva, where two yakṣas appeared and substituted his body for that of a corpse. The next day, he returned to Upagupta and, completely detached from his body, he attained arahathood: cf. A yu wang ts’ouan, T 2042, k. 6, p. 122b (tr. Pratypuski, Aśoka, p. 381-382); A yu wang king, T 2043, k. 9, p. 165b. [Among successful suicides, we may cite that of the Buddha who turned the wheel of Dharma and converted disciples, that of pratyekabuddhas who judged the time had come to enter into nirvāṇa, that of arhats who destroyed their passions and “did what had to be done” (ākāśayāyantī); finally, that of bodhisattvas who sacrificed their lives in honor of the Buddha or for the good of creatures. Thus, Śākyamuni, having decided to die, spontaneously renounced his life force (āyusvabhrānam avaya): Dīgha, II, p. 106). Pratyekabuddhas in groups or singly, judging that the time had come, rise up into the sky, change themselves into fire and enter parinirvāṇa (cf. Traité, I, p. 182F, n. 2; p. 392F). At the death of Śākyamuni, eighteen arhats entered nirvāṇa with him (Traité, I, p. 89, n. 2) while...
Therefore the ātman is not eternal and, for many reasons of this kind, we know that the ātman is not eternal.

b. If the ātman were transitory (anītya), there would, again, be neither sin (apatti) nor merit (puṇya). The body being impermanent and likewise the ātman, both would perish together [at death] and final annihilation (upādānā) would be reached. Swallowed up in this annihilation, one would not go on to future existences (parājanman) and undergo there [the retribution] of sins and merits. If this annihilation were nirvāṇa, it would not be necessary to cut the bonds (bandhanadamaṇketa), and one would only commit sins and merits, the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of future existences. For many reasons of this kind, we know that the ātman is not transitory.

c. If the ātman were independent (svatantra) and active (ātikāra), it would be able to have everything according to its desires. Now it does not [always] get what it wants and it [often] gets what it does not want.

If the ātman were independent, no one would commit evil deeds and fall into the bad animal destinies (tryayonidurgati).

Furthermore, every being hates suffering (dukkha); but whoever seeks happiness (suḥka) finds suffering. This is how we know that the ātman is neither independent nor active.

[149b] Moreover, out of fear of punishment, people make an effort to practice the good. If it were independent, why would it be forced to cultivate merits (puṇyabhāvāna) out of fear of punishment?

Finally, beings do not realize their wishes (manorathā); they are pulled about (ākṣipeta) by the affections (kleśa) and the bonds of craving (tyāśāsuddhāna). For many reasons of this kind, we know that the ātman is neither independent nor active.

d. Is the ātman dependent (avatana) and inactive (ākāra)? No, those are not the characteristics of the ātman. What is called the ātman is not different from the six consciousnesses (sixajñāna). Moreover, if the ātman is inactive, why does king Yena (Yama)149 ask the fisherman: “Who commanded you to commit this sin?” And the fisherman answered: “I myself committed it.” This is why we know that the ātman is not inactive.

e. Is it not correct that the ātman is substantial (ātīpi)? Why? Because all substance is transitory (anītya).

Question. – Why do people say: substantiality is one of my own characteristics?

Answer. – Some say that the ātman resides in the mind (cāna) and that it is as fine (śūkṣma) as a mustard grain (ūrīsaya); pure (vīṣudhdha), it is called subtle material body (prasādārthikāya). According to other opinions, it is like a grain of wheat (ṣuva), a bean (māya, mastuva) half an inch high (ārdhāgautamā), an

---

Subhadra voluntarily preceded him in death (Traité, I, p. 210F). Vakkhali, who was suffering from a painful illness, received assurance from the Buddha that his death would be innocent (apūpikha), recited the Buddhist credo for the last time and stabbed himself (Sanyutta, III, p. 119-124; Tsang yi a han, T 99, no. 1265, K. 47, p. 346b-347b; Tseng yi a t han, T. 125, k. 19, p. 642b-643a). Godhika, despairing of attaining definitive deliverance, slit his throat, at once obtained arhathood and entered into nirvāṇa (Traité, I, p. 587F, n.). Both the Lesser and the Greater Vehicle unreservedly praise the charitable deeds of the bodhisattvas who sacrifice their life for the benefit of beings or to pay homage to the Buddhas. We may recall the “gift of the body” and the “gift of the head” made by the future Buddha Sākyamuni (Traité, I, p. 143-144F, n.), the deed of the bodhisattva Sarvanātampiyadana who, to celebrate the Buddha and the Sādhanāmapuṇḍariṇīsūtra, filled his body with oil, set it on fire and burned for twelve years (Traité, I, p. 579, n.; below, p. 751F). Suicide seems to be reserved for very scanty and very virtuous people; others would do best to abstain. Often, the untimely attempt at suicide fails, not without, however, assuring the hopeless one of considerable spiritual benefit. Śīhā, hopeless at not progressing on the spiritual path, wished to hang herself; hardly had she knotted the cord around her neck than she attained arhathood; the cord loosened from her neck and fell to the ground (Theragāthā, v. 77-81). Sappadina, feeling unable to arrive at meditative stabilization, was about to kill himself with a razor when he suddenly attained insight (Theragāthā, v. 405-410). Vakkhali, regretting not seeing the Buddha, wished to throw himself down from a high rock; at that moment the master appeared and prevented him from prematurely ending his days (Apadāna, II, p. 465-468; Manorathā, I, p. 248-251; Dhūnmapadathā, I, p. 118-119; tr. Burlingame, Legend, III, p. 262-263; Theragāthā Comm. in Rh-D., Brethren, p. 197-199).

inch high (aṅguṣṭha). As soon as it takes on a body, it resumes its former form, the way the skeleton of an elephant (gajāḥ), when it has reached its complete form, is like that of the entire elephant. Some say that the size [of the subtle body] corresponds to that of the human body and that after death the dimensions re-appear. But all of that is wrong (ayukta). Why? Because all matter (rūpa) is made of the four great elements (mahābhūtās); being the result of causes and conditions (pratītyasamutpāna), all matter is impermanent (anitya). If the ātman were material, since matter is transitory, the ātman too would be transitory. For this hypothesis, see what has been said above (p. 743F).

Question. – There are two types of bodies (kāya), the coarse body (sthīlākāra) and the subtle body (stūkṣmākāra). The coarse body is transitory (anitya), but the subtle body is the ātman; eternally it passes from existence to existence and penetrates the five destinies (guṇī). Answer. – This subtle body does not exist (nopalabhya). If the subtle body existed, there should be a place (sthāna) where it could be found, as is the case for the five internal organs or the four parts of the body. But we may search for it everywhere without finding it.

Question. – This subtle body is extremely fine (paramasākṣa). At death, when it has gone, how would you see it if, during life, you couldn’t find it? Besides, the five organs can neither see nor cognize this subtle body; only the ārya endowed with the superknowledges (abhiṣikāḥ) could see it. Answer. – If that is so, it is no different than nothing at all. When a person, at the moment of death, abandons the aggregates (skandha) of the present existence to enter into the aggregates of the intermediate existence (antarābhava), there is no relationship of anteriority or posteriority between the moment when the body of the actual existence disappears and when it assumes the body of the intermediate existence: the birth occurs at the same time as the disappearance. It is as if one presses a wax seal (mudrā) onto clay and, the clay having received the imprint, the imprint were to be broken at once; the impression and the disappearance of the imprint are simultaneous, without anteriority or posteriority. At the very same moment when one takes on the aggregates and the mode of being of the intermediate existence, one abandons the aggregates of the intermediate existence (antarābhava) to assume the mode of being of existence-birth (upārthabhava). You say that the subtle body constitutes this intermediate existence, but this [alleged] body of intermediate existence comes [from nowhere] and goes [nowhere]. It is like the burning of a lamp (ādu) characterized by a succession of productions and disappearances (upādānottaradhva-prabandha), without permanence (ilāvata), but also without interruption (ucccheda).

[149c] Finally, the Buddha said: “Whether past, future or present, coarse or subtle, all substance is transitory.” Therefore your [alleged] subtle matter constituting the ātman would also be transitory and perishable.

For many reasons of this kind we know that the ātman is not substantial.

f. Neither is the ātman non-substantial (ārūpin). The four aggregates (skandha) and the three unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) factors are non-substantial. The four aggregates in question, being impermanent (anitya), dependent (avatattva), dependent on causes and conditions (hetupratyayapaksa) cannot be the ātman. As for the three non-conditioned factors, they cannot be considered as being the ātman because they are not taken on (upāsita). For many reasons of this kind we know that the ātman is not non-substantial.

153] In its reasoning and its examples, the Māṇipī seems to take its inspiration directly from the Madhavānti, p. 544: tatāhānubhūtāni bhūtyeṣu svābhāvāntām śūnyatām na labhateṣu ṣva pradhānāntāṁ śūnya prabhābāṇitāṁ. In this example, the image and the reflection or the example of reading and the lamp, the seal and the impression, etc., when the present skandhas are destroyed at death, at that very moment, as is the case for the (simultaneous) rising and falling of the paws of a balance, the skandhas relating to birth are produced by a projection in harmony with the actions.”

For the example of the image and the reflection (śūnyatābhāvam), see Kośa, III, p. 34: for the example of the seal and the impression (śūnyatā). Lālitaśīlā, p. 176, l. 15; Madh. vṛtti, p. 428, 551; for the example of the paws of a balance (tālāndra), Madh. vṛtti, p. 94 (fr. Luv., Münch., 1910, p. 291-292).

Also according to the Vāsudhamagga (p. 604), birth immediately follows death and there is no intermediary (tesam antarāntā nāti). Cf. Vīnaya, I, p. 14; Sānyutta, II, p. 252, 253; III, p. 47, 68, 80, 89, IV, p. 382: Yann kālī rūpan atilāgatapacakuppanmano ajhātam śaḥ bhūdhāntā vā stīkām kṛtān vā nāvām āmānāya maraṇaḥ rūpan n āntām māma n ‘eso ‘ham ammi na me so atāti.

154] I.e., saṃjñā, vedanā, saṃskarā and vijñāna; cf. above, p. 77F, n. 2.
Search for the ātman in the heavens or on earth, inside (adhyātmam) or outside (bahirdhā), in the three times (vācuḥparyayā, phassapaccayā), at the moment of death (aatvāyutto, phassapaccayā), and the subsequent knowledge relating to suffering (dukkhe ‘svayādhiṇa). When satkhyādhyāti is destroyed, one no longer believes in the ātman.

Refutation of the 2nd argument. – Above (p. 736F) you said: “If there is no inner (adhyātmam) ātman, given that the consciousness of colors arises and perishes from moment to moment (kJutapannaniruddha), how does one distinguish and cognize the color blue, yellow, red or white?” But if the ātman existed, neither could it cognize it by itself; it would have to depend (ādīr) on the visual consciousness (cakṣurvidhiṇa) to be able to cognize it. If that is so, the ātman is futile (niḥprayaṇa). The visual consciousness cognizes color; color arises and perishes, and [the visual consciousness] arises in similarity with it and perishes in similarity with it. However, in the mind that [immediately] follows, there arises a dharma called memory (smṛti), this memory is a conditioned (samsṛti) dharma: although it perishes and disappears, this memory is capable of cognizing. In the same way that the ārya, by the power of his wisdom (prajñābala), is able to cognize future things (anagataśāyana), so successive moments of memory are able to cognize past moments (arthadharma). On disappearing, the previous visual consciousness gives birth to the subsequent visual consciousness. This subsequent visual consciousness is endowed with power by the energy of its activity (pravṛttiśāstra) and, although the color is temporary and unstable, it can be cognized thanks to the energy of memory. This is why, while arising and ceasing from moment to moment and despite its impermanence, consciousness can distinguish and cognize color.

Refutation of the 3rd argument. – You said (p. 736F): “If there were no Ātman, since the evoking human consciousnesses (pravṛttiśāstra), which are always arising and perishing, all disappear with the life of the body, who then is related to actions – sins or merits? Who endures the suffering (dukkha) or enjoys the happiness (sukha)? Who is liberated (vimukti)?” Now we will reply.

156 Extract of a sūtra the Sanskrit version of which is known to us by the Viññān Śākya’s (tr. L., EA, I, p. 370) and Kośa, III, p. 105, IX, p. 245: cākṣuḥ pratītyā rūpāni cənyapāyata cakṣurvidhiṇaṃ, trayaṁ punaṃ samjñayati sparśaṃ vedanā samjñā cetanā. The Pāli version which is slightly different occurs in Sān̄yutta, II, p. 72; tr, I, p. 33, 105-69, 86-87, 90: cakkhu ca paticcā rūpe ca upajjati cakkhiṇādhammaṃ, tiṇṇam samgati phasso, phasuṭṭhacayā vedanā, vedantapacayā tanha, ayaṃ kho dukkhaṃ samsādava. 157 For the problem of memory, see Kośa, IX, p. 273 sq.
VI. GENEROSITY AND THE OTHER VIRTUES

Moreover, if the bodhisattva practices the virtue of generosity, he will be able to give birth to the six virtues (pāramitā), and this will then be the perfection of the virtue of generosity.

1. Generosity and the virtue of generosity.

How does generosity engender the virtue of generosity?

Generosity is lower (avara), middling (maḍhya) or higher (agra); from the lower generosity comes the middling generosity and from the middling generosity comes the higher generosity. Giving food (āhāra) and [other gross] objects (auddhikadasya) with gentleness (merucitā) is lower generosity.\[150]\n
[Gifts practiced by Śākyamuni in his jñānakas].\[159]\n
[1. Lesser gifts]. – Thus, when the Buddha Śākyamuni produced the Bodhi mind (pratamaksetropadakā) for the first time, he was a great king called Kousung ming (Prabhāsa) – seeking Buddhahood, he practiced generosity more or less. – When he took on a new existence, he was the master-potter (kumbhakāra) who gave bath utensils and honey syrup to another Buddha Śākyamuni and his samgha.\[158]\n
[2. Middling gifts]. – In his previous existences, the buddha Śākyamuni was a merchant’s son who gave a garment to the buddha Ta yin cheng (Mahāghosa) and built ninety stūpas to him for his parinirvāṇa. – Then, when he was reborn, he was the great king who offered to the buddha Che teu (Simha) garlands made of the seven jewels (saptaratanmayancaya). – Finally, when he was reborn, he was the great merchant (mahiśrēṣṭhim) who offered to the buddha Miao mou (Sunetra) an excellent palace and lotuses made of the seven jewels (saptaratanmayapadma). Deeds of this kind are called middling gifts of the Bodhisattva.

[3. Higher gifts]. – In a previous existence, the buddha Śākyamuni was a recluse (ryśi) who, seeing the grace and beauty of the Buddha Ku o sh’en (Kauṇḍinya) threw himself at the feet of this Buddha from the top of a high mountain; then, with peaceful body, he stood to one side. – He was also the bodhisattva Tchong cheng hi kien (Sarvasuttaviprīyadarśana) who offered his body as a lamp to the Buddha Je yue kουang ti (Candrastāryavimalaprabhāśaśī). Various deeds of this kind, where the Bodhisattva sacrifices his body (kāyeṣṭiva) to offer it to the Buddhas, are the higher gifts of the bodhisattva. These are the three gifts of the Bodhisattva.

It is the same also when the bodhisattvas, from their first production of Bodhi mind (pratamaksetroppadakā), make gifts to beings; first, they give food (āhāra); then their generous intentions increasing (dānacitravardhana), they give them the flesh of their body (kāyamāsa). First, they give all kinds of excellent drinks; then, their generosity increasing, they give them their body’s blood (kāyaśīvātita). First they give them paper, ink and canonical texts, then they give the dharma teachers the fourfold offering (piṭā) of garments, robes, food and drink; finally, having obtained the dharmaśākhya, they preach all kinds of sermons (dharma) to countless beings (apurvanayavatra), thus practicing generosity of the Dharma (dharmanāna). It is by means of such [progressions] that, from the virtue of generosity, there ensues [an increase of] the virtue of generosity.

2. Generosity and the virtue of morality.

How does the generosity of the bodhisattva give rise to the virtue of morality (līlāpāramitā)? The bodhisattva says to himself that, if he does not give anything to beings, he will be poor in the following existence; because of this poverty, thoughts of stealing (adattākāna) will arise in him; in the course of these thefts, he will commit murder (prāṇatāpā). As a result of his poverty, he will have insufficient pleasure; since these pleasures are insufficient, he will engage in illicit lovemaking (kāmanilāvāśam).\[160]\n
159. On the gift of the Buddha to the former Śākyamuni, see above, Traité I, p. 225F and notes.

160. The action of this bodhisattva who later became the Buddha Bhaisajyàja is fully described in the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, p. 405-408. See text, Traité I, p. 579.

158. In the course of his previous existences, Śākyamuni made countless offerings to the Buddhas, seeking for enlightenment in order to liberate beings. The Mppī limits itself here to mentioning several of these offerings, but a much longer list may be found in Lalitavistara, p. 171-172 (tr. Foucaux, p. 153-154).
Because of his poverty, he will be a man of [150c] low condition (hīna); fearful of the fact of this lowly condition, he will speak falsehoods (mṛṣāvāda), etc. Thus in the course of his poverty, he will commit the ten bad paths of action (akusālakarmapatha). [On the other hand], if he practices generosity, he will be reborn wealthy, and having riches, he will not commit sins (adharma). Why? Because one has no needs, then the five objects of enjoyment (pulika kāmāguna) are assured.

[The snake, the frog and the rat] 25. – In a previous existence, Tīpāsu (Devadatta) was once a snake (śāpa). This snake lived in a pool (krama) in friendship along with a frog (manḍalika) and a tortoise (kīrma). In time, the water of the pool dried up completely, but there was nobody the snake could blame for the famine (dāribhikā) and distress; however, he sent the tortoise to call the frog [intending to eat the latter]. But the frog sent the tortoise back with this stanza:

When one becomes poor, one forgets previous dispositions.

One forgets earlier values; eating becomes the main thing.

Remember my words and repeat them to the snake:

The frog will never return to you.

If one develops generosity, one will become rich in future existences and never have needs; then one will be able to keep morality (śīla) and avoid all these sins. Therefore generosity can engender the virtue of morality.

Furthermore, generosity leads to the alleviation of the bonds of immorality (āduhāliṣya); it increases the mind of morality (śīlācaya) and brings about its strengthening (dṛṣṭavya). Thus generosity is the cause and condition (hetupratyaya) that advances (vārdhāna) morality.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who gives always feels sentiments of goodwill (nairṛtī) and compassion (karuṇa) towards his beneficiary. Detached from riches, unreaping of his own goods, how could he steal?

Full of loving-kindness and compassion towards his recipient, how could he have the intention to kill?

This is how generosity impedes immorality and gives rise to morality. By practicing generosity, all thoughts of miserliness (mātsaryacitta) are suppressed, and henceforth morality (śīla), patience (kṣānti), zeal (vīrya) and the other [virtues] are readily practiced.

[The gift of Mahājīrī]. – Wen chou che li (Mahājīrī) was once a bhikṣu a long time ago – these are long kalpas. Having gone to a village to beg alms, he succeeded in filling his bowl (pātra) with sweet cookies (p. 754F) of a hundred flavors (śātrasamodaka). In the town, a little boy insistently asked him for one of these cookies but Mahājīrī did not give him any. However, having come to a stūpa of the Buddha, Mahājīrī took two cookies in his hands and said to the boy: “If you can eat one of these cookies yourself and give the other one to the Sangha, I will give them to you as a gift.” They agreed and the boy made a gift of one cookie to the Sangha. Then in the presence of Mahājīrī he received ordination (upasampadā) and made the aspiration to become Buddha. This is how generosity can lead to obtaining morality and to making the decision to become Buddha. Therefore generosity gives rise to the virtue of morality.

Finally, as reward for generosity, one obtains the fourfold offering, a fine kingdom, a good teacher and finally, as reward for generosity, one obtains the fourfold offering, a fine kingdom, a good teacher and

For many reasons of this kind, generosity engenders the virtue of morality.

3. Generosity and the virtue of patience.

How does generosity gives rise to the virtue of patience (kṣāntipatramiśā)?

[151a] 1) If the bodhisattva gives a gift and his recipient (pratigrāha) rebuffs him, either by asking for too much or by asking at an inopportune time (abikīle), the bodhisattva has the following thought: “If I give gifts, it is to attain Buddhahood; no one forces me to give. Acting by myself, why should I get angry?” Having reasoned in this way, he practices patience; thus generosity engenders the virtue of patience.

2) Furthermore, if the bodhisattva gives and his recipient becomes annoyed, the bodhisattva thinks in the following way: “At this moment I am giving my inner and outer wealth (ādyatmiṃkabāhyadhana); I relinquish that which is hard to abandon. Then why should I endure vain insults (ītyaśiha)?” If I did not have patience, the gifts that I would be making would be impure (āśuddha). Giving without patience is to act in exactly the same way as a white elephant (pāndaragaja) going to take a bath in the river who, as soon as he comes out, goes to roll in the dirt.” Having reasoned in this way, he practices patience.

For many reasons of this kind, generosity engenders the virtue of patience.

4. Generosity and the virtue of exertion.

How does generosity engender the virtue of exertion (vīryapāramitā)?

In making gifts, the bodhisattva always uses his exertion. Why? At the moment when the bodhisattva heal them all. He worried about the whole world and worry did not leave his mind. He died of sadness and unfortunate

The Buddha Śākyamuni in one of his previous existences (pūrvajanman) was a great physician-king (mahāvaidyāyudya) who healed all the sick people (vydhā), not with pride (kloka) or self-interest (lābha) but with compassion (anukāmaka) for all beings. But as the sick were too numerous, he was unable to heal them all. He worried about the whole world and worry did not leave his mind. He died of sadness and was reborn in the heaven of the Tao li gods (Trīyastirnija). Then he thought: “Here I have become a god; but by enjoying the reward of my merits (punyavipāka) alone, I have not advanced.” By his own means, he chose to die and renounced the divine longevity (devāyus).

He was reborn in the palace of the Nāga king P'o k'ia t'o (correct So k'ie lo = Sagarānāgarjya; cf. Traité, I, p. 294F, 288F) as nāga-prince (nāgakāmarā). When he was grown up, his parents loved him very much, but he resolved to die and gave himself up to the king of the golden-winged birds (garuda). The bird carried him away and devoured him at the top of a cottonwood tree (sālmanai). His parents wept, moaned and lamented.

After his death, the nāga-prince took rebirth in Jambudvīpa as the crown prince of a great king (mahārāja/ākasa). He was called Neng che (Tyagavat) and was able to speak as soon as he was born. He asked everywhere what wealth there actually was in the land so as to take it and distribute it as gifts. Frightened, the people avoided him and fled from him. Out of compassion and affection, his mother alone stayed to care for him. He said to his mother: “I am not a demon (rākṣasa); why do people run away from me?” The astrologers answered: “We have heard at one time that there is a

The body of Mahāyāgavat as they appear in the aforementioned sources are reproduced here incompletely by the Mppś because it is silent about the marriage of Mahāyāgavat and about his courageous action of emptying the water of the ocean with a gourd. The latter detail, however, is not unknown to the Mppś because it mentions it in another place (Traité, I, p. 265F). On the other hand, he introduces a series of episodes as the deeds of Mahāyāgavat that earlier are foreign to him; thus, after a shipwreck, during a period of seven weeks, Mahāyāgavat has to overcome a whole series of obstacles in order to reach the nāga palace.

These new episodes are borrowed partially from another cycle of legends closely related to that of Mahāyāgavat, the legend of the two brothers Kalyānākārin and Pipākārikā, of which the following is a summary: The king of Viśālana had two sons, Kalyānākārin and Pipākārikā. The king of another land, Li che Pu (Rāhula) promised his daughter in marriage to Kalyānākārin who was a hero of generosity and who, in order to satisfy his leavings, went to seek his fortune beyond the seas; his brother Pipākārikā accompanied him. He came in turn to the cities of gold, of silver, of lapis-lazuli, and finally, after a thousand obstacles, the palace of the nāga king. Kalyānākārin obtained from the nāga the cintāmaṇi pearl, but his brother stole it from him after having put out his eye. The brother returned first and made pretensions to the throne. The blind Kalyānākārin returned to the court of the king who had promised him his daughter, and the latter, although not recognizing him, declared that she wanted to marry only him; Kalyānākārin regained his sight and, having driven away his brother, the usurper, mounted the

The acts of the bodhisattva Mahāyāgavat are well-known in the following sources: Mahāvanta, II, p. 89-91; L’oeuvre de la littérature, p. 152 (no. 9), k. 1, p. 4a-5a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 3038); Hien you king, T 202 (no. 40), k. 8, p. 104ab-104bc (cf Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 90-91); Schmidt, Der Weise u. d. Thor, p. 227-2252; King li u siang, T 2121, k. 9, p. 47b-48a. – In summary, Mahāyāgavat, the son of the brahmin Nyagrodea, is a kind of hero of generosity. As his fortune and that of his father were insufficient, he undertakes a sea journey. On the way, he meets first the brahmin Kia p’i who promises him his daughter in marriage. Having come to the sea-shore, he joins some travelling companions, and on the seventh day, the last anchor holding the ship was cut. They came to the land of jewels; his companions, having made their fortunes, leave Mahāyāgavat who alone sets out to look for the cintāmaṇi pearl in the palace of the nāga. Having triumphed over the poisonous serpents and the rūkasas, Mahāyāgavat comes in turn to cities of silver, lapis-lazuli and gold where he gathers wondrous pearls. On his way back, they are stolen from him while he sleeps by the nāgas. To get them back, he undertakes to empty the water of the ocean; his pearls are returned to him. Having come back to his homeland, he finds his aged parents and marries his fiancée.

The deeds of Mahāyāgavat as they appear in the aforementioned sources are reproduced here incompletely by the Mppś which is silent about the marriage of Mahāyāgavat and about his courageous action of emptying the water of the ocean with a gourd. The latter detail, however, is not unknown to the Mppś because it mentions it in another place (Traité, I, p. 265F). On the other hand, he introduces a series of episodes as the deeds of Mahāyāgavat that earlier are foreign to him; thus, after a shipwreck, during a period of seven weeks, Mahāyāgavat has to overcome a whole series of obstacles in order to reach the nāga palace.

These new episodes are borrowed partially from another cycle of legends closely related to that of Mahāyāgavat, the legend of the two brothers Kalyānākārin and Pipākārikā, of which the following is a summary: The king of Viśālana had two sons, Kalyānākārin and Pipākārikā. The king of another land, Li che Pu (Rāhula) promised his daughter in marriage to Kalyānākārin who was a hero of generosity and who, in order to satisfy his leavings, went to seek his fortune beyond the seas; his brother Pipākārikā accompanied him. He came in turn to the cities of gold, of silver, of lapis-lazuli, and finally, after a thousand obstacles, the palace of the nāga king. Kalyānākārin obtained from the nāga the cintāmaṇi pearl, but his brother stole it from him after having put out his eye. The brother returned first and made pretensions to the throne. The blind Kalyānākārin returned to the court of the king who had promised him his daughter, and the latter, although not recognizing him, declared that she wanted to marry only him; Kalyānākārin regained his sight and, having driven away his brother, the usurper, mounted the one could obtain all that one desires." Having heard these words, the bodhisattva said to his parents: "I want to go to sea to look for this cintāmanī on the head of the Nāga king." His parents replied: "You are our only son; if you go down to the bottom of the sea, it will be hard for you to escape dangers;" if we ever lose you, what is the use for us to live on? You must not go. In our treasury (kośa) there is still some wealth; we will give it to you." The son replied: "Your treasury is limited, but my aspirations are limitless: I want to satisfy the whole world so that there will be no more needs. I would like to have your permission (amāṣṭikā). If I can follow my original intention, I will satisfy everyone in Jambudvīpa." Seeing the gravity of his resolve, his parents dared not hold him back and allowed him to depart.

At this moment, out of respect for his great qualities, five hundred merchants were very happy to follow him. Knowing the date of his departure, they assembled in the port. The bodhisattva, who had heard that there was a cintāmanī in the head of the Nāga king Sāgara (read So k'ie lo), asked the crowd: "Does anyone know the way leading to this Nāga’s palace?" A blind man (andhapūraśa) named T'o chō (Dīsa), who seven times previously had been on the high seas knew the sea route in question. The bodhisattva asked him to accompany him. He answered: "I am old and my eyes have lost their light; although formerly I went several times, today I can no longer go." The bodhisattva said: "I am undertaking this journey now, it is not for myself; it is in the interests of all that I am going to look for the cintāmanī. I wish to satisfy people so that their bodies have no more suffering." Then by means of a sermon on the Path (mārgadharmaparyāya), [the bodhisattva] converted the [old pilot]: "You are a wise man, how could you deny that? How could my vow be accomplished without your help?" Dīsa heard his appeal, warmly embraced the bodhisattva and said: "I will accompany you and set sail with you on the great ocean. As for myself, I will surely not return. You must gather my ashes and leave them on the island of golden sand (suvarṇarājakalādipa) that is in the middle of the great ocean."167

When the gear for the voyage had been gathered together, they cut the seventh anchor; the ship set forth, pitching and heeling and arrived at the island of precious stones. The merchants argued about the seven kinds of jewels (saṇḍarmanā) and, when each had had enough, they asked the bodhisattva why he did not take any. The bodhisattva answered: "What I want is the cintāmanī; these jewels are impermanent things and I don’t want them. But each of you should [151c] limit yourselves so as not to weigh down the ship which cannot withstand it." But the merchants said: "Bhadanta, make some wishes for us so that we will be safe (yogakṣema)." Then they went away. Dīsa said to the bodhisattva: "Let us keep the dinghy separately and we will go another route. Let us wait seven days for the wind." We will sail along the southern coast; we will reach a dangerous place; there will be a craggy shore with a forest of jujuhe trees the branches of which extend down to the water. A heavy wind will blow our boat and it will break up. You must try to grab a branch and you will be able to save yourself. As for me who have no eyes, I will perish. Beyond the reef there is an island with golden sand and you must bury my body in the sand; this golden sand is pure and that is my wish."168

As he had said, the wind arose and they sailed off. They came to the craggy shore and according to Dīsa’s advice, the bodhisattva tried to grab a branch and succeeded in saving himself. He took Dīsa’s body and buried it in the Golden Island (Suvarṇabhūmi). Then he went on alone according to the instructions previously given. For seven days he swam in deep water; for seven days he waded in water up to his neck (jātūs); for seven days he waded in water up to his knees (jāna); for seven days he walked in mud (kārduṃa). Then he saw beautiful lotuses (uptaṇa), fresh and delicate, and he said to himself: "These lotuses are too fragile; it is necessary to enter into the meditative stabilization of space (ākāśasamādhi)." Having made his body light [by means of this meditative stabilization], he walked on these lotuses for seven days. Then he saw venomous snakes (āhūraṇa) and he said: "These poisonous snakes are very formidable; he entered into the meditative stabilization of loving-kindness (matrītiṣṭhasamādhi) and he walked on the heads of these venomous serpents for seven days: all the snakes raised their heads and presented them to the bodhisattva so that he could walk thereon.169 When he had overcome these obstacles, he found a city made of the seven kinds of jewels (saṇḍarmanāyugāṇa) fortified by seven moats; three great nagas guarded the gates. Seeing this handsome (abhūraṇa), graceful (prajñādikā) bodhisattva adorned with the major and minor marks (jākṣanādyavāla-īdānakā) who had overcome all the obstacles to come to them, these nagas thought: "This is not an ordinary man (prajñāgama); this must be a bodhisattva, a man of great merit (mahāstapanaṇa)." They allowed him to enter into the palace.

The nāga king and queen had recently lost their son and were still mourning him in their hearts. Seeing the bodhisattva coming, the nāga queen, who possessed the superknowledges (abhūlaṇa), recognized that this was her son, and the milk spurted from her breasts.171 She asked him to be seated and said to him: "Your son; where do you live today?" The bodhisattva who, for his part, kept the memory of his previous existences (pārvanidvānaṁśati), recognized that these were his parents and answered her mother: "I took birth in Jambudvīpa as the crown prince of a great king (mahārājaśakumāro) Out of compassion (anukampā) for the poor (dārādā) who are unable to overcome the suffering of hunger (bhūlaṇa) and cold (īta), I have come here to look for the cintāmanī." His mother said to him: "There is a [152a] cintāmanī on your father’s head as an ornament (cūḍāmanī), but it will be difficult to

164 Parents always try to discourage their children from the business of the sea; cf. Mahāyānaṣūryatikā, Pāli Jātaka, VI, p. 34
165 Supārśa, the master mariner from Bharacaccha, had also himself become blind; but his services being revealed as indispensable, he agreed to lead an expedition on the high seas; cf. Pāli Jātaka, IV, p. 138-139; Jātakaṁbhī, p. 88.
166 Seven voyages on the high seas are a record, since, as Pāṇa in the Divyāvadāna, p. 34: “Has anyone ever seen or heard of a man who has returned from the great ocean six times bringing his ship back safe and sound and who goes to sea again for the seventh time?”
167 This is evidently Suvarṇādī or Suvarṇabhūmi, cf. above, p. 628f.
168 The ship had been anchored to the quai by seven anchors; once the departure was decided on, one anchor per day was cut; cf. Chavannes, Conœx, II, p. 243; IV, p. 90, 129.
169 The favorable wind was known by the name īwāri the propeller; cf. Chavannes, Conœx, II, p. 243.
170 Usually it is at the end of seven days and after sailing seven hundred leagues that the ship is wrecked (cf. Pāli Jātaka, IV, p. 16; VI, p. 34). To reach the marvelous city, the castaway must still struggle against all kinds of obstacles for seven weeks: one week of swimming, etc. See a development of very similar points in Ssu fen liu, T 1428, k. 46, p. 912a14.
171 This is the theme of The Mother’s Milk; cf. Chavannes, Conœx, I, p. 83; III, p. 12; IV, p. 98. get it. Your father will certainly take you to the treasure-house where he keeps his jewels and will certainly give you them at will; you must answer: ‘I do not need these assorted jewels (mūrvariṇa); I want only the precious jewel on the head of the great king; if he understands my compassion [for beings], he will consent to giving it to me.’ This is how you will be able to get it.”

The bodhisattva went to his father who was deeply moved and whose joy was boundless. Full of pity for his son who had endured so many dangers to come to him, he showed him magnificent jewels and said:
“I give you anything you wish; take what you want.” The bodhisattva answered: “I have come from afar in the Tch'ang a han, T 26, no. 68, k. 14, p. 515b-618c; and Ta tcheng kiu wang king, T 45, p. 831a seq.
Ken pen chouo... tsa che, T 1451, k. 37, p. 393a- 394b. – However, an independent version of the Mah p'o cha, T 1545, k. 76, p. 395c. The Dharmapr
This is what has been told: The eighty-four thousand vassals of the noble king Hi kien (Sudarśana)173 came one morning to offer him precious things made of the seven jewels. The king said: “I have no need of them. Each of you should cultivate merit (jūnya).” The petty kings had the following thought: “Even though the great king does not want to accept [our gifts], it is not fitting that we should use them for beings.” Immediately a dark cloud spread and rained down all kinds of precious objects, garments (cīvara), food (ākūra), beds and seats (śāśīvara), medicines (bhūṣaṇa) and all the materials (parisāra) that people need. And to the end of the [bodhisattva’s] life, this rain never stopped.
This is how generosity gives rise to the virtue of exertion in the bodhisattva.

5. Generosity and the virtue of meditation.

How does generosity give rise to the virtue of meditation (dhyānapāramitā)?

1) When the bodhisattva gives, he eliminates miserliness (mātsarya) and greed (loha). Having eliminated avarice and envy by this generosity, he fixes his attention (ekacita) and progressively eliminates the five hindrances (nivarana).172 [152b] Elimination of the five hindrances is what is properly called meditation (dhyāna).

2) Moreover, it is by the support (dīrṣṭya) of generosity that the mind (citta) goes from the first dhyāna up to the dhyāna of the absorption of the cessation (nirodhasamāpatti).174 How is [generosity] a support? When the bodhisattva gives a gift to a person deep in meditation, he says to himself: “Because this person is practicing meditation and absorption (samāpatti), I am making the offering with good intention (viśuddhacittā). What can I do now to replace the meditation [from which I have just distracted him]? ” Immediately, he concentrates his own mind and practices meditation. - When the bodhisattva gives to a poor person (daśā), he recalls the previous existences of this poor person [and says to himself]: “It is because he has committed errors (ākula), because he has not concentrated his mind (ecūcita) or practiced meditation that he is at present (khaṇaṃ) poor.” As a result of that, [the bodhisattva] himself tries to practice the good, to fix his attention, and he enters into the dhyāna and the absorptions.

[Mahāsudassana-sutta].174

This story of Sudassana is also summarized in Dīgha, II, p. 156; III, p. 265, 290; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 410. They include the four dhyānas, the four dīrṣṭya-samāpatti and the sūryā-vad-vadhāvādā-vadhāvādā-patti.

172 These are fully studied below, chap. XXVIII.
173 These are the nine upekkhāphala listed in Dīgha, II, p. 156; III, p. 265, 290; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 410. They 174 The Mahāsudassana-sutta, of which the present passage is a somewhat variant version, is a separate sutra in the Pāli Dīgha, II, p. 169-199 (tr. Rh. D., II, p. 198-232), whereas the Chinese Dhīrgālāma and related sources corporate it into the Mahāparinibbaṇa Sūtra: cf. Teh’ang a han, T 1, no. 2, k. 3, p. 218-248; Fp pan ni yuam king, T 5, k. 2, p. 169c-171a; Pan ni yuam king, T 5, k. 2, p. 185b-186c; Ta ni pan’ a king, T 7, k. 2 and 3, p. 200c-203a; Ken pen chouo... tsa che, T 1451, k. 37, p. 397a-394b. – However, an independent version of the Mahāsudassana is in the Tch'ang a han, T 26, no. 68, k. 14, p. 531b-618c; and Ta teh'ang kiou king, T 45, p. 831a seq.

The story of Sudassana is also summarized in Dīgha, II, p. 146-157; Sanyutta, III, p. 144; Pāli Jātaka, I, p.
391-393.

173 Sudarśana is here rendered as Hi kien (30 nd 9; 147); elsewhere as Chan kien (30 and 9; 147) or Miao kien (38 and 4; 147). – This cakravartin Mahāsudarśana belongs to the royal lineage of Mahāsudarśana from which the Buddha came: cf. Dipavamsa, III, v. 8; Mahāvamsa, I, v. 5; Mahāvamsa, I, p. 348; Mahāvṛttapati, no. 3570; Teh’ang a han, T 1, k. 22, p. 149b8; Ken pen chouo... p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 1, p. 101c27. – In mythical times, he reigned in Kuivaṭṭi, in the actual location of Kuinagara. This city and its splendid palaces are fully described in the various versions of the Mahāsudassana-sutta mentioned above; see also Divyāvatana, p. 227; Divyāvadāna, p. 227; P’o p’o cha, T 1545, k. 76, p. 395c. The Dhammapāṭāda was built following to the model of the cakravartin’s city; cf.
ourselves.” Thereupon, they set to work together to build a palace (prāsāda) made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamaya); they planted rows of trees (vyūpyapānakā)176 made of the seven jewels and built pools (pākṣīrṇī)177 made of the seven jewels. In this palace they built eighty-four thousand floors (dīvākārā)178 made of the seven jewels; on each floor was a bed (puruvamaka) made of the seven jewels; cushions of different colors (mitravarnopadhāna) were placed at the two ends of the bed; they had banners (dhvaja) and flags (patādā) hung and incense (dhipāsa) was spread on the ground.

When all was ready, they said to the great king: “We would like to accept this Dharma-palace (dharmanuprāsāda) with its precious trees and its pools.” The great king accepted by remaining silent; then he thought: “I must not be the first to live in this new palace and devote myself to pleasure; I am going to look for holy people (saucena), irāmanas and brhāmanas to be the first to enter the ceremonies (pūjā); only afterwards will I myself live there.” Then he joined the holy men who were the first to enter into the precious palace, filled with offerings of all kinds (nāmaśvādhaṭṭṭā) and splendid accessories (parikāra).

When these men had gone, the king entered the precious palace,180 ascended to the floor of gold (suvarnākāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the silver bed (rāpyapānakā) and, meditating on generosity, eliminated the five hindrances (pākṣamavaraṇa), concentrated his six organs (sadyātyāvatana), swept away the six sense objects (sadbhātyāvatana), experienced joy (priti) and happiness (sukha) and entered into the first dhyāna (prathamadhīyāna). – Then he ascended to the floor of silver (rāpyakāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the golden bed (suvarnapurānakā) and entered the second dhyāna (dhiyāvyādha). – Then he ascended to the floor of silver (vaiḍīryakāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the crystal bed (spatikakārapurānakā) and entered into the third dhyāna (triṣṇaḥdīyāna). Finally, he ascended to the crystal floor (spatikakārapurānakā), sat down on the ceryl bed (vaiḍīryapurānakā) and entered into the fourth dhyāna (caturthadhīyāna); he spent three months in solitary meditation.181

The queen Yu niu pao (Strīratna)182 and her eighty-four thousand followers (upasthāṭā) who had all adorned their bodies with the White Pearl jewel (maniratna) came to the great king and said: “For a long time you have been averse to visits from your family and we have come to ask why.” The king answered: “Sisters (bhaginī), you should change your feelings and be friends, not enemies, to me.” In tears, queen Strīratna said: “Why does the great king call me ‘sister’? Surely he has a hidden motive; I would like to know the meaning. Why do he order us to be his friends and not his enemies?” The king replied: “For [152c] me, you have been the cause of rebirths; together we give ourselves up to pleasure; while giving me joy, you are my enemies. If you could wake up [to the doctrine of] impermanence (aniyata), know that the body is like a magic show (māyā), cultivate merit (punya), cultivate the good (kaśāya) and give up the satisfactions of desire (kāma), you would be my friends.” The women agreed:

“We will obey your orders with respect.” Having spoken thus, they took their leave and went away.

When the women had gone, the king ascended to the floor of gold (suvarnākāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the silver bed (rāpyapānakā) and practiced the absorption of loving-kindness (matrīsamādhi). – Then he went to the floor of silver (rāpyakāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the golden bed (suvarnapurānakā) and practiced the absorption of compassion (karunāsamādhi); – He went up to the floor of beryl (vaiḍīryakāṭṭāgāra), sat down on the bed of crystal (spatikakārapurānakā) and practiced the concentration of joy (muditāsamādhi). – He went up to the floor of crystal (spatikakārapurānakā), sat down on the bed of beryl (vaiḍīryapurānakā) and practiced the concentration of equanimity (upekṣāsamādhi).183

This is how generosity gives rise to the virtue of meditation in bodhisattvas.

6. Generosity and the virtue of wisdom.

How does generosity give rise to the virtue of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā)?

1) When the bodhisattva practices generosity, he knows that this generosity will necessarily have its reward (vipakṣaḥpala) and he is free of doubts (sambhava, vickītā); he destroys wrong views (mithiyāceti) and ignorance (avidyā). This generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom.

2) When the bodhisattva cultivates generosity, he knows clearly that an immoral (duḥkha) person who strikes, beats or imprisons, but who practices generosity, nevertheless has broken the law to obtain wealth, is reborn among the elephants (hastin), horses (aśva) and oxen (go); while taking on an animal existence (tiryagyosanamsabhāna) where he is burdened down with loads, beaten, fettered and used as a mount, he will always have good shelter, be well-fed and will be respected (gurukrāṇa) by men who will take good care of him.

He knows that an evil bad-tempered man, but one who practices generosity even though it be for tortuous and indirect intentions, will be reborn among the nāgas where he will have a palace made of the seven jewels, good food and beautiful women.

176 Seven rows of palm trees (tulā); cf. Dīgha, II, p. 171-172.
177 These pools were placed between the rows of palm trees (tālāntarikā) at a distance of a hundred bow-lengths (dharmamūuta); each pool had four staircases (stupāna) and two balustrades (vedikā); of which the upper steps (stambha), the crosspieces (āci) and the handrails (asamā) were of different metals; cf. Dīgha, II, p. 178-179.
178 For these stories (lalāgūra), see Dīgha, II, p. 182.
179 The inauguration of palaces was reserved for monastics, f. Dīgha, II, p. 185.
180 According to Dīgha, II, p. 186-187, the king first practiced the four dhyānas and the four brāhmaṇavāhāras and only after that did he receive the queen. On the other hand, in the Mpp, the king first practiced the four dhyānas then repeated the requests of the queen; after her departure, he devoted himself to the practice of the four brāhmaṇavāhāras.
181 This manner of practicing the four dhyānas is described in similar words in Dīgha, II, p. 189-195.
182 Compare the visit of queen Subhadrā in Dīgha, II, p. 189-195.
He knows that a proud man, but one who practices generosity even though it be ostentatiously (abhimāna), is reborn among the golden-winged birds (garude), where he will always have power (asivarṇa), possess the philosopher’s stone (cintilāmaṇi) in place of a ring (kavyāra), succeed in having all his needs satisfied, suffer nothing contrary to his wishes, and can manage everything.

He knows that a minister (anātiya) who earns money out of people and plunder them of their goods illegally, but one who practices generosity, is reborn among the Kousi chen (asura) where he is the demon Kieou p’an tsh’a (Kumbhāṇḍa), who enjoys himself by carrying out multiple transformations (paripūζa) on the five outer objects (paliṣṭabhāyvatana).

He knows that a very ill-tempered and wicked man who loves good wine and good cheer, but one who practices generosity, is reborn among the Ye tsh’u, the terrestrial yakṣas (bhūṃya), where he always has varied pleasures, fine music (udya) and good food (ṭīḥra).

He knows that an unfeeling and violent man, but one who who satisfies by gifts [his army, for example] his chariots (rathu), his cavalry (aśva) and his infantry (pattika), is reborn among the heavenly yakṣas (vihīṇasyaṃkṣa), where he possesses great power (mahābala) and moves like the wind.

He knows that a jealous man who loves to dispute but who can give fine houses (bhīṃya), another a garment (vastra) and food (ṭīḥra), will be reborn among the yakṣhas who fly about in palaces and temples where they enjoy all kinds of pleasures and material advantages.

What is that the bodhisattva knows completely when he cultivates generosity. Therefore, generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom in bodhisattvas.

Further, when one gives food (bhūjana), one obtains strength (bala), beauty (varṇa), long life (āyus), happiness (sukha) and good servants (apasthuḷa). – By giving clothing (vastra), from birth one knows modesty and honor (bhūtapatrāpya), power (anubhāva), beauty (prāśa) and comfort of body and mind (khyacittasvākha). – By giving a house (gṛha), one obtains a palace made of the seven jewels (saptaratnamayaḥṇa), and one possesses the enjoyment of the five pleasurable objects (paliṣṭabhāγuna) automatically (svatāt). – By giving a well (kūpa), a pool (tadīga), a spring (udhīra), water (udaka) or any kind of juices, at birth one obtains freedom from hunger (kṣudha) and thirst (piṇḍha) and the five pleasurable objects (paliṣṭabhāγuna) are assured. – By giving a bridge (setu), a ship (nau) or shoes (upamāla), at birth one obtains a whole set of chariots and horses (rathāhvasambhāra). – By giving a pleasure-garden (drīma), one gets to be an eminent servant of refuge for all (asvārāja), and one receives [one’s] share of beauty of body (khyaprasādha), joyous mind (cittasukha) and freedom from sadness. These are the various benefits obtained by generosity in human existences.

The person who cultivates (bhīṃya) merits (punya) by his gifts, who abhors the conditioned (samskṛta) and conditioning (samskṛta) life, is reborn in the Cāturmahātārjika heaven. – The person who, by his gifts, increases the care (pitā) for his parents, his uncles and aunts and his brothers and sisters, the person who, without anger (dveṣa) or hatred (pratigṛha), abhors arguments (kalaka) and is unhappy to see people who are arguing, is a person who obtains rebirth among the Trāyayatrīṣ, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarāti and Paramiṁiśvalavatārīn gods. The bodhisattvāna distinguishes all these gifts, and this is the way generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom in the bodhisattva.

If a person gives with detached mind (asaktaṣa), out of distaste for the world (lokārṇve), with the view of the happiness of nirvāṇa, this is the generosity of an arhat or pratyekabuddha. – If a person gives with the view [of attaining] buddhahood and for the welfare of beings, this is the generosity of a bodhisattva. The bodhisattvāna knows all these gifts, and this is how generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom.

Moreover, when the bodhisattva gives, he reflects (manasikarot) on the true nature (bhūtālakāna) of the three elements [of the gift, namely, the donor, the recipient and the gift given], as has been said above (p. 724F). In this way, generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom.

Finally, omniscience (sarva-bha), the prime quality [of the Buddhas], takes its origin in generosity. Thus, the thousand [latest] Buddhas, at the moment when they [each in turn] first produced the mind of Bodhi (prthagāmbodhikicchottazākāle), were in the process of offering something to the Buddha [who was their contemporary]: one offered a lotus (upala), another a garment (cīrva), a third a tooth-pick (dantaśītha); and it is by giving this gift that they produce the mind of Bodhi. These different gifts prove that generosity gives rise to the virtue of wisdom in the bodhisattva.
CHAPTER XXI: DISCIPLINE OR MORALITY (p. 770F)

[153b] Sūtra: The virtue of discipline must be fulfilled by basing oneself on the non-existence of sin, wrong-doing, and its opposite (Sīlaṇḍramūdā pāravajjirā ṅāryamāṇāppattiyamāṇādīyaṃ upādāya).

I. DEFINITION OF DISCIPLINE

Śūtra: Sīla (discipline), in the language of Ta’ín, is called innate goodness (prakṛtikauśalya). Wholeheartedly following the good Path (kaśālamārga) without allowing any faults (pramāda) is what is called sīla. Practicing the good (kaśa), whether one has taken the precepts (samādānīśīla) or not, is called sīla.

In brief (sāmasātah), the [ethical] discipline of body and speech (kīryavatīsamapara) is of eight kinds: 1) abstaining from killing (pratītadānavari), 2) from theft (aṭṭhādāna), 3) from forbidden love (kāmānihāryacara), 4) from falsehood (mṛṣāvada), 5) from slander (sūṣṭyavada), 6) from harmful speech (pṛsavādā), 7) from idle gossip (samākhataraprālpaya), 8) from the use of liquor (madhyaparaṇa) and to resort to pure ways of life (parissuddhaśī). These are the characteristics of discipline (śīlaṃśītas).

II. VARIOUS KINDS OF MORALITY

By means of lower morality (khaṇḍhaśīla), one is reborn among humans (manuṣya); by middling morality (madhyaparaṇaśīla), one is reborn among the six classes of gods of the desire realm (kāmadhātuśādheva); by superior morality (prajñāśīla) one becomes through the four dhyānas and the four absorptions of emptiness (dhyānasamāpatti) and one is reborn among the pure forms (bhuddhavatīsadeva) of the form realm (rupadhātu) and the formless realm (āriyadhātu).

Superior morality (prajñāśīla) is of three kinds: 1) as a result of lesser pure morality (khaṇḍhaparissuddhaśīla), one becomes arhat; 2) by medium pure morality (madhyaparissuddhaśīla), one becomes pratyekabuddha; 3) by higher pure morality (prajñāparissuddhaśīla), one obtains buddhahood. Detachment (avastig), disinterestedness (avārya), absence of transgression (abheda) and absence of defect (avālaśa), so lauded by the holy men (ārya) [in the cultivation of morality], constitute the superior purity.

If one has loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇa), if one wants to save beings and if one understands the true nature (sāvyatākaraṇa) of the precepts, the mind is completely disinterested (ātitaṣīkṣaṇa): observing the precepts in these conditions is going directly to buddhahood: this is what is called the morality that realizes the unsurpassed state of the Buddhas.

III. BENEFITS OF MORALITY.

Karmavibhanga, p. 33. These eight precepts are repeated and developed in the various rules (prātimoksa) of the “pledged discipline.” The Mātārānsu thinks it proper to add, from now on, the moral pledge to resort exclusively to pure ways of life (parissuddhaśī), i.e., to avoid dealing in arms, in living beings, in flesh, intoxicating drinks, poisons, etc.

190 Cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 247, or Karmavibhanga, p. 33, where it is said that killing, etc., practiced and repeated, leads to hell, to an animal or ghost rebirth (pratītadāna sevita bhāhikāyo nīryaṃsamapattaya bhavati, tīryagamanaṃ samapattaya ‘pi bhavati); those are the three “bad destinies”.

191 The Visuddhimagga, p. 13, has an entire paragraph on the various degrees of morality. “Lower” is the morality based on a mediocre enthusiasm (chanda), intention (cīna), energy (vīrya) or insight (vinīmaṇa); the morality that pursues a goal of fame (uosvahaṃ); the morality that is aimed at exalting oneself and putting down someone else (uoṭikāṃsana-parāvambahā); the morality that results from the desire for profit or wealth (bhavabhoga). “Middling” is the morality that seeks to gather reward for good actions (puṇītapakānaṃ); worldiy (lokaśa), the morality that is aimed at individual liberation (atulo vinoṃha). “Superior” is the morality that results from the spirit of duty and holiness (kattabham ev ‘idam it āriyabhāṣa); supermundane (alokātā) morality, morality that aims to assure the salvation of all (sabbaatvamokkha).

These three moralities are rewarded differently in the human world and in the heavenly realms described above: cf. Taṭṭai, I, p. 517F, 605-607F.

192 The Greater Vehicle insists above all on the altruistic nature of morality. See Hobgōrīn, Bosatsukai, p. 142.
The person who wants great benefits must keep the precepts firmly as if he were guarding a precious treasure (kostya) or defending his life (klayajivita). Why? Just as everything (sakaladarsya) on this great earth (mahayathiv) that has form subsists by being supported (tivritya) by the great earth, so morality is the seat (taspada, adhiyathmā) of all good dharmas (kaśyadharma). Just as it would be futile to try to walk without feet, fly without wings or make a crossing without a boat, so it is futile to want to obtain the great fruits (of the Path) without morality.

The person who has rejected morality, even if he is an ascetic in the mountains (parvatapataripravina), eating fruits (phala) and grasses (osadhī), is different from the animals (tiragogni). Some men have as their rule of conduct the custom of swallowing (153c) nothing but water (udaka), milk (kṣūtra) or air (dīrūma);193 they cut their hair, if it is long, keep only a little bit of hair on their head; they wear the yellow robes (klāṣraya) of the Buddha, while they wear white robes (āṅgikabharari) or of tree bark (vallkaladharva);194 in winter (hemanta), they go in the water; in summer (grama), they roast themselves at the fire;195 they throw themselves over cliffs;196 they bathe three times per day;197 they make repeated offerings to the fire (agniparicarya),198 with many sacrifices (yajña) and magical formulas (maṇtra), they carry out ascetical practices (dāksikacarya). But because they have no morality (all these efforts) are vain and futile. Other people, living in great palaces or great houses (gṛha), wearing fine clothes and eating exquisite food but capable of exercising morality, succeed in being born in a good place and win the fruits of the Path (mārgaphala). Whether one is noble (pranita) or lowly (klīta), small (bhavasva) or great (mahārat), provided that one observes pure morality, one always obtains great benefits. But if one violates morality, neither wealth nor humbleness, neither greatness nor smallness, will allow one to be reborn at will (yunahkānuma) in the blessed abodes (sukhavātra).

Furthermore, the immoral (dhihi) man is like a clear pool (prasannapadgā) filled with venomous snakes (āśīvīsa); one does not bathe there. He is like a tree bearing beautiful flowers (parinikṣa) who, denying the precepts of the moral law, believe that purity consists only of purely external things (paribhāṣa);199 from a high-scented tree (māṇicandana) one does not bathe there. He is like a cow, thinking himself pure, standing in the water in order to wash his body (gandhapativa) and excrete his body (vittakmapati) in coarse cloths (kaṭṭaragā), in crude clothes (accūkikāla), with fine body (ahīrtirakāka), learned (parihāvīta) and wise (baṅghūrita), the man who does not conform to morality does not know the loving-kindness and compassionate mind (maññīkāraṇḍīvīcita) [of the saint]. As a stanza says:

Nobility without knowledge (jīlana) is a failure;
Knowledge increased by pride (abhīmāna) is a failure also;
The person who has taken the precepts but who violates them
Is bound for complete failure here and in the beyond.

Despite his poverty or lower rank, the person who observes morality is superior to wealthy people and noblemen who live in immorality.

The perfume of flowers (puṣpagandha) and of the Tagara does not spread very far; the perfume of discipline spreads throughout the ten directions.200

192 In this passage the Mppī is arguing against the views of certain brāhmaṇas and śramaṇas (mainly the Nigraṇthas and the Āṭiyakas) who, denying the precepts of the moral law, believe that purity consists only of purely external practices, such as food, hair-dressing, clothing, ascetic practices or ritual actions. Before his conversion, the Buddha himself had participated in this training and practiced - without success – the external mortifications. He soon determined that these austerities did not lead to “the supremamundane qualities of the noble knowledge of noble vision” (māññabhagaman uttaraṃ manussadhammā almayuṭaṃdassasatvam) and he condemned them later in many sūtras: cf. Dīgha, I, p. 168 seq.201 Majjhima, I, p. 77 seq., 238, 342; II, p. 161; Tīrīṇa a han, T 1, no. 25, k. 16, p. 105; Tsaing yi a han, T 125, k. 23, p. 670c-672a; Lalita, p. 248-250 (tr. Foucault, p. 214-216).

193 Without listing all the ascetic practices condemned by the Buddha in the texts cited, the Mppī limits itself to mentioning the most characteristic.

194 Dīgha, I, p. 166. “He eats vegetables (sūla), wild rice (nīlotika), milk (daddula), the water plant (kutcika), the fine powder adhering to seeds of rice inside the spike (kuṇa), the scum from boiled rice (rīçūna), the starch of oily seeds (pūṭākā), grass (rīna), cow manure (goyāna), forest roots and fruits (vanamālaphala), windfalls (pusvataphala).”

195 This passage is to be taken literally because according to the Majjhima, I, p. 387 and the Lalita, p. 248, certain ascetics vow (vrata) to live like cows, gazelles, dogs, wild bears, monkeys or elephants.

196 Lalita, p. 249. They drink hot water (uoðulodaka), rice water (tamasolodaka), filtered through felt (patiyāvittakāmbalika), boiled in a cauldron (ōthāpīnū). . . they drink milk (piyūsa), curds (saddha), better (sarūpā). . . they drink smoke (dhammāōna).

197 Lalita, p. 249. They have one, two, three, four, five, six, seven or more garments; they remain naked; . . . they wear their hair long, braided and piled up in a crest; . . . they smear their bodies with dust, feces, mud; they wear animal skins, human skulls, hair, claws, a lower garment made only of bones. . . they wear ashes, colored marks, reddish garments, tridents; they shave their heads, etc.

198 By practicing the paścimottāra or the austerity of the five fires: cf. Tueng yi a han, T 125, p. 671b; Lalita, p. 249; Sūttālāmkīra, tr. Huber, p. 48.

199 In a passage that the Mppī is discussing (153c), the Buddha explains how the person who observes morality always obtains great benefits. But if one violates morality, neither wealth nor humbleness, neither greatness nor smallness, will allow one to be reborn at will (yunahkānuma) in the blessed abodes (sukhavātra).

200 A practice known as adalombhana that consists of bathing three times a day: cf. Dīgha, I, p. 167; Samyutta, I, p. 182; Anguttara, i, p. 296. The Udakorakhasa form a class of ascetics: Majjhima, I, p. 281; Samyutta, IV, p. 312; Anguttara, V, p. 263.

201 On the brāhmaṇical cult of Fire, see Majjhima, I, p. 32; Anguttara, V, p. 263; Dhammapadathī, II, p. 232.

202 Literally, the perfume of flowers and the scent of woods, but Mou liang, I, p. 75; 168 “scent of woods” assumes an original Sanskrit Tagara (cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 248); this is a highly-scented tree known as Tabernaemontana coronaria (see above, Traité, I, p. 600F, n. 2). The present comparisons are borrowed from a stanza of the Gandharasutta (Anguttara, I, p. 226; Dhammapada, I, p. 54; Dhammapadathī, I, p. 422; Jātaka, III, p. 291; Milinda, p. 333; Kośa, III, p. 163; Sanskrit Udānavarga, p. 71; Tibetan Udānavarga, p. 26): Na prappragandho paññam ati, Na candaman tagaraṃ mallika vā; sata ṣa ca gandho paññam ati, sabbā disa sappuriso purīti. In Sanskrit: Na puṣpagandhoh pratīṣṭanam eti
The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).

The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).

The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).

The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).

The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).

The moral person (śīlavat) is full of happiness (sukha); he is famed (kṛitiśāhā) far and wide; he is esteemed by gods and men; in the present lifetime he obtains all kinds of happiness and, if he wants to find wealth, nobility and long life (dīghāyu) among gods and men, he finds it easily. When morality is pure, one finds everything one wishes.

Moreover, the moral man who sees the immoral man struggling with all kinds of problems – punishments, imprisonment, searches, despoliation – and who knows himself to be sheltered from such troubles, experiences great joy (muddāt) thereby. On the other hand, seeing the good person (sattvaputra) obtain fame (kṛtī), glory (yaśas) and happiness (sukha), he says to himself: “If he can obtain fame, I also can have some.”

At the end of his life (śīvāyat), after death he will be reborn among the gods and will then attain buddhahood. There is nothing that the moral man will not obtain; as for the immoral man, he loses everything. At the end of his life (some.)

In great sickness (yudhā), discipline is a remedy (bhātājya); In great terror (bhīṣāna), it is a guardian (yāla); In the darkness of death (marana), it is a lamp (pradīpa); In evil rebirths (durgart), it is the girder of a bridge; In the ocean of death (maravanasamudra), it is a great ship (nau).
The immoral person is not respected (satkṛta) by people; his house is like a cemetery (śmaśāna) into which people do not go; he loses all his virtues (vāsu); he is reborn among the gods; in the presence of the Buddhas of the ten directions (asiṣādīg buddha), he enters the path of the Threefold Vehicle (ṣaṅmattra) and attains liberation (vimokṣa). Many wrong views (mithyādṛṣṭā) disappear after taking the precepts.

Furthermore, without going forth from the world (jyavatitā), the person who observes the rules of discipline will also be reborn among the gods. The person whose discipline (śīla) is pure (pariśuddha) and who practices meditative stabilization (saṃādhi) and wisdom (prajñā) seeks to free himself from the misfortunes of old age (jārā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maranā): he will necessarily realize this wish (pranidhāna).²⁶⁶

Even though the moral man has no weapons (āvyuddā), wicked people do not attack him. Morality is a treasure (vītta) that cannot be lost; it is a parent (jīhāti) who does not abandon you even after death; it is an adornment (ālamkāra) that surpasses the seven jewels (saptaratna). This is why morality must be guarded as if one were defending the life of the body (kāya/vitā) or as if one were watching over a precious object. The immoral man endures ten thousand sufferings; he is like the poor man who broke his vase and lost his treasures. He is like a false pearl (pariṣuddha); he is like a lotus that gives people no pleasure to see; filled with evil thoughts (mithyā), his happiness (āsukha) is impure: it is as though madmen had dressed among real pearls, like a castor-bean tree (alaṅkāra) that surpasses the seven jewels (saptaratna). This is why morality must be guarded.

IV. DISADVANTAGES OF IMMORALITY

[154b] Moreover, seeing the punishments suffered by the immoral man, the moral man must try to observe discipline carefully (ekacittena). What are the punishments of the immoral person?

²⁶³ In the Tchong king siuan tsa p'i yu (l.c.) the man began to dance with the vase and dropped it; in the Pāli Jātaka, he threw it up in the air and finally let it fall.

²⁶⁴ Morality, under various titles, is profitable to the lay person and to the monastic: the lay person who aspires to heaven (svarga) is reborn among the gods; the monastic who practices the Path in its three essential elements, śīla (discipline), saṃādhi (meditative stabilization) and prajñā (wisdom) will escape from old age, sickness and death and will attain nivāṇa.

²⁶⁵ The talākā is a wooden card that allows its holder to participate in a vote or in the distribution of food; it is a sort of method of supervision. To vote is called talākāṃ grāṇāti, “to hold one’s ‘ticket’”: cf. Vinaya, I, p. 117; II, p. 199, 205; Aṣṭigutā, I, p. 24.
CHAPTER XXII: THE NATURE OF MORALITY (p. 782F)*206

FIRST PART: GENERAL MORALITY

Question: - Knowing the various marvelous fruits (nānāvidhaguṇavipāka) of morality, what is its nature (lakṣāṇa)?

Answer: - The nature of morality is the cessation of sin (apāca), wrong-doing (paścātma) and its non-reappearance. The suppression of sins of body and speech (kāyavākśprajñātāsaṃsāra), whether it be the making of a resolution (vīpūpa), a verbal promise (vagukri) or a pledge before a third person (prataraṇa samāhanam), constitutes the nature of morality (illalakṣāṇa).

I. Abstaining from murder.

1. Required conditions for murder.287

1.1. Sin (murder, theft, lust, falsehood, drunkenness) and the state of sin resulting assumes three things:

1.2. A mental action (manaskārman) consisting of an evil volition (āsaktheseva), the resolution to kill, to lie, etc.

1.3. A bodily action (kāyakārman) or vocal action (vāḳkārman) – a murderous act or false speech – derived from the preceding volition and which manifests it to others. Because of this advertising, it is called “information” (vijñāpati).

1.4. A substance derived from the five great elements (upādāyuvāpī), substantial but invisible, projected by the bodily or vocal action, which transforms the person into a murderer or a liar. Since this substance, although it is material, is invisible and does not make itself known to others, it is called “non-information” (avisajñāpati).

In a way, it is a perpetual action that classifies the person within the framework of guilt and continues to exist within him even when the person is inactive. This state of sin, understood in a material way, is ended only by death, by formal renunciation (śīla) of sin, and by physical or vocal actions directly opposed to its nature.

1.5. Morality consists of abstaining from sin and its sequel. But abstaining from sin does not have the same value in all people. There can be a fortuitous and purely negative abstention: e.g., a person does not sin because he has not for sworn it by a public statement, or as long as it has not been destroyed by a physical or vocal action contrary to its nature. An upavedā (layperson) commits murder, a bhikṣu, a bhikṣuṇī, an upāsaka, an upāsikā, an āśrama or a bhikkhu. This quality of upāsaka, etc., continues to exist and to develop in him as long as he has not forsworn it by a public statement, or as long as it has not been destroyed by a physical or vocal action contrary to its nature. An upāsika who commits murder, a bhikṣu who lacks chastity ceases to be an upāsaka or bhikkhu, because these faults are directly opposed to their discipline.

Clearly, discipline as it has been described here can be possessed only by people living in the realm of desire. Does this mean that the gods of the form realm and the formless realm as well as the saints free of all stains do not possess any kind of discipline? No, and this leads the scholars to distinguish three new kinds of discipline: 1) the discipline of rules (prātimokṣa) in all religious states; 2) the discipline produced by heavenly dhārmika, the morality of rūpadhātu; 3) pure (anokṣa) discipline which arises from the Path, pure morality.

The theories summarized here which are the basis for the laborious studies of the Mppū are those of the Sāvāntavādins-Vaibhāsikas; they are explained in detail in Kośa, IV and in the introduction of the Karṇasiddhiḥpanācarāṇa. They are not accepted by all the Buddhist schools. Thus the Saṅruttikas deny the existence of bhīvijñā at a material substance. For them, sins or renunciation of sins (śīla) induce a subtle change (ākāśapaṭāvakāśasāra) and it is precisely of this transformation that the quality of sinner or of monastic consists (cf. Kośa, IV, p. 22; Karṇasiddhiḥpanācarāṇa, p. 88-89).

287 According to traditional Buddhism, five conditions must be present for there to be murder to be murder. They are explained in the Daśākṣāntakarmapathan, attributed to the Kanjur (Mā, XXXIII, 39 and XIV, 23) to Alavaghā, found in a Nepalese manuscript published by S. Lévi, Ante d’Alavaghā, Ja, Oct.-Dec. 1929, p. 268-269:

Tatra kathan prādayātābhavati, prāṇī ca bhavati, prāṇāsāṃjñī ca bhavati, vādihakṣatāma ca bhavati, upākramam ca harati, jīvātābhavayaupayāyati: eñāca [saṃkhārād] prābhavati: “How is one a murderer? There is a living being, one knows that there is a living being, one has the intention to kill, one proceeds to attack, one deprives it of life: these are the five things needed for there to be murder.”
2. The vow not to kill.

Sometimes a person pledges publicly to observe morality (śīla) and expresses his resolve (cittopadesa) aloud: “From today on, I will no longer kill living beings”; sometimes, without moving or speaking, he just ratifies his resolution by means of a personal oath: “From today on, I will no longer kill living beings”: this is called the morality of abstaining from murder (prātimokṣaśuddhiprativiratiśīla).

This teaching is repeated and completed by Buddhaghosa in Samaññatthaka, I, p. 69-70; Aṭṭhaṅkīlīni, p. 97 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 129): Tassa paticca sambhārā honti: pāṇo, pāṇasahatthi, vedhākacittam, upapakāno, tena maranavati: Chi payogī: sathakkho, ānattiko, nissaggiko, tāthāvato, vijñāmo, itthāmo yo, ti: “Five things are necessary for murder: a living being, the awareness that a sentient being is there, the intention to kill, attack and the death that results. There are six ways of realizing it: with one’s own hand, by instigation, by weapons, by stratagem, by trickery or by supernatural means.” See also Kosā, IV, p. 153; Tibetan Karṇaprajñapti, Mdo 62, chap. XI, Hydro, Manuel, p. 461; Bigandet, Gauduma, p. 417.

208 On the nature of this bodily vijñapti, matter derived from the great elements, see Kosā, IV, p. 4; Karmasuddhiprajsthaka, p. 66-68.

209 Murder assumes the destruction essentially of the vital organ (sīvandhiṣṭha), which has been discussed in Kosā, II, p. 105, 123; IV, p. 154.

210 The solemn statements in the course of the refuge (saranalāyana) and ordination (upasampadā) ceremonies will be described in the second part of the present chapter. But in the preliminary note, we have seen that abstaining from sins may be derived from a simple inner resolution independent of any statement. It seems that at the beginning, the practitioners of the Greater Vehicle “took the precepts” by means of personal oath (cf. Ḥobogirīṇī, According to some, this abstention from murder is sometimes good (kusala), sometimes neutral [i.e., undefined from the moral point of view (avyākṛta)].

3. Why abstention from murder is sometimes neutral.211

Question. – In the Abhidharma it is said that every moral discipline (suvilāsanaśvara) is good (kusala): why is it said here that it is sometimes neutral (avyākṛta)?

Answer. – It is in the Kātyāyāṇaputra Abhidharma that it is said that it is always good; but in the other Abhidharmas, it is said that abstention from murder is sometimes good, sometimes neutral. Why? If abstention from murder is always good, the person who abstains from killing would be like a practitioner of the Buddhist path (lābhamārīgapuruṣa) and would never fall into the bad destinies (ādurgati). This is why there can be the case where abstaining from murder is neutral; being neutral, it does not involve any fruit of retribution (vipiṇḍapahāla) and therefore does not lead to rebirth among the gods (deva) or men (manuṣyā).

Question. – One does not fall into the hells because the morality of abstention is neutral, but rather because there had been, in addition, the production of an evil mind (dustacitotpāda).

155a Answer. – 1) Abstention from murder produces an undefined merit (upramāṇakusala) because, whether there is action (kriya) or abstention (kriya), a merit (puṇya) always results. If one commits a slight error (kaṇḍapratibaddha) and would never fall into the bad destinies (ādurgati).

2) Moreover, there are people who pledge to observe the precepts and who limit themselves to formulating mentally (citena) a personal oath, saying: “From today on, I will no longer kill living beings.” Such an abstention is sometimes neutral (avyākṛta).

4. The “realm” of abstention from killing.

Question. – To which realm (abhūta) does abstention from murder belong?

Bosatsuksai, p. 142); later, they had a separate ceremony, otherwise closely copied from the ritual of the Lesser Vehicle (cf. Bodhisattvatappātikāsūtra, ed. N. Dutt, IHQ, VII, 1951, p. 259-286).

111 If L[amotte] correctly understands the problem studied here, three cases should be distinguished:

a. Pure and simple abstention from murder, not inspired by any elevated motivation, has no moral value; it is neither good nor bad, but neutral (avyākṛta).

b. The abstention from murder that comes from a resolution, from a formal pledge (sāmalānīna) but which is tainted by a wrong notion, is not capable of directly and absolutely opposing sin. Thus, infidels (bhūsa) can possess the morality of pledge, but as they remain in the false view of existence (bhavasamāvātā), they are incapable of rejecting, of absolving from sin. Therefore it is not really good. Cf. Kosā, IV, p. 48-50.

c. The abstention from murder to which the Buddhists pledge themselves by the Prātimokṣa directly counteracts sin and merits being qualified as good (kusala).
Answer. – In the Kātyāyinīputra Abhidharma it is said that all morality of pledge (samādānasamvara) belongs to the desire realm (kāmadhūtivasāra); but the other Abhidharmas say that it belongs to the desire realm or that it belongs to no realm (anavavacara). To speak truthfully, it is of three kinds: it belongs either to the desire realm (kāmadhūtivasāra), or to the form realm (rūpadhūtivasāra), or to the pure realm (anavacara).

The killing of living beings (pratātātpaṇa) involves the desire realm; abstention from killing, corresponding to it, is in the desire realm. It is only the absence of killing in the form realm or the absence of killing in the pure (anurava) realm which, by pushing it away (vipakaśṭavāt), constitute the true morality of abstention from killing.

Moreover, there are people who, from birth onwards, without pledging to observe the precepts, have come to abhor killing; sometimes good (kuśala), sometimes neutral (avyakta), this [abstention from killing] is described as undefined.

5. The nature of abstention from killing.

This abstention from killing is neither mind (citta), nor mental event (caitta), nor associated with mind (cittasamprayukta); sometimes it arises with the mind (cittasahaja), sometimes it does not arise with the mind. In the Kātyāyinīputra Abhidharma, it is said that abstention from killing is a bodily or vocal action (kāyavākkaran), sometimes with derived matter (upāśītyarūpa), sometimes without derived matter; sometimes concomitant with mind (cittamārvarin), sometimes non-concomitant with mind. It is not the reward (vipāka) of actions carried out in previous existences (pārvajanmanakaran). It is of two kinds, i.e., practice (bhāvanā) or intended to be practiced (bhāvītavya), and realization (sāksāttāra) or intended to be realized (sāksātkartavya) ...

[The moral discipline] of ordinary people (bāla) and the āryas is a material dharma (rūpadhūma), sometimes visible (sāndarśana), sometimes invisible (anāśraya); sometimes offering resistance (sāpratigha), sometimes non-resistant (apratigha); it is a dharma that involves retribution (savīpaka) and involves fruit (sāphala); it is a defiled (ātmara) conditioned (samskṛta) dharma which has others beneath it (sottara); it is not an associated cause (samprayuktaḥkhetas). These are the categories that constitute the morality of abstention from murder.

Question. – In the Noble eightfold Path (āryaṣaṭṭhīmārūga), morality (citta) also consists of the banning of the killing of living beings.\(^\text{212}\) Why do you speak only of the morality of abstention from murder which involves retribution (vipāka) and defilement (āsava)?

---

\(\text{212}\) The eighthfold Buddhist Path, by prescribing right speech (samyakvācya), right action (samyakkarmanā); and right means of livelihood (samyogīya) in articles 3, 4 and 5, forbids by that very fact the sins of body (murder, theft and lust) and the sins of speech (falsehood, slander, harsh speech and idle gossip). But we have seen above that the morality arising from the Path constitutes pure discipline (ānuravasamvara) and consequently transcends the mechanism of retribution: it leads directly to nirvāṇa.

Answer. – Here we are speaking only of the discipline of the morality of pledge (samādānasamvara); we are not speaking of the discipline of pure morality.

Moreover, in the other Abhidharmas, it is said that abstention from murder does not always follow mind and is not [always] a physical or vocal action (kāyavākkaran); not being concomitant with mental action (cetakarmanārvarin), sometimes it involves retribution (vipāka), sometimes it does not involve retribution; not being associated with mind (cittasamprayukta), sometimes it is impure (ātmara), sometimes it is pure (anurava). These are its distinctive attributes; and it is the same for the other [abstentions].

Finally, some say that the Buddha and the saints (ārya) avoid all futile disputations (prapañca) on the dharmas. It is obvious that each being in particular [155b] [tries to] preserve its own life; also, the Buddha said that another’s life must not be taken and that if one takes it, one will undergo all the sufferings (duḥkha) from one lifetime to the next. As for the existence or non-existence of beings, that will be discussed later.

Question. – By one’s strength, a person can overcome people, conquer kingdoms and kill enemies; the income that he derives from the meat and hides of game animals is considerable. What benefits (duḥkha) does he find in not killing living beings?

Answer. – 1) He derives confidence (vaiśārayaya), happiness (sukha) and fearlessness (abhaṣaya). [He says to himself]: “Since I am not tormenting these beings, they will not torment me either.” This is why he is fearless. The person who loves to kill, even if his position places him above kings, never enjoys the same peace as the moral man: even though he walks alone and in isolation, the latter has no worries to be fearful of.

2) Moreover, in the case of the murderer, all creatures (jīvāna) around him (parāvāra) have a horror on seeing him; but all beings willingly visit the person who does not love to kill.

3) Moreover, at the end of his life (jīvatāpyavasāna), the moral person has a peaceful heart and is not worried or afraid. Whether he is reborn among the gods (devā) or among men (manuṣya), he will have a long life (duḥkhaya) which is the cause and condition (hetrapraya) of obtaining the Path (mārgalābha); having reached Buddhahood, the length of his life is limitless (apramuṇa).

4) Moreover, in the present (ṁa) lifetime and in future (parāvāra) lifetimes, the murderer will undergo all kinds of suffering of body and mind (kāyacittaduḥkha); the man who has not killed does not have all these worries; this is a great benefit.

5) Moreover, the ascetic (yogin) has the following thought: “I spare my own life, I love my own body, and it is the same for them; how are they any different from me? This is why I must not kill a living being.”

6) Moreover, the murderer is decried by good people (sattvāna) and envied by wicked people. Being guilty of the death of a man, he will always be afraid of being despised by them. At the time of his death, his mind dread is of falling into the hells (naraka) or into the animal destinies (āyānasamāpātika). If he were to reappraise amongst men, he would always have a short life.

7) Moreover, supposing even that, in the future lifetime, he does not undergo punishment, that he is neither deceived by good people nor envious by the wicked, he should not even then take the life of another. Why? Because this conduct is not appropriate for an honest person. All the more reason (prākāya) he should abstain from it when, in both lifetimes, [present and future], he must suffer the [punishment for his fault.

8. Moreover, murder is the most serious (gaurīgha) of all sins (āpatti). Why? When people are in danger of death, they sacrifice their treasures and keep their safety as primordial thing.

[The joy of the merchants saved from shipwreck]. — Some merchants (vanijā) who had gone to sea and gathered precious substances were about to set sail again when their ship was wrecked. Their precious stones (manātrasu) were lost; nevertheless they congratulated themselves and, raising their hands, they said: "Happily have we sacrificed our treasures!" The astonished crowd said to them: "You have lost your riches (vītu) and, quite naked (nagna), have you found safety. Why do you rejoice saying: 'Happily have we sacrificed our treasures'? " They answered: 'Of all treasures, the life of a person is the foremost treasure. It is for life that people search for treasures, but they do not sacrifice their life for treasures.'" This is why the Buddha said that, of the ten bad paths of action, (āsādāsālakāramapatha), the sin of murder takes first place and, of the five precepts (jīla), that [which prohibits] murder also is in first place.

The person who, in many ways, practices (bhāvyavātri) all the meritorious virtues but who does not have the morality of abstention, does not derive any benefit.

[155c] Why? One can have wealth, nobility, rank, power and bravery; but without a long life (ālīghňaya), who could enjoy it? This is how we know that, of the sins (āpatti), the sin of murder is the most serious; of all the virtues (guṇa), abstention from murder is the foremost.

In the world (lokā), anxiety for life is primordial. How do we know that? All people suffer punishments (danda) willingly, ruin, house-search, pillage, provided that they can preserve their life.

8) Moreover, the person who pledges to observe morality (samādānāsīla) and has made the resolution to no longer kill any living being has already given to numberless beings the most important gift that they wish for, and the merits that he has attained are immense. Thus the Buddha said: "There are five great gifts (mahābālā). What are they? Abstaining from killing living beings is the first great gift, and so on for renunciation of theft, lust, falsehood and the use of intoxicants."

9) Finally, the merits (puṇya) of those who practice the meditative stabilization of loving-kindness (maitrīsamādhi) are immense: water and fire cannot harm them, soldiers cannot wound them, poisons have no effect on them. These are the benefits of the five great gifts.

7. Punishments for killing.

Furthermore, in the three times (trayaṅkava) and the ten directions (daśayādīk), veneration of the Buddha is primordial. Now, as the Buddha said to the upśakā Nam tī̄ kiśa (Nandikā),213 the killing of living beings has ten punishments.214 What are these ten?

1) The mind is always infected by poison (vīla) from lifetime to lifetime without interruption.

2) Beings abhor [the murderer] and feel no joy in seeing him.

3) [The murderer], always full of evil intentions, contemplates evil things.

4) Beings fear him, as though they saw a snake (śarpā) or a tiger (vīghaṇa).

5) During sleep (ṣūdhi) his mind is disturbed; when awake (avasodhi), he is not at peace.

6) He always has bad dreams.

7) At the end of his life (jīvitaśārvaṁśāna), he dreads a bad death.

Monks, the noble disciple renounces murder and abstains from it. Because he abstains, he gives fearlessly to innumerable beings, he gives without hatred; he gives without malevolence; giving thus, he takes part in immense happiness, heavenly, rewarded by happiness, to innumerable beings, he gives without hatred; he gives without malevolence; giving thus, he takes part in immense happiness, heavenly, rewarded by happiness, confidence, friendliness and kindness. This, monks, is the first gift, the first great gift, known from the beginning...

213 The Buddha put murder at the top of the list of the ten asādāsālakāramapatha (cf. Traité I, p. 503F), and abstention from murder is the first obligation that he imposed on all his adepts, lay as well as monastic: prānāśīlāpavāritati is the first of the pañcasīlā and the daśāsīlā.

214 Extract from śūtra in Aṅguttara, IV, p. 246, which does not seem to have a correspondent in the Chinese canon.

215 The Buddha put murder at the top of the list of the ten asādāsālakāramapatha (cf. Traité I, p. 503F), and abstention from murder is the first obligation that he imposed on all his adepts, lay as well as monastic: prānāśīlāpavāritati is the first of the pañcasīlā and the daśāsīlā.

216 The Buddha put murder at the top of the list of the ten asādāsālakāramapatha (cf. Traité I, p. 503F), and abstention from murder is the first obligation that he imposed on all his adepts, lay as well as monastic: prānāśīlāpavāritati is the first of the pañcasīlā and the daśāsīlā.
8) He plants the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) leading to a short life (alpāyus).

9) After the destruction of the body (kāyabheda) at the end of life (jīvātiparyavāvana), he falls into hell (niraya).

10) If he reappears among men, he always has a short life.

Moreover, the ascetic says to himself: “All living beings (jīvīn), including insects (krīmī) hold onto their life. Why clothe and feed oneself if, for one’s own existence, one kills living beings?”

Finally, the ascetic must always cultivate (sīkṣate) the virtues (dharma) of Great Men (mahāpuruṣa). Of all the Great Men, the Buddha is the greatest. Why? He is omniscient (sarvañāti), he has the fullness of the ten powers (daiñhabalaparipūrtisamanvāgata), he can save beings and always practices loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karunā). By observing morality and abstaining from murder, he has become Buddha; he also teaches his disciples (trāvūka) the practice of this loving-kindness and compassion. The ascetic who wants to engage in the practices of the Great Man should also avoid murder.

8. Better to die than to kill.

Question. – The taste for murder is easily eliminated in those who do not harm themselves [by not killing]; but if, [in order to avoid murder], one must expose oneself to torture (vihehāna), violence (bīhāna) and insults (abhīhāvāna), what should one do?

Answer. — One should estimate the relative importance [of the solutions with which one is faced]. Before sacrificing oneself, the person will pay attention (manasikā) to the benefits of safeguarding morality or safeguarding one’s life, to the drawbacks (hūnī) of violating morality or losing one’s life. Having [156a] reflected in this way, he will know that it is more important to safeguard morality than to save one’s life. If one is in a hurry to save one’s body, what advantage will one have? This body is a reservoir of old age (jāra), sickness (vyāḍhi) and death (marāṇa) and must necessarily perish. But if one sacrifices one’s body to preserve morality, the benefit [that one will derive from it] will be very great.

Pursuing these thoughts (manasthāna), one thinks: “Before as after, I have sacrificed my life for innumerable existences, in the form of a bard (cūra) or an animal (tīryagya), following only the evil goal of enriching myself. Today, having succeeded in keeping pure morality (parisa śuddhāsāla), I will not spare my body. I will renounce my life in order to keep morality. [By acting thus], I will surpass a hundred, a thousand times, ten thousand times, those who violate their vows (vratā) in order to save their lives.” It is necessary to sacrifice one’s life thus resolutely to keep pure morality.

[The suicide of the Candalā]. – A certain srotaṇapaṇa had taken rebirth in an outcaste (candala) family. Time passed and he attained a man’s years. When he had to practice his family’s craft, he refused to kill living (prāna) beings. His parents gave him a knife (śātrā) and closed him up in a room with a sheep (edaka), saying: “If you do not kill this sheep, you will not be allowed to go out to see the light of day (read: je minge) and get food.” The son thought and said to himself: “If I kill this sheep, I would end up by practicing their trade. Even for my life, how could I commit such great crimes?” Then he killed himself with the knife. When his parents opened the door to look in, the sheep was standing up in a corner of the room (ekākānea) and their son was dead. At the moment he died, he took rebirth among the gods. A person like that sacrifices his own life to safeguard pure morality, and this is the sense in which we speak of the morality of abstaining from murder.

II. Abstaining from theft

1. Definition of theft

Taking what is not given (adatādāna), knowing that an object belongs to another (paraparīghhasamāntī), forming the intention to steal it (styaucetanāsamanthāpana), taking the object (ādhyugruhāna) and leaving the original place, saying: “This object belongs to me”: that is theft (stya). Not doing that is abstaining from theft. The rest, viz., stratagens (apṣya), plots (nirāpana), up to the fact of laying hands on some land that is not abandoned (apariṇāyakāhāra) are auxiliary to theft (styaupakāra).

There are two kinds of wealth (vasu), that which belongs to another (paratantra) and which that does not belong to another (aparatantra). The fact of taking (grahāna) an object belonging to another constitutes the sin of theft (styaupapti).

---

156a Se the canonical definition of theft in Majjhima, I, p. 286; II, p. 46, 54; Aṅguttara, V, p. 264; Tson a han, T 99, no. 1039, K. 37, p. 271b: Adhikādāyā hoti; yan tam parassa paravātāpavanam gāmagatān vā avahālātān vā, tam adomam theṣayaamāmālītanā derā hoti: “The thief, with steadfast intent, lays hand on that which has not been given to him, on another’s property who is in the village or in the jungle.”

Five conditions are needed for there to be theft: they are explained in the Dāsakusūlakarmapathā of Aṅvaghoṣa, J.A., Oct.-Dec., 1929, p. 269: [Tātra kathām adatādāya bhavati: parakāvan ca bhavati, paraparīghhasamāntī ca bhavati, styaucitam ha pataḥpataḥvītātāva, upavāvan ca karoti, sthānāca ca ... sāvātara adatādāyā bhavati: “How is one a thief? There is the property of another, one knows that it is the property of another, one has the intention of stealing, one goes ahead to carry it out and [one changes] the position [of the object]. That fulfills [the five conditions] to be a thief.”

This teaching is repeated and developed by Buddhaghosa in Sampālita, I, p. 71; Atthasālī, p. 98 (tr. Tin, Expositor, Lg. 138): Padha saṃbhūtā hoti: paraparīghhasamāntī, paraparīghhasamāntī, theṣayaamālītanā, upākamānātāvanamānāmātāvāhikamālītanā, Chappayāggaṃ dākhikādāyā va. Te ca kha yathāmārpaṃ theṣayaamālītanā patañjālāvāhikamālītanā parikāppadhānikhāvāhikādīkādāyāḥ tām aham avahālātām vasana parāvāhikādītaṃ: “There are five factors constituting [theft]: another’s possessions, the awareness that it is another’s possessions, the intention to steal, the execution and removal that results. There are six ways of stealing: with one’s own hand, etc. One or another of these ways will be carried out according to the circumstances, dealing in false weights and measures, by force, by fencing stolen objects, by intrigue or by forgery.” – See also Kośa, IV, p. 155-156; Hardy, Manual, p. 465-467, Bigandet, Gaudama, p. 417.

Question. – What are the benefits of not stealing?

Answer. – A man’s life (manusyañāṇā) has two aspects, i) inner (śānti dharma) and ii) outer (bādhya). To take his wealth (puṣpa) is to deprive him of his outer life (bāhyā). Why? Because life is maintained thanks to (śānti dharma) to food (āhāra), clothing (vastra) bedding, etc.; to steal them or remove them from the person is to deprive him of his outer life. A stanza says:

[156b] This is why the wise man (jñātā) does not steal them.

2) Furthermore, the wise man says: By taking an object by theft and appropriating it, one will be able to live in abundance, but soon one must die and after death, one will fall into hell (niraya). Even if the family and relatives have enjoyed the larceny with you, one will be alone in suffering the punishment and one will be unable to avoid it. With such thoughts on these matters, the wise man will be incapable of committing theft.

3) Furthermore, there are two ways of taking what has not been given (adattādāna): i) by larceny, ii) by pillage; the two together are called adattādāna.

In regard to adattādāna, theft (steṣa) is more serious. Why? Because it is very vile (asiṣṭha) to commit burglary (samadhichedana) or to steal (steṣa) the wealth (bhana) which people need to live. Why? Because it is stealing from weak people (nirbhala) who are threatened by death. Of all plundering, theft is the most serious. Thus a stanza says:

All beings subsist
Thanks to clothing and food.
To take them away or to steal them
Is to deprive them of life.

Although the fault of the murderer is serious, he is the enemy only of his victim; the thief, however, is the enemy of everyone who possesses something. Those who violate the other rules of morality can find people in other countries who would not find them guilty; the thief, on the other hand, is punished in every country.

Question. – However, there are actually people who praise the heroism of brigands; then why not indulge in brigandage?

Answer. – Taking what has not been given is bad in itself (puṣpādattā). Although brigandage has special (yeṣaḥ) characteristics, it itself is bad. It is like good food mixed with poison (vīṣaṃśuṣa) and bad food mixed with poison; although the good food and the bad food are different, the poison mixed with them does not change. Or it is as if one were walking in fire, sometimes in the daytime (toṣas) and sometimes in the dark (tamas); although day and night are different, one’s feet get burned in the same way.

But actually fools (bāla) are ignorant, in this life and the beyond (ikaparutra), of the retribution (vipāka) of merits (puṇya); lacking loving-kindness (maitrīcitta), when they see people using force to encroach upon one another and rob another’s wealth, they praise the violence. The Buddhists and the saints (ārya) who are full of love and compassion (karuna) for the entire world understand well that the misfortune of the three times (tryadhvadukkha) [which threatens thieves] is inevitable and there is nothing in brigandage to boast 218 See the preceding note that distinguishes the goods of another gāmagataṃ and arahṭhaṅkataṃ vid. Buddhaghosa in Paññāca, II, p. 329, explains: gāmagataṃ and ti uṭṭhāntiṃ and thāṭhiṃ, arahṭhaṅkataṃ and ti arahṭhe vukkhaṃ, ruddhatā maddhālānaṃ thāṭhiṃ.

219 The Hindus are impressed by the immorality of certain foreign customs: the Viśālakīrti (T. 1545, k. 116, p. 605c17) mentions the existence in the West of Mlecchas, called Mos jia (109, 162 and 5); in Sanskrit Mapa, magi) who believe that “those who kill their decrepit father and mother and sick people obtain merit and not sin”, “that there is no sin in having sexual intercourse with one’s mother, sisters and sisters-in-law”. The Kośa, IV, p. 145, 147, and Kotaśākyā, p. 394, blame the Pāśaṅka (Persians) with the same deviations. The Divyāvadāna, p. 257, confirms that in the frontier regions, it is a custom for the son to have sexual intercourse with his father’s wife: pratyayata saṃaprakāsa duḥmataraiśa yām eva piṭāḥgacchati tām eva patvō ‘py adiṭhigacchati. But, as the Mppī comments here, there is no country in which theft is not condemned.
about. This is why we know that brigandage is bad; good people (satpurwa) and ascetics (yogin) do not indulge in it.

3. Punishments for theft.

As the Buddha said, theft (adatādāna) has ten punishments:220

1) The owner of the object (dravyapati) is always angry [with the thief].
2) The thief experiences great anxiety.
3) He acts inopportunistly (read: fei che kling) and without thinking things out.
4) He is associated with evil people and avoids honest people.
5) He violates the rules of morality (kuśalanimitta).
6) He is punished by the king.

[165c] 7) He does not retain any wealth.
8) He plants the causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) of actions engendering poverty (adirāgā).
9) After death, he falls into hell (niraya).
10) If he is reborn among men and manages with difficulty to obtain wealth, the “group of five” (pañcasatāhravana)221 will be the prey of the king (rājan), thieves (caura), fire (agni), water (udaka) or the prodigal son (aprīdayāda); even [treasures] buried in the earth are lost.

III. Abstention from illicit love.

1. Definition of illicit love.222

“Illicit practice of sexual activity” (kāmamaithyācāra):

1) If a woman (strī) is under the protection of a father (piturakkhit), to the explanation of Buddhaghosa in Papañca, I, p. 113, p. 585b4, it is a woman on whom someone has thrown a veil. This is why we know that brigandage is bad; good people (satpuruṣa) and ascetics (yogin) do not indulge in it.

Even if a woman has no protector, the law holds her over. Who are the women protected by law? All women who have gone forth from the world (pravajjastra) and those who, still staying at home (grhasthā), have taken the “morality of a day and night” (nītridivasaśāti)223 are protected by law.

[It does not matter whether one has intercourse with them] by force (bala), by means of a gift of money (dhana) or by deception (vicala).

2) If one has intercourse with one’s own wife (kalatra) when she has taken a vow (saṃādānāvāti), is pregnant (garbhitā) or is nursing a child (pāyayanti) – or in a forbidden way (amārga) – that is the illicit practice of sexual activity.

Intercourse with these women, including courtesans (guṇikā, vejyā) crowned with a flower garland (mālāguparikitsīpā)224 as a sign of being betrothed, is called the practice of illicit sexual activity. Not to do any of that is kāmamaithyācāravātāt.

---

220 Nandikasūtra in Feer, Extrait, p. 245; T 81, p. 899b16-18.
221 I.e., his entire fortune, see above, p. 679F, n. 1.
222 See the canonical definition of illicit love in Majjhima, I, p. 286; III, p. 46, 54; Anguttara, V, p. 264; Tsa a han T 99, no. 1029, k. 37, p. 271b: Kāmeu mīcchācārā kho pana hoti, yā tā mītravakkhitā piturakkhitā mālāguparikkhitā bhāgavrakkhitā tātāvakkhitā dhammaparikkhitā savānānāt, antamanac mālāguparikitsmāni pi, uṭṭhāpaya cāvānti-dāgāyāt hoti: “In love, there are illicit practices: intercourse with girls who are under the guardianship of a mother, a father, a mother and father, a brother, a sister or relatives, with girls who are under the protection of the law, already promised to a husband and protected by the ring, or even with maidens garlanded with flowers [of the betrothed].”

Later sources such as the Dālakusatālakarmapatha, JA Oct.-Dec., 1929, p. 269; Kośa, IV, p. 157-158; the Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 76; Mahāvyutpatti, ch. 280; and in part, Samālīgala, 1, p. 72 and Atthaṭalīlī, p. 98 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 130) consider as illicit:

a. Intercourse with a forbidden woman (aṅgavāti). - Kośa: Another’s wife, daughter, paternal or maternal relative; - Dālakusatā: Savaṇ parastra, dhammastra, goтраstra, kāla, śāstra, parivarstra, vejyā. “Another’s wife, she who has the banner of the law, who is protected by her clan, the courtesan whose hand has been promised, she who has been bought.” – Mahāvyutpatt, no. 9456-9463, continues the canonical list from piturakkhitā up to mālāguparikitsāpātītā: Sumatiyāla and Atthaṭalīlī (i.e.) consider as illicit ten classes of unmarried women and ten classes of married women.

Intercourse with unwed animals is included as illicit love also along with intercourse with prohibited women; cf. Dālakusatā, Śikṣāsamuccaya, p. 76.

b. Intercourse with one’s own wife in a prohibited way (amārga, aṅgavī, i.e., anything that is not the yonī. – Dālakusatā: mokṣa, vāravācana, dhīra dāvādāka jatāpayāvārana, hota, - Mahāvyutpatt, no. 9226-9227: piturakkhitā, vāravācana, vāravācana, vejyā, vāravīrāgīvā.

223 In an inappropriate place (adāde): - Dālakusatā: bodhisattra saha, ṛṣiyā-sādāstra, bhūmikā-sādāstra, samādānāvātā. “The dwelling of a bodhisattva, of a mother, a guru” – Kośa (i.e.) In an open place, a temple (cūtisa) an hermitage (cūtisa).

d. Intercourse in an inappropriate time (adade): - Kośa: When the woman is pregnant, when she is nursing her baby, when she has taken the vow of an upāsika:

224 This is the vow of one day and one night, or upāsika, taken for twenty-four hours, six days per month; see below, p. 526F.

225 Mālāguparikitsāpātītā is an accepted expression: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 286; III, p. 46, 54; Anguttara, V, p. 264; Mahāvyutpatti, no. 9463: Tsa a han, T 99, k. 37, p. 271b24-25; Bhāhāla, T 1545, k. 113, p. 585b4. – According to the explanation of Buddhaghosa in Paññaka, II, p. 113, p. 585b4, it is a woman on whom someone has thrown a Question. – If a woman is under the protection of a man (puruṣakṣitā) and the man is angry, if she is under the protection of the law (dharma): even though being married previously, today she is not free (svatantra). But beyond the time of the vow, she is no longer protected by the law (dharmaśākṣitā).

2) The pregnant wife (garbhīṣt ābhāyā) has a heavy body and feels loathing for previous delights. Moreover, [conjugal intercourse] might injure the fetus.

3) When she is nursing a baby and one has intercourse with her, the mother’s milk (stāmya) dries up. Moreover, if her mind is attached to sexual pleasures, the woman will not look after her child.225

4) By a forbidden manner (amārgasthāna) means anything that is not by way of the female organ (yoni). The mind of the woman loathes [such practices] and to force her to such improprieties merits the name of illicit sexual practice. Avoiding all of that is called renunciation of illicit sexual practices (kāmamithyācāravirātī).

Question. – But if the husband (pāri) does not see, does not know, or does not deplore [the unfaithfulness of his wife], of what is the lover guilty?

Answer. – 1) If she has been permitted to take the vow [of chastity] for one day, she falls under [the protection] of the law (dharma); even though being married previously, today she is not free (svatantra). But beyond the time of the vow, she is no longer protected by the law (dharmaśākṣitā).

2) Moreover, as the Buddha said, the libertine will fall into ruin because of illicit sexual activity. Avoiding all of that is called renunciation of illicit sexual practices (kāmamithyācāravirātī).

225 Cf. Kosāiyābhikhyā, p. 406: garbāṅgamane garbhapauravah. Piyavatsitivasℝṛṣṭābhāyāyāphṛṣṭābhāyāyārāṇikā śṛṣṭi-abhāmacaryakarane kī taryād stāmya kṣeyate, bhālākāyā paṃstāyata tathā stāmya ca bhavati. “In intercourse with a pregnant woman, there is danger for the fetus. The woman who is nursing (piyavat) or (piyavatī) is one who has a son taking his mother’s milk; if she gives herself up to pleasure, her milk will dry up or is not such as can nourish the child.”

226 See above, p. 799F, n. 1.

The libertine should say to himself: “My wife and the wife of another are equally women; there is no difference in body and in passions between the one and the other. Under these conditions, why should I have violent and anxious thoughts? The man who follows bad thoughts and profilagacy destroys the happiness of the present existence (ājīvakam) and future existences (ājīvakam).” – [Note: Good name, good reputation, physical and mental well-being are obtained in the present lifetime; rebirth among the gods, acquisition of the Path and nirvāṇa are obtained in future lifetimes.] – Moreover, putting oneself in another’s place, the libertine controls his mind; he says to himself: “If that man took my wife, I would be angry; if I take his wife, why would he be any different from me? I shall master myself as I would like others to master themselves in what concerns me; this is why I will not commit [adultery].”

Moreover, as the Buddha said, the libertine will fall into Kīṃ chau tī tuṣu (Asipattanirayā)227 where massiv sufferings are prepared to welcome him. If he is reborn among men, the hall-ways of his home are disordered; dissolute women and people of damaged reputation are always encountered there. Illicit sexual relations are a calamity (apādraśva) like a poisonous snake (tāvāsa) or a great fire (mahādāra); if it is not quickly avoided, misfortune and suffering will ensue.

According to the Buddha, there are ten punishments for illicit sexual relations:

1) The deceived husband seeks revenge.

2) The libertine has a badly kept wife who always quarrels (vivāda) with him.
3) The bad dharmas (akusaladharma) increase from day to day and the good dharmas (kusaladharma) diminish from day to day.
4) He is unable to defend his life; his wife (bhārya) and children (putra) are left alone.
5) His wealth (āhana) is spent in one day.
6) His business goes badly; he is always suspected by people.
7) He is not loved by his relatives (ākāti), his neighbors (parivāra) and his friends (mitra).
8) He plants the karmic causes and conditions (karmaheṭupratayāya) that produce disrupted homes.
9) At the destruction of the body (kāyasthā bheda) at the end of his life (jīvītarpayavasāna), he dies and falls into hell (niraya).
10) If he is reborn as a woman, many men share her; if he is reborn as a man, his wife will be unchaste.

These are the various reasons for not committing [this sin]. And this is what is meant by renunciation of illicit sexual practices (ākāmānyalyācāravirati).

IV. Abstention from falsehood.

1. Definition of falsehood.228

228 See the canonical definition of a liar in Majjhima, I, p. 226; III, p. 47, 55, Anattūra, V, p. 264; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1039, k. 37, p. 271b: "Maudulāttāḥ: satthāgato varṣatugato utākāmājmihagato utākāmājmihagato utākāmājmihagato atthānulīkāvitthānāhato: evam bho purisa vaim jānati tam vikāri, so aśjānom utā: jānanti, jānāṃ utā: na jānāṃ, aparāmon utā: parāmon, utā: parāmāṇ, iti atthān vāparābhūtā vā ānivākākkhāhato utā: sāmpāyānāvā bhātāvā hoti: "He is a liar: summoned to appear before an assembly, a gathering, a family circle, a guild or a tribunal, and interrogated as a witness to tell what he knows, he says that he knows when he does not know, he says that he does not know when he knows with say that he has seen when he has not seen, he says that he has seen when he has not seen; thus he consciously tells lies sometimes for himself, sometimes for others, for some material advantage."

Later scholasticism determines the conditions necessary for there to be falsehood: Dāsakūṣa, JA, Oct-Dec. 1929, p. 269: "Tātā kathaṁ moryādādā naṁ: vastu ca bhāravi, vastuṣṭuttam ca bhāravi, viśvasaṁjaṁ ca bhāravi, viiṭṭhahatitam ca bharati, mavyādādām ca bhālāte: evābhi pariṣṭhā yāpan vācanaṃ vācanaṃ bharati: "How is one a liar? There is something true, there is something false, there is something that he knows and he speaks a lie: the person who fulfills these five false, this is a liar." – Buddhaghosa in Sumaṁ, I, p. 72; Athasālaṇī, p. 99 (tr. Tīn, Expositor, I, p. 131): "Tusā catūro sabbhārā hoti: ātāhāṁ savi svāvadānakacchā, tajjō vāsāmo, paracca tadattadhājīnamati tī. Eko panyogāhamhiko. So kāyaṁ ca kāyapati adhānu ca vācāya ca vācāya ca vācāya ca vācāya ca kāyavaṃ savipāyādakacchāya kārane ādhetabba: "Falsehood has four constitutive factors: a false thing, the intention to deceive, a corresponding effort and communication to another. There is only one way to lie: personal action. This should be understood as the fact of deceiving another either by body or something in “Falsehood” (moryādādā). – With an evil intention (asubbhacita), wishing to deceive another, concealing the truth (satya), offering words different [from the truth]: this is called falsehood (moryādādā). The sin of lying arises in dependence on the intelligibility (samavobodha) of the words pronounced, for these if they are not understood, there could be an incorrect comment (vitaravāhākhyā), but it would not be a lie.229 “When one knows, to say that one does not know; when one does not know, to say that one knows; when one sees, to say that one does not see; when one does not see, to say that one sees; when one understands, to say that one does not understand; when one does not understand, to say that one understands: this is what is called falsehood.”

230 When one thinks about these punishments, one does not lie anymore.

Consider also true speech (satyaavād) and how great are its advantages (anusiṣṭa): these advantages arise by themselves and are easy to obtain: they are the power of all monastics (pravrajina); virtuous lay people (gānaṁ grhaśaka) also share them with the monastics.

Moreover, the truthful person has a straightforward mind and, by this straightforwardness, he easily succeeds in escaping from sorrow. It is like a thick forest: if the direction followed is correct, one comes out of it easily.

Question. – What are the punishments for falsehood?
Answer. – The liar first deceives himself, then he deceives others. He takes the true to be false and the false to be true. Deception relating to true and false (anuyātanipāyākhyā) prevents the gathering of good dharmas (kusaladharma); it is like a closed vase (praṭicchānaghaṭa) where water cannot penetrate. The mind of the liar is without shame (apātraṭīpa) or modesty (bhrī): he closes the door to the divine destinations (devgati) and to nirvāṇa. When one thinks about these punishments, one does not lie anymore.

Answer. – There are fools (mālīka), people of little knowledge who, upon [157b] meeting with some difficulty, an enemy, or an obstacle, try to escape from it by lying. They ignore that their difficulties will increase and that they will be punished in this very life (ilajānman): they ignore that the future life connection with the body, or by speech.” – See also Kośa, IV, p. 158 seq.; Hardy, Manual, p. 468; Bigandet, Gandhāra, p. 418.

230 Cf. Kośa, IV, p. 156-159: In order that there be a lie, the interlocutor must understand the meaning of the words pronounced; if he does not understand them, it is frivolous speech (sambhānasāvātā) but not a lie.

231 Free quotation from a sūtra on the sixteen “vocal conducts” (sūtravādā): - eight bad (anādyā) ones: not having seen heard, known, felt, to say that one has seen heard, known, felt; - eight good (ādyā) ones, the opposite of the preceding. Cf. Dhīka, III, p. 232; Majjhima, III, p. 29; Anattūra, II, p. 246; IV, p. 307; Th'ang a han, T 1, k. 8, p. 50b; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 49, p. 732b-c: Vībhābha, T 1545, k. 171, p. 861c; Kośa, IV, p. 159-160: catāla anuvādavādā: adhitthā dhīnavādā, ādanta sāvatvādā, amante sāvatvādā, abhītā vībhāvādā. Apare pi catāla anuvādaōvādā: dhīte adhitthāvādā ...
(aparajanma) also has great punishment in store for them. – Furthermore, there are people who, even knowing the punishments reserved for lying, nevertheless lie under the sway of desire (ṛgī) hatred (ūvesu) or delusion (moha). – Finally, there are people who, although feeling no desire or hatred, bear false witness of the faults of others and even think they are right: these after death will fall into hell (niraya).

[Kokālika’s mendacious accusations]232

This is how Kiū k’è li (Kokālika), the disciple of T’1 p’o t to (Devadatta), looked for the faults (ādhinava) of Chō lì fou (Śūtriputra) and Mou k’ien liun (Maudgalāyana).

1. [Kokālika proclaims the misconduct of the two disciples everywhere]231 – One day, when the summer retreat (variu) was over, these two men were traveling through the land239 and were caught in a great rainstorm. Having come to the house of a potter (kumhikāra),235 they spent the night there. In this house, there already was a woman234 who spent the nights there secretly, but the two disciples did not see her. During the night, this woman had a dream (svaṇa) and had an emission.237 The next morning, she went to the water to bathe. Kokālika, who was there by chance, saw her. Kokālika knew how to distinguish traces of sexual emotions but without knowing exactly whether they had taken place in dream or not. Immediately he affirmed to his disciples that this woman had had sexual relations with a man the preceding night. He asked the woman: “Where did you sleep?” She replied: “I stay temporarily at the house of the potter.” He asked with whom, and she answered: “With two bhikṣu.” At that moment, the two disciples came out of the hut. Kokālika saw them, looked them over and declared that these two men were definitely impure. First, he felt jealous (īrya); then he went everywhere, in the cities and the villages, proclaiming what he had seen. He went up to the Guangen divulging this slander.

2. [Intervention of the god Brahmadā]238 – In the meantime, Fan Tien wang (Brahmā devarīja) came to see the Buddha. But the Buddha had gone into his silent cell to practice meditation in solitude;232 all the bhikṣus also had closed the doors to their cells and were practicing meditation; there was no way to rouse them. Brahmā then thought: “I have come to see the Buddha but he is in meditative stabilization (sammāvīti); I shall go away.” Thinking again, he said to himself: “The Buddha will come out of concentration soon; I will wait for him here.” He went to the cell of Kokālika, knocked on the door and said: “Kokālika! Hey, Kokālika! Śūtriputra and Maudgalāyana have pure, sweet and gentle minds (vīśuddhamudatantaracittā). Do not say anything bad against them for, during the Long Night (ādityavatā) you will suffer.” – Kokālika asked him: “Who are you?” – He answered: “I am Brahmadā.” – Kokālika said: “The Buddha said that you had attained the state of non-returner (anāgāmin). Why then have you returned here?” – King Brahmadā thought and spoke the following stanza:

To want to measure the immeasurable Dharma,
When one is unable to grasp its nature (nimittagrahana)!

The person who wants to measure the immeasurable Dharma

232 For this Kokālika (in Pāli, Kokāliya) see above, Traité, I, p. 62F. – According to Buddhaghosa (Suttanipāta Comn., II, p. 473: Sūnartha, I, p. 216), this is Kokāliya-the-lesser, son of Kokāli-sāriṇī and a resident of the monastery of Kokāli; he is different from Kokāliya-the-great, a bhūti in origin and disciple of Devadatta. The Chinese sources do not recognize this distinction, since they know only one Kokālika whom they make out to be the disciple of Devadatta.

In the following story, faithful to a process of compilation dear to itself (cf. Traité, I, p. 457F, n. 3), the Mppi has brought together several sūtras and avadānas about Kokālika, so as to present a complete story. I [Lamote] have distinguished three parts to this story and have given distinct references for each of them.

231 This first part, except for a few details, is found almost word for word in Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, no. 28, k. 3, p. 664b-665b; Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 4, p. 868c-b.

On the other hand, it does not seem to be known to the Pāli sources (Jātaka, IV, p. 242 sq.; Dhūnmapadathā, IV, p. 91 sq.) which explains the origin of the conflict between Kokālika and the two holy disciples differently: Śūtriputra and Maudgalāyana, in search of rest, had come to spend the rainy season with Kokālika who had promised not to reveal their presence to anyone. After the rains, when the elders were about to return, Kokālika at once informed the inhabitants and reproached them for their lack of hospitality. The citizens loaded the saints down with all kinds of gifts but the latter were not accepted, and Kokālika, who was hoping to receive some gift, was disappointed. The elders promised the inhabitants to visit them again, and when they departed, were accompanied by a great following of monks to whom the inhabitants paid great respect. The gifts were distributed among the monks and Kokālika did not get anything. He became insolent and the two great disciples left the place. The angry populace asked Kokālika to bring them back immediately or to go away himself. But the elders refused to come back and Kokālika, very annoyed, went to Śrīvastī to the Buddha where, notwithstanding the Buddha’s remonstrances, he began to speak ill of the two disciples (cf. Malalasekera, I, p. 674)

234 Rājagha and its environs (T 212 and T 1464).

235 An isolated and inhabited house: the potter’s kiln (T 203), a stone hut (T 1464) or a temple (chen sceu, or chen miao = caitya) in T 212.

236 A cowherd (gošā) according to T 203, 212 and 1464.

238 The elements of the second portion are found in three small sūtras of Samyutta, I, p. 148-149 (Kokālika, Tsa pao and Taudhurā), the extreme disorder of which reveals the activity of awkward disciples. In the Chinese Samyutta, these three small sūtras are joined into one single story in which the lucids ordo leaves nothing to be desired: cf. Ts a han, T 99, no. 1193, k. 44, p. 323b-c; Pie ts a han, T 100, no. 106, k. 5, p. 411b-c.

Is only a stupid layman.

Having spoken this stanza, Brahmā went to the Buddha and told him what had happened. The Buddha said:

“Good! Very good! You have spoken well.” And the Buddha repeated the stanza.244

To want to measure the immeasurable Dharma
When one is unable to grasp its nature!
The person who wants to measure the immeasurable Dharma
Is only a stupid layman.

Brahmā devarāja, after hearing the words of the Buddha, disappeared suddenly and returned to the heavens.

3. [The obstinacy of Kokālika, his death and fall into hell]241 Then Kokālika went to the Buddha and, having bowed his head to the Buddha’s feet, he stood to one side (bhagavataḥ pūdau sīrasā vanditaśaktā te ’ṣṭāt). The Buddha said to Kokālika: “Sāriputra and Maudgalyāyana have pure sweet and gentle minds (vīsuddhamūlafalāṇacitāḥ). Say nothing bad about them for, during the Long Night (ālīgharārātra) you will suffer.” – Kokālika said to the Buddha: “I dare not disbelieve the Buddha’s word (budhavacana); however, I know what I saw with my own eyes; I know perfectly well that these two men actually committed the sin.” Three times the Buddha reprimanded Kokālika in this way, and three times Kokālika did not believe him. Rising up from his seat (unāhāyaśanāt), he went away.

When he went back to his cell, pastules (pīdakī) appeared on his body: the size of a grain of mustard seed (sarṣapap) at first, they grew bigger and bigger to the size of a bean (mudgā), a jujube (kola), a mango (āmalaka). When they were as large as a hīla fruit, they exploded all together (grahbhit-) like a blazing mass. With tears and cries, Kokālika died that very night and went to the Lien houa ti yu (Padmaniraya) hell.

During the night, a Brahmādeva went to the Buddha to say: “Kokālika has died.” Another Brahmādeva said: “He has fallen into the great Padmaniraya.”

When the night had passed, the Buddha asked the community (samgha) to assemble and said: “Do you want to know how long is the life (āśayaḥvāna) in the hell (niraya) where Kokālika has fallen?” – The bhikṣus answered: “We would joyfully learn it.” The Buddha answered: “If there were sixty measures (drona) of sesame seeds and a man came every hundred years and removed one sesame seed (ūlī), these measures would be exhausted before the stay in the A feou t'o (Arbuda) hell would be ended. – Twenty stays in the Arbuda equal one stay in the Ni lo po to (Nirarbuda) hell. – Twenty stays in the Nirarbuda hell equals one stay in the A lo to (Atāta) hell. – Twenty stays in the Atata hell equals one stay in the A p o p’o (Hahava) hell. – Twenty stays in the Hahava hell equals one stay in the Hioo hieon (Hahava) hell. – Twenty stays in the Hahava hell equals one stay in the Ngeou po lo (Utpala) hell. – Twenty stays in the Utpala hell equal one stay in the Fen t’o li kia (Punarka) hell. – Twenty stays in the Punarka hell equals one stay in the Mo ho po to ye (Mahāpadma) hell. Kokālika has fallen into the Mahāpadma hell.242 His great tongue (mahājīlīvā) has been stretched out and nailed [to the ground] with a hundred spikes; five hundred plows are plowing it.”243 Then the Buddha spoke these stanzas:

[158a] At man’s birth
An axe is put into his mouth
With which he cuts himself
When he speaks wrong words.244

241 These are the cold hells (ātītānayānā). The Pāli sources (Sāsanutta, I, p. 152; Anguttara, V, p. 173; Suttanipāta, III, 10) list ten whereas the Chinese sources (T 99, p. 351c; T 100, p. 470b) list only eight. Thus they reveal their affinity with the Sanskrit Sarvāstivādin school which knows only eight cold hells: cf. Dīya, p. 67; Auddhārī, I, p. 4; I, 9; Vībhāsikā, T 1545, k. 172, p. 266a; Kōla, III, p. 154; Dharmasamāgama, ch. 122; Mahāyutpatti, no. 4292-4305. - On the other hand, the cosmography of the Chinese Dīghaṅgama (T 1, k. 19, p. 1256; T 23, k. 2, p. 286c; T 24, k. 4, p. 329a) knows ten cold hells, like the Pāli sources; this is easily explained because the Dīghaṅgama belongs to the Dharmagupta school (cf. Watanahe in Hoernle, Remains, p. 18; Bagchi, Le canon bouddhique, I, p. 202-203; Przybucki, Concile, p. 354, seq.; F. Wellmer, Die Ubersetzung der älteren buddhistischen Schriften, Asia Major, 1928, p. 180). According to corroborating accounts, (Divya, V, v. 45, 47; Mahāvamsa, V, v. 6, 8; Kathāv., Comm., p. 3; Vasumitra, p. 16; Paramartha, in P. Denmehl, L'origine des serres, MC, I, 1931, p. 25, 59-62; Bhavya in Walliser, Sélen, p. 81; Yi ting. tr. Takaku, p. 20), the Dharmaguptas descend in direct line, by the intermediary of the Mahāśāhasa, from the early Buddhist锡hativas whose Pāli scriptures are supposed to represent the authentic traditions. The similarities between the Pāli scriptures and those of the Dharmaguptas are thus naturally explained; this has already been noted for the Vinaya (cf. E. Wulffschmidt, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣukāṅtā-Pratimokṣa des Sarvāstivādan, LLL1926, p. 187; Przybucki, Concile, p. 314-315).

242 Cf. T 125, k. 12, p. 603b25: “A hundred oxen were plowing his tongue”; and Suttanipāta, v. 673b-c: jīvam balīvena uhetvā, ājñāyāpyajñāyā vyahāroti.

243 Cf. T 125, k. 12, p. 603b25: “A hundred oxen were plowing his tongue”; and Suttanipāta, v. 673b-c: jīvam balīvena uhetvā, ājñāyāpyajñāyā vyahāroti.

244 Sāsanutta, I, p. 149, 152; Anguttara, V, p. 171, 174; Suttanipāta, v. 657; Nettipakara, p. 132.
When he praises that which deserves blame
When he blames that which deserves praise,
He accumulates sins by way of his mouth
And will never see happiness.

If he is reborn in the Arbula,
For thirty-six
And five more existences
He will undergo the poison of sufferings.

With his mind fixed in wrong views
He struggles against the words of the saints.
Like a bamboo breaking up its own shape
As soon as it produces its fruit.

If by consciously (samsārīn) nourishing defamatory suspicions in this way, one ends up by persuading oneself (nīcāya), it is just the same as a lie. And the liar ends up by not trusting the words of the Buddha (buddhavacana); he will suffer the punishments we have spoken of. This is why one should not lie.

Ehrtositions to Rāhula.

The present page of the Māpi answers to this definition perfectly, better than the Ambalathaṭiḥāra Rāhulaśuddatsa (Majjhima, no. 61) with which the “sermon on falsehood” has been identified as early as 1879 by H. Oldenberg in his edition of the Vinaya Pitaka, p. XL, n. 1: The Buddha went to Ambalaṭtika to his son and washed his feet in front of the latter. Then the Blessed One spilled a thin stream of water into his basin (parītum udakāvaseṇam udakāhāne hupeta), saying to Rāhula: “Do you see this thin stream of water? As thin as this is the faith of those who are not ashamed of a deliberate lie.” Finally he emptied out a thin stream of water (tām parītum udakāvaseṇam chaddera) and said: “Do you see this thin stream of water being emptied? As discarded as this is the faith of those who are not ashamed of a deliberate lie.” Then he turned the basin upside down (udakāhānaṁ niḥājitaśvita) and said: “Do you see this upside-down basin? So inverted is the faith of those who are unashamed of deliberate lies.” Finally he placed the basin upright (udakāhānaṁ niḥājitaśvita) and said: “Do you see this empty (vittam tuccham) basin? As empty like this is the faith of those who are unashamed of a deliberate lie.”

After this short introduction on falsehood, by means of the comparisons of the elephant in battle and the mirror, the Buddha taught his son to look at his thoughts, his words and his actions, to exert himself day and night in the good dharmas and to purify all his actions.

The Chinese correspondent of the Ambalathaṭiḥāra Rāhulaśuddiṣṭa is in T26, no. 14, k. 3, p. 436a-447b, which S. Lévi has translated in Notes sur diverses inscriptions de Piyadasi, IA, May-June, 1896, p. 475-485. The two recensions are essentially identical. R. Senart, Les inscriptions de Piyadasi, II, 1886, p. 206, comments: The stūpa does not take falsehood solely as its subject but rather as a point of departure; one could say that the exhortations on lying which form the entrance into the subject, are submerged in the bulk of the stūpa.

But comparison between Majjhima, no. 61 and T26h is unessential: the “Exhortations to Rāhula” with which we are concerned also occurs in two Chinese texts that have not yet been examined. These are two versions of the Dharmapada, the Ts'iu yao king, T212, k. 11, p. 668a and the Fa kiu p'i
6) People have no respect for him and even if he has some authority, nobody obeys him.

7) He is always sad.

8) He plants karmic causes and conditions [which will merit his] being criticized.

9) At the dissolution of the body (kāyāvakābhīna) at the end of life (jīvabhāvayāvasāte), he will fall into the hells (nīrāya).

10) If he is reborn among men, he will always suffer criticism.

Not committing all these lies is “to abstain from falsehood” (mṛṣṭrāvādiratī).

V. Abstention from liquor.

1. Various kinds of drinks.

“Not to drink wine” (madhavirati). — There are three kinds of wine: (i) cereal wine (surā), (ii) fruit wine (phalamadya), (iii) herb wine (aydhamadya).

Fruit wine. — Grapes (drākṣa), berries of the A śī taka (ariśṭaka) tree, and other similar fruits give fruit wine.

[158h] Herb wine. — Any herb mixed with rice flour (mi mien = sakus) or sugarcane (iṣṣurasa) juice can change into wine. Also the wine derived from the milk (kṣīru) of hoofed animals: any fermented milk can give wine.

Briefly (saṃsūta), liquors, dry or wet, clear or cloudy, that cause excitement (kampāṇa) or weakness (pramāda) in the human mind are called wine.

They should not be consumed, and this is what is called abstaining from liquor (madhavirati).

Question. — Wine can combat cold (ṣīta), strengthen the body and rejoice the mind. Why not drink it?

248 The classical formula (e.g., Anguttara, IV, p. 248; Mahāvyut. no. 8505) is: surāvireyasa madhupramādasārāvīrati, i.e., renouncing fermented rice drink (surā) and the fermented drink of ingredients (mārāvaya) when they are still intoxicating (madhva); because they are the cause of all fallings (pramādasāha); cf. Koīha, IV, p. 85-86.

The Miśpi recognizes three kinds of intoxicating drinks:

a. The liquor of grains, in Sanskrit śūra, in Tibetan, bhrul da cha (Mahāvyut., no. 8505) is, in the strict sense, the fermented drink of rice (samāśava), arak.

b. The wine from fruits, extract of raisins (drukṣa) or berries.

c. The intoxicating drink from any fermentation process whatsoever, such as sugar-cane juice (iṣṣuśava).
Disadvantages of liquor.

As the Buddha said to the upasaka Nandikasūtra (Nandaka), wine has thirty-five disadvantages.251 What are these thirty-five?

1) In the present (duḥka) lifetime, wealth (vasu) is exhausted. Why? When one drinks wine and becomes intoxicated, the mind loses any moderation (mārīca) and one spends without reckoning.
2) Drink is the door to all illnesses (sārvarūṣhīvādva). It ruins joy (śānta).
3) It is a source of quarreling and disputes (vighraḥavīvādamāla).
4) The drunkard is not ashamed of being seen naked (nagnu).
5) He has a bad name, bad reputation and is not respected by people.
6) Drink ruins knowledge.
7) The drunkard does not get the good things that he should obtain, and he loses those that he has already obtained.
8) He tells people all his secrets (gudhyā).
9) He misses all kinds of business and realizes nothing.
10) Drunkenness is a source of grief (akamśa). Why? Drunkenness involves many lapses (hāni) and when one awakens, there is shame (hrī) confusion (apaśrāpya), sadness (daurmanasya) and grief (ādaka).
11) Physical strength (kāyabala) progressively diminishes.
12) Beauty (riśpa) changes.
13) The drunkard no longer respects his father.
14) He does not respect his mother.
15) He does not respect monastics (jīraṁava). It ruins memory (sāmrut) and excites anger (krodha), It ruins joy (madā) and breaks up families.
16) He does not respect brāhmans.
17) He does not respect his uncles or old people. Why? Because, in his grief and the troubles of drunkenness, he no longer makes distinctions.
18) He no longer venerates the Buddha.
19) He no longer respects the Dharma.
20) He no longer respects the Community (saṃgha).
21) He mixes in the intrigues of evil people (durjana).
22) He distances himself from beauty (bhadrā) and wholesomeness (kaśāla).
23) He becomes an immoral person (duḥśitapuruṣa).
24) He has neither shame (hrī) nor embarrassment (apaśrāpya).
25) He does not guard his six sense organs.
26) He lets himself go (pronti) at 120 and 11, 49) and neglects himself (pramāda).
27) People hate him; they are not pleased to see him.
28) He is rejected by serious people, his relatives (jīraṁ) and his friends (mitra).
29) He cultivates bad dharmas (akivaladhāma).
30) He abandons good dharmas (kīvaladhāma).
31) He does not enjoy the trust (paśrāda) of intelligent (medhāvin) and learned (pandita) people. Why? Because of the lapses (praśrāda) due to wine.
32) He is far from nirvāṇa.
33) He plants the causes and conditions (hetu-pratya) for madness (anmāda).
34) At the destruction of the body (kāyabhedā) at the end of his life (jīvita-prāpya-vāda) and grief (ādaka).

These are the various faults of drink. This is why one should not drink. Some stanzas say:

Wine wastes the intellect (budhi).
Beauty (riśpa) is changed and is ruined,
The mind is agitated and ruined
Shame (hrī) is diminished.

Wine ruins memory (sāmrut) and excites anger (krodha),
It ruins joy (madā) and breaks up families.
What is called “drinking”
Really is taking the poison of death (snṛtyuviṣa).

One is worried when one should not be worried,
Then one laughs when one should not laugh,
One cries when one should not cry,
One strikes when one should not strike.
One speaks when one should not speak,
One is no different from a madman.
Wine removes all good qualities (guna).
The person who has self-respect does not drink.

SECOND PART: THE MORALITY OF PLEDGE
(SAMĀDĀNASILA)²⁵²

Ι. Morality of the lay person or avadātanasana

§ 1. – The fivefold discipline of the upāsaka.

1. The Pañcasīla.

Abstention from the five sins (āpattī), [murder, theft, illicit sex, use of intoxicating drinks], constitutes excellent physical discipline (kāyakṣatasamvara); abstention from falsehood (mryāvada) constitutes the excellent discipline of speech (vākṣasamvara); the whole thing is called ‘discipline of fivefold morality characteristic of the lay practitioner’ (upāsakapāṇḍitasamvara).

Question. – If the eightfold discipline (astvatītasamvara) and the means of pure livelihood (parīsaddhiṣva) constitute morality (cf. p. 771F), why is not the upāsaka, in his discipline of speech (vākṣasamvara) not subject to the threefold discipline [which forbids slander, harmful speech and thoughtless speech, cf. p. 771F] and is not subject to the means of pure livelihood (parīsaddhiṣva)?

Answer. – 1) Lay people (avadātanasana) residing at home (ghyasta) who enjoy worldly pleasures (lokasaṃkhāra) and at the same time cultivate fully both wealth (vītu) and virtue (guna) are unable to practice the laws of morality (śīladharma) completely; this is why the Buddha has them observe [only] five precepts.

2) Moreover, of the four sins of speech (catuṛvādharākkarman), [lying, slander, harmful speech and frivolous speech], lying is the most serious (garipā).

3) Moreover, lying is [always] cultivated (kou tso = samakriya) by the [wicked] intention (cītanāḍa) [from which it originated]; the other [sins of speech, sometimes are refined, sometimes not refined.

4) Moreover, it is enough to list falsehood to include the very fact of the other [sins of speech].

5) Moreover, of the good dharmas (kuśaladharma), truth (satya) takes first place. Speaking true words (sattyavādā) is observing entirely the four kinds of right speech (samyagvādā).

6) Finally, lay persons (avadātanasana) living in the world are officially called to busy themselves with family affairs and to give commands; this is why it is hard for them to observe the rule [forbidding the speaking] of harmful speech (pītrayavādā). But lying, a serious fault due to its refinement, should never be committed.

2. Five kinds of upāsaka.²⁵³

There are five ways of taking (samaddāna) these five precepts (śīla) which makes five kinds of upāsakas: 1) upāsaka of a single practice (ekadasikārī), 2) upāsaka of limited practice (pradekasikārī), 3) upāsaka of developed practice (yuddhīyaskārī), 4) upāsaka of complete practice (paripūnakārī), 5) upāsaka who has renounced sexual activity (samucchinnar).

1) The ekadasikārī takes (samaddāni) only one of the five precepts (pañcasīla) and does not pledge to observe the other four.

2) The pradekasikārī takes either two or three precepts.

3) The yuddhīyaskārī takes four precepts.

4) The paripūnakārī takes all five precepts.

²⁵² For the upāsaka, the main text is the Mahānāmasūtra (Aṭṭhakatta, IV, p. 220-222; Samyutta, V, p. 395; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 927, 928, k. 33, p. 236b-c); widely cited by Buddhaghosa in Samaṅgala, I, p. 235; by the Kośa, IV, p. 70; and by the Kośavyākyā, p. 376-377. – In all the manuals, it concerns the important tīrtha played by the upāsaka in the Buddhist community; we may note particularly of La Vallée Poussin, Notes sur le chemin du Nirvāṇa, § 3. – Les fidèles laïcs ou Upāsaka, BCLS, 1935, p. 15-34; Buddhām, in Legacy of India, 1937, p. 165-170.

²⁵³ This distinction is taken from Mahānāmasūtra in its Sanskrit version; cf. Kośa, IV, p. 73; Kośavyākyā, p. 377. See also Mahāyānapatti, no. 1609-1613.

According to the Mppī, it seems that some upāsakas choose from the five rules constituting the discipline of the upāsaka and observe only one, two, three, or four rules. In this case, one wonders if they deserve the name of upāsaka. According to Kośa, IV, p. 73, every upāsaka pledges to observe the five rules, but may transgress one or another subsequently, and it is this breach that makes the distinction among the various classes of upāsaka.

643 644
5) The samucchinnarāga is the person who, having taken the five precepts, makes the following oath (prāṇidhāna) in the presence of the teacher (āchārya): “I will not have sexual relations with my own wife.” These are the five precepts (pucaśīla).

3. The reward of the uṣāsaka.

[159a] Some stanzas say:

Not killing, not stealing,
Abstaining from forbidden sex,
Telling the truth, not drinking wine,
Living correctly (samyagjiva) constitutes the pure mind.

The person who practices these
In both lifetimes escapes from sadness and fear,
The merit of morality (śīlapuṇya) becomes attached to him,
He is always accompanied by gods and men.

In the world six seasons254 are necessary
For flowers to develop their bright colors.
But one has these annual flowers
In one single day in heaven.

The heavenly tree255 spontaneously produces
Flowers, garlands (mālyu) and necklaces (keyūra).
The red flowers are like the brightness of a torch (dīpajvala),
All the colors are intermingled in them.

There are heavenly garments in immense quantities.
Their colors appear in every hue.
Their cool whiteness provides shade from the sun,
They are light and [their texture] is unbroken.

Their gold threads make embroidery pale
Their decoration is like vapor:
These wondrous garments
All come from the heavenly tree.

Brilliant pearls (māṇi), ear-rings
Precious rings to ornament the hands and feet
At will, all these desirable things
Are given by the heavenly tree.

Golden lotuses (svarūpadalma) with stems (daṇḍa) of vaidūrya,
With diamond (vajra) stamens,
Tender and fragile, with penetrating perfume
Are produced by the celestial pools.

K’in che, Tcheng and K’ouang heou256 guitars
Set with the seven jewels (saptaratna),
Marvelous instruments with pure sounds,
All come from the heavenly tree.

The Po li tche tou tree (Pārijātaka)257

254 The Indian year is divided into two, three, five or six seasons (ayana). The six seasons are known in the Brāhmaṇas; beginning with spring, they are: vasanta, grīrama, varṣa, śarad, hemanta and śiśira. See G. Thibaut, Astrologie, Astronomie et Mathématique, 1899, p. 10-11; Yi tsing, transl. Takakusu, p. 102.

255 This is the Pārijātaka

256 Chinese guitars having five, twelve and twenty-three strings respectively (cf. F. S. Couvreur, Dictionnaire classique de la langue chinoise, Sien-Hsien, 1930, p. 594a, 680b, 680a). But Kumārajīva seems to be too precise in his translation, and the musical instruments used by the Hindus at this time were undoubtedly simpler: see M. Dubois, Notes sur les instruments de musique figurés dans l’art plastique de l’Inde ancienne, BAA, XI, p. 38-49.
All these various joys
Result from generosity and morality.

Whoever wishes to have such a reward
Should exert themselves zealously.

Question. – Here it is a matter of the virtue of morality (sīlapāramitā) by means of which one attains buddhahood; then why praise heavenly happiness (divyavasukha) [which rewards simply morality and nothing else]?

Answer. – The Buddha said: “Three things (varuṇa) necessarily and inevitably bring fruit of retribution (vipākaphala): by means of generosity, great wealth (mahādhanurya) is obtained; by morality (śīla), rebirth in fortunate places is obtained; by meditation (bhāvanā), deliverance (vimokṣa) is obtained.” 218 When one limits oneself to practicing morality, one is reborn in fortunate places; when meditation (bhāvanā), wisdom (prajñā) and loving-kindness (matrīkaraṇā) are joined, one obtains the path of the threefold Vehicles (yānatrayamūrga). Here we are limited to praising morality [which ensures], in the present lifetimes, virtue (gūna), knowledge (bhuvīrṇaṇa) and happiness (sukha) and, in the future lifetime, a reward like that celebrated in the [preceding] stanzas. Just as sugar is put into a bitter medicine so that the child can swallow it, so morality is praised above the other virtues so that people can observe it; when a person observes it, he will make the great resolve (prasīdhāhāra) to arrive at buddhahood. This is how morality (śīla) engenders the virtue of morality (sīlapāramitā).

Moreover, all people are attached to happiness (sukha). Of all worldly happiness (laukikasukha), heaven (svarga) is the greatest. If a person hears about the many kinds of happiness in heaven, he will busy himself in observing morality. Then, when he hears speak of the impermanence of heaven (svargābhāvanā), he will feel distaste (ātiveda) and will seek for deliverance (vimokṣa). Finally, when he hears about the infinite virtues (aprunaṣaṅgaṇa) of the Buddhas, he will develop loving-kindness (matrī) and compassion (karuṇā) and, based on the virtue of morality (sīlapāramitā), he will reach the state of buddhahood. This is why there is no fault in speaking about the reward for morality here.

§ 2. – The eightfold morality of the upavāsastha.219

The Pārijātaka (in Pāli, pārijātuttaka) is a magnolia (kosalā) that grows in the Nandanaśrī of the Tīrīyākṣīna gods; its roots are fifty yojanas deep, it is one hundred yojanas high and its foliage extends to fifty yojanas: it is the foremost place for pleasure and love. In Sanskrit, besides pārijātaka, the reading pārijātaka also occurs (cf. Divyāvalī, p. 194, 195, 219). Here are some references to this tree: Vinaya, I, p. 30; Anguttara, IV, p. 117; Jātaka, I, p. 40, 202; II, p. 20, VI, p. 265, 278; Dhammapadottāka, I, p. 273; Atthasālinī, p. 298; Visuddhimagga, p. 206; Kośa, III, p. 162; Cosmogony of the Dīrgha (T 1, p. 115c, 131c; T 23, p. 278a, 295a; T 24, p. 311c, 342a; T 25, p. 366, 397a; Ting cheng sang yin yuan king, T 165, k. 3, p.398b; Tsie wau, nang, fa t’ien tseu king, T 595, p. 129b.

Actually, all the gods are “appurpositional” (upapādikā); see Kośa, III, p. 27, 165.

217 The Pārijātaka (in Pāli, pārijātuttaka) is a magnolia (kosalā) that grows in the Nandanaśrī of the Tīrīyākṣīna gods; its roots are fifty yojanas deep, it is one hundred yojanas high and its foliage extends to fifty yojanas: it is the foremost place for pleasure and love. In Sanskrit, besides pārijātaka, the reading pārijātaka also occurs (cf. Divyāvalī, p. 194, 195, 219). Here are some references to this tree: Vinaya, I, p. 30; Anguttara, IV, p. 117; Jātaka, I, p. 40, 202; II, p. 20, VI, p. 265, 278; Dhammapadottāka, I, p. 273; Atthasālinī, p. 298; Visuddhimagga, p. 206; Kośa, III, p. 162; Cosmogony of the Dīrgha (T 1, p. 115c, 131c; T 23, p. 278a, 295a; T 24, p. 311c, 342a; T 25, p. 366, 397a; Ting cheng sang yin yuan king, T 165, k. 3, p.398b; Tsie wau, nang, fa t’ien tseu king, T 595, p. 129b.

218 Actually, all the gods are “appurpositional” (upapādikā); see Kośa, III, p. 27, 165.

219 The-divider (śīla) and bhāvanā make up the three meritorious actions (puṇyaṭīrīyavātā) studied in Dīgha, III, p. 218; Anguttara, IV, p. 241; Itivuttaka, p. 51; Netipakaranā, p. 50, 128; Kośa, IV, p. 251.

220 In the Vedas, upavasastha is the day of preparation preceding the Soma sacrifice. The word has passed into Buddhism, not without having gone through transformations: in Pāli, uposatha; in Sanskrit, aposathā (Mahāvāra, I, p. 155, l. 13; II, p. 177, l. 20; III, p. 97, l. 20; III, p. 98, l. 2; Avadānakapāli, VI, v. 76, p. 197), and, more frequently, posadhā (Lalitavistara, p. 25, 41, 55, 76; Divyāvalī, p. 116, l. 21; 121, l. 18; Mahāyuppati, no. 9101, 9287). In Juina Prakrit, there is posada. Hence the traditional Tibetan translation gso-bgyis “that which nourishes Question. – For the lay person (avādātavasana) living at home (gṛhasta), is there not the fourfold morality [of the upāsaka] or are there yet other rules?

Answer. – There is also the “morality of a day-and-a-night” (ātītadvesasāla). If it is observed during the six fasting days (upāsadasaṇa) of the month, the merit (puṇya) is immense (āpramāṇa).261 If one pledges (samādādātī) to observe it, during the twelve months [of the year], from the 1st to the 5th of each month, the merit is even greater.262

1. The taking of vows by the Upavāsatha.263

Question. – How does one take this discipline of one day?

Answer. – Here is the rule for taking the discipline of one day:

Bending one’s knee (jñūnandalam pratiṣṭhāpya) and joining one’s palms together (sattāliṃ pranamya), one should say the following:

(guo = posa) the merits and which washes (śyati = dhau) sins”. The person who is practicing upavāsa is called upasadhika (Mahāvīra, I, p. 205, l. 7; II, p. 8, l. 20), posadhika (Mahāvīraspati, no. 8726), posadhiṣṭa (Divyāvādinī, p. 118, l. 27) or upavāsastha (Kośa, IV, p. 44).

In early Buddhism, the word designated the day preceding the lunar quarters, a sacred weekly day or Sabbath. The early religious communities prior to Buddhism used these days to explain their doctrines (cf. Vinaya, I, p. 101). The Buddhists followed their example and, on the fifteenth day of the lunar fortnight, they held a chapter of the ordination in which the Dharma was explained (Vinaya, I, p. 103). They also chose one or another of the upavāsa days for the recitation of the Pratimokṣa. During the upavāsa days, the lay adepts (avādātavasana) often took it upon themselves to fast and observe some limitations. This practice is called “discipline of a day and a night” (ātītadvesa), for it is for 24 hours only on the 4th, 5th or 15th days of the month, it is also called eightfold morality (avādātavasana) for the lay person pledges to observe eight interdictions other than the fast (ātītadvesa).

It is this morality that is in question here. The main text is the Anguttara, I, p. 205-215 (tr. Woodward, Gaudī Sayings, I, p. 185-195), summarized in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 624b-526a. – See also Pʻi pʻo cha, T 1545, k. 125, k. 124, p. 647b; Kośa, IV, p. 64-69.

The Mppi will explain (p. 835f) the origin of these days of fast. The four fasting days are the 8th and the 14th day of the dark fortnight (kālākṣaṇa), the 8th and the 15th of the bright fortnight (sukkaśaṇa): see Yi tsiung, tr. Takakusu, p. 63, 188. But the texts prefer six days of fast per month, the 8th, 14th, 15th, 29th and 30th days: cf. Hiuan tsang, tr. Wattren, I, p. 304; Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 24, n. 2; Demiéville, Versions chinoises de Milinda-ṣūtra, XXIV, 1924, p. 77.

261 This was the half-month upasada of the Bhāgavat, in Mahāvīra, III, p. 97. The lengthened fast is of Jain inspiration.

262 The Mppi here adopts the ceremony in use by the Sarvāstivādinis, a ceremony recorded in the Che song kie mo pi k’ieus yang yong, T 1439, p. 496b3-20. It consists of the following rituals: 1) taking refuge in a humble posture, 2) declaration that one has taken refuge; 3) confession of past sins, 4) taking the eight vows. 5) taking the fast, 6) declaring one’s intention. – See details in text; cf. Kośa, IV, p. 65.

I, so-and-so (ānudha) today, for one day and one night, take refuge in the Buddha, take refuge in the Dharma, take refuge in the Samgha. – This is repeated a second and a third time.

I, so-and-so, have taken refuge in the Buddha, have taken refuge in the Dharma, have taken refuge in the Samgha. – This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

Today, with a sincere heart, I, so-and-so, confess (pratissayaṃ) every bad physical action, every bad vocal action, every bad mental action that I have committed, out of desire (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) or delusion (moha), in the present life or in past lives.264

With pure body, pure speech and pure mind, I pledge (saṃhāradādātī) to observe the eightfold discipline (avatāgātī) that constitutes the upavāsa [in the language of Ts’ins: dwelling in common]:

1) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from killing living beings, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from killing living beings.
2) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from theft, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from stealing.
3) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from sexual activity, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will abstain from sexual activity.
4) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from lying, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not sit high and elevated seats.
5) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, abstained from drinking wine, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not sit high and elevated seats.
6) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, did not sit on high and elevated seats, so I too, so-and-so, for a day and a night, will not sit on high and elevated seats.
7) Just as the Buddhas, to the end of their life, did not eat past mid-day, so I too, so-and-so, will not eat.
8) Just as the Buddhas, until the end of their life, did not eat past mid-day, so I too, so-and-so, will not eat.265

264 See also this confession of sins followed by a declaration of purity in the Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 625b.

265 These eight vows, in slightly different forms, occur in Anguttara, I, p. 211-212 (Tseng a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 625b-c); Anguttara, IV, p. 255-256 (Chhong a han, T 26, no. 202, k. 55, p. 770b-c; Tchi ai king, T 87, p. 911a-b; Yeou pʻo yi to chö kia king, T 88, p. 912b-c; Pu kouan tehai king, T 89, p. 913a-b.)
Question. – How is the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla) taken?
Answer. – Here is the ceremony for taking the fivefold discipline (pañcaśīla).

The arguments may be found in P'i p'o cha, T 1545, k. 124, p. 645 seq.; Kośa, IV, p. 71-76.

I, so-and-so, pledge (samādadāmi) to observe the eightfold discipline and to imitate (anuśikṣ-) the qualities (kleśā), I wish to arrive at omniscience (sarvakhyāna) and to attain Buddhahood.

2. The taking of vows of the upāsaka.

In agreement with the Sarvāśāvādin-Vaibhāvikas, the Mppś makes the fast or upavāsa, in the proper meaning of fast, consist of the renunciation of taking a meal outside of the proper time; the other eight renunciations are the members of the fast (apavāsāṅga). The Saṅrītītikas do not hold this opinion for, they say, according to the śūtra, immediately after the renunciation of having a meal outside of the time, the person fasting should say: “By this eighth member, I am imitating the rule; I am conforming to the rule of the Arhats.” Cf. Kośa, IV, p. 68.

For these eight aśīlanas, see Traité, I, p. 479ff, n. 2.

Here also the Mppś adopts the ceremony used by the Sarvāśāvādin school which is more complicated than the old ceremony.

a. Originally, it seems that one became upāsaka simply by taking refuge; cf. Anuguttara, IV, p. 220; Sanyutta, V, p. 395; Suttañgalā, I, p. 234: “How, O venerable one, does one become upāsaka? Mahānāman, one becomes upāsaka by the mere fact that one has taken refuge in the Buddha, in the Dharma and in the Sangha.

However, in some old canonical texts we see that the candidate, having taken refuge, then asks the Buddha or the preceptor to consider him as an upāsaka. In the Sarvāśāvādin-Vaibhāvikas (cf. in Kośayākhyā, p. 390, l. 31-32) and its Chinese translation (Tsa a han, T 99, No. 928, k. 33, p. 236c15-16), the candidate, after taking refuge, says to the Buddha: upāsakam mān dhāraya “Consider me as an upāsaka.” Similarly in Dīgha, I, p. 85; Sanyutta, IV, p. 113; Anuguttara, I, p. 56; Vinayana, II, p. 157, the candidate says: āham bhagyavantam sarvamam gacchāmi dhammam ca bhikkhuva sañcita dhāvita ajñātaye pāṇüpute punam gatam. “I take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma and the Sangha; may the Bhagavat consider me as an upāsaka from this day on as long as I live (pāṇikā upavatam).” [as] an upāsaka who has taken refuge.

b. The ceremony is more complicated and the vows more strict in the Sarvāśāvādin sect, as may be seen according to present passage of the Mppś, taken from the Sarvāśāvādin Vinaya (Che song liu, T 1435, k. 21, p. 149c; Che song kie mo pi k’ieou yao yong, T 1439, p. 496a): 1) In a humble posture, the candidate takes the triple refuge.

He declares that he has taken the triple refuge and asks to be considered as an upāsaka.

The ordination master gives him the five precepts (pañcaśīla) incumbent on an upāsaka, and the candidate shows his agreement with each of them.

c. If the two rituals are compared, it may be said that there are two kinds of upāsaka, the one who has merely taken refuge, and the one who, having taken refuge, has farther vowed to observe the five precepts. This distinction is made in the Śāloka, commentary on the Āṣāśāhastikā, ed. Wogihara, p. 331, l. 22: One is an upāsaka because one has taken the triple refuge or because one has [therefore] taken the five precepts. Thus there are two kinds of upāsaka according to the twofold reading attested in the Vinaya: “May the master consider me as an upāsaka who has taken the triple refuge”, or else, “May the master consider me as an upāsaka who has taken the five precepts.”

d. Hence the discussion amongst the scholars. The Apārītikas (scholars from Konkan) and the Saṅrītītikas, basing themselves on the old formulas brought together under a, think that one becomes upāsaka just by taking refuge. On the other hand, the Sarvāśāvādin and the Vaibhāvikas from Kashmir, reasoning from their more complicated ceremonial, are of the opinion that one can only become upāsaka by possessing the discipline, i.e., by taking the five precepts. – The arguments may be found in P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 124, p. 645 seq.; Kośa, IV, p. 71-76.
This is the fivefold discipline that the upāsaka undertakes to observe (samādadāti) during his life. He will pay homage to the Three Jewels (triratna), the Jewel of the Buddha, the Jewel of the Dharma and the Jewel of the Sangha of bhikṣus; he will exert himself energetically in meritorious actions (puyakarman) and so reach the state of Buddhahood.

3. Why celebrate the upavāsa of six days of fasting.

Question. – Why are the six fasting days (upavāsādivasva) chosen to take the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgasāla) and to cultivate merit?

Answer. – During those days, the evil demons pursue people and try to take their lives; sickness and calamities make these days unfavorable (ālīva) for people. This is why, at the beginning of the cosmic period (kalpa), the saints (ārya) recommended that people keep the fast (upavāsa), cultivate goodness and gain merit (punya) [during these fasting days] in order to avoid calamities. At that time the rule of fasting did not involve the observance of the eightfold discipline; the fast consisted merely of not eating for one day. Later when the Buddha appeared in the world (prādhānīya), he gave people the following advice: “For one day and one night (rātrīdivasva) you should observe the eightfold discipline in imitation of the Buddhas and you should abstain from eating past mid-day.”

Such virtue will lead people to nirvāṇa.

[The Caturdevārajāstūra].

Thus the Buddha said in the Sūtra t’ien wang k’ing (Caturdevārajāstūra):

During the monthly six days of fast, the messenger-princes (dītakumāra) and the four kings of the gods (caturdevarā) examine (anuvicaranti) beings. If the people who cultivate generosity, observe morality and honor their parents are few in number (alpaka), they go to the Tao li gods (Trīṣyastraṁśa) and inform Ti che (Śakra); Śakra and the gods are unhappy (anudittamana) and say: “Surely the armies of the asuras are increasing and the armies of the devas are decreasing.” If the people who cultivate generosity, observe morality and honor their parents are many (bha), the gods and Śakra are happy and say: “The armies of the devas are increasing and the armies of the asuras are decreasing.”

One day, seeing the joy of the gods, Che t’i p’o na min (Śakra devānām indra) spoke this stanza:

He who, for six days and the marvelous fortnight,

Pledges to observe pure morality,

To the end of his life

Will be my equal in virtue.

The Buddha said to the bhikṣus: “Śakradevendra should not have spoken this stanza. Why? Śakradevendra has not expelled the five obstacles (read: wou chouai) nor the three poisons.” How could he claim that by 271 Whereas the Caturdevarājāstūra speaks of a fortnight (pāśka), the Mppi speaks of a month: whether there are three days of fast per fortnight or six days of fast per month, the result is the same, but there is a change in the calculation.

272 According to the sutra, the ministers proceed with this examination on the 8th and the 14th day of each fortnight, the four great kings on the 15th day, the pannawaka upasatthu.

273 Śakra and the Trīṣyastraṁśa gods assemble for the occasion in the Sudhārūḍ, the meeting hall, situated south-east of the city Sudarṣāna, on the summit of Mount Meru. For Sudhārūḍ, see Dhīgha, II, p. 268; Majjima, II, p. 79; Saṃyutta, I, p. 22; Aṅguttara, I, p. 143; Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 10, p. 63a; k. 20, p. 131b; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 33, p. 637b; Tsa a han, T 99, k. 40, p. 292b; Tseng yā a han, T 125, k. 26, p. 697b; Mahāvastu, I, p. 32, III, p. 198; Divyāvadana, p. 220, P’i p’o cha, T 1545, k. 133, p. 692a; Kota, III, p. 163.

274 This stanza is repeated four times in Aṅguttara, I, p. 144-146:

Chhalukhaśaṭikacanāśu patiñcatāsumajjamati pūrṇahṛtāyapakākham ca atithihosattvamātaram uposathānām upasasyeyya ya pasu mādūdayo naro tī.

With the exception of the last line, it also occurs in Saṃyutta, I, p.208; Suttanipīta, v. 402; Therīgāthā, v. 31, p. 126; Dhammapadaṭṭha, IV, p. 21. – “He who observes the uposatha with its eight aspects, on the 14th, 15th and 16th day and during the pūṇamettikākha ...” Pratikālāyapakākhā translated into Chinese as chen pien yue (113 and 5; 149 and 16; 74) in T 99, p. 296a7; as chen tiao yue (113 and 5; 157; 74) in T 1509, p. 160a18; according to the suggested explanations of Buddhaghosa (Śīrātha, I, p. 307), it is the additional fasts preceding (paccaggamanan) and following (anugamana) the usual days of abstinence.
observing the discipline of one day that a man would definitely be like him in virtue (guṇa) and in reward for merit (punyavipāka)? The man who undertakes to observe this discipline will definitely (read ā, 61 and 2; instead of ā, 61) be like the Buddha: this is true (satyavāda). As for the great gods, because of the joy that they experience, they will obtain an increase of merit (punyavardhaka).²³⁵

***  ***  ***

Furthermore, during the six days of fast, the evil demons torment people and spread trouble everywhere. But if there is some place, a hamlet, a village, a town, a district, a country or a city, where people observe the fast, observe the discipline and cultivate goodness, the evil demons are driven away and the region remains in peace (vogoskema). This is why, by keeping the fast and the precepts during these six days, one obtains increase in merit.

4. The origin of the six fasting days.

Question. – Why did the father of the demons busy himself during the six days with cutting up meat, drawing blood and offering them up in the fire?

Answer. – There are two reasons (hetupratyaya) for considering the two disciplines as equivalent. According to the Caturdevatā, the four gods of heaven and earth: the Mppā means the Buddhist Cosmogony, the original Samkṛiti of which is lost, but which is known by four Chinese versions, one connected to the T'ch'ang a han, under the name of Che ki king (T 1, k. 18-22, p. 114-149), the others transmitted separately under the name of Ta leou tu an king (T 23), K' i che king (T 24), K' i che yin pen king (T 25). Although the legend told here does not occur there, it concerns demons and gods (cf. T 1, k. 20, p. 135a-b).

Neither the Dīghāṅgāra nor the Dīghāṅgāma of the Sarvāstivādin contain this Cosmogony. If it did have it, the Mppā, according to its custom, would be referring to the Dīghāṅgama and not, as it does here, to the Sūtra on Cosmogony, for our author prefers to give the title of the general collection (āgama) rather than that of the sūtra in which it is incorporated. Thus, quoting a passage pf the Aṭāṅkāsūtra twice, it refers its reader simply to the Dīghāṅgama (see T'suī, I, p. 300F, 544F).

On the other hand, this Cosmogony has been incorporated into the Chinese Dīghāṅgama, or T'ch'ang a han (T 1), but this work is not of Sarvāstivādin provenance, and everything points to its Dharmagupta origin (see above, p. 811F, n. 1).

Question. – Why did the father of the demons busy himself during the six days with cutting up meat, drawing blood and putting them in the fire?

Answer. – Mo hī cheou lo (Maheśvara)²³⁷ is the foremost and greatest of the gods. Each of the gods has his share of days: i) Maheśvara, as his share, has four days per month, the 8th, the 23rd, the 14th and the 29th day; ii) the other gods have two days per month, the first day, the 16th, and the second day, the 17th; iii) the 15th and the 26th day are dedicated (apeksāte) to all the gods together. Maheśvara is the chief (pati) of the gods; since he has the largest number of days, the four days that belong to him are counted as days of fasting (upavāsadvāsa); also counted as fasting days are the two days belonging to all the gods together: [this is how there come to be six fasting days per month, the 8th, 14th, 15th, 23rd, 29th and 30th]. This is why the demons gain sudden strength during these six days.

So the demon-father was busy during these six days cutting up meat, drawing blood and offering them up in the fire. After twelve years, [Brahmā], king of the gods, came down from heaven and said to his son: ‘What do you want to get?’ He answered: “I would like to have a son.” The king of the gods said to him: “Among recluses (śrāvaka), the rule about worship (piṭā) is to offer incense (gandha), sweet fruits and other pure things. Then why do you put meat and blood into the fire? That is a faulty practice. Because you have infringed on the holy ritual and are involved in bad practices, you will father a bad son who eats meat and drinks blood.” Hardly had he said this when eight big demons who were in the fire arose, their bodies black as ink, their hair yellow and their eyes red; they glowed brightly. All demons have come from these eight. And so, if during these six days, meat is cut up, blood is drawn and they are put in the fire, they regain strength.

In the Buddhadharmā there are no good or bad days; but in order to conform (amavartana) to what [is thought to be] bad days, it is advisable to keep the fast and to take the eight precepts [during these six days].

5. Comparison between the pañcicāḷā of the upāsaka and the aṣṭāṅgāśhāla of the upavāsāśaṅī.

Question. – Which is preferable, the fivefold discipline [of the upāsaka] or the [eightfold] discipline of one day [taken by the upavāsāśaṅī]?

Answer. – There are two reasons (ketuprayāya) for considering the two disciplines as equivalent.

1) Only the fivefold discipline (pañcicāḷā) is observed for one’s entire life (jīvavājīvam), whereas the eightfold discipline (aṣṭāṅgāśhāla) is observed for one day [for six days of the month]. But if the fivefold morality is great by reason of the duration of its perpetual observance, it is small by reason of the number of rules [which are only five]; on the other hand, the morality of one day lasts for a very short time but involves more rules, [eight].

²³⁵ According to the Caturdevatāsūtra, more detailed, the five obstacles would be jāti, jāti, mārana, kṣota, parideve; and the three poisons, rdga, chvesa and moha (see text above, p. 844F, as n.). However, vana chomai, “five obstacles” may mean the five signs of death among the lower gods: see Kośa, III, p. 136.

²³⁶ By T’ien ti pen k’i king “Sūtra on Cosmogony,”²⁷⁶ says: During the first phase of the cosmic period (kalpa), there was a son of a Fan t’ien wang (Maheśvara or Śiva), see references in Traité, I, p. 137-139F.

²³⁷ On Maheśvara or Śiva, see references in Traíśāi, I, p. 137-139F.
2) Furthermore, if one is lacking a high ideal (mahācitta), one will be able to observe the [five] precepts as long as one lives, but one will not be the equal of the person with a great ideal who observes [the eight] precepts for one day only. Thus, if the general is a feeble man, were he commander of soldiers for his entire life, his lack of skill and bravery would prevent him from earning the title entirely. On the other hand, a brave, courageous, zealous man who stands up in the midst of chaos is able to conquer the world by his deeds of a single day.

6. The four levels of the lay person’s discipline.

[160c] These two kinds of disciplines, [pākaśīla of the upāsaka and abhāṅgaśīla of the upāvāsakha], make up the rules (dharma) for upāsakas living at home (grhaḥṣaṭha). The morality of the householder is of four kinds: lower (avaru), middling (madhyuḥ), higher (agru) or absolutely highest (atayagra).

1) The lower person observes morality in order to enjoy the present lifetime, out of fear for his reputation or his renown, by domestic discipline, to adapt himself to the opinions of another, to avoid subordinate employment, or to escape from difficulties. The lower person observes morality for all of these reasons.

2) The middling person observes morality to enjoy wealth and nobility, happiness and power among men. Or else, in the hope of future happiness (paratrasukha) he tames himself and attempts mortification to get a considerable result in a short time. In this state of mind (manasikāra), he observes discipline strictly. Just as a voyage to distant regions is worth considerable profit to a merchant, so the merit of morality assures the considerable result in a short time. In this state of mind (manasikāra) one observes morality for all these reasons.

3) The superior man observes morality in order to reach nīvaṇa, to know the universal impermanence (anityatā) of all dharmas, to escape from suffering and to enjoy the unconditioned (asamskṛta) eternally. Besides, the moral man has no regret; having no regret, he acquires joy (muditā); having joy, he acquires one-pointedness of mind (ekacitta); having one-pointedness of mind, he acquires true knowledge (nirvedacitta); having true knowledge, he experiences revulsion (nirvedacitta) [for the world]; feeling this revulsion, he acquires renunciation (vairāgya); having renunciation, he acquires deliverance (vinokṣa); having deliverance, he reaches nīvaṇa: thus morality is the root of all good dharmas (sārvakṣaśādharmanīlā). Finally, morality is the gateway (āyutana) of entry into the eightfold Buddha path (ādhyātma-gāmidaṇga); by working with it, one necessarily arrives at nīvaṇa.

Question. — In [the list] of the eight branches of the Path, right speech (samyaksūla) and right action (samyakkarmanā) [which constitute morality or śīla] are placed in the middle [in 3rd and 4th place, respectively], whereas right vision (samyagdṛṣṭi) and right intention (samyaktipālā) [which constitute wisdom or pajñā] are placed first [1st and 2nd place, respectively]. Then why do you say that morality is the doorway of entry into the eightfold Buddha Path?

Answer. — In the list [of the eight branches of the Path], the most important is put first, namely, right vision (samyagdṛṣṭi). Moreover, before undertaking the Path, it is first necessary to ‘see’. But in the order of things (dharmasamākramāna), morality comes first. It is like when a house is being built: although the ridge-pole is the most important piece, one begins by taking the ground.

4) The absolutely superior person observes morality because he wants to reach Buddhahood out of his compassion (anukampa) for beings; because, knowing all dharmas, he is seeking their true nature (satyalakṣaṇa). He does not fear the unfortunate destinies (durgāni) and does not seek happiness. The absolutely superior person practices morality for all these reasons.

In general (sāṁdhyāntah), this fourfold discipline is called the morality of the upāsaka.

II. Morality of the monastic or pravrajīta.

There are four kinds of disciplines (śīla) among monastics (pravrajīta):

1) discipline of the śrāmaṇera (novice) and śrāmaṇerikā, 2) discipline of the lākṣāmāṇī (probationer). 3) discipline of the bhikṣuṇī (nun), 4) discipline of the bhikṣu (monk).

1. Superiority of the monastic vows over the lay vows.276

276 Can the upāsaka obtain the fruits of the religious life (śrāmaṇayupaha) or reach arahathood and obtain nīvaṇa? Or are these benefits reserved for the monastic alone, for the bhikṣu? For this question, see Oldenberg, Bouddha, p. 358-359; Rh. D., Dialogue of the Buddha, III, p. 5; Oltramare, Théosophie, II, p. 131; L de La Vallée Poussin, in Kouta, IV, p. 69, n. 2; Demiéville, Les versions chinoises de Milindapañha, BEFEO, XXIV, 1934; N. Dutt, Place of ūlāy in Early Buddhism, IHQ, XXI, 1945, p. 180-183.

We are asked to distinguish between the Theravādin position and that of the Sarvāstivādin, but it seems that Buddhists never differed on this question; their thesis is very simple and can be summarized in two words: Theoretically, the upāsaka can gain all the perfections of the bhikṣu, but practically, his spiritual progress will be slower and less certain.

1) In theory, the upāsaka can obtain all the fruits of the religious life: “As the Ganges river bends, inclines and flows down to the sea, so Gautama’s congregation, lay as well as monastic, bends, inclines and flows toward nirvāṇa (nīvaṇa) — even evāya Gotamasamā pratiṣaṇa sahaṇāppasaṁbhājīta nīvaṇānāṁ nīvaṇānāṁ nīvaṇāpattāh.”

It is a matter of course that the ordinary upāsaka, no different from the bhikṣu of middling virtue, will not attain nīvaṇa straight away. The majority of upāsakas, “not having broken the fetter of the lay life, will be reborn after death in the heavens” (Majjhima, I, p. 483: bhīṣyo ye gṛīhaścāsyaśānasaṁyāpallāha kāyasya bhūtāt saṇāyānāṁ or), and we have seen above (p. 822F) that celestial bliss and particularly rebirth in the paradise of the Tīrāyātrīṃa gods are the usual rewards for lay morality.

Nevertheless, all the canonical scriptures, Pāli as well as Sanskrit, agree in saying that there are many especially worthy upāsakas who have access to the first three fruits of the Path and who become srotāpānina, sakṛiddhagamin and anāgāmin:
a. “Many are the upāsakas, disciples of the Buddha, householders, wearing the white robe and cultivating the sense-pleasures … who adapt their life to the teachings of the master (Majjhima, I, p. 491. bhikkho va ye su upāsaka mama sīvakkā gihā nādittavanā kāmabhūgino … sattadhāvane vibhārānī. Such a person “breaking the three fetters (kājīyati, vicikītā and īlāsavatipārājga) is a stream-enterer, is not subject to rebirth in the lower destinies, is assured of deliverance) and destined to obtain supreme enlightenment’’ (cf. Majjhima, I, p. 467, and T 99, k. 34, p. 24765-7: cinnā samyojānaṃ parikkheyyā lokaṭāppuṇṇo avipītipaddhunāṃ nīyatā sambodhipattiyāhunā).

b. The same canonical sources also praise the upāsaka who “by breaking the three fetters and reducing passion, aggression and ignorance has become a once-returner; after having returned to this world once, he will attain the end of suffering” Majjhima, I, p. 467, and T 99, k. 34, p. 246v29-2471: cinnā samyojānaṃ parikkheyyā vādukkosasahāminuṁ nāmarājāniśātta jāyatā avimānuṇaḥ antam kārīvāti.

c. Finally, many are the upāsakas, disciples of the Buddha, householders, wearing the white robe, but observing charity who, by breaking the five course fetters (kājīyati, vicikītā, īlāsavatipārājga, kāmabhūgana and vyāsita) have become beings who are reborn in the world of the gods and who attain nirvāṇa; they are not subject to returning to this world” (Majjhima, I, p. 490. and T 99, k. 34, p. 246v19-20: bhikkho vu ye upāsaka mama sīvakkā gihā nādittavanā bhavāčārīni pañcāsanāṃ avipītipaddhunāṃ samyojānaṃ parikkheyyā tapaṣṭikā bhūti avinduṭṭhāhunā avimānuṭṭhānī avimānuṭṭhānā.

On the attainment of these three fruits by the upāsaka, see also Tchong a han, T 26, k. 18, p. 546b.

But can the upāsaka also obtain the fourth and last fruit of the Path, viz., arhathood and nirvāṇa? Yes, unhesitatingly say the Utpalaipakhas in the Karāvattu, Lp. 167: “The lay person can become arhat” (gihī ‘sū avara). But the Theravādins hesitate, quibble and disagree with a test of the Majjima, I, p. 483, that says:

Without having broken the fetter which binds the lay person, no lay person can, after death, put an end to suffering’ (N’āthi koci gihī sūvamyojānaṃ appañkhya kāyasavā bhedā dukkhaṃ antam kārīvā). But that is not the question: the main thing is whether the lay person, while remaining a lay person, can break the fetter that binds and thus put an end to suffering. That is it possible if not easy is what the Theravādins themselves implicitly recognize; actually, in their Aṅguttara, II, p. 45, they list about twenty lay people, Trupassa and Bhallika at the head of the list, who have attained cessation (nibbāna), immortality (ameta), without ever having being ordained. In Samyutta, V, p. 410 and Tsa a han, T 99, no. 1128-1129, k. 1, p. 298v, they recognize that the reverence of honest people, the hearing of the holy Dharma, right reflection and conformity with the precepts of the Dharma – qualities that are within the reach of the upāsaka as well as of the bhikkha – are sufficient to assure the obtaining of the four fruits of the Path including the state of arhat.

2) But if lay discipline correctly practiced leads to sainthood, what is the use of becoming a monastic?

This question was asked by Menander of Āsipyāla who did not know how to answer (cf. Milinda, p. 19-21); it was Nāgasena who provided the solution for this difficulty to the king: the monastic attains sainthood more quickly and more assuredly than the lay person (cf. Tsa pao tsang king, T 203, no. 111, k. 9, p. 492c. tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 120-123). This is the position of all the other Buddhist authors who never fail to underline the dangers of the lay life and the benefits of the monastic life. Although he is a disciple of the Buddha, the lay person is always troubled by passion, aggression and ignorance. This is because he is not yet free of depravity for, if he were free of it, he would no longer stay at home and would not eat as he pleases (Majjhima, I, p. 91). The wise man should renounce the world and leave his family: “Let him leave his son and his wife, his father and mother, wealth and harvests, friends and all objects of desire; let him wander alone like the rhinoceros. Let him say: Family life is a bond; there is little happiness there; little joy, many problems; it is fish-hook; let him wander alone like a rhinoceros” (Suttaṭṭhapāna, v. 60 sq). The monastic life offers immense benefits to those who thirst for salvation; they are fully described in the heavens (svarga), of finding the Path (ābhāsvaṃ) of the bodhisattvas and of reaching nirvāṇa, why resort to the monastic discipline (pravrajīta)?

Answer. – I) Salvation is found by these two moralities, but with greater or lesser ease. Those who remain at home (gṛhaśātha) are overloaded with business during their lifetime; if they want to apply their minds to things of the Path (māgladharmo), their domestic affairs decline; if they want to busy themselves with their domestic affairs, the Dharma things suffer from it; observing the Dharma without adding anything and without subtracting anything is difficult. But for the monastic (pravrajīta) who has renounced the world and made a break with all the causes of restlessness, practicing the Path by exclusive exertion (aṅkāntikāyaṃ) is easy.

2) Besides, those who remain at home are troubled with many cares and preoccupations; [these are] a cause of fetters (samyojana) and an occasion for faults that constitute a problem. The monastic is like a person who has withdrawn into the forest (aranya) beyond any human habitation; he can fix his mind one-pointedly (aṅkāntikāya); when he has neither thought (cintāna) nor speculation (ūrka), his inner consciousness (ādhyātmikasamākhyā) vanishes and outer objects (bhāvyavacca) disappear. Some stanzas say:

Withdrawn into the forest,
Alone, he wipes out his faults.
In calm and rest, he attains single-mindedness (cittāna);
His happiness is greater than divine.

People seek wealth, nobility and profit,
Fame, garments and comfortable beds,
But their happiness is not peace (sujabhiyā).

The search for profit is insatiable.

But the Theravādins see the drawbacks of monastic life in greater or lesser ease.” In his journey to sainthood, the lay person encounters more difficulties than the monastic: he is subject to a more complete discipline which requires sustained effort; the faults that he may commit are somewhat neutralized by his vows that he has professed; they delay but do not prevent his spiritual progress.

659
He who wears the robes (pāṃśukūlika) and begs his food
Does not know restlessness; his mind is always fixed.
With the eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣuṣa)
He contemplates the True [nature] of dharmas.

Into all kinds of sermons (dhammaparyāya)
He penetrates with the view of sameness (saṃpasīṇa).
Wisdom (ijjāna) and peace of mind (cittatānti)
Have no equal in the threefold world (traiḍhitūka).

From that we know that the morality observed by the monastic makes the practice of the Dharma easy.
3) Besides, the cultivation of morality by the monastic earns him an infinite discipline (apramāṇāśīlasamvāra) and the fulfillment of all the equipment for salvation (sarvasambhāraparipūri).
This is why the lay person (avādātavasana) likewise should leave the world (pravraj-ī) in order to acquire perfect morality (paripūnasīla).
4) Besides, in the Buddhadharma, the monastic life (pravrajya) is extremely difficult to practice (paramaḍhūṣa).

[Jambukhādakasūtra] 279

Thus the brahmacharin Yen feou k’ia (Jambukhādaka) asked Śāriputra:
“What is most difficult in Buddhism?”
Śāriputra replied: “The religious life is difficult.”
Jambukhādka continued: “But where is the difficulty?”
- “For the monastic, compliance with the Dharma (dharmanuṭipatti) is difficult.
The cultivation of all the good dharmas (sarvakṣādaladharmabhāvāna) is difficult.
This is why the religious life should be embraced.

279 This sūtra, entitled Dukkharav “Difficulty”, is taken from a chapter of the Samyutta, the Jambukhādakasamyutta, telling about a conversation between Śāriputra and his nephew, the chanuṣāṇabhūṣa Jambukhādaka. In the Chinese version (T 99, no. 490, k. 18, p. 126a), the Dukkaratattata is at the beginning of the chapter; in the Pāli version (Samyutta, IV, p. 260), it is placed at the end.

280 This reading is vouched for in the Chinese version T 99, k. 18, p. 126a11; in the Pāli version there is the variant dharmadharmapariṇām, meaning “conduct in harmony with the Dharma”. Cf. Geiger, Pāli Dhamma, p. 115.

5) Moreover, when a person becomes a monastic (pravrajati), king Mfhr, frightened and saddened, says:
“The fetters (saṃyojana) will diminish in this person; they will certainly attain nirvāṇa and increase the ranks of the Jewel of the samgha (saṃgharāṇa).”

6) Moreover, in Buddhism, the monastic who violates the precepts and undergoes punishment will attain deliverance once this punishment has been undergone.

[Utpalavarnā Jātaka] 281 The Yeou po lo houa pi k’ieou ni pen cheng king (Utpalavarnābhikṣaṇājātakastra) says:

When the Buddha was living in this world, this bhikṣuḥ had become an arhat possessing the six superknowledges (suddhihpāti). She was dwelling in the house of a [161b] nobleman and endlessly praised the monastic life (pravrajya). She said to the women of this nobleman: “Sisters, you should become nuns.”
The women said to her: “We are young and our faces are beautiful; it would be difficult for us to observe the precepts (śīla); we would violate them sometimes.”
The bhikṣuḥ answered: “Just become nuns and, as for violating the precepts, violate them!”
They said: “But if we break the precepts, we will fall into hell. Why could we violate them?” – “As for falling into hell, fall into hell!”
The nobleman’s women made fun of Utpalavarnā and said to her: “In hell one suffers punishment; why should we fall into hell?”

The bhikṣuḥ replied: “I remember my previous lives (pūrvaṇaśāntaḥṣeṣa)…” Once I was an actress (ketādikā) and I told old stories in all kinds of costumes. One day as a joke, I put on the robes of a novice nun, and because of that, at the time of the Buddha Kāyapa, I myself became a bhikṣuḥ. Proud of my noble lineage and my beauty, I developed pride (ahāmānā) and violated the precepts. As punishment for this, I fell into hell and there I suffered all kinds of punishment. Once the expiation was over, I met the Buddha Śākyamuni; I became a nun and now I possess the six superknowledges (abhiṣiktā). Know then that by becoming a monastic and taking the precepts – even if one breaks them subsequently – one will attain arhathood thanks to them. But if one is content to commit sins without having taken the precepts, one will never attain the Path.282 And so, from very early times, from one lifetime to the next, I fell into hell; when 281 This is about the nun Utpalavarnā who has already been considered above, p. 638F, and about whom there is a lot of information; cf. Malalasekera, I, p. 418-421; Akaruna, p. 715-716; Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 155; Watters, On Yuan Chwang’s Travels, I, p. 334, 337. Nevertheless, to my [Lamotte] knowledge, the present jātaka does not occur elsewhere.

282 In order to ensure his final salvation, a criminal had better become a monastic than remain in the world. On this subject see Dhammapadātha, I, p. 147.

“Having seen his [criminal] state, the Tatthāgata ordained Devadatta. Actually he said to himself: If Devadatta does not leave the world and remains a layman, since he has committed such serious crimes, he will be unable to see his future lifetimes with confidence; but if he enters into religion, no matter how grave the actions he has committed, he will be able to look upon his future lifetimes with confidence. This is why the teacher ordained

661 662
I came out of hell, I was an evil man and, when this evil man died, he fell into hell again, and all that without the least benefit. Know then that the monastic who has taken the precepts, even if he breaks them subsequently, will nevertheless obtain the fruit of the Path (mārgaphala) thanks to them.

[Ordering of an intoxicated brähman. - While the Buddha was at Tche houan (ketavana), a drunk brähman approached him and asked to become a bhikṣu. The Buddha ordered Ānanda to shave his head and give him the monk’s robes. When his intoxication had worn off, the brähman was frightened, did not want to be a bhikṣu any longer and fled. The monks asked the Buddha: “Why did you allow this drunk brähman to become a bhikṣu?” The Buddha replied: “For numberless kalpas, this brähman did not even have the idea of becoming a monastic. Today, as a result of his drunkenness, he made a small resolution (sīksmaṇicintrapāda) thanks to which, later, he will leave the world and obtain the Path.”

For all of these reasons, the religious life has many benefits and this is why the lay person (avādīravasana), even though he has the fivefold discipline (pancaśīla) is not like a monastic (pravrajyā). The discipline (samvara) of the monastic is of four kinds, namely, the discipline of the śrāmaṇera (novice) and the śrāmaṇerikā, that of the sīksamāṇā (probationer), that of the bhikṣuṇi and, finally, that of the bhikṣu (monk).

2. Morality of the śrāmaṇera.283

How do the śrāmaṇeras and śrāmaṇerikās take the precepts (śīlaṃ samādhatu) when they leave the world (pravrajyā)?

The lay person who wishes to leave the world should find two masters: 1) a preceptor (upādhyāya), 2) a tutor (acarā).284 The upādhyāya will take the place of father for him and the acarā, that of mother: since he is abandoning his natural parents, he must seek parents in the religious life.285

Devadatta. Actually, after a hundred thousand kalpas, the latter will become a pratyekabuddha with the name Athissara.”

283 In its description of the ordination of the śrāmaṇera, the sīksamāṇā, the bhikṣuṇi and the bhikṣu, the Mūla is directly inspired by the Sārvāstivādin Vinaya (T 1535) which contains an entire ordination ritual, a summary of which may be found in the Che song kie mo pi ki’t eus yao yong, T 1439, p. 496 seq.

284 The novice then becomes the sārdayaśādhiṃ in the upādhyāya and the antevaci of the acarā, but we do not know what distinguishes these two teachers. The duties of the sārdayaśādhiṃ towards the upādhyāya (Pāli Vinaya, II, p. 222-231) are exactly the same as those of the antevaci towards the acarā (ibid., II, p. 231). Nevertheless, the upādhyāya seems to have had more importance than his colleague: he plays the principal rôle in the ordination ceremonies (Vin., I, p. 56-57) and his responsibility therein is more binding (Vin., IV, p. 114-115). Buddhist scriptures have retained lists of upādhyāyas who followed one after another in the course of time (cf. Przyłęcki, Aśoka, p. 46-48), but have not transmitted the names of acarās to posterity. In Brāhmaṇism, on the other hand, the acarā was more important than the upādhyāya (Manu, II, 145; Yājñavalkya, I, 35). – Cf. Oldenberg, Vinaya Texts, I, p. 178, n. 2).

Having put on the yellow robes (kāśāyini vatthūhī acchodāparṇi) and having cut one’s hair and beard (kesamassum ohārāparṇa), with his two hands he should grasp [161c] the feet of his upādhyāya (upājñāyassvā pāde vandapari).286 Why grasp the feet? In India, it is the custom to grasp the feet as a sign of respect and supreme veneration (paramādinasupaniṣṭi).

The śīcārya should teach (śīkṣate) him the ten rules (daśaśīkṣāpada)287 according to the ordination rite (upasampadaśīlhaṁ). It is the same for the śrāmaṇerikā except that [in place of a bhikṣu] she has a bhikṣuṇi as upādhyāyikā.

3. Morality of the sīksamāṇā.288

The sīksamāṇā pledges to observe the six rules (saddharma) for two years.289

Question. – The śrāmaṇera, possessor of the ten precepts (daśaśīkṣāpada), is able to directly take the full discipline of the bhikṣu (purpiṇñārāja) [without passing through an intermediate stage]. Why must [the śrāmaṇerikā], in the career of the bhikṣuṇi, go through a stage of sīksamāṇā in order to take the full discipline [of the bhikṣuṇi] later?

Answer. – When the Buddha was in this world, the wife of an eminent man (śrīrethābhādha), left the world and took on the full discipline [making her a bhikṣuṇi]. Subsequently when her pregnancy became noticeable, all the nobles blamed (jugapti) this bhikṣuṇi. Because of that, it was established that, for two years, women should practice the discipline (śīlaṃ śīla-) by taking the six precepts [of the sīksamāṇā] and only after that could they take the full discipline of the bhikṣuṇi.286

286 Ceremony of pravrajyā which, in early times was confused with that of upasampadā (cf. I, p. 22).
287 The ten śīkṣāpada of the novice are well known in the texts: cf. Vin. I, p. 83-84). The novice must refrain from: 1) killing (gāndhavilepanadāna); 2) theft (gāndhavilepanadānā); 3) impurity (gāndhavilepanadānā); 4) falsehood (gāndhavilepanadānā); 5) intoxicating liquors (suurvīramayaṁpaddāmānāṇā); 6) eating outside of the proper time (vīkālabhojana); 7) attending worldly entertainments (naccaugālaṁpaddāvadāsana); 8) using unguents, perfumes and ornaments on the body (mālāgandhāravipadhānāmalānādāvabhojanā); 9) sleeping on a high or wide bed (naccaugamālānākṣavā); 10) accepting gold or silver (jātirupamāṇaptapattigahana).
289 The six rules of the sīksamāṇā are the same as the first six śīkṣāpada of the śrīmaṇerikā. Thus the śīkṣāmāṇa vows to refrain, for two years, from killing, stealing, impurity, lying, intoxicating drinks and eating outside of the proper time. Cf. Vin. IV, p. 319.
290 The story of the pregnant bhikṣuṇi is told in Pāli Vin. IV, p. 317; Mahāsākāra Vin. T 1421, k. 12, p. 92a-b; Dharmagupta Vin. T 1428, k. 27, p. 754b; Mālaśārvāraudihāna Vin., T 1443, k. 18, 1005c. According to the latter text, it concerned the bhikṣuṇi Śubhānanda, known in the Vinaya for her breaches of all kinds of disciplines. See E. Waldschmidt, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣuṇi-Pratimokṣa des Śrīvatsatīdrāma, 1926, p. 135.
4. Morality of the bhikṣuṇī

When a woman wants to take full ordination [which will make her a bhikṣuṇī], in the presence of the two assemblies (ubhayasamgha), she must be furnished with the fivefold robe (pañca-cīvara), the begging bowl (pātra), a bhikṣuṇī as preceptor (upādāhyā) and tutor (ācārīnā), a bhikṣu as “master of discipline” (śīla-caryā), etc., in accordance with the ordination ritual (apāsampādādharma).

Generally (samāsataḥ), the discipline of the bhikṣuṇī consists of 500 rules; in detail (vīratarataḥ), of 80,000 rules.295

After the third official proposal (trītyā karmāvācana) she obtains the immense discipline (aprāmāṇa-upavarsā) that makes her a bhikṣuṇī.

---

285 Generally, it is accepted that the discipline of the bhikṣu involves 250 rules, that of the bhikṣuṇī 500 rules (see also P‘i ni mou king, T 1463, k. 8, p. 850c15-16; Wei Annals, ch. 114); but these round numbers are not exact. According to Waldschmidt, Bhikṣuṇīprātimokṣa, the exact number of rules in the Prātimokṣa of the various schools is as follows:

- Chinese Sārvāstivādin: 257 (bhikṣu), 365 (bhikṣuṇī)
- Sanskrit Sārvāstivādin: 263, --
- Chinese Mālasāvāstivādin: 245, 354
- Tibetan “ ” 262, 371
- Mahāyānastūpa “ ” : 255, --
- Mahāklāśaka: 251, 380
- Mahāmāyāgikha: 218, 290
- Dharmagupta: 250, 348
- Pili: 227, 311

286 The bhikṣu and bhikṣuṇī receive ordination by means of the jhāpaticaturbhukārakaraṇa, “the ecclesiastical act where the motion (jhāpa) is fourth (caturtho),” which means: the (threefold) act which, with the motion, makes four. The act of ordination consists of a motion (jhāpa) followed by three proposals (karmāvācana) related to the acceptance of the motion by the community:

a. The motion. – The community is requested by a learned and capable monk who says: “Let the community listen: So-and-so, present here, who is a student of the venerable so-and-so, wishes to receive ordination. If the community is willing, let it confer the ordination: this is the motion.”

b. The three proposals. – The monk continues: “Let the community listen: So-and-so, present here, who is a student of the venerable so-and-so, wishes to receive ordination. The community confers ordination to so-and-so with so-and-so as preceptor. Whoever is in agreement that ordination be conferred, let him be silent. Whoever disagrees, let him speak.” This proposal (karmāvācana) is repeated three times. After the third proposal (trītyā karmāvācana), if the community is silent, the ordination is acquired and the monk says: “So-and-so has received ordination from the community with so-and-so as preceptor. The community is agreed; that is why they are silent: thus do I understand.”

On these ceremonies, cf. Vinaya, I, p. 56, 95 (for the bhikṣu); II, p. 274 (for the bhikṣuṇī); J.Filliozat, Frag. du Vin. des Mālaśaur., JA, 1938, p. 50: Oldenberg, Boudhia, p. 390.

In acts of lesser importance, the motion may be followed by a single proposal instead of three; this is called jhāpaticaturbhukārakaraṇa, “the ecclesiastical act where the motion is second”, i.e., the (simple) act which, with the motion, makes two. Cf. Oldenberg, Vinaya Texts, I, p. 169, n. 2.
5. Morality of the bhikṣu.

As for the bhikṣu, he [must] have the three robes (tricivara), the begging bowl (śīla), three masters and a chapter of ten monks (daivalgav) conforming to the ordination ritual (apasampadidharma).

On the whole, the discipline of the bhikṣu involves 250 rules; in detail, 80,000 rules.

After the third proposal (pṛyād karmaścāvata), he obtains the immense discipline [that makes him a bhikṣu].

In general, that is what is called morality or śīla.

CHAPTER XXIII: THE VIRTUE OF MORALITY (p. 853F)

[162a] Question. – Now that we know the characteristics of morality (uddilakṣaṇa), what is the virtue of morality (uḍḍilāpamītī)?

Answer. – 1) Some say that the virtue of morality is the morality of the bodhisattva who prefers to lose his life rather than break the smallest precept. As was said above in the Sou t'ao sou mo wang king (Sutrasamājāṇi) 303, the bodhisattva sacrifices his life to keep the precepts. [Jātaka of the flayed Nāga] 304

In a previous lifetime, the Bodhisattva was a very powerful poisonous dragon (visāndga). All beings perished before him, the weak merely at the sight of him, the strong, at his breath.

Having undertaken the discipline of one day (cāttārasaṣṭāca), this nāga started to look for a retreat and entered the forest. Having remained in meditation (manasākara) for a long time, he tired himself out and fell asleep. Now it is the rule among the nāgas, when they sleep, to take the form (sammihina) of a snake. The body of this nāga bore an inscription in which the seven jewels (ṣaptarasa) mingled their brilliance. Some hunters (vyadhā, lubdha), seeing him, were astonished and said: “Such a skin (racc-) is extraordinary (adhibhat) and rare (dulabhā); should we not offer it to the king as an adornment?”

The Sutasomajāṇakā has been recounted fully above, Traité, I, p. 260-263F. In addition to the references already given, we may add Rājputaparpīri, ed. Finot, p. 22; P’ou sa pen hing king, T 155, k. 2, p. 115b; Che tseu t’ao so king, T 164, p. 392.

This Jātaka shows some resemblance to the Campeyya (no. 508) and especially to the Bhirādatuṇjātaka (no. 543): there too the nāgas are practicing the upothakamam and offer to those who want them their skin, their muscles, their bones and their blood (cf. Pīlī Jātaka, VI, p. 169); their deeds are presented as illustrations of uḍḍilāpamītā (cf. CariyāHER, p. 85-86; tr. Law, p. 108-109). However, the present tale seems to evoke a famous site near Īllān, well-known from descriptions given by Foucher, Notes sur l’itinéraire de Hiuan tsang en Afghanistan, Études Asiatiques, I, p. 261-262. La vieille route de l’Inde de Bactres à Taxila, I, 1942, p. 130-132, pl. 28. To the west of the city, below the confluence of two streams, there is a rocky cliff three hundred meters long and facing north-south; red lichens cover its sides; a long fissure splits the rock in two; the southern end is whitened by many deposits of coarse mineral. With the help of imagination, the Buddhists of the 1st century were able to see, in the rocky cliff, the giant snake of the present Jātaka or another analogous to it; the fault in the rock evoked for them the knife that will begin his torture; the red lichens recalled “his bloody flesh scattered about on the ground”; wanting to get the mineral deposit to plunge his body into it to the quick, the snake, attacked by insects, immobilized himself so as not to crush them. – It is true that at the time of Hiuan tsang, this rocky cliff, to Buddhists, evoked rather the gigantic image of a Buddha in nirvāṇa. “Two or three it is to the east (correction?), to the west) of the royal city, in a samphālārāna, there is a recumbent statue of the Buddha in nirvāṇa, more than a thousand feet long” (Si yu ki, T 2087, k. 1, p. 873b). But the old Jātaka of the flayed nāga has passed into Muslim legend as the dragon Aidālah, a legend which archeologists have collected on the spot from the natives of Īllān: the rocky crest is none other than the corpse of Aidālah, the great dragon that desolated the country and which Hazrat Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet, had already slain.
Immediately they crushed the snake’s head with a stick and cut off his skin with a knife. The nāga said to himself: “My strength is miraculous (tyādhika); if I spread out over this land, it would be turned over like one’s hand. How can these men, tiny things, engage me? But today when I am observing the discipline, I have no care for my life; I will follow the teachings of the Buddha (buddhavacana).” Thereupon, fortifying himself with patience, he closed his eyes and did not look; he held his breath and did not breathe for, out of compassion (anukampa) for these men, [he wanted to spare them]. To keep the discipline, he resolutely (ekacittena) suffered the torture of flaying, without feeling any regret. Thus he lost his skin and his bloody flesh was scattered on the ground. When the hot sun started its journey around the earth, the nāga wanted to get to a large expanse of water [to cool off]; he then saw that small insects (kṣitvā) were coming to eat him; to keep the discipline, he dared not move [out of fear that he would crush them]. He said to himself: “Today I give the gift of my body to the insects; it is in order to reach buddhahood that I give my flesh and sacrifice my life; later, when I am a Buddha, I will follow this [good] resolution by practicing the generosity of the Dharma (dāharmaṇā).” After taking this oath (pranādhāna), his body dried up and he died. He was then reborn in the second heaven (svarga), that of the Trīyāstrīma.

The poisonous dragon of that time was the Buddha Śākyamuni; the hunters were Devadatta and the six heretic masters; the little insects were the [162b] 80,000 devas who found the Path when the Buddha Śākyamuni turned the wheel of Dharma the first time.

In order to keep the [precepts, the bodhisattva sacrifices his life; he is steadfast (niyata) and without regret. That is why it is called the virtue of morality.

2) In order to reach buddhahood, the bodhisattva who observes morality makes the following great vow (pranādhāna): “I wish to save beings; I am not seeking the happiness of the present existence nor of future existence (Ihaparatarasaṅkha); I do not seek glory (vāsai) or fame (prasāna). I do not seek to enter nirvāṇa later; I have in view only the beings fallen into the great stream (mahāsrotā) [of transmigration], deceived by desire (kāma) and bewildered by stupidity (moha); I wish to save them and lead them to the other shore (pāra). I will observe morality attentively (ekacittena) in order to be reborn in a good place (kuśalasthāna); being reborn in a good place, I will meet good people (saṃpuruṣā); meeting good people, I will give rise to wisdom (prajñā); giving rise to wisdom, I will come to practice the six virtues (satpāramāṇā); practicing the six virtues, I will reach buddhahood.” Such morality is called the virtue of morality.

3) Furthermore, the mind of the bodhisattva who is observing morality is good (kuśala) and pure (paritāddha); he is not afraid of the unfortunate destinies (durgati) and has no wish to be reborn among the gods; he seeks only goodness and purity and perfumes (vāsyaṇa) his mind with the aid of morality so as to make it better. That is the virtue of morality.

4) Moreover, the bodhisattva who observes morality in the spirit of great compassion (mahākaruṇācittra) reaches buddhahood, and that is what is called the virtue of morality.

5) Moreover, by observing morality, the bodhisattva gives rise to six virtues and this fact constitutes the virtue of morality.

a. Why does morality give rise to morality? On leaving the fivefold morality [of the upāsaka], one reaches the tenfold morality of the śrāmaṇera. On leaving the morality of the śrāmaṇera, one takes up the morality of discipline (samvaratiśa) [that characterizes the bhikṣu]. On leaving the morality of discipline, one reaches the morality resulting from dhyāna. On leaving the morality of dhyāna, one reaches pure morality (āsākravatāla). In this way morality gives birth to morality.

b. How does morality give rise to generosity (dāna)? There are three kinds of gifts: i) the material gift (āniṣṭādāna), ii) the gift of the Dharma (dharmaṇādāna), and iii) the gift of fearlessness (ahāyaṇādāna).

The morality that abstains from encroaching on the good of others constitutes the “material gift”. -- Beings who witness this value this behavior. [By means of his example], the moral person preaches the Dharma to them and opens up their intellect. He says: “By carefully observing pure morality, I will be a venerable field of merit (panyākṣatra) for all beings; thus all beings, [being inspired by my example], will earn immense merit (apraṇāṇaṇa).” All beings fear death; morality which forbids tormenting them constitutes the “gift of fearlessness.”

Moreover, the bodhisattva says: “I will observe morality and, as reward for this morality, for all beings I will be a noble cakravartin king or a king of Jambudvīpa. If I become a king of the gods (devardhaja), I will load all beings with wealth and there will be no more poor people; later, seated under the Bodhi tree, I will conquer king Mira and destroy his armies; I will realize supreme buddhahood, I will preach the pure Dharma to all beings and will take [162c] innumerable beings across the ocean of old age (jetā), sickness (vyāḍhv) and death (maraṇa).” This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of generosity.

c. How does generosity give rise to patience (kṣānti)? The moral person says to himself: “Today I am observing morality to control my mind. If this morality is without patience, I will fall into hell. Even by not violating the precepts, if I have no patience, I will not escape the evil destinies. How then can I give myself up to anger and not control my thoughts since it is only because of the mind that one enters into the three evil destinies? This is why one must love individual effort, diligence and cultivate patience. Besides, the ascetic who wishes to affirm his moral virtue must exercise patience. Why? Because patience is the great power that consolidates morality and makes it immutable.” Also he says: “Today that I have abandoned the world (pravrajita) and my appearance distinguishes me from a worldly person, how could I give myself up to my emotions like people of the world? It is necessary to try to arm one’s mind with patience. By means of patience of body and speech (khyavakākṣānti), the mind acquires patience. If the mind is not patient, the body and speech are not either. This is why the ascetic must use patience of body, speech and mind to break any movement of anger (krodha). Besides, in general (saṃsārakāla), this morality involves eighty-four thousand items; in detail (vistararaṇa), an immense number (apraṇaṇya) of items. What should I do in order to observe the innumerable rules of morality at once? It is only by patience that I will have command over all morality.” When a person has committed a crime against the king, the king takes the guilty person and puts him into a cart armed with swords; on the six sides of the cart there are sharp points leaving no spaces; the cart goes off at a gallop without choosing a path. If the man succeeds in staying alive without being wounded by the swords, it will be as though he had been put to death but without dying. It is the same for the moral man: his morality is the sharp swords; patience keeps him alive. If his patience is not strong, morality will wound this man. An old man or a night-walker stumbles if he has no stick; patience is the stick of morality that helps that man reach the Path; being the cause and condition of happiness, it is immutable. This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of patience.

d. How does morality give rise to exertion (āyāta)? The moral person excludes all carelessness (pramāda); by personal effort, he cultivates the peerless Dharma (anuttaradharma); he renounces worldly happiness and penetrates into the holy Dharma; he makes the resolution to seek nirvāṇa and save all beings; with this great thought, he has no more laziness, for he seeks the Buddha above all. This is how morality can give rise to exertion.

Moreover, the moral person abhors the sorrows of the world (lokaduhha) and the sufferings of old age, sickness and death; he develops exertion to free himself and save beings.

[The exertion of the jackal]. – A jackal (ṣūkṣma) was living in a forest with the lions (simha) and tigers (vārāha), looking for the prey left by these animals. Once when he was hungry and tired, in the middle of the night he jumped over the ramparts of the city and entered into a house. Not finding the meat he was looking for, he went to sleep in a hiding-place (rahasyadhyāna) and did not awaken until night had passed. Frightened and bewildered, he did not know what to do: to leave was to risk not being able to escape; to stay was to condemn himself to death. Finally he resolved to die and he lay down on the ground. Some passers-by saw him; one of them said that he needed a jackal’s ear (karnā) and cut off his ear; the jackal said to himself: “Cutting off an ear is painful, but I am happy to save my life.” Another man said that he needed a jackal’s tail (pucca), cut off his tail and went away; the jackal said to himself: “Painful as it is to have my tail cut off, that is only a small thing.” Finally, a third passer-by said that he needed a jackal’s tooth (danta); but the jackal said to himself: “The enthusiasts are too many; if they want to take my head, my life is over.” Immediately he got up and using the power of his wisdom, he jumped across an irrigation ditch and was able to save himself.

It is the same for the ascetic who wants to escape from suffering: when old age (śraddho) comes, he tries to reassure himself; he does not become saddened and applies exertion; also in the case of sickness (vyādhi), as long as there is hope, he does not worry; when death (marana) comes and he knows there is no more hope, he exerts himself and, arming himself with courage and zeal, he redoubles his energy; from the sphere of death, he will finally reach nirvāṇa. The practice of morality is like drawing the bow. The archer first looks for even ground; once he is on even ground, he fixes his attention; having fixed his attention, he bends the bow fully; having bent the bow, he releases the bow-string. Here the level ground is morality; the bow is fixed attention; the bending of the bow is exertion; the arrow is wisdom; the enemy is ignorance. If one can use one’s strength and exertion thus, one will certainly reach the great Path and will save beings.

Finally thanks to exertion, the moral person controls his five instincts and does not feel the five objects of desire (pañcakāmānaga). When his mind escapes from him, he grabs hold of it and brings it back. Morality keeps guard over the senses (indriya); guarding the senses, it gives rise to rapture (ādyāna); producing rapture, it gives birth to wisdom (prajñā); creating wisdom, it leads to Buddhahood. This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of exertion.

e. How does morality give rise to rapture (ādyāna)? There are three actions (karman) by which a person does good; if the physical action (āthakarman) or the vocal action (vākkarman) is good, the mental action (manakarman) tends spontaneously (svatāh) towards the good. A twining plant (kauśalya) growing in the midst of hemp is stunted in its growth; thus the power of morality can destroy all the fetters (samsāra). How does it destroy them? When one does not observe morality, as soon as a reason for hatred (dheṣavasthā) arises, a thought of killing (śītāpācāna) is produced; as soon as a reason for desire arises, a thought of lust is produced. On the other hand, even if he experiences a little anger, the moral man does not conceive any thought of killing; even if he experiences sensual attraction, he feels no lust. This is how morality leads all the fetters to destruction. When the fetters are destroyed, rapture (ādyāna) and concentration (samādhi) are easy to obtain. Just as death takes place easily for a sick person or an old person who has lost their strength, so rapture and concentration are easy to obtain when the fetters are destroyed.

Moreover, the human mind always and incessantly seeks for pleasure and debauchery; the ascetic who observes morality renounces the worldly joys and his mind is without carelessness (apurvamāna); this is why he obtains rapture (ādyāna) and concentration easily.

Moreover, the moral person obtains rebirth among humans, then among the six classes of gods of the desire realm (loka); he is reborn among gods of the desire realm, he obtains rapture (ādyāna); it gives birth to wisdom (prajñā); creating wisdom, it leads to Buddhahood. This is how morality gives rise to the virtue of exertion. 671
Moreover, the moral person says to himself: “We claim that morality is noble (praṇita) and that we should keep it, that immorality is vile (bhau) and that we should avoid it. Such an idea does not correspond to wisdom. According to the judgment of wisdom, the mind is not attached to morality; there is nothing there to grasp, nothing to let go of.” This is how morality gives birth to the virtue of wisdom.

Moreover, the person who does not observe morality, even though he has known knowledge (ātkṣetaka), seeks common occupations and keeps busy in every way finding means of livelihood; the organ of knowledge (ātmanedriṣṭa) becomes dulled little by little, like a slicing blade, if used to cut clay becomes more and more chipped. The monastic who observes morality and is not occupied with the business of the world always contemplates (samānyapayati) the absence of characteristics (ānimitta) which makes up the true nature of all dharmas. Even though originally he has only weak faculties (mevānāyāva), his knowledge makes no progress. For all these reasons, one can say that morality gives rise to the virtue of wisdom. Thus the virtue of morality gives rise to the six virtues.

6) Furthermore, the bodhisattva who observes morality does not know fear (bhaya); he is free of confusion (moha), hesitation (kāśikā) and doubt (samāyā); he does not aspire personally for nirvāṇa; he observes morality solely in the interests of all beings, in order to reach buddhahood and acquire all the Buddha attributes. This characteristic constitutes the virtue of morality.

7) Moreover, [in the words of the sūtra, above, p. 770F], the bodhisattva “is based on the non-existence of sin and its opposite” (āppatiyapratyamadhyāppattitum upāddya), and this constitutes the virtue of morality. Hence it is said:

[163c] Question. – If morality consists of avoiding evil and practicing good, why speak of the non-existence of sin and its opposite?

Answer. – Speaking of their non-existence is neither wrong view (mithyādyṛṣṭi) nor gross conception (sthulacintā); if one penetrates deeply into the nature of dharmas and if one cultivates the meditative stabilization of emptiness (śūnyatāsamādhi), one sees by the eye of wisdom (prajñākāsa) that sin (āppati) does not exist. If sin does not exist, its opposite, absence of sin (anāppati) does not exist either. Besides, if the being does not exist, the sin of killing (ātippatipatti) does not exist either; if the sin does not exist, the discipline (śīla) that forbids it does not exist either. Why? There must be a sin of killing in order that the forbidding of killing exist; but since there is no sin of killing, its forbidding does not exist.

Question. – Beings presently exist; would you say that they do not exist?

Answer. – That which is seen by the fleshy eye (mānasacaksu) is not right seeing (darśana); if one uses the eye of wisdom (prajñākāsa), one will see that there are no beings. As was said above (p. 724F) in regard to generosity, there is neither donor (ādaya) nor recipient (pratigraha) nor thing given (deya); it is the same here.

Moreover, if the being (sūtra) existed, it would be the same as the five aggregates (skandha) or different from them. If it were identical with the five skandhas, the skandhas being five and the sentient being being one, five would equal one and one would equal five. An exchange market where five would equal one would find no taker. Why? Because one does not make five. This is why we know that the five skandhas do not make up one single being. – Moreover, the five skandhas that arise (uppanna) and perish (niruddha) are of impermanent nature (anetadyākṣaṇa), whereas the being’s nature is to pass from one existence to the next by accumulating sins (āppatti) and merits (puṇya) in the three worlds (traiḍhiṇa). If the five skandhas are confused with the being, the latter would be like plants (ṭīna) and trees (kāṣṭha) which, arising spontaneously and perishing spontaneously, are unaffected by the bond of sin (āppattihandhāna) and by liberation (vimokṣa). Thus we know that the five skandhas are not the being.

That a being exists outside of the skandhas has already been refuted above when it was a question of the eternity and omnipresence of the ātman (cf. p. 740F). Besides, the view of self (ātmanadṛṣṭi) does not arise outside of the five skandhas. If a being existed outside of the five skandhas, it would be eternal and, if it were eternal, it would escape birth (jīvít) and death (maruṇa). Why? Because birth is to be after not having been, and death is to perish after having been born. If beings were eternal, they would fill up the five destinies (paṇhagati). Being eternal from the very beginning, would they return into existence? Free of birth, they would also be free of death.

Question. – It is certain that the being exists; why do you say that it does not exist? There is a dharma, ‘being’, that has the five skandhas as causes and conditions (henupratayu), just as the dharma ‘hand’ exists as a result of the five fingers (antarū).

Answer. – This statement is false. If a dharma, ‘being’, existed as a result of the five skandhas, the existence of this dharma ‘being’ would not be conceived apart or outside of the five skandhas. The eye (cākṣa) sees color (rūpa), the ear (śrava) hears sound (śahāsa), the nose (gandha) smells odor (gandha), the tongue (jāva) tastes flavor (asa), the body (kāya) feels touch (graśatava) and the mind (manas) cognizes dharmas; but all of that is empty [164a] (śūnya) and free of substantial self (anātman). There is no being distinct from these six things. The heretics (tṛthīka), who believe the reverse, claim that the being is the eye that sees colors, etc., up to... the mind that cognizes dharmas. Or else, they are of the opinion that the being is that which experiences suffering or pleasure. Those who share this view do not know the reality of the being.

[The trick of the self-interested disciples]. - There was a very virtuous and venerable disciple. The people who claimed him as an arhat brought him masses of offerings. Later, he became sick and died. Fearing to lose the offerings [that were brought to him], his disciples took away his body during the night and arranged the coverings and pillows on his bed so that one would have said that the teacher was there lying on his bed. To those who came to ask about the condition of the sick man, the disciples said: “Don’t you see his bed-clothes and pillows on the bed?” Without looking into the matter, the foolish people thought the teacher was sick and in bed, and went away after having made their offerings. This happened several times. There was, however, an intelligent man who came to enquire about the disciple; the disciples gave him the same answer. But this intelligent man replied: “I didn’t ask you about the bed-clothes and the pillows on the bed; I asked you about the man.” Taking away the covers, he looked for his teacher, but there was no one there. [Here too], outside of the six objects, there is no ātman. Similarly, there is no individual who cognizes (jāhāna) or who sees (darśin). Furthermore, if the being existed in the five skandhas as in its causes and conditions (henupratayu), the five skandhas being transitory, the being also would be transitory. Why? Because there is a similarity
The virtue of patience does not play a large rôle in the Lesser Vehicle: a short praise in Dhammasaṃgharājaṃ (tr. Lav. O. 49-69); Saṃghavagga, I, p. 226: "khaṇṭiḥ paramaṃ tāpaḥ tiṣṭhātāḥ nibbāne paramaṃ vadaṃt Buddhāḥ, and in Samyutta, I, p. 226: khaṇṭiḥāḥ bhāgyo na vijiṣṭāt; a brief definition in Dhammasaṅgīti, 230: "tā khaṇṭiḥ kamanātā adhyātanātā acandikākham anasaṃpravattani cīnasa, ayaṃ vuccati khaṇṭiḥ. But the opposite sin, anger, hatred or aversion (krodha, dveṣā, pratigha) is often condemned.

The Greater Vehicle, on the other hand, attaches great importance to patience: it distinguishes three main kinds: paripādikāruṇāvasthāṅkāṃ, injuring injuries; dukkhasiddhiṣvāndikesāṅkāṃ, withstanding suffering; dharmasiddhiṣvāndikesāṅkāṃ, meditating on the Dharma and adhering to it. See, among other sources, Sūtrimukālī, ed. Lévi, p. 108; Bodh. bhāmi, p. 189-199; Sīkāsāsāmakāya, p. 179-188 (tr. Bendall-Rouse, p. 175-183); Bodhisattvavatāra and Puñjikā, ch. VI (tr. Lav. O. 49-69); Saṃghavatā, p. 191; Siddhi, p. 621; Ta-fang kouang, T 279, k. 44, p. 232b sq.

The three seals of the Dharma will be defined below, k. 15, p. 170a.

CHAPTER XXIV: THE VIRTUE OF PATIENCE (p. 865F)

[164b] Śūtra: It is necessary to fulfill the virtue of patience by being based on non-turbulence of the mind (kṣaṇitpāramitāḥ paramāntayā aṣṭobhanaṃ upādāya).
Some say that there are two kinds of good minds (kusala), one coarse (sthūla), the other subtle (māṃsa), the former being patience, the latter, rapture (dhyāna). As long as one has not acquired rapture, spiritual joy (ānubhāva) is only able to mask (pratichīdāna) sans: this is called patience; when one has acquired rapture, this joy can avoid all sin: this is called rapture.

Patience is a mental event (cittakāyadharma) associated with the mind (cittasamprayakta) and accompanying the mind (cittanuṣārin); it is not an action (karman) or the retribution of an action (karmanipīta) but a companion of action (karmanusārin).

According to some, it belongs to two realms (dhetuātyāvaca) (desire realm and form realm). According to others, it belongs only to the desire realm (kāmadhatvāvaca) or to no realm (anavacara); it would be foreign to the form realm for there are no external annoyances to be withstood in the form realm (rūpadhatu).

Patience is impure (sdorava) or pure (sandorava), for it is found among worldly people as well as in the saints (āśyā).

The patience that puts an obstacle (āvyeti) to the bad instincts of one’s own mind or the mind of another (svaparacittakusala adverse) is said to be good (kusala). Since it is good, there is suppression (samuccagna) or non-suppression (asamuccagna) of thinking (manusikāra). All this is fully analyzed in the Abhidharma.

II. PATIENCE TOWARD BEINGS

Question.
- What is patience toward beings (sattvakṛṣṇa)?

Answer. – There are two kinds of beings for the bodhisattva: (i) those who cover him with respect (satkāra) and veneration (pūjā), (ii) those who hate him, insult him, strike him and torment him. The bodhisattva is able to withstand both kinds: he does not like the man who flatters him; he does not hate the man who harms him. That is patience toward beings.

1. Indifference toward sycophants.

Question. - Can there be patience in the face of respect and veneration?

Answer. – There are two kinds of fetters: (i) those that depend on affection (anunayapattita); (ii) those that depend on averse (pratighapattita). Respect and veneration do not give birth to averse but lead to affection (anunaya) and attachment (akhiṃveva); these are skillful seducers and this is why it is necessary to cultivate indifference toward them without becoming attached to them and without liking them. How does one remain insensible to them? By thinking about their impermanence (aniyati) and [by knowing] that they are a source of fetters (samyojanapattichāna). Thus the Buddha said: “Profit and honors (lābhassatkāra) are a deep wound (vrana). Just as a wound cuts through the skin (chavi) into the flesh (mūliina) to the bone (asthi), breaks the bone and penetrates to the marrow (asthinīla), so the man attached to profit and honors cuts the skin of morality (śilacchāvi), breaks the flesh of rapture (dhyānamūla), crushes the bone of wisdom (prajñāśīla) and loses the marrow of the subtle good mind (māṃsakusalaśīlamūla)”.

[164c] [Devadatta, the victim of profit and honor]

---

677

---

678
When the Buddha returned to the land of Kia p'i lo p'o (Kapilavastu) for the first time, he was accompanied by 1250 bhikṣus, all brahmacārīns; since they had been worshippers of fire (agnī), their appearance was miserable; since they had practiced fasting and asceticism, their bodies were emaciated. King Tsing fan (Saddodhana) said to himself: “My son’s companions (parivāra), although animated by pure intention (citātivinuddhī), are really not good-looking. I am going to choose among my sons and grandsons; each family will give one of their members to be a disciple of the Buddha.” Having had this thought, he published an edict in the land enjoining certain young men of the nobility of the Śākyas to leave home and go forth (pravrajya).\(^{309}\) It was then that Devadatta, son of king Hou fan (Dronadana),\(^{310}\) left home practiced the Path and recited the 60,000 items of the Dharma (dhammasaṅkho). He gave all of these to prince Ajāna (wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 14, p. 101b17). He had acquired the five powers. Devadatta then addressed the great bhikṣu Maudgalyāyana and said: “Consider the impermanence of the five aggregates: you will thus find the Path and, at the same time, obtain the supernatural powers”; however, the Buddha did not teach him the means of acquiring them. Devadatta went away and made the same request of Śāṇḍitra, Maudgalyāyana and up to five hundred arhats, but all of them were silent about the method, saying: “Consider the impermanence of the five aggregates: you will thus find the Path and at the same time acquire the supernatural powers.” Devadatta wept with vexation and, going to Ānanda, begged him to teach him the supernatural powers. At that time, Ānanda did not yet have the knowledge of another’s mind (parācittajño); however, out of consideration for his brother and on the advice of the Buddha, he taught Devadatta the means of acquiring the supernatural powers. Devadatta withdrew to the mountain and soon acquired the [first] five powers.

---

\(^{309}\) Accordign to the Mppāsaṅkho, this episode does not occur in the Pāli sources: the Vinaya, II, p. 183, notes only that Devadatta had acquired the first five powers. For twelve years he pursued his efforts zealously.\(^{311}\)

---

\(^{311}\) One day when the Buddha was at Rājagha, a famine broke out. The bhikṣus who had magical powers went to various mythical regions, Jambuvipa, Pārvavideha, Apagrodana, Uttarakuru, the Trāyasthrīman heaven, to gather the marvelous foods and fruits which these regions produced and distributed them to the community. Envious of their powers, Devadatta asked the Buddha to teach him magic, but the Buddha advised him rather to work for his own salvation. Devadatta then addressed the great bhikṣus, Śāṇḍita, Maudgalyāyana and up to 500 arhats, but all of them refused him. In despair, Devadatta then had recourse to his brother Ānanda who, giving in to his entreaties, gave him the secrets of magic and other miraculous powers. – Cf. Che songliu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 257a15, which the Mppāsaṅkho follows almost textually here; Pi nai ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 859b; Tch’ou yao king, T 212, k. 14, p. 687b-c. In the Mulasāṃghikavin vin. (T 1450, k. 13, p. 167c-168b; Rockhill, Life, p. 84-85), it is Ānanda’s teacher, Daśabala Kāśyapa, who communicates the secrets of magic to Devadatta; in Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 802b-c, it is the bhikṣu Sīva lo t’o (Suradha) who taught him the precepts and the discipline (dīnasannvase) and the bases of miraculous power (śāntipaṭadā).
He transformed himself several times\(^{130}\), changing into a marvelous elephant (hastiratna) or a marvelous horse (aivaratana) and disturbing the prince’s mind. One day he changed into a child (kumāракa) and came to sit on the prince’s lap; the prince took him in his arms, kissed him and gave him some spit.\(^{131}\) Each time Devadatta stated his name so that the prince recognized him.

Devadatta moved Ajātiṣṭhū’s mind by means of these transformations (parināma); the prince lost his head. He built a large monastery (vihāra) in the Ngaik yuau (Ambavana);\(^{132}\) nothing was missing in it, not the fourfold pūjā, not the most varied furnishings. He made a gift of this monastery to Devadatta and, each day, leading his great ministers (mahāmātyas), Ajātiṣṭhū brought five hundred cauldrons of rice soup.

[First sin: the schism].\(^{133}\) – Although Devadatta received so many offerings, his community was limited. He said to himself: “I have thirty marks of the Great Man (mahāpurussalaksana),\(^{320}\) a few less than the Buddha [who has thirty-two]; but my disciples are not numerous. If I had a large community (mahāsaṅgha) [165a] around me, in what way would I be different from the Buddha?” Having had this thought, he provoked a schism in the assembly (sanghabheda) and won five hundred disciples to his cause.

Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana came to preach the Dharma to them and converted them; [the Buddha’s] community was reformed.

\(^{130}\) Among these transformations, Devadatta’s metamorphosis into a child is the best known; some sources do not mention any others. Pāli Vin., II, p. 185: Having changed his own shape and taken that of a little boy, Devadatta appeared on the lap of prince Ajātiṣṭhū adorned with a belt of snakes. Ajātiṣṭhū was frightened, dumbfounded and terrified. Devadatta said to him: Are you afraid of me, prince? – Yes, who are you? – I am Devadatta. – Then show me your own form. – Then Devadatta put away the form of the little boy and stood up before prince Ajātiṣṭhū, begging bowl in his hand, clothed in his monks’ robes. See also Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 139 (tr. Burlingame, Legends, I, p. 255); Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 802c; Teh ou yao king, T 212, k. 14, p. 687c; Pi i po cha, T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a.

There were yet other metamorphoses that the Suvastivādins sources enumerate: they tell how Devadatta changed into an elephant, a horse, a veil, a cap, a monk, and finally a child: cf. T 1435, k. 36, p. 257c, which the Mppī follows closely: Devadatta changed into a precious elephant in prince Ajātiṣṭhū’s house: he came in by the door and left by the window. Then he changed into a precious horse that did the same. Then he changed into a precious veil and appeared on the prince’s lap who took it and fastened it on his forehead … Finally, he changed into a handsome little boy wearing a necklace of precious gold and appeared on the prince’s lap who took him in his arms, played with him and spit into his mouth. This story has the same details almost in the same Ken pen choou.. p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 13, p. 166c (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86); Pi ni ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 859f.; Pie yi sa a han, T 100, k. 1, p. 374c.

131 This disgusting detail, unknown to the Pāli sources, is mentioned in almost all the Chinese versions. Here is the explanation which the Mppī will give later (T 1590, k. 20, p. 252b): The Buddha called Devadatta a fanatic, a corpse, a swallower of spit … A swallower of spit because Devadatta, greedy for gain (ālāha) and honors (sukāra), changed into a little boy of celestial beauty and appeared in the arms of king Ajātiṣṭhū. The king kissed his mouth and gave him some spit to swallow. This is why Devadatta is called the man who swallows spit.” The same explanation is found in Vībhāṣaṇa, T 1545, k. 85, p. 442a: First, Devadatta possessed the raptures (ālāha), thanks to his arījñā of magical power, he changed into a little boy, clothed in a garment sewn with gold thread, his head crowned with five flowers; he sat down on prince Ajātiṣṭhū’s knee, caressed him and joked with him until the prince recognized that he was the venerable Devadatta. Then the prince took him in his arms with affection, kissed him and spat into his mouth. Very greedy for gain and honor, Devadatta swallowed this spit. This is why the Buddha reproached him, saying: “You are carrion, eating human spit.” When Devadatta had swallowed this spit, he came out of his capture, but quickly resumed his body of metamorphosis.”

132 Many places are known with the name of Ambavana (cf. Malalasekera, I, p.160): actually, the monastery built for Devadatta was at Gayāluṇa (cf. Jātaka, I, p. 185, 508; II, p. 38). All the sources obviously describe the gifts that Ajātiṣṭhū piled on Devadatta: Sānnyāta, II, p. 242; Vīṇayya, II p 185, 187; Tseng yi a han, T 99, k. 38, no. 1064. – K. 33, p. 276b-c; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 257c; Ken pen choou.. p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 13, p. 168c; k. 14, p. 173b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86).

133 Here is a brief summary of this schism, told by all of the sources in a more or less concordant way: Blinded by his success, Devadatta went to Rājagṛha in the Venuvana where the Buddha was preaching the Dharma. Respectfully bowing to the teacher, he made the following statement: “Lord, you are already old; entrey the assembly to me: I will take care of it.” The Buddha refused three times: “I would not entertain the assembly even to Śāriputra or Maudgalyāyana, still less to you who are nothing and worthless.” Devadatta went away furious. – Cf. Pāli Vinaya, II, p. II, p. 188-189; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 30, p. 258b; Ken pen choou.. p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 14, p. 169f. (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 86); Pi ni ye, T 1464, k. 2, p. 860a; Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 139-140.

It was undoubtedly after these events that Devadatta tried to foment discord in the Saṅgha. He persuaded Kokāḷika, Kamarāgāya, Khandrāyasa and Samudrādattā to go with him to advise the Buddha to impose on the monks a more severe way of life. The new rule would involve the following points: (i) to live as hermits in the forest; (ii) to live entirely on begged food, never to accept an invitation; (iii) to dress in gathered rugs and tatters; (iv) to spend the nights at the foot of a tree; (v) to abstain from meat and fish.

The teacher refused to agree to these demands and declared that he would allow those who wished to adopt this kind of life free to do so, but that he would not make these rules obligatory for all the monks. Already expecting this refusal, Devadatta took it as a pretext to revolt against the Buddha; he won over five hundred monks to his cause. Vṛjī, natives of Vasiṣṭha, who, since they had already recently entered into the community, were ignorant of the rules. – Cf. Vīṇaya, II, p. 196-198; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 25, p. 164a; Sseu fen liu, k. 46, p. 909b; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 36, p. 259a; Ken pen choou.. p’o seng che,T 1450, k. 14, p. 70b seq. (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 87); Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 141-142.

Sustained by his supporters, Devadatta went back to the monastery of Gayāluṇa. One day when he was preaching the Dharma, he saw in the assembly Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana. Thinking that they had come to join his side, he invited Śāriputra to address the assembly and, feeling tired himself, he lay down to sleep. Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana spoke and easily persuaded the five hundred schismatic monks to return to the Buddha. Awakened from his sleep by Kokāḷika, when Devadatta learned what had just taken place, his blood flowed from his mouth. – Cf. Vīṇaya, II, p. 199-200; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 46, p. 906c-910a; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 37, p. 263b-c; Ken pen choou.. p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 20, p. 203a-b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 94); Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 47, p. 803a; Dhammapadāṭṭha, I, p. 143.

For these thirty mahāpurussalaksana of Devadatta, see above, Traité, I, p. 286f, n. 2.
Thus Devadatta committed three sins of immediate retribution (ānantarya).

[Connection with the heretics]. – He joined in friendship with bad teachers, the heretic Fou lan ma (Pīrāma), etc.; he destroyed all the roots of good (kasalantulā) unashamedly.

[Attempt to poison the Buddha and fall into hell]. – Finally, Devadatta dipped his fingernails into poison (vīs) and, under the pretext of going to bow before the Buddha, he tried to wound him. He wanted to go, increase tomorrow? – The bhikṣuṇī answered: “By committing the sin today, you have created the roots of evil (akīlaṃśkara).” – Then Devadatta, inflamed with anger, struck her with his hand and killed her.

There are five ānantarya sins, so called because the person who commits them falls immediately into hell (samanantaravara naraṃkaṇṇapadaya): 1) mātyāṅgha, 2) pītyāṅgha, 3) arhadbhāṅgha, 4) abhāṅgha, 5) tatūdghastāḥ. The sources do not always give the same order and they are sometimes given mixed in with other sins: cf. Vinaya, I, p. 193; Anguttara, I, p. 27; III, p. 436; Vinaya, I, p. 168, 321; Vibhāṅga, p. 578; Mahāvtrandupati, no. 2324-2328; Dharmasūmiyāh, LX; Koka, IV, p. 201. – Devadatta was guilty of no. 3-5; cf. Kena pen choso... p'o sen chho T 1450, k. 10, p. 1480: “He has committed three ānantaryas: i) He struck the Bhagavat from afar with a big rock and spilled the blood of the Tāthāgata with a mind of hatred; ii) he broke up the community which was living in harmony; iii) he took the life of the bhikṣuṇī Utpalavarnā.”

The Pāli Vinaya is silent on the death of Devadatta; the Buddha just said that he will go to hell for a kalpa. – The Mālinda briefly mentions that he was swallowed up by the earth (p. 101) and that at the moment of death he took refuge in the Buddha (p. 111). – The Dhammapadatthā, I, p. 146-147 continues this twofold tradition and develops it: Feeling sick, Devadatta wished to see the Buddha one last time and had himself brought by his disciples to Śrīñauvī to the Jarvāna. Forewarned of his arrival, the Buddha announced that, despite his efforts, Devadatta would not succeed in seeing him in the present lifetime. Actually, when the heresiarch got out of his litter, his feet sunk into the earth, before disappearing, he still had time to take refuge in the Buddha.

The Pāli tradition does not mention the incident of the poisoned nails. This detail appears in the Vajrapāṇi-yālana, T 1450, k. 10, p. 804a, which is otherwise quite close to the Pāli tradition. Here is an extract: Being gravely ill, Devadatta said to his disciples: “I no longer have the strength to go to the īsāmaṇa Gautama; you must help me to go.” Then Devadatta dipped his ten fingernails in poison and said to his disciples: “Curry me to the īsāmaṇa.” His disciples brought him to the Buddha. Then Ānanda, seeing Devadatta approaching from afar, said to the Bhagavat: “Here comes Devadatta; surely he feels remorse and has come to make amends.” The Buddha said to Ānanda: “Devadatta never comes to me... from today, his vital organ (jīvojīva) is ripe (i.e., has reached its end).” Then Devadatta came near the Bhagavat and said to his disciples: “It is not proper for me to stay lying down in front of the Buddha; put down my litter,” and he stepped out onto the ground. At this moment, a blazing wind arose from the center of the earth and enveloped Devadatta’s body. Burned by the fire, he felt a mind of remorse toward the Tathāgata and wanted to cry out Namo buddhaye. But he did not reach the end of this invocation; hardly had he pronounced Namo than he felt into hell.

According to this text, we see that Devadatta did not have a chance to scratch the Buddha with his poisoned nails; the Māpī also seems to indicate that he did not put his hand on the Buddha: “He had hardly arrived in Rājaṭhāna than the earth opened up.” According to the Mūlaasavatīvivāda Vinaya, T 1450, k. 10, p. 150a (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 107), things went further and Devadatta effectively tried to wound the Buddha. Here are some extracts from this Vinaya: [Having tried in vain to seduce Yāsīdhārā], full of shame, Devadatta left the palace. Seeing his anger and pain, the Śākyas said to him: “From today on you should go and find the Bhagavat and ask his but had not arrived at the city of Rājagṛha, when the earth opened up and a fiery chariot came to get him. Devadatta entered into hell (niraya) alive.

Although Devadatta did possess on his body thirty marks of the Great Man, he was unable to tame his mind; carried away by the lure of honors and gain, he committed the great sins and, alive, entered into hell.

This is why the sūtra says that profit and honors are a deep wound that breaks the skin and penetrates as far as the marrow. One must keep from liking toadies. In the bodhisattva, patience consists of not clinging to those who cover one with veneration (pūjā) and respect (sattākara).

*** *** ***

Furthermore, there are three kinds of honors (pūjā): i) One is respected (sukhrta) by people as a result of merit (punya) acquired in the course of previous existences (pijvajjananant; ii) One is respected by people as a result of qualities (guna) of which one has given evidence in the present lifetime (shajjanan) in practicing morality (śīla), rapture (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā); iii) By falsehood (myād) and deception (vipralambha) one can have no virtue inwardly and outwardly seem quite white: one wins honors by deceiving one’s contemporaries. In the face of these three kinds of honors, [the bodhisattva] has the following thoughts:

1) “Presently I am enjoying these honors as a result of the merits that I diligently cultivated in my previous existences; this is the natural result of my diligent activity. Why feel proud (purṇa)? What has been planted in spring is harvested in autumn. Why be proud of what happens naturally?” Having thought thus, the bodhisattva disciplines his mind and feels neither attachment (abhītiśecaka) nor pride (abhīmāna).

2) If the honors that he enjoys are due to his qualities of which he has given evidence in the present lifetime, the bodhisattva has the following thoughts: “It is thanks to wisdom (prajñā) that I know the true nature (sattākākṣana) of dharmas and that I have cut through the fetters (sannyojana); it is as a result of my pardon, if he pardons you, we will proclaim you king (devaputra).” Then Devadatta filled his ten fingernails with poison and went to the Bhagavat. He thought: “I could not stand it if the śramaṇa Gautama gives me his pardon and congratulates me; so, in the moment of bowing to him, I will scratch his feet with my poisoned nails and wound him.” Having come to the Buddha, he bowed his head to the two feet of the teacher and speaking to the Bhagavat, he said: “Out of your compassion, please grant me your pardon.” The Bhagavat looked at Devadatta, wondering with what intention he had come: divining the murderous intentions of Devadatta, he used his miraculous powers (viddhikula), transformed the bottom of his knees and changed them into rock crystal; then he remained silent.

Devadatta became angry at this silence of the Buddha and, putting his evil intentions into execution, scratched the Bhagavat with his poisoned fingernails. But his ten fingers all broke off and, with a shock, the poison caused him severe pain.

This attempted poisoning is known to the Chinese pilgrims (cf. Fa hien, tr. Legge, p. 66; Hsuan tsang, tr. Watters, I, p. 390), as well as to the Tibetan tradition (cf. Schiefner, Tibetische Lebensbeschreibung, p. 278 seq.). qualities (guna) that these honors come to me; I have no part in it.” Having thought thus, he disciplines his mind and feels no pride. He says: “actually, it is my qualities that people love, not me.”

[The trick of the Kaśmirian].

A bhikṣu, native of Ki pin (Kaśmir), learned in the three baskets (trīpiṭaka), who followed the rules of the forest-dwellers (araṇyadharma), went to the royal palace one day where a great reception was being prepared. The gate-keeper (dharāpāla), seeing the coarseness of his garments, closed the gate and refused him entry. This happened several times; as a result of the coarseness of his dress, the bhikṣu was not allowed to enter. He had recourse to a trick (apāya); he borrowed a fine robe and went back to the palace. Seeing him, the gate-keeper allowed him to enter without stopping him. The bhikṣu entered the gathering and was given all kinds of delicate food. First [165b] he made offerings (dāya), transformed the bottom of his knees and changed them into rock crystal; then he remained silent.

The ascetic who obtains honors while practicing virtue (guna), morality (śīla) and wisdom (prajñā) likewise says to himself that he owes these honors to his qualities and not to himself. This consideration is a mental discipline called patience.

3) To obtain honors by falsehood (myād) or deception (vipralambha) is to inflict unbearable torture on oneself. One should say: “By obtaining honors by means of deception I am no different from brigands and thieves who get their food [by means of petty theft]. This is falling into the sin of deception (vipralambhāṇa).”

Not feeling any affection for the people who cover one with all kinds of honors, not exalting oneself, constitutes patience toward beings (sattvakaśanā).

2. Indifference toward benefactors.

Question. – For those who have not yet found the Path, food and clothing are necessary. By what means (apāya) can one find patience, not be attached and not love one’s benefactors?

1326 A monk who knows the three baskets is called tripiṭaka in Sanskrit (cf. Avadānaśīlā, p. 334; Divyāvadāna, p. 61, 505) and more rarely, tripiṭaka (Divyāvadāna, p. 54. In Pāli, he is called tripiṭaka (Milinda, p. 18; Jātaka, IV, p. 219).
3. Indifference toward women.

Furthermore, when women want to charm and disturb the bodhisattva, the latter must tame his mind and endure it without being disturbed.

[The first attack by the daughters of Māra.]

The intervention of the three daughters in Māra’s first attack against the Bodhisattva should be noted. These three girls were called Taṣṭhā, Arati and Raṇī (Sūryāvatī, I, p. 124); Taṭṭhī, Arati and Raṇī (Mahāvastu, III, p. 286); Rati, Arati and Tāṭṭhī (Lalitavistara, p. 378); Arati, Prati and Tīr (Buddhadatta, VIII, v. 3).

Māra launched three main assaults against the Buddha: 1) Immediately before the enlightenment, when the Bodhisattva was sitting under the pipal tree of Bodhi, Māra launched his armies against him to make him leave the Bodhi seat and thus prevent him from attaining enlightenment; the Bodhisattva victoriously resisted this attack and, touching the earth with his right hand (bhūmirūpāṇamādāya), he took it as witness to his right to occupy the Bodhi seat. – 2) Four weeks after the enlightenment, when the Buddha was meditating under the ajīpalayayogadhi tree, Māra and his daughters came to tempt the Buddha and induce him to enter into nirvāṇa before having preached his doctrine.

With regard to the intervention of the daughters of Māra in these two daughters’ appearances, it is convenient to distinguish three groups of sources:

1. Some sources, distinguishing carefully between the two assaults, do not have Māra’s daughters appear in the first assault, but tell only of the repeated attacks of Māra’s armies against the Bodhisattva: Sunanipāta, III, 2 (v. 425-449); Ājīvaka, I, 71-75; Mahāvastu, II, p. 404-414; Buddhacarita, ch. XIII; Fo s'en guo, T 192, k. 5, p. 25a. There are also representations where Māra’s daughters do not appear: the bas-reliefs of Gandhāra (cf. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 401 (fig. 201); I, p. 405 (fig. 202-204); II, p. 15 (fig. 306-307); II, p. 197 (fig. 402); II, p. 201, (fig. 403); - a stele at Sālaśīth (ibid., p. 539, fig. 498); - a stele at Jagdispur, Patna district (ibid., p. 545, fig. 500); - a picture from Qyzyl in central Asia (ibid., p.605, fig. 523); - a fresco at Yun-Kang (Chavannes, Mission, fig. 228 and p. 311). – On the other hand, the same sources or related sources attribute a major rôle to the Daughters of Māra outside of the second assault against the Buddha: Sūryāvatī, I, p. 124; Tīr, k. 99, no. 1092, k. 39, p. 286b-287c; T 100, no. 31, k. 2, p. 383a-384a; Jataka, I, p. 78; Dhammapadatthā, III,p. 195-197; Mahāvastu, III, p. 281-286; Fang kouang ta tchou meng yen king, T 187, k. 10, p. 601a-b.

2. Other groups of sources, unaware of or ignoring the second assault, make Māra’s daughters appear in the first assault where they dance and speak: Sīuou hing pen k'i king, T 184, k. 2, p. 470c; T'aisou jouei pen k'i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 477a; P'ou yao king, T 186, k. 6, p. 519a; Kong k'in hien tsai yin kouo king, T 189, k. 3, p. 640a; Fo pen hing king, T 190, k. 28, p. 782c-783 (tr. Beal, Romntic Legend, p. 214 seq.); Fo pen hing king, T 193, k. 3, p. 76a; Ken pen choo; ‘po s'eng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 123b (cf. Rockhill, Life, p. 31). Also some representations of the first assault, easily identifiable thanks to the presence of the Bodhi tree where the bhūmirūpāṇamādāya of the Bodhisattva appear as well as the daughters of Māra; cf. Marshall-Foucher, Mon. of Sanchi, II, pl. 29 (center); Vogel, Manūrī, pl. 51a (above t. right); three sculptures at Amāvatī (in Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 179, fig. 68, above center; II, p. 565, fig. 500b; II, p. 565, fig. 500b); two steles at Sālaśīth (Foucher, ibid., I, p. 413, fig. 209b; II, p. 563, fig. 507b); Longhurst, Nigalrakonda, pl. 22b, p. 29a; Gouloive, Anājā, pl. 23; a Amboine stele (in Foucher, ibid., p. 407, fig. 205); Kron, Life of B on Barabudur, pl. 95.

3. In a few sources, Māra’s daughters play an active part in the course of both assaults. This is the case for the Lalitavistara: 1st assault, p. 320-331 (tr. Foucaux, p. 273-279); 2nd assault, p. 378-379 (tr. Foucher, p. 315-316), and for the Mānapāta: 1st assault (here, k. 14, p. 165b-c); 2nd assault (below, k. 17, p. 180d-181a).

Cf. Jātaka, I, p. 79; a picture from Qyzyl in central Asia (ibid., p.564, fig. 523); - a fresco at Yun-Kang (Chavannes, Mission, fig. 228 and p. 311). – On the other hand, the same sources or related sources attribute a major rôle to the Daughters of Māra outside of the second assault against the Buddha: Sūryāvatī, I, p. 124; Tīr, k. 99, no. 1092, k. 39, p. 286b-287c; T 100, no. 31, k. 2, p. 383a-384a; Jataka, I, p. 78; Dhammapadatthā, III,p. 195-197; Mahāvastu, III, p. 281-286; Fang kouang ta tchou meng yen king, T 187, k. 10, p. 601a-b.

While the Buddha was under the Bodhi tree, king Māra, out of spit (daurmanasaya) sent him the three princesses, Lo kien (Rāgha), Yuei pei (Arati) and K’o ngai (Trṣṇi). They came showing off their bodies and using all sorts of charms to try to corrupt the Bodhisattva, but the latter did not let himself become disturbed and did not look at them. The three maidens said to themselves: “The hearts of men are all different and tastes vary: some like little girls (kumārīka), others women of a ripe age (madhyayṣṭri); some like them big, others small; some like them black, others blonde; each of these types has its lovers.” Then the three maidens each changed into five beautiful women and each of these five women underwent innumerable metamorphoses (parināma). They came out of the forest and appeared suddenly, like lightning [165c] from a dark cloud; they raised their eyebrows, lowered their eyelashes and, watched carefully like young married women; they made music and used all the tricks. Coming close to the Bodhisattva, they pressed their splendid bodies up against his body.

Then the hero Mi tsi Kin kung (Guhyaka Vajrapūti), looking at them angrily, scolded them: “Who is this man you magicians dare to come and touch?” And Guhyaka reprimanded them with these stanzas:

Do you not know that the god Indra (read t’ien t) loses his beauty and that his beard has faded?

The clear limpid water of the ocean

Is drying up today out of bitterness.

327 The intervention of the three daughters in Māra’s first assault against the Bodhisattva should be noted. These three girls were called Taṣṭhā, Arati and Raṇī (Sūryāvatī, I, p. 124); Taṭṭhī, Arati and Raṇī (Mahāvastu, III, p. 286); Rati, Arati and Tāṭṭhī (Lalitavistara, p. 378); Arati, Prati and Tīr (Buddhadatta, VIII, v. 3).
Do you not know that the sun is becoming dim,
That the P'o seou (Vasudevatā) gods are falling?
The fire from his divine mouth
Will devour you today!

No, you don’t know that, you who dare to treat this holy man so lightly!
Then the daughters widened their circle, withdrew a little and said to the Bodhisattva: “These women are of incomparable beauty and able to please. Why do you keep this seat!” The Bodhisattva responded: “You are impure, dirty and evil-doers. Begone and do not speak any more lies!” And the Bodhisattva spoke this stanza:331

This body is a swamp of excrement
A foul mass of impurities
How can one take any delight
In these walking latrines?

Hearing this stanza, the daughters said to themselves: “In speaking this stanza, this man does not know our pure goddess bodies (viśuddhādevakīryā).” At once they transformed themselves and resumed their earlier form. Their brightness and splendor lit up the entire forest. Playing musical instruments, they said to the Bodhisattva: “These are our bodies; who can find blame in them?” The Bodhisattva answered: “The day will come when you will understand.” – “Tell us”, they replied. – The Bodhisattva replied with these stanzas:

In the heavenly arbors,
Near lotus pools made of the seven jewels
Gods and men are happy to remain.
Wait and you will see.

One day you will discover impermanence
[You will see that] divine and human pleasures are suffering,
You will experience distaste for sensory joys
You will delight in the right Path.

Hearing these stanzas, the daughters said to themselves: “This man has immense wisdom; he understands the malevolence of the purest celestial enjoyments and cannot abide them.” At that moment they disappeared.
Thus the bodhisattva, in the presence of sexual attractions, can control his mind and endure them without being disturbed.

Moreover, the bodhisattva understands all the impurities of desire. Of all the calamities, the calamity of the woman is the most serious. One can come up to a moment of the sword (vajra), enemy (vāra), poisonous snake (śāriha); one cannot come up to the woman who is miserly, angry, flattering, tricky, dirty, aggressive, quarrelsome, lustful and envious. Why? Girls are vulgar, short-tempered and of little knowledge; they do not like what they see; they have no consideration for wealth, nobility, knowledge, virtue or renown; they follow only their own wicked tendencies. They destroy the roots of good (kusaśūlaṇa) in men. Difficult as they are to open, still it is easy to break through fetters, manacles, the cangue, a lock, or a prison; but when the lock of a woman is fastened on a man, it holds firmly and deeply. The ignorant man who allows himself to be taken by it will find it hard to free himself. Of all illnesses, the sickness of woman is the most serious. Some stanzas say:

331 For the beginning of his stanza, cf. Lalitavistara, p. 328:

Sallape asihatthena [pisṭṭhassati pekkhītena mhitena ca] 330
na tveva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra, III, p. 69, but the order is different. Here is the text and the translation, which presents some difficulties:

Sallape avhāthathena (pīṭhēna pi sallape śārihaṃ pi śārde yena dāttho na āvati, na tva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra,
Sallape asihatthena [pisṭṭhassati pekkhītena mhitena ca] 330
na tveva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra, Mālakṛṣṇam śārihaṃ pi śārde yena dāttho na āvati,
na tva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra,
na tva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra,
na tva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra,
na tva eko skāya mālakṛṣṇaṃ gocra.

Maṭṭhassatīn iñṭhandhante pekkhitena mhiṭhaṃ ca atho pi dānivaṭṭhena maṭṭhassatīn iñṭhante sa na vesa jano vaktusado api ugghatīto mato.

Tesuṃ kāmoghaśālaṃ kāma aparajñātām kālam gatiṃ bhavabhavāṃ samudravānim purakkhatā.

332 These stanzas show some connection with those of the Aṅguttara, III, p. 69, but the order is different. Here is the text and the translation, which presents some difficulties:

Paśyāmi kāyamedhyam aśuciṃ kurimikulabharitam,
It is better to put out one’s eyes
With red-hot iron
Than to become distracted
And contemplate the beauty of women.

By her smile and her looks,
Her pride and her false modesty,
Her way of turning her head or closing her eyes,
Her fine words and her fits of anger and jealousy,
The provocativeness of her walk,
Woman drives a man mad.
The net of lust is full:
All men are caught in it.

Whether she is seated, lying down, walking or standing,
A glance, a lifting of the eyebrow is enough
For the inexperienced fool
To be completely intoxicated by her.

A swordsman marching against the enemy
Can still be conquered;
The female enemy, tormenter of men,
Should not be touched.

A snake full of poison
Can still be held in the hand;
Woman, this deceiver of men
Should not be touched.

The man endowed with wisdom
Should not look at her
Or, if he is forced to see her,
He should treat her as his mother or his sister.

Looking at her objectively, he will consider woman
As a mass of impurities.
Not running away from the fire of lust
Is to [condemn oneself] to perish in its flames.

Moreover, there is in woman the peculiarity that her husband is proud when she is treated with respect, vexed when she is slighted. Thus woman brings man only affictions (āśāśa) or sadness (daurmanasya). Then why approach her? Instability in affections is the defect of woman; wicked curiosity into the business of men is her knowledge. The great fire burns men, but it is possible to approach it; the brisk wind has no material form, but it is possible to grasp it; the snake contains venom, but it is possible to touch it; the heart of a woman, nothing can gain possession of it. Why? Because it is a characteristic of woman that she has

333 This phrase is reminiscent of the Saundarāṇāḍa of Aśvaghoṣa, VIII, v. 36:
Pradahan dahano ’pi grhyate viśārah pakavo ’pi grhyate, kapito bhujago ’pi grhyate pramadādām tu mano na grhyate.
saw him sleeping, she shook him several times without succeeding in bringing him back to his senses; then she left him ... sources noted above, add Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 23, p.731a; Ta tche tou louen, T 1509, k. 26, p. 252a29.

694

no consideration for wealth, nobility, fame, knowledge, virtue, family, ability, eloquence, stability of the household, or depth of affection: all that is of no account in her mind; she desires only what she sees. She is like a dragon that seeks only to kill men without distinguishing good from evil.

Moreover, woman cares nothing for the grief or sadness [that she provokes]; she can be loaded with gifts and attention, she will follow her fancy without letting herself be guided.

Moreover, in the midst of good people, woman is puffed up with pride; she considers the ignorant as enemies; she pursues the wealthy and the noble with her flattery; she treats the poor and the humble like dogs. She always follows her own appetites and never virtue.

[The fisherman lover of the king's daughter]335

[166b] The king of a kingdom had a daughter named Kin moou t'sou (Kumuda). A fisherman, named Chou p'o k'ie, walking on the road, noticed the king’s daughter from afar in a high tower; he saw her face in the casement of a window. His mind was completely taken with this image and his heart could not be detached from it for a single moment. This attachment grew from day to day and from month to month; he could no longer eat or drink. To his mother who asked him what was the matter, he answered by revealing his feelings: “Since seeing the king’s daughter, I cannot forget her.” His mother scolded him, saying: “You are a humble man, and the king’s daughter is of very high rank; you cannot have her.” Her son replied: “I would like to be able to distract myself, but I cannot forget the princess for a single moment; if my wishes cannot be realized, it is impossible for me to live.”

In order to act in her son’s favor, the mother went to the palace; she constantly brought large fish and excellent meat without asking for any payment. The king’s daughter was astonished and asked her what she wanted. The mother begged her to send away her attendants and said that she would reveal her sentiments; [after this] she said: “I have an only son who loves you deeply, O princess; his passion is so strong that he cannot be realized, it is impossible for me to live.”

Moreover, the ascetic who is always nourishing feelings of loving-kindness (maitrīcittā) is compelled to withstand torments that are inflicted on him patiently.

4. Withstanding persecutors.

How can one attain patience toward those who torment one?

It is necessary to say: “All beings commit faults that expose them to a punishment and they take vengeance one upon another. The torment that I undergo today has as its cause my previous conduct. Even though, in the course of the present lifetime (bhajānman) I have done nothing [that merits reprisals] still I now expiating the wrong caused in my previous lifetimes (parājñaman). I [166c] am in the process of paying for it now; let us withstand this torment gently; what use is it to rebel? A debtor must pay his debt cheerfully at the request of his creditor and not become irritated.”

Moreover, the ascetic who is always nourishing feelings of loving-kindness (maitrīcittā) is compelled to withstand torments that are inflicted on him patiently.

[The patience of Kāntātri]336

The rishi Tch'ou t'si (Kāntātri) was practicing patience (kaññi) and loving-kindness (maitrī) in a great forest. One day, king Kiśī (Kali) with his courtesans (gandākā) went into the forest to walk about and amuse themselves. His meal being finished, the king stopped to sleep. The courtesans, who were wandering in the flowering forest, noticed the rishi and went to pay their respects (vandāsa) to him. Then the rishi praised loving-kindness and patience to them; his words were so fine that the women could not get enough of them and stayed with him for a long time. King Kali woke up and, not seeing his courtesans, seized his sword (asāttra) and follow their footsteps. When he saw them standing by the rishi, his jealousy broke out; with furious eyes and brandishing his sword, he asked the rishi: “What are you doing here?” The rishi replied: “I am here to cultivate patience and practice loving-kindness.” The king said: “I will put you to the proof at once. With my sword, I will cut off your ears (karna), nose (nāsā), hands (hasta) and feet (pāda). If you do not 335 This little story has been translated by Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 294-296. His translation is reproduced here.

336 The exploit of Kāntātri has already been told above, Traité, I, p. 264F. To the other Chinese sources noted above, add Tch'ou yao king, T 212, k. 23, p.731a; Ta tche tou louen, T 1509, k. 26, p. 252a29.
get angry, I will know that you are cultivating patience.” The ṛṣi answered: “Do as you will.” Then the king took his word and cut off his ears, nose, hands and feet, asking him: “Is you mind disturbed?” The ṛṣi answered: “I am cultivating loving-kindness and patience, my mind is not disturbed.” The king said: “Your body lies there powerless; you are speaking the truth when you say that you are not disturbed, but nobody would believe you.” Then the ṛṣi made this vow: “If I am really developing loving-kindness and patience, may my blood (kṣīra) become milk (kaṭvā).” At once his blood changed into milk; the king was astounded and went away with his courtesans. But then in the forest, a nāga took pity on the ṛṣi, made thunder and lightning and let loose his thunder-bolt; struck by its poison, the king collapsed and died before he reached his palace.

This is why we say that it is necessary to exert patience toward one’s persecutors.

*** *** ***

Furthermore, the bodhisattva cultivates compassion (karunācitta). All beings are ceaselessly under the stress of all the sufferings (dukkha): in the narrow space of the womb (kukṣi), they feel a great deal of pain; at the time of birth (jīri), they are squeezed; their bones and flesh are as if crushed; a cold wind pierces their body worse than a halberd. This is why the Buddha said: “Of all the sufferings, the suffering of birth is the worst.” And it is the same for the many distresses suffered in old age (jīrā), sickness (vyādhi) and death (maravaṇa). Why would the ascetic further increase the suffering of beings? This would be like putting iron into the wound.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: “I must not be like other people who are constantly carried along by the stream of transmigration (samsāra); I must go against the current and dry up the source and enter the path to nirvāṇa. All ordinary people (prthagga) are worried by a theft, are happy with a profit, are frightened in a sinister place. I, who am a bodhisattva, should not imitate them in any way. Although I may not yet have destroyed the [167a] fetters (samyojana), I must control myself and practice patience, not get irritated by persecutions, not rejoice at flattery, not fear suffering and difficulties; I must have feelings of great compassion (mahākarunācitta) for all beings.”

Moreover, seeing beings coming to torment him, the bodhisattva should say to himself: “This is my friend, this is my teacher; let me treat him with additional affection (anumaya) and respect (sakāra). Why? Because if he did not inflict torment on me, I would not have the chance to be patient.” This is why he says: “This is my friend, this is my teacher.”

Moreover, the knowledge of the bodhisattva conforms to this speech of the Buddha: “ Beings have had no beginning (andañcha) and the universes (lokadhatu) are infinite (ananta); I have endlessly transmigrated through the five destinies (pālcosati); of all the beings [presently existing], I have formerly been their father, mother, and brother; in turn, these beings have been at some time my father, mother and brother.

And it will be the same in the future.”

Reasoning in this way, the bodhisattva is unable to have bad feelings or give himself up to anger.

Moreover, the bodhisattva thinks: “Among all these beings, the family of the Buddhas (buddhamaṇḍa) is widely represented. To become annoyed at them is to become annoyed with the Buddha. If I become annoyed with the Buddha, everything is finished. Thus it has been said that this pigeon (kapota) will later become a Buddha;” at this moment, although it is but a bird, it should not be treated lightly.”

Moreover, of all the afflictions (kleśa), anger (krodha) is the most serious; of all the punishments inflicted for sin (akusalaśīpākā), the punishment reserved for anger is the most severe; Of all the other bonds (bandhana), there is none as serious.

[Śakra’s question]. 340

Che t’i p’o na min (Śakra devānā indra) questioned the Buddha with this stanza:

What must be killed in order to be safe?
What must be killed in order to experience no repentance?
What is the root of poison (visamūla)?
What destroys all good?
What must be killed in order to have praise?
What must be killed in order not to feel sadness?

The Buddha answered with this stanza:

By killing anger, one is safe.

337 Free quotation from Samyutta, II, p. 89-190 (Tsa a han, T 99, no. 945, k. 34, p. 241c-242a; T 100, no. 338, k. 16, p. 487a: Ananatageyahe bhikkhave samādhi pubbati na padhipaya avijjāvaranManam satīnaṃ taṃhāṃayojitaṃ sandhīvatam samasamatanama do bhikkhave satto sulabharūpo yo na mā’dī-pāṭābhāgī-patta-bhūtanucchati imāna dīphana addhuna: “The transmigration of beings, O monk, has its origin in eternity. It is not possible to find any beginning starting from which beings, plunged in ignorance, fettered by ignorance, wander by chance from birth to birth. It is not easy. O monks, to find any being who, in the course of the long path of transmigration, has not been at some time your father, your mother, your brother, your sister or your son.”

338 I.e., the family of those who one day will become Buddhas.
339 See above, p. 647F, the avadīna of the pigeon.
340 Chetvā sutta in Samyutta, I, p. 237 (cf. Tsa a han, T 00, no. 1116, k. 46, p. 295b-c; T 100, no. 45, k. 3, p. 388c-389a)
By killing anger, one experiences no repentance.
Anger is the root of poison
That destroys all good.
The Buddha praises those who kill anger.
By killing anger, one feels no sadness.

The bodhisattva says to himself: “I am cultivating compassion (karuṇā); I wish that all beings find happiness; anger destroys all good and pollutes everything; why would I commit such a sin? If I feel anger (krodha) and aversion (pratigha), I lose my own benefits; how then could I lead beings to happiness? Moreover, the Buddhas and bodhisattvas consider great compassion (mahākaruṇā) as fundamental. If, for this compassion I substituted this anger that is a destructive poison, that would be especially inappropriate. If the bodhisattva loses the basis of compassion, would he deserve the name of bodhisattva? Where would his quality come from? This is why it is necessary to develop patience. If a being inflicts harm on me, I must think of this being’s qualities (gusa), for, although at the moment this being is committing a fault, otherwise [167b] he possesses good qualities; as a result of these qualities, he should not be hated. Besides, if this man curses me or treats me, it is in order to correct me; he is like a goldsmith who cleans the gold by putting it in the fire so that only the pure gold remains. If I suffer injury, the cause of it is in my earlier lifetimes (pūrva Jayamana); now I must pay; I should not be annoyed but I should practice patience. Finally, the bodhisattva treats beings with loving-kindness (maitrī), like little children. Now, in Jambudvīpa, people feel very sad (daurmanaya) and their joyful days are rare. When they come to insult me or attack me, they have so much joy! Joy is so difficult to obtain that I will allow them to insult me. Why? Because from my first resolution (prathamacitropóa), I have decided that they should find joy.

Furthermore, in this world, beings are constantly tormented by illness (vydh); a cruel death (maranavatā) constantly awaits them like an enemy constantly spying on his opponent. How could an honest man not feel loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karuṇā) for them? Furthermore, if one wanted to increase their suffering, this suffering would not affect anyone else before one experiences it oneself. By reasoning in this way, one will not become annoyed with them and one will develop patience.

Moreover, it is necessary to consider the gravity (doṣatā) of hatred (dveṣa, pratigha); of the three poisons (trīṣṭa), it has no equal; of the 98 fetters (sanyojana), it is the most solid; of all the sicknesses of the mind (cittrividhi), it is the most difficult to cure. The hateful man does not distinguish between good (kusala) and bad (akusala), between sin (āpatti) and merit (puṇya), between profit (lābha) and loss (hāni); he does not reflect; he will fall into the unfortunate destinies (durgati) and will forget beneficial (subhākṣata) words; he neglects his reputation; he ignores the efforts of others and does not clean out his own physical and mental torments; hatred having covered over his eye of wisdom (prajñācakṣa), he devotes himself particularly to tormenting others.

This is how a rśi who possessed the five supernatural powers (abhijñā) destroyed a whole country in the manner of an outcaste (candala) simply out of hatred, even though he practiced pure asceticism (vīśuddhayoga).341

341 Reference is made to this event in a passage in the Upāśanta of the Majjhima, I, p. 378, reproduced textually in Milinda, p. 130. “Have you heard, O householder, how the forest of Dunḍaka, the forest of Kalāga, the forest of Mejja and the forest of Māṇḍa have been deserted and emptied of inhabitants? – I have heard, O venerable one, that it was the mental misdeed of the rśi.”

The Dunḍaka version of this passage occurs in a fragment of the Upāśira found by S. Lévi in Kathmandu and published in JA 1925, p. 29-30 which has a development missing in the Pāli: “Have you heard, O householder, by whom the forests of Dunḍaka, of Kalāga and Māṇḍa have been completely emptied leaving only the spaces in the forests? Thersupon Upāli, the householder, remained silent. Later, Upāli replied: “I have heard, O Gautama, that the cause was the mental anger of the rśi.” – The Chinese translation of the Tchong a han, T 26, no. 133, p. 630a, closely follows this version.

Another Sanskrit version of this passage occurs in a citation from the Viśṇukī, ed. Lévi, p. 10. For the Tibetan version, see L. de La Vallée Poussin, Jīmālakārakāvnārahana, Muséon, 1912, p. 64; and for the Chinese versions, T 1588, p. 69c; T 1589, p. 73b; T 1590, p. 77a.

Of the three royal kingdoms mentioned here, at least two are well known: Kalāga is actually Orissa; Dunḍaka covered the entire region of the Vindhya from the Videha to the Kalāga (cf. B. C. Law, India as described in early texts of Buddhism and Jainism, 1941, p. 106) The Majjhikālā of the Pāli version may be a faulty reading of the Sanskrit version: avayrī sanyāni madyahākātanī. It should not be forgotten that the Pāli texts have been revised according to a Sanskrit norm (cf. J. Bloch, L’Inde-bhūsen, 1934, p. 8).

S. Lévi, Pour l’histoire du Rāja, JA, Jan-Feb. 1918, p. 97, has looked into the story of the destruction of the Dunḍakāranya in the Rāmāyana, VII, 81B, the rśi Udayas, furious at the violence used by the king Dunḍa against his daughter, pronounced a curse, and the land, flourishing as it had been, was changed into a wild forest. – But the destruction of the Dunḍaka is well known in the Buddhist tradition: 1) The Pāli texts (Ivatka, III,p. 463, V, p. 133 seq., 267; Papalau, Ill, p. 60-65) tells the following: Kṣavacchā, disciple of Sāرابhūga, in search of solitude, was established in King Dunḍaka’s park, near the city of Kumābāvati in Kalāga. One day when King Dunḍaka was leaving to suppress a revolt, he thought he could make himself lucky by spitting on Kṣavacchā and throwing his toothpick at him. The gods were indignant, killed the king and destroyed the whole country. Only three people escaped death: the rśi Kṣavacchā, the leader of the army who had become his disciple, and a certain Rāma, originally from Benares, who was spared as a result of his filial piety. The forest that grew up in that desolated land was called Dunḍakāranya.

2) The Mahābhārata, III, p. 363, tells another version which is of some interest: A pupil of the rśi Kāyāyana, called Vatsa, surrounded by five hundred disciples, lived at Anurāma in a hermitage on the shore of the Ganges; they all possessed the five powers, practiced the four trance, had renounced desires, and were of noble conduct and great power. Then Vatsa, suffering from a wind sickness and unable to withstand the bitter cold at Anurāma, went away to the Dékhan, to the city of Govardhana. King Dunḍaka, who reigned there, was an irreligious man and an impious king without the correct view, eager for pleasure, full of wrong ideas, ignoring his mother and father, with neither religious life nor chastity, cruel, pitiless and violent. Seeing the rśi Vatsa, he buried this peaceful, harmless

697 698
Finally, the hateful man, like the tiger or wolf, is hard to withstand; like a pernicious ulcer, it pierces and easily becomes poisoned. The hateful man is like a poisonous snake that people look at without pleasure. When a man accumulates anger, his bad feelings develop and he ends up in unexpected crimes: he kills his father and rebels against the Buddha.

You are living in the holy Dharma,

Why are you quarreling?

In worldly people, quarrels may still be... p. 489; Dhammapāṭṭha, I, p. 58-60; Tchong a han T 26, k. 17, p. 536a; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 24, p. 160a. 700

Finally, the hateful man, like the tiger or wolf, is hard to withstand; like a pernicious ulcer, it pierces and easily... I, p. 176-178); Sārattha, II, p. 304. Sanskrit sources: Kośambakavastu, Gilgit MS, III, 2, p. 181-186. 699

You are living in the holy Dharma,

Why are you quarreling?

Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 882b; partially versified version in Tatchouang yen laouen king, T 201, no. 51, k. 9, p. 304a-305b (tr. Huber, p. 246-247).

You others, O bhikkus,

Do not provoke quarrels (vivāda).

By continuing in bad feelings

One exposes oneself to very heavy punishment.

You are seeking nirvāṇa

You have renounced material profit, and innocent man in the earth. But the prime minister of the kingdom, named Vighasta, pulled the still living rāja from under the pile of earth, prostrated before him and begged for pardon: “O venerable one, I do not approve the poison [of hatred] is doing harm to himself.

You are living in the holy Dharma,

[167c] Why are you quarreling?

In worldly people, quarrels may still be excused.

But among monastics

How can they quarrel?

The monastic who nourishes in his heart

The poison [of hatred] is doing harm to himself.

It is like fire, flashing forth from a cold cloud

Which burns the body.

The bhikṣus said to the Buddha: “Let the Buddha, the teacher of the Dharma (dharmassāmin), remain humble and silent (apatottusu tāsāmabhātas tiṣṭhatu); as for us, we cannot remain silent when we are attacked.” 344

Persuaded that these men could not be saved, the Buddha rose up into the sky (apari vīhāyata prakṛtāṇi) in the very midst of the assembly 345 and went away. He entered into a forest [and there entered into] meditative stabilization of tranquility (sīanalathasamādi).

342 For the schism of Kauśāmīti and particularly the last quarrel that caused the Buddha to leave the city, see:

Sanskrit sources: Kosambakavastu, Gilgit MS, III, 2, p. 181-186.

Chinese sources: Tehinag a han, T 26, no. 72, k. 17, p. 53b-c; Tsung yi a han, T 125, k. 16, p. 626b seq.; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 24, p. 160a; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 882b; partially versified version in Ta souchoung yen loun king, T 201, no. 51, k. 9, p. 304a-305b (tr. Huber, Sūtraṭṭha, p. 246-253).

343 These stanzas have nothing in common with those which the Vinaya, I, p. 349-350, and the Majjhima, III, p. 154, make the Buddha pronounce in this circumstance; on the other hand, they show an undeniable resemblance to the version of the Sūtraṭṭha, tr. Huber, p. 246-247.

344 Cf. Vinaya, I, p. 349; Majjhima, III, p. 153: Ahattavo bhikkhu Bhagavatam etad avoca: Āgāme, bhante, Bhagavā dhammasāmin; appoṣaṅko, bhante, Bhagavā dīṣadhammaiḥasiḥhāram ameyutto viharata: mayaṃ etena bhāsananam kalahena vighahena veddāna paṁmāyasiṁdām iti: “A certain monk said to the Bhagavat: Lord, let the Blessed One, the teacher of the Dhamma, be patient! Lord, let the Blessed One remain tranquil in the Blissful Abode that he has attained in this life. As for us, we recognize ourselves to be in the middle of this altercation, this dispute, this struggle and this argument.” – Similar reply in the Gilgit MS, III, 2, p. 186: Evam ake Kosambakā bhikkuva Bhagavatam etad avoca: Dhammasāmin Bhagavā dīṣadhammaiḥhāram aṃyютto viharati: mayaṃ etena bhāsananam kalahena vighahena veddāna paṁmāyasiṁdām iti: “The monks of Kauśāmīti said to the Bhagavat: “The Blessed One is the teacher of the Dhamma, the Well-gone One is the teacher of the Dhamma, but for us, why should we pardon those who speak insults and heresies?”

345 This journey in the air is also mentioned in the Gilgit MS, III, 2, p. 186; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 24, p. 160a23; Sseu fen liu, T 1428, k. 43, p. 882c5. The Pāli sources do not give this detail.

346 In the forest of Pārīlayaka, where a lone elephant brought him food and drink; cf. Simutta,III, k. 95; Udāna, p. 41-42; Vinaya, I, p. 352-353; Jātaka, I, p. 489; Dhammapadattha, I, p. 58-60; Tschong a han T 26, k. 17, p. 536a; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 24, p. 160a.
The sin of anger is so serious that it happens that one no longer accepts the words of the Buddha; this is why anger must be chased away and patience cultivated. Besides, by cultivating patience, one easily obtains loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karunā); thanks to these, one reaches Buddhahood.

*** *** ***

Question. – Patience is a fine quality among all the qualities, but there is a case where it is impossible: when a person of little worth looks you up and down and treats you fearfully; then patience is not called for.

Answer. – When a person of little worth looks you up and down and treats you fearfully, you are tempted to not endure him. However, the sin of impatience is more serious than the insult. Why? Because the impatiant person is scorned by the saints (ārya) and by honest people (sújana), whereas the patient person is scorned only by common people. Of the two despisers, better to be despised by the ignorant than by the saints. Why? The ignorant scorns what is not despicable, [namely, patience], whereas the saint despises that which is despicable, [namely, patience]. This is why one should practice patience.

Furthermore, even without practicing generosity (ādana) or rapture (bhūsma), the patient person always attains marvelous qualities (gūna); he is reborn among the gods or among men and later will attain Buddhahood. Why?

Because his mind is gentle (mudha) and tender (sūrava).

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: “The person who is tormenting me today is concerned with destroying my patience. Not only do I have his scorn, his curses and his iron to suffer, but if I lose patience, I will also fall into the hell (niraya) of burning iron walls and earth where I will suffer immense pain; the burns that I would suffer would be indescribable.” This is why the bodhisattva is aware of his nobility, even if the ordinary man treats him scornfully; if he resisted and stood on his own dignity, [his self-love] would be satisfied but he would be base. That is why he should be patient.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva says to himself: Since the first time that I made the resolution (pratīhāratāmāsa), I have sworn, in the interest of others, to heal all their mental sicknesses (cittayuddhi). Today, this man is sick with anger (pratīhasyosayanena vyūdhi); I want to cure him. Would he be calmed if I added my own sickness to his; [in other words, if I wanted to cure his anger by means of my own anger]? The master physician (bhūsma) cures all illnesses; if a sick person beset by a demon draws his knife and insults him, without making a distinction between friend and enemy, the physician who understands demonic sicknesses wants only to cure him and has no hatred for him. It is the same for the bodhisattva; when a being torments or insults him, he [168a] knows that this being is sick with the passion “anger” (dvesakāra), and that he is led by rage; the bodhisattva cures him by skillful means (upāya), without feeling any aversion toward him.”

Moreover, the bodhisattva takes care of all beings and loves them like his children; when they bother him, the bodhisattva has compassion for them, is not cross with them and does not scold them. A loving father takes care of his sons and his grandsons; they are young and have no discretion and sometimes they insult and beat their father disrespectfully and fearlessly; but their father pardons these young fools and his love for them only increases; even though they have done wrong to him, he is not annoyed and does not hate them. The bodhisattva’s patience is like that.

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “If beings persecute me, I must endure it. If I do not endure it, I would regret it from this life on and, later, I would fall into hell (niraya) where I will suffer greatly. If I am reborn among the animals (tityugyoni), I will be a poisonous dragon, a perfidious serpent, a lion, tiger or wolf. If I am reborn among the pretas, fire will come out of my mouth; like a man caught in a fire, at first the burn is slight, but later it gradually increases.”

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “As a bodhisattva, I want to do good (kīta) to beings; if I am unable to endure them patiently, I am not called “bodhisattva”, I am called “wicked man”.

Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “There are two kinds of worlds (loka): the world of animate beings (sattvaloka) and the world of inanimate beings (asattvaloka). From the time of my first resolution (pratīhāratāmāsa), I have sworn, in the interest of beings, to withstand the torments coming from inanimate beings, stones, trees, wind, cold, heat, water and rain without impatience; today, it is this animate being that attacks me; I must endure it; why would I become irritated?”

Moreover, the bodhisattva knows the distant origin [of beings]; it is in a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamgrha) that is metaphorically (pratīhāra) given the name of ‘pudgala’ (man, individual), but there is no true pudgala. With whom then could he be annoyed? In this [alleged pudgala] there is just a pile of bones (asthi), blood (sāma), skin (chāva) and flesh like bricks piled one upon another, coming and going like a mechanical doll. Knowing that, there is no place for irritation with him. If I am angry, I am a fool (mudha) and will suffer the punishment myself. This is why it is necessary to exercise patience.

Finally, the bodhisattva says to himself: “In the past, when the numberless Buddhas, as many as the grains of sand in the Ganges (gangaṇavāluvaśāravatamsa), followed the bodhisattva path, they first practiced patience toward beings (sattvaloka) and then patience toward the Dharma (dharmaśānti). I, who am today following the Path of the Buddha, must imitate the qualities of the Buddhas and not feel aversion (pratīhāra), as that is the mark of Māra (māraśānti). This is why I must be patient.”

He is patient for all these reasons. This is patience toward beings (sattvalokasānti).
CHAPTER XXV: PATIENCE TOWARD THE DHARMA (p. 902F)

I. GENERAL DEFINITION.

[168b] What is meant by patience toward the Dharma (dharmaśānti)?

To endure sycophants and flatterers as well as violent and lustful people constitutes patience toward beings (satvākṣānti); to endure adulation (sākāra) and flattery (pūjā) as well as violence (viheṭhana) and lust (kāmaniṣṭhacāra) constitutes patience in regard to the Dharma (dharmaśānti).

Furthermore, dharmaśānti consists of not feeling any of the six inner attractions (sādāḥyātmikakaraṇa), not seizing any of the six outer objects (sādāḥyāsthaśāla), and not making any distinction (vikalpa) between the two categories. Why? Because inner (ādhyātmikākṣamitma) is mixed with outer (bhāvyānimitta) and outer is mixed with inner. Actually the two characteristics (nimitta) are equally nonexistent (anupalabdha), presenting a single nature (ekalakṣaṇa), resulting from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasaṃgrahapekṣa) and are really empty (ānyaya).

The nature of all dharmas is eternal purity (nityavisuddhi), the true nature (tathāti), the limit of existence (bhūtatoṣṭa), the real nature (dhammati). Dharmas are included in non-duality (advayaparita), but although they are without duality, they are not, however, single. Seeing all dharmas in this way, without developing them in one’s mind or in one’s firmly held views, is what is called dharmaśānti. Thus, in the Pīṭha king (Vimakūṁitānīsāstra), the bodhisattvaFa cthou (Dharmasthiti) said: “Arising and cessation are two; the absence of arising (anupāda) and the absence of cessation (anirodha) is the teaching on entering into non-duality (advayaparaitivajjana).” And, finally, the bodhisattva Wen chou che li (Mañjuśrī) said: “The absence of hearing, absence of seeing, cessation of all thoughts, absence of words and absence of speech, that is the teaching on entering into non-duality.” [Questioned in turn about non-duality], Vimalakirti said to the bodhisattvas: “Sirs, how does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality (advayadharmaparyāśya)?” Let each speak as he will. In the assembly there was a bodhisattva named Fa ctwu tai (Dharmāvāra) who said: “Sirs, arising (upāda) and cessation (nirodha) are two. Dharmas that do not arise in the very beginning do not actually cease; subscribing to the doctrine of non-arising (anupādatadharmaṅkṣānti) in this way is to enter into the teaching of non-duality.” (p. 550b-c). — Twenty-six other bodhisattvas then gave their opinions, and the text continues: Each having spoken in turn, all these bodhisattvas asked Mañjuśrī: “How then does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality?” Mañjuśrī answered: “In my opinion, in regard to dharmas, there are no words or speech, no statement or awareness; they elude questions.

II. ENDURING OUTER AND INNER SUFFERINGS AND THE AFFLICTIONS.

Furthermore, the dharmas altogether form two groups: 1) beings (saṭṭha), ii) things (dharma). We have already spoken about the bodhisattva’s patience toward beings (chapter XXIV); here we will speak about patience toward things. There are two kinds of things: 1) mental things (cittadharmas), ii) extra-mental things (acittadharmas). – Among the extra-mental things, some are inner (ādhyātmika) and others are outer (bhāya). Cold (śīta), heat (uṣṇa) wind (ānīla), rain (varṣa), etc., are outer; hunger (kṣīṇā), thirst (pāpa), old age (jīrā), sickness (vyādhi), death (maraṇa), etc., are inner: all the categories of this type are extra-mental. – Among the mental things, there are two types: i) anger (krodha), sadness (daunmanaya), doubt (śaṃcāra), etc.; ii) lust (rāga), pride (abhīmāna), etc.; these two categories are mental things. Whether it is a question of mental things or extra-mental, the bodhisattva endures them both without flinching; this is what is called dharmaśānti.

[A. Enduring outer sufferings]. — Question. — With regard to a being (saṭṭha), anger or killing are sinful whereas compassion is meritorious; but cold, heat, wind, or rain derive neither benefit nor inconvenience [from our attitude toward them]. Then why endure them?

[168c] Answer. — 1) Although they derive no benefit or inconvenience [from our attitude], the very fact of enduring sycophants and flatterers as well as violent and lustful people constitutes patience toward beings (satvākṣānti). 2) Finally, the bodhisattva knows that it is as a result of his previous faults (bhāvajñāna) that he has taken this form. Having committed a sin merely by not nourishing benevolence for a being, he derived no benefit from it, is very meritorious. This is why, even if cold, heat, wind or rain derive no benefit or inconvenience [from our attitude toward them], one commits a sin merely by not nourishing benevolence for a being.

Summary of the ninth chapter of the Vimalakīrti-nirdeśa, entitled Advayadharmaparyāśya (in Tib., Ghūs su med pah chos kyi skor byung po); cf. Wei mo kie kīng, T 474, k. 2, p. 536c; Wei mo kie so chou kīng, T 475, k. 2, p. 550b; Chou wou keou tsi’eng kīng, T 476, k. 4, p. 577a. — Here are the passages of T 375 to which the Mpp is referring here: At that time, Vimalakīrti said to the bodhisattva: “Sirs, how does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality (advayadharmaparyāśya)?” Let each speak as he will. In the assembly there was a bodhisattva named Fa ctwu tai (Dharmāvāra) who said: “Sirs, arising (upāda) and cessation (nirodha) are two. Dharmas that do not arise in the very beginning do not actually cease; subscribing to the doctrine of non-arising (anupāhatadharmaṅkṣānti) in this way is to enter into the teaching of non-duality.” (p. 550b-c). — Twenty-six other bodhisattvas then gave their opinions, and the text continues: Each having spoken in turn, all these bodhisattvas asked Mañjuśrī: “How then does the bodhisattva enter into the teaching of nonduality?” Mañjuśrī answered: “In my opinion, in regard to dharmas, there are no words or speech, no statement or awareness; they elude questions.

(praṇā) and answers (vyūkārma).” Then Mañjuśrī asked Vimalakīrti, saying: “We have all spoken in turn; now it is up to you to tell us how the bodhisattva enters into the teaching on nonduality.” But Vimalakīrti remained silent and did not speak. Mañjuśrī congratulated him: “Good! Very good! By having neither sounds (aksara) nor speech (abhīdpa), that is truly entering into the teaching on nonduality.” (p. 551c).
The enduring of these many outer inconveniences is called dharmakṣaṇī.

\[B. \text{Enduring inner sufferings.} – \]

1) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “There are two kinds of fields (āṣṭāva), those that are pure (vituddha), those that are impure (avitiuddha). The bodhisattva who has been born into an impure field and undergoes bitter suffering there, such as the torments of hunger or cold, makes the aspiration (graniḍhāna) [to possess] a pure field and says to himself: “When I will be Buddha, all these sufferings will not exist in my field; these sufferings, although they are impure, will be of benefit to me.”

2) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “If the eight human situations (aṣṭau lokadharmāḥ) \[146\] cannot be avoided by the saints (ārya), how then could I avoid them? Therefore I must endure them.”

3) Moreover, the bodhisattva who reflects knows that the human body is without power or weight, is prey to old age (jarā), sickness (vyāḍha) and death (maruṇa). Even though the celestial existence [to which he could aspire] is pure, free of old age and sickness, the bodhisattva hesitates to become attached to celestial bliss. [Actually, a god (deva)] is like a drunk man, unable to cultivate the merits of the Path (mārgaṃpurṇa), of entering the monastic life (pravrajya) or of renunciation (vīrya). Therefore it is in his human body that the bodhisattva is obliged to win merit and act for the benefit of beings.

4) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: “I have taken on a body made of the four great elements (mahābhūta) and the five aggregates (skandha); thus inevitably I will experience all kinds of suffering. It is impossible that one can avoid suffering when one assumes a body; rich or poor, monastic (pravrajya) or lay (gṛhaṇa), foolish or wise, scholarly or ignorant, all cannot avoid it. The rich man experiences constant fear in guarding his wealth; he is like a fat sheep about to be led to the slaughterhouse; he is like a crow holding some meat in its beak with the other crows chasing it. The poor experience hunger and cold. The monk, despite the sufferings he undergoes in the present lifetime, will find happiness and will win the Path in the next lifetime. The lay person, despite the happiness he experiences in the present lifetime, will find suffering in the future lifetime. The fool, who is looking for happiness in the present lifetime, runs up against impermanence (aniyati) and then will find suffering. The wise person, who meditates on the sadness of impermanence, will later find happiness and will attain the Path. Thus all those who possess a body cannot avoid suffering. This is why the bodhisattva must cultivate patience.

5) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: The entire universe is suffering: how then could I seek happiness?

6) Moreover, the bodhisattva says to himself: For innumerable cosmic [169a] periods (aprameyakāla), I have ceaselessly undergone all the sufferings without gaining any benefit; now that I am seeking buddhahood in the interests of beings, I should have great benefit in enduring this suffering. This is why he will patiently endure all outer and inner sufferings.

7) Finally, with a great mind, the bodhisattva has made the aspiration (graniḍhāna) to endure the sufferings of the A pi (avīcī) hell and the No li (niraya) hell. How could he not endure the lesser sufferings [of the present]? If he does not withstand these petty sufferings, how will he be able to withstand the great sufferings?

\[C. \text{Enduring the afflictions.} – \]

Question. – How are the inner mental sufferings endured?

Answer. – \[1\] The bodhisattva says to himself: although I have not yet obtained the Path nor cut through the bonds (bandhāna), if I do not withstand these sufferings, I am not yet a bodhisattva. He also says: If I had obtained the Path and cut through all the fetters (samyojana), I would have nothing else to endure. Besides, hunger, thirst, cold and heat are Māra’s outer army (mūrabāḥvyāsa), the fetters (samyojana) and the afflictions (kleśa) are Māra’s inner army (mūrabāḥvyāsa). I must crush these two armies in order to attain buddhahood; if I do not succeed in that, the state of buddhahood will not be realized.

\[\\]

\[146\] Cf. the Padhānasutta of Suttanipāta, III, 2 (v. 425-449) designated above by the Taśīl, I, p. 341f. under the name of Tsa taung king (Kṣatriya). See the parallel texts there of the Suttanipāta, v. 436-449 and of the Lalitavistara, p. 262-263

\[169a\] Kiso traṃ asi dibhanno; santeke maraṇaṃ tava.

\[169b\] Kṛṣṇa vivaḥanī dhanas traṃ, antilo maraṇaṃ tava.

\[169c\] Sahastraśaḥ śrāvakaśa, ekāno tava jīvaṃ. Sahasrabhigāḥ maraṇam, ekābhīḍaḥ cha jīvaṃ.

\[169e\] Carato ca te bhūmacarṣaṃ, agghbuṣṭaḥ ca jīhaṅ, dudātaḥ satatāṃ dānām bhavanti yatra puṇḍrāḥ vai prahūte karāyaṁ.

\[169f\] The lokadharmas are eight in number: gain (lābdha), loss (alābdha), etc.; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 260; Aṅguttara, IV, p. 156 seq.; V, p. 53.
The Bodhisattva answered: “Today I will destroy your inner armies that are so powerful, to say nothing of your outer armies.” - Māra asked: “What are my inner armies?” The Bodhisattva replied:

Desire (kāma) is your first army (sendū)
Sadness (arati) is the second,
Hunger and thirst (kṣoṭipāla) are the third army,
Greed (ṛṣṇā) is the fourth.

Laziness-torpidity (satīnāmīdīha) is the fifth army.
Fear (bhaya) is the sixth,
Doubt (viśīkṣā) is the seventh army,
Anger (krodha) and hypocrisy (maṛṣkura) are the eighth.

Cupidity (labha) and vainglory (mahāvyāvasa) are the ninth,
Glorification of the self (āṇāmāvijñāna) and scorn of others (parāvajjāha) are the tenth.

It is into these armies
That monastics (pravajjāna) are plunged.

By the power of my meditation and my wisdom
I will crush your armies.
Having attained Buddhahood
I will save all people.

2) Moreover, the bodhisattva should exercise patience toward his own afflictions (kleśa) but he must not cut the bonds (bandhana). Why? Because if he cut these bonds, the loss would be very serious: he would fall into the arhat class [169b] and would be no different than someone who has lost their senses. This is why he stops his passions but does not completely cut them; by cultivating patience he does not follow his passions (sanyojana).

Question. – How is he able to not follow his passions without having previously cut them?
Answer. – By correct reflection (sanyojanaśikṣā), while still having afflictions, he succeeds in not following them. By reflecting, he contemplates the empty impermanent nature of everything (ānyādūnātivināmita) and, although the five desires (paṭcakāna) are still subtly present in him, he no longer produces any bond (bandhana).

[The corpulent sheep without fat]. - A king had a prime minister (mahāmaṇḍya) whose faults he himself concealed so that they remained unknown. He said to him one day: “Go and find me a big sheep but that has no fat; if you don’t find one, I will inflict punishment on you.” The prime minister was learned: he chained up a big sheep, fed it with grass and grains; but three times each day, he frightened it with a wolf. Thus the sheep, in spite of all the food that it received, was big but had no fat. The minister brought the sheep and presented it to the king who commanded his people to kill it; it was big but had no fat. The king asked how that was done, and the minister gave him the reason we have just described. The bodhisattva acts in the same way: he contemplates (samanupayāya) the wolf of impermanence (antivatā), suffering (dukkha) and emptiness (śūnya) in such a way that the fat of the passions (sanyojanaśuto) melts while the flesh of the qualities (guṇamāṇasa) becomes solid.

3) Moreover, an immense reward (pravajjānasūtra) is attached to the qualities (guna) and merits (puṣya) of the bodhisattva: this is why his mind is gentle (mydā) and tender (saraṇa), his fetters are slight and it is easy for him to cultivate patience; he will act in the manner of the royal lion (śimhaśaśa); when he roars in the forest and when people, on seeing him, prostrate with their face on the ground begging for mercy, the lion releases them and lets them go. The tiger (vyāgra) and the jackal (śīrāda), smaller animals, do not act in this way. Why? Because the royal lion, a noble animal, has the discretion of knowledge, whereas the tiger and the jackal, lowly animals, do not have it. If bad troops succeed in finding a good leader, they are safe, but if they encounter only a mediocre soldier, they are lost.

4) Moreover, by the power of his wisdom (prajñā), the bodhisattva knows that anger (krodha) has all kinds of defects and that patience has all kinds of qualities. This is why he is able to endure the fetters.

5) Moreover, by the power of knowledge, the bodhisattva knows how to cut the fetters; but in the interest of beings, he prefers to remain in the world for a long time [and retain his passions]; however, he knows that the fetters are enemies and that is why, while enduring them, he does not follow them. The bodhisattva curbs these hostile passions and, without allowing them to be unleashed, he practices virtue. When one has an enemy whom, for some reason or other, one does not want to kill, one imprisons him closely some place and one goes about one’s own business.
6) Moreover, the bodhisattva who understands well the nature of dharman (dharmalaksana) does not consider the fetters as bad and does not consider the qualities as good; this is why he does not hate the fetters and does not love the qualities. He practices patience with the power of this knowledge. Some stanzas say:

The bodhisattva who has cut through all evil
Will arrive at absolute cessation without residue.
His qualities and merits are immense
The action that he carries out is not ill-advised.

In his great wisdom, the bodhisattva
Does not destroy all the fetters.
This is why he understands the nature of dharman:
[169c] Transmigration and nirvāṇa are but one and not two.

For these various reasons, without yet having obtained the Path, the bodhisattva endures all his afflictions. This is what is called dharmakāya.

7) Moreover, the bodhisattva knows that all the dharman are of a single nature (ekatālaksana), non-dual (advaya):102

a. All dharman are intelligible (vijñyātālaksana) and consequently “one”. The eye consciousness (cakkurūpā) understands color (rūpa), and so on up to the mental consciousness (manovijñāna) which understands dharman. As a result of this characteristic of intelligibility, all dharman are proclaimed “one”.

b. All dharman are knowable (jñātālaksana) and consequently “one”. The dharmakāya (dharmajñāna) and the nirodhe (nirvikalpa) who cognize the truth of suffering (sukhāsaya); the samudaye (samudayajñāna) and the samudaye (samudayajñāna) who cognize the truth of the origin of suffering (nirodhasaya); the pratyakṣa (pratyakṣajñāna) and the pratyakṣa (pratyakṣajñāna) who cognize the truth of the Path (mārgasasaya).103 Finally, excellent worldly knowledge (kulaśa laukikajñāna) also cognizes suffering (dukhha), its origin (samudaya), its destruction (nirodha), the path of its cessation (mārga), space (ākāśa) and cessation not due to knowledge (apratisambhvanirvāna). As a result of this nature of cognizability, all dharman are proclaimed “one”.

8) Moreover, the bodhisattva sees all dharman as triple. What is this triplicity? All the dharman are capable of being object (ālambana) and consequently “one”. The visual consciousness (cakkurūpā) and the things associated with it (samprajñānakutadharma) are considered with color (rūpa). In the same way, the auditory consciousness (srotavā), olfactory (gṛhāvā), gustatory (jīvāvā) and tactile (kāya) consciousnesses (as are considered with sound, smell, taste and the tangible) respectively. The mental consciousness (manovijñāna) and the things associated with it are concerned with the eye (cakṣus), color (rūpa) and the visual consciousness (cakkurūpā) as well as all the others, including the mind (manas), dharman and the mental consciousness (manovijñāna). As a result of this nature of objectivity, all dharman are declared “one”.

d. Moreover, some claim that all dharman, taken separately, form a unity: One and one is two; three times one is three, and so on up to a thousand, ten thousand, etc. Everything reduces to unity; it is metaphorical (prajñāpti) to speak of thousands and tens of thousands.

e. Finally, in all dharman there is a characteristic that makes them to be declared “one”; they are one by means of this same characteristic. Every object (suvacana) is called ‘dharma’; by means of this nature of ‘dharma’ it is one. [The patience consisting] of destroying any characteristic of multiplicity by means of innumerable categories of this type without, however, being attached to unity, is called dharmakāya.

8) Moreover, the bodhisattva sees all dharman as triple. What is duality? Duality is inner nature (ādhyātmikasamutpāda) and outer nature (ādhyātmikasamutpāda). As a result of this inner nature and this outer nature, that which is inner is not outer, and that which is outer is not inner.

Moreover, all dharman are dual by virtue of their nature of existence (bhūva) and their nature of nonexistence (abhāva). They are empty (ā鸿a) and non-empty (ā鸿a), eternal (a鸿a) and transitory (a鸿a), personal (ā鸿a) and non-personal (ā鸿a), material (rūpa) and non-material (rūpa), visible (ā鸿a) and invisible (ā鸿a), resistant (apratīta) and non-resistant (apratīta), impure (ā鸿a) and pure (ā鸿a), conditioned (ā鸿a) and unconditioned (ā鸿a), mind (citta) and non-mind (citta), of mental order (citta) and of non-mental order (acitta), associated with mind (ā鸿a) and dissociated from mind (ā鸿a). [The patience consists] of destroying uniqueness by means of innumerable categories of this type without, however, becoming attached to duality, is called dharmakāya.

9) Moreover, sometimes the bodhisattva sees all dharman as triple. What is this triplicity? [All the dharman] are lower (ā鸿a), middling (sadācāra) or higher (a鸿a); good (kṣa), bad (kṣa) or indeterminate (a鸿a); existent, non-existent, neither existent nor non-existent; to be abandoned by seeing the truths (a鸿a) to be abandoned by meditation (ā鸿a), to be abandoned by meditation (ā鸿a) and to be abandoned (ā鸿a); pertaining to the student (śa), pertaining to the teacher (aśa), pertaining to neither the student or the teacher (nāśa); involving retribution (ā鸿a), not involving retribution, involving retribution, not the absence of retribution. [The ] patience consisting] of destroying unity by means of innumerable ternary categories of this type without, however, being attached to multiplicity (ā鸿a) is called dharmakāya.

III. PATIENCE IN REGARD TO THE BUDDHADHARMA.
Moreover, although the bodhisattva has not yet obtained the pure Path (anāsravamārga) and has not cut through the fetters (samsāja), he is able to adhere to the pure holy Dharma (anāsravīryadharma) as well as the three seals of the Dharma (trivādaḥadharmamāndrā). First seal: “All conditionings are transitory” (anityaḥ sarvasamkāraḥ); second seal: “All dharmas are devoid of substantial self” (anātmānāḥ sarvadharmaḥ); third seal: “Nirvāṇa is reality” (sataṃ nirvānaṃ).354 The saints (ārya) who have obtained the Path (pratipadāyogāḥ) possess the knowledge of all that by themselves (svataḥ); but when the bodhisattva who has not obtained the Path believes in this teaching and adopts it, this is called dharmakṣānti.

Moreover, there are fourteen difficult questions which the Buddha did not answer (caturdaśāvākṣaravatavaḥ): is the world eternal, is it not eternal, etc. [see above, Trāṣṭā, I, p. 155F, 423F]: meditating on these questions without encountering obstacles (śāvarūpa) or losing the Middle Path (madhyamā pratipadaḥ), the ability to maintain such a position constitutes dharmakṣānti.

[Śīlavatikāyasutta].355

A bhikṣu who was reflecting and meditating on these fourteen difficult questions had no success in penetrating them and became impatient. Taking his robe and his begging bowl, he went to the Buddha and said: “If the Buddha will explain these fourteen difficult questions for me and satisfy my mind, I will remain his disciple; if he does not succeed in explaining them to me, I will seek another path.” The Buddha answered this fool (mohapuruṣa): “At the beginning, did you have an agreement with me that if I explained these fourteen difficult questions, you would be my disciple?” The bhikṣu said “No.”

The Buddha continued: “Fool! How can you say today that, if I do not explain that, you will not be my disciple? I preach the Dharma to save people stricken by old age (īvara), sickness (vyākhya) and death (maraṇa). These fourteen difficult questions are subject for debate (vijñānakṣāntaḥ); they are of no use to the Dharma and are only futile proliferation (prapalica). Why ask me these questions? If I answered, you would not understand; at the time of death, you would have understood nothing and you would not be liberated from birth, old age, sickness and death. – A man has been struck by a poisoned arrow (suvāsana); his relatives and his companions (jñānaparivratā) have called a physician (bhūṣaj) to remove the arrow and apply an antidote. The wounded man says [to the physician]: “I will not let you take out the arrow until I know what is your clan (gotra), your name (nāma), your family (jāti), your village (grāma), your father and mother and your age (āyus); I want to know from which mountain the arrow came from, what kind of wood (kāṇḍa) and feathers, who made the arrow-head and what kind of iron; then I want to know if the bow (dhanu) is of mountain wood or animal horn; finally, I want to know where the antidote comes from and what is it name. After I have learned all these things, I will let you take out the arrow and apply the antidote.”” – The Buddha then asked the bhikṣu: “Will this man be able to know all these things and only after that let the arrow be removed?” – The bhikṣu answered: “The man will not succeed in knowing all that for, if he waited to know it all, he would be dead [before the operation].” The Buddha continued: “You are like him: the arrow of wrong views (māyādviṣa) has pierced your mind; I want to remove this arrow from you, my disciple; but you are unwilling to let me take it out, and you want to know if the world is eternal or non-eternal, finite or infinite, etc. You will not find what you are looking for, but you will lose the life of wisdom (prajñābhūtaḥ); you will die like an animal and fall into the shadows.” Gradually the bhikṣu [170b] understood the words of the Buddha deeply and later attain arhathood.

*** *** ***

Furthermore, the bodhisattva who wants to become omniscient (sarvajñā) should discuss about all the dharmas and understand their true nature; he will find no obstacle or impediment in the fourteen difficult questions; he knows that they are serious mental illnesses; to be able to get out of them, to be able to endure them constitutes dharmakṣānti.

Furthermore, the Buddhaadharma is very profound (gambhīraḥ), pure (visādhika) and subtle (śākṣma); it is expressed in innumerable sermons of all kinds. To adhere to it wholeheartedly without hesitation (samsaya) or regret (vipratikṣa) constitutes dharmakṣānti. As the Buddha said, dharmas, although empty (śūnya), are neither cut (samucchima) nor destroyed (niruddha). Arising from a series of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasaṃsāraḥ), they are not eternal (nītāḥ). Although the dharmas are impersonal (ādīnāma), one does not escape from sin (āpatti) or merit (puuya). The mind lasts for only an instant (ekakṣamāna); material dharmas (tālaḥdharmas) enter collectively (bhūtpratāvatāṃśa) with the senses (indriya), the intellect, perish ceaselessly; without lasting until the next moment (pṛthvikṣaṇāḥ), they arise and perish ever anew; nevertheless, one does not escape from the actions (karman) that are causes and conditions for innumerable lifetimes. Although the aggregates (skandha), the elements (ādīnaḥ) and the bases of consciousness (āyatana) [that make up beings] are empty (śūnya) and without self (anātman), beings wander in the five destinies (pākṣacakāra) and undergo transmigration. Such is the Buddhaadharma, multiple (nāṇādhāma), profound (gambhīraḥ) and subtle (śākṣma); even though he has not yet attained buddhahood, [the bodhisattva] believes in it and adheres to it without hesitation or regret; that is what dharmakṣānti consists of.

Furthermore, whereas arhats and pratyekabuddhas, fearing transmigration, seek to enter nirvāṇa as soon as possible, the bodhisattva, not being a Buddha, seeks omniscience (sarvajñānā); out of compassion (karunā) for beings, he wants to understand, analyze, know the true nature of dharmas. The patience that he manifests to that end constitutes dharmakṣānti.

Question. – How does he see the true nature of dharmas?
Answer. – He sees that all the dharmas are without defects (akhila), indestructible (abheda) and unchangeable (avatara) and that that is their true nature.

Question. – Every argument (vāda) may be turned around, refuted and confounded. Why do you say that indestructibility is the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – Because the dharmas are indestructible. In the Buddhadharma, every path of speech is surpassed, the functioning of the mind (cittapratvesh) is stopped; eternally unborn (anupanasa) and unceasing (aniruddha), dharmas are like nirvāna. Why? If dharmas existed in their true nature, they could not be non-existing; if they did not exist after having been, they would be destroyed.

Furthermore, dharmas cannot be eternal (nitya). Why? If they were eternal, there would no longer be sin (āpattra) or merit (puṇya), killing (saśāda) or giving of life, asceticism (yoga) or kind deeds (hitā), bondage (bandhāna) or freedom (vimokṣya): the world would be nirvāna. For all these reasons, dharmas cannot be eternal.

If dharmas were transitory (aniyata), they would be annihilated (uccītanā) and there would be no sin or merit, no increase or decrease; virtues (guna), actions (karman), causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), results (phala) and retribution (vipāka) would disappear. For all these reasons, dharmas cannot be transitory.

Question. – You say that, according to the Buddhadharma, eternity (dālāvata) and impermanence (udechāla) are equally unreal; but that is wrong.

[170c] Why? In the Buddhadharma, eternity is real and impermanence is also real. cessation due to knowledge (pratīṭhāvyānāmyānā) is cessation due to knowledge (pratīṭhāvyānāmyānā) and space (tākāla) are eternal:356 they are eternal because they are not born, they do not perish and they do not perish. The five aggregates (skandha) are impermanent: they are impermanent because they are born (upādā), they perish (sthitā) and they perish (nirvāda). Then why do you say that eternity and impermanence are equally unreal?

Answer. – The saint (brāhma) has two types of language (abhilāpa): (i) an artificial language (apāyabhilāpa), (ii) a true language (samyogabhilāpa). In the artificial language, he will speak of the eternal [principle] or the transitory [principle] according to whether the listener holds the individual (nudgala) to be a simple assemblage of causes and conditions (hetupratyaya) or a true being (sattva).

See what has been said with regard to “therapeutic viewpoint” (pratīṭhāvyānāmyānā) [Cf. Traité, I, p. 27F seq., and especially p. 32F]. When the saint speaks of impermanence, he wants to uproot attachment to the pleasures of the threefold world: the Buddha wonders how to lead these beings to acquire renunciation of desire (vairāgya); this is why he speaks of impermanent dharmas. A stanza says:

By seeing the unconditioned dharma, one escapes from conditioned dharmas. By seeing the unconditioned dharma, one escapes from conditioned dharmas.

Why is rebirth (gaurabhāva) called the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamgraha)? Non-eternal (anitya), non-independent (asuṣatātra), coming from causes and conditions (hetupratyaya), it possesses a nature of old age, sickness and death (jāraśādāhinnarājanakṣaṇa), a nature of destruction (vivādanirājanakṣaṇa), and a nature of destruction (vivādanirājanakṣaṇa) is called rebirth; it is a conditioned dharma (samkhyadharma). As was said in regard to the “therapeutic point of view” [Traité, I, p. 36-38], eternity and impermanence are not real characteristics, for they are both defects.

To say that dharmas are both eternal and transitory is a foolish argument. Why? It is both denying the denial of non-existence and denying the existence of that which is not denied. If one denies both of these, what is the dharma of which one will still be able to say anything?

Question. – In the Buddhadharma, characterized by eternal emptiness (lāmiya), there is neither existence (bhāva) nor non-existence (abhāva). Emptiness (lāmiya) excludes existence, and the emptiness of emptiness (lāmiyalāmiya) prevents non-existence; this adds up to the fact that there is neither existence nor non-existence. Why accuse of that of being a foolish argument?

Answer. – The Buddhadharma in its true nature transcends every belief (grāha) and every opinion (abhāvīsā). By believing in dharmas that are neither existent nor non-existent, you are holding a foolish argument. To affirm both non-existence and non-existence is a debatable and refutable thesis; it is a theoretical position (cittopadāphita) and an occasion for dispute (vivādāphita). The Buddhadharma is not like that. Even though there are reasons for affirming non-existence and non-non-existence, the Buddhadharma does not express an opinion (abhāvīsā) on this subject; as it does not express an opinion, it cannot be refuted or confounded. The Buddhist position is the same [for the other difficult questions: [See Traité, I, p. 155F, 423F]: are dharmas finite, infinite, both finite and infinite, neither finite nor infinite? Does the Tathāgata exist after death, does he not exist after death, does he exist and not exist after death, is it false that he exists and does not exist after death? Is the vital principle (jīva) the same thing as the body (kāraṇa)? Is the vital principle different from the body? All of that is futile. [The bodhisattva] also considers as wrong all the theories relating to the sixty-two views (dystigoa).137 He avoids them all; he believes in the pure unalterable nature (vivādāphita) of the Buddhadharma; his mind is free of regret and functioning. This is what is called dharmakṣaṇa.

[171a] Furthermore, existence (bhāva) and non-existence (abhāva) are two extremes (anta). If one considers dharmas at the time of their arising (upādā) and of their duration (sthiti), one has the view of existence (bhāvadṛśā); if one considers dharmas at the time of their aging (jāra) and their cessation (vibhāgā), one has the view of non-existence (abhāvadṛśā). Beings of the threefold world (trīdāhādākṣaṇa) are often attached (abhāvīsā) to these two views, but these two concepts are wrong.

356 These are the three asamśkrita; cf. Kośa, I, p. 8.

137 These are the 62 dystigoa the root of which is saktādṛśā; detailed explanation in Brahmajālasutta, Dīgha, I, p. 40. – See also above, Traité, I, p. 423F.
and unreal. If existence really existed, there would be no non-existence. Why? To no longer be after having been (bhūtvā abhūtvā) is to undergo destruction (ucchedapatana; such a destruction is impossible (ayukta).

Furthermore, all dharmas are said to exist by reason of the complex of names and conventions (nāmāvakṣetasāmāgar). This is why dharmas coming from the complex of names and conventions do not exist (nopālahābhyaevat).

Question. – Although dharmas coming from names and conventions do not exist, the complex of names and conventions itself does exist!

Answer. – If there were no dharmas, for what would names and conventions be united? There are no names or conventions either.

Furthermore, if dharmas really existed, there would be no need for a mind (citra) or a consciousness (vijñāna) to cognize their existence. If a mind and a consciousness are needed to cognize their existence, they do not exist. Thus, the solidity (khakkhātara) of earth (pūrva)139 is cognized by the body organ (khyendriya) and the body consciousness (khyāvijñāna); but if there were no body organ or body consciousness to cognize it, there would be no solidity.

Question. – Whether the body organ and the body consciousness cognize it or not, the earth is always characterized by solidity.

Answer. – One cognizes the existence of this solidity if one has already recognized its existence or has heard someone else speak about it; but if one did not know it beforehand or if one has not heard speak of it, there would be no solidity.

Furthermore, if the earth were always solid, it would never lose this characteristic. But, like solidified butter, wax or vegetable gum, earth can become liquid and lose its characteristic of solidity. It is the same for gold, silver, copper, iron, etc. The characteristic of water (āparas) is liquidity (āparatvā) but, by the action of cold, it solidifies. Many things lose their characteristics in this manner.

Furthermore, the teachers of the Dharma (upadeśavārāṇya) can transform existence into nothingness and nothingness into existence. [p. 920F, l. 10-11]. Saints (ārya) and great meditators (dhyāvin) can change earth (pūrva) into water (āparas) and water into earth.139 All these dharmas are transformable as has been said in regard to the ten views as totality (kṛtyāvatānāna).190

Furthermore, this view of existence (bhāvavārtika) arises from desire (rāga), hatred (dvesa), delusion (moha), the bonds (bandhana) or disputes (vidvāda). Now any position (bhāvanā) that gives rise to desire, hatred, etc., is foreign to the Buddhadharma. Why? Because the Buddhadharma, by its very nature, is good (laukika) and pure (laukika). Therefore [this view of existence] is false.

Furthermore, all dharmas are grouped into two categories: i) material dharmas (rūpa-dharmā), and ii) non-material dharmas (arūpa-dharmā). Material dharmas can be divided down to the subtle atom (paramātma) and endless dispersion, as we have seen in regard to the refutation of the gift given (dehadvaya) in the chapter on Dānapāramitā [see above, p. 729F]. Non-material dharmas are not cognized by the five faculties. Therefore it is by means of considering the moment of birth-duration-destruction of the mind (manasaupadādhatih bhaṅgappakāra) that we know that the mind (citra) is composed of parts (saṅkhāra).

Since it consists of parts, it is transitory (anitiya); being transitory, it is empty (ālaya); being empty, it is nonexistent (asaṃ). In the time of a finger-snap (accaśāmātāvāra), there are sixty moments (kaṇṭha);136 in each kaṇṭha, the mind is born (śānā) and ceases (bhūnya); but as it arises in a series (prabhavahetupadārā), we know that this is a mind of desire (rāgaścitta), that, a mind of anger (dvesaścitta), or a mind of delusion (mohaścitta), [171b] a mind of faith (pratāpaścitta), or a pure mind (vīśuddhaścitta) of wisdom (prajñā) or rapture (ālāsa). The ascetic considers the arising and cessation of the mind to be like a water torrent (aśrayas) or the flame of a lamp (dīpāyasa): this is called crossing the threshold of knowledge of emptiness (ālayatvābhāvadadhyapavāraeva). Why? If the mind arises in one moment (ekākāma) and perishes in another moment (anyaksāna) this mind would be eternal (anitiya). Why is that? Because it would be escaping from destruction during a short instant. Now, if it escaped destruction even for a moment, it would be free of destruction forever. Besides, the Buddha said that the conditioned has three characteristics, birth, duration and destruction. If its arising lasted for one brief instant, it would be free of destruction and would not be a conditioned dharma (samskṛtadharma). If the arising, duration and cessation of the mind occupied 136 For the nature of the four great elements, earth, water, fire and wind, see Kośa, I, p. 22-23. The discussion started here will be resumed below, k. 18, p. 194c.

139 For this power of transformation, see above, Traité, I, p. 383F, n. 1 and below, p. 731F.

139 See Kośa, VIII, p. 214. 360 See Kośa, VIII, p. 214.
[altogether] only a single moment, why does arising of necessity precede cessation? Could it not just as well fall into [existence]? Moreover, if the mind at first existed and then had birth, it would not depend on birth [to exist]. Why? Because the mind would exist in advance. If birth existed before [the mind], this would be a birth where nothing was being born. Finally, birth and cessation are opposed to each other (anyonayaviruddha) by nature; if there is birth, there cannot be cessation; at the moment of cessation there cannot be arising; consequently, they do not exist at the same moment, or at different moments. Therefore there is no arising; if there is no arising, there is no duration or cessation; if there is no duration or cessation, there is no mental dharma (cittasikadharma); if there is no mental dharma, there is no dharma dissociated from the mind (cittaviprayukta); since conditioned dharmas (vivekadasa) are, namely, material dharmas (rūpidharma) and non-material dharmas (arūpidharmas) do not exist, unconditioned dharmas (asamskāra) do not exist either. Why? Because it is due to conditioned dharmas that there are unconditioned dharmas; if there are no conditioned dharmas, there cannot be any unconditioned dharmas.

Furthermore, by considering the impermanence of karman, we understand the eternity of akarman. If this is so, we now see that karman is existence (bhāva) that akarman is non-existence (abhāva). Consequently an eternal dharma does not exist (nopadabhyate).

Furthermore, among the eternal dharmas of which the heretics (ākṛtiṣa) and the disciples of the Buddha speak, some are the same whereas others are different. The ones that are the same are space (ākāsa) and nirvāṇa. The heretics accept a soul (ātman), time (kāla), direction (ādi), the subtle atom (paramānā), darkness (tasman) and other categories of the same type, different [from those of the Buddhists].

Moreover, the disciples of the Buddha say that cessation not due to knowledge (avratīsaṃkhyānaitirdhā) is eternal; they also say that uncaused dharmas (apravṛttiyasamutpāda) are eternal, whereas dharmas resulting from causes and conditions (pravṛttiyasamutpāda) are transitory. In the Mahāyāna, permanence (nityatā), the nature of things (dharmatā), the true nature (tathatā), the summit of existence (bhūtadhatu) and other [synonyms] of this type are called eternal dharmas, space (ākāsa) and nirvāṇa, as was said before in the chapter dedicated to the praise of the Bodhisattva (cf. Trutie, I, p. 38F, 39F n. 1, 45F). In regard to the soul, time, direction and the subtle atom [of the heretics], see also what has been said above (above, p. 725F seq.). This is why we cannot speak of the existence of dharmas.

If dharmas are non-existent, they are of two categories: i) permanently non-existent, ii) non-existent following a cessation (vihāra).

a. If, having previously existed they no longer exist now or, if presently existing, they will not exist later, there is cessation. If that is so, then there is no [171c] longer cause (hetu) or condition (pratāpaya). If there is no longer any cause or condition, then anything can come from anything, or also, nothing comes from anything. And it is the same in the future. But if causes and conditions for sins (upatti) and merits (punya) being suppressed, and if there is no longer any difference between the poor (dāriva) and the rich (dhana), b. If one claims [that the dharmas are] permanently non-existent, one misunderstands [the four noble Truths] of suffering (duḥkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirvāṇa) and the path to its cessation (mārga). If one suppresses the four Truths (satu), the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna) no longer exists. If the Jewel of the Dharma no longer exists, the eightfold noble Path (aṣṭāṅgadhyānagama) disappears. If the Jewel of the Dharma (dharmaratna) and the Jewel of the Sangha (sangharatna) disappear, there is no longer the Jewel of the Buddha (buddharatna). If that is so, the Three Jewels are destroyed. Besides, if all dharmas are really empty (śūnya), there would be no sin (apatti) or merit (punya), no father or mother, no world or rituals, no good or evil; good and evil would be confounded with a multiple succession [of consequences]; everything would vanish, like visions in a dream (svapnadarśana). These are the faults to which one is exposed if one claims that [dharmas] are really non-existent. Who would believe that statement? If one claims that one sees [dharmas] to exist because of a mistake (viparyāśa), then, when one sees one person, perhaps one is seeing two or three persons? For, if dharmas are truly non-existent, by seeing them, one is committing a mistake. But by falling into views of existence and non-existence (bhāvabhābabhavya), one gains the middle Path (madhyamā pratipada), the true nature [of things].

How can one know the truth?

By complying with what has been identified (jñāta) and said (aṭṭa) by the Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the past (ātita) numerous as the sands of the Ganges (gantipūvakālanipāta), with what will be identified and said by the Buddhais and bodhisattvas of the future (antarāgya) numerous as the sands of the Ganges, with what is identified and said by the Buddhais and bodhisattvas of the present (pravṛttipāna) numerous as the sands of the Ganges. If the mind of faith (prasadācita) is great, one escapes from doubt (samaya) and regret (vipratītā); if the power of the faith (pradādāha) is great, one can grasp and adopt the Dharma: that is called dharmaksānti.

Furthermore, by the power of rapture (ābhāṣyabala) one hears speak of the true nature of the dharmas with a gentle (medha), tender (taruna) and pure (vīsuddha) mind, and one incorporates the Dharma into one’s mind. By the adhesion of faith (prasadādāhinīvāra), the mind penetrates deeply in the absence of doubt and regret. Why is that? Doubt and regret are the bonds of the desire realm (kāmadhātu-bandha); if they are heavy (sthāla) there is no access to this gentleness and tenderness of the mind (medutaraṇacittatītā) which is called dharmaksānti.

Finally, by the power of wisdom (prajñācita), one discovers in many ways that, in the face of all the dharmas, there is no dharma that can exist. Being able to endure and adopt this doctrine with no hesitation or regret constitutes dharmaksānti.

The bodhisattva also says to himself: Under the virulent action of ignorance (avidyāvīsita), worldly people (prthaguna) attribute a contrary characteristic (laksana, nimita) to all the dharmas in particular: they take what is impermanent (anitiya) to be permanent (nitya); that which is painful (duḥkha) to be happy (sukha); that which is not a self (anātman) to be a self (ātman); that which is empty (śūnya) to be real (satya); that which is non-existent (asat) to be existent (sat); that which is existent to be non-existent.

In this way, they attribute contrary characteristics to all kinds of dharmas. To obtain the noble true wisdom (āryabhūtaprajñā), to destroy the poison of ignorance (avidyāvīśa), to understand the true nature of dharmas (dharmasatyasatyalakṣaṇa), to acquire the wisdom of impermanence (anītya), suffering, emptiness (śūnya) and the non-self (anatman), [then] to reject it without being attached to it (abhinkīvela), and finally being able to endure such a doctrine, this is what is called dharmakṣaṇī. Finally, the bodhisattva considers all dharmas as eternally empty (śūnya) from the very beginning (ādītāḥ) and also actually empty. To believe and accept this doctrine is dharmakṣaṇī.

Question. – [Believing] in original and eternal emptiness as well as actual emptiness is a wrong view (mityārthā)! Why do you call that dharmakṣaṇī?

Answer. – If the bodhisattva had in mind the absolute emptiness (atyantāśūnyatā) of dharmas, by grasping at the nature (nimittadgahaṇa) and adhering to it in his mind (chittadhīnīvela), that would be a wrong view; but if he considers emptiness without subscribing to it or producing wrong view, that is dharmakṣaṇī. A stanza says:

By nature, dharmas are eternally empty,
But the mind does not become attached to emptiness.
To support such a doctrine
Is the major characteristic of the Buddhist Path.

The bodhisattva crosses over the threshold of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) in many ways. He considers the true nature of the dharmas; his mind experiences no pulling back or regret; he does not [blindly] follow the considerations [he has made] and they cause him no grief; he assures his own benefit (śvrtha) and that of others (parārtha): this is what is called dharmakṣaṇī.

This dharmakṣaṇī is of three kinds. When he practices it in its pure form, the bodhisattva does not see the properties of patience, does not see himself, does not see those who are insulting him, does not play with the dharmas. Then this is pure dharmakṣaṇī. For this reason, the śūtra says (below, p. 865F) that “the bodhisattva who dwells in the virtue of wisdom must fulfill the virtue of patience by not swaying in the wind and not withdrawing” (bodhisattvasa prajñāpāramitāśṛṇa sthitā kṣaṇātīśīrṣitā purīṇāpāramitā avivartanāākṣobhanātāmpūrṇādāya). What is this immobility (aksobhanatā) and this absence of withdrawing (avivartana)? Not feeling hatred (dveṣa, pratigaha), not speaking wicked words; physically, not doing evil; mentally, not having doubt. The bodhisattva who understands the true nature of the virtue of wisdom does not see dharmas, for his mind is without opinions (abhinkīvela) about them. When a man comes to insult him, torment him, poison him or strike him, he can endure it all. This is why he is said to dwell in the virtue of wisdom; he can fulfill the virtue of patience.

363 For these mistakes (viparyśasa), cf. Aṅguttara, II, p. 52; Kośa, V, p. 21; Śīkṣāsamuccaya, p. 198.
364 For the correct way of taking emptiness, by using it without adhering to it, see below, k. 18, p. 193c.
CHAPTER XXVI: EXERTION (p. 927F)

Sūtra: The bodhisattva must fulfill the virtue of exertion\(^{365}\) by means of non-slaughtering of bodily and mental exertion (vīryaparamārthatatipāryayātāvīyakaitasiṣhāvīryāsanasrūryaṇupādīyāya).

Śāstra: Pīli ye (विर्य), in the language of the Ts’in: exertion.

I. EXERTION, FOURTH VIRTUE.

Question. – Exertion is the root (स्तूल) of all good dharmas (कृतिलाभधर्मम्): it should be first; why is it here placed in fourth place?

Answer. – 1) Generosity (दुन्ति), morality (दुन्ति) and patience (कक्षति) always exist in the world (कोला).

The householder, as a guiding principle, gratifies his guests (सैत्तिक) and examples of generosity are found even among animals. People give for various reasons: they give in view of the present lifetime (सस्मानम्), or in view of the future lifetime (पारमासानम्), or in view of the Path (मर्गा). There is no need for exertion [to practice generosity].

Similarly in regard to morality. Seeing malefactors punished by the king or by laws, people themselves feel possible by means of morality to escape from birth (कल्याणम्), it cannot see the true nature of dharmas. Thus, a lamp burning in the full wind cannot light up itself.

2) Furthermore, by means of generosity, morality and patience, great merit (साधन) and great joy (साधन) are obtained; great renown and the fulfillment of all one’s wishes are obtained. Having appreciated the flavor of these benefits, the bodhisattva now wishes to progress and obtain rapture (आराम) and wisdom (समझ्दा), the understanding of the true nature of dharmas, or the great virtue of wisdom, is the appreciation of the flavor of these benefits. The bodhisattva now wishes to progress and obtain and rapture and wisdom. Thus, when digging a well and finding dampness and mud, one increases one’s efforts with the firm hope of finding water. Or, while trying to produce fire by friction, when smoke appears, one increases the friction in the firm hope of having fire. Commonly there are two gateways (द्वारम्) for arriving at buddhahood, namely, merit (सुन्तम्) and wisdom (स्वरूपम्). The practice of generosity, morality and patience is the true gateway of the great virtue of wisdom.

This is how one acquires rapture and wisdom; when one has these two, one possesses (मरादा), take the vows at once and proclaim: “Starting from today onward, I will not kill (प्रत्यापोषुता), etc.”

Is exertion needed to observe this morality?

[127b] Similarly with patience. Whether someone insults them, beats them or kills them, some people do not respond because they are afraid; others are quiet and do not respond because they are too weak, because they fear a punishment, because they follow the rules of honest people (सत्प्रयोगसाधनम्) or because they seek the path. There is no need for the virtue of exertion in order to endure all that.

But here, the bodhisattva who wishes to know the true nature of dharmas and to practice the virtue of wisdom must practice rapture (धिन्याः), the rapture that is the gateway to true wisdom. Now, in order to practice rapture, diligence (सुदृढ्य, exertion (विर्या) and one-pointedness (केतुक्तिः) are necessary.

The Greater Vehicle distinguishes three types of exertion: samādhavīrya, exertion to arm oneself; prajñāvīrya, exertion to endeavor; avijñāvīrya, exertion without timidity, withdrawal or satiation; or else samādhavīrya, exertions in producing the great vow (सत्तवाधसमसमाहायाः), exertion to acquire spiritual benefits; sattvādhāsahāvyā vīrya, exertion for the service of beings: cf. Dhammasaṅgaha, ch. CVII; Sūtrālakāra, ed. Lévi, p. 108, 114; Bodhi. bhūmi, p. 200-201; Śīkṣāsūcayāca, p. 51; Bodhicaryavatāra and Patijjāk, chap. VII (tr. Lav., p. 70-83); Samgraha, p. 191-192; Śūddhi, p. 622.

\(^{365}\) A stock phrase found in several sūtras: Majjhima, I, p. 481; Aṅguttara, I, p. 50; Tassa t a hāna, T 99, no. 348, k. 14, p. 98a21: Kāmaṃ tace ca nābhiḥ ca aśīth avassicaddā, suvitā upasasamaddikhitam, yam purakaṃhaṃ purīvaśīrvaram purīparakrākrameṇa pattaḥbhavat tu na taṃ apāṇāraḥ viṛṣeva santānām bhavṣutti: “May my skin, nerves and bones alone remain (later variant: upasasat: dry up), may the flesh and blood of my body dry up; as long as I have not obtained that which can be obtained by man’s courage, by man’s exertion and decisiveness, my exertion will persist.”
That is why exertion is in the fourth place; it is the root of rapture and true wisdom. In the first three virtues [generosity, morality and patience], there is indeed some exertion, but so little that we do not speak of it.

Some say that only by practicing generosity, morality and patience can one acquire great merit (mahāpuṇya), and that one’s aspirations (pranidhāna) are realized by the power of these merits; as for rapture and wisdom, they will come by themselves (svaṁah) [without the help of exertion]. Then what use is the virtue of exertion?

Answer. – Buddhahood is profound (gambhīra) and difficult (darṣabha) to attain even if one has generosity, morality and wisdom, it is still necessary to have profound rapture, true wisdom, as well as the innumerable attributes of the Buddhas (apramuṇaḥ-buddhadharma). If one does not practice exertion, one does not produce rapture; if rapture is not produced, it is not possible to be born in the Brahmādevatāra heaven and, a fortiori, to aspire to Buddhahood.

Thus, the Viśvottara Sūtra (Mṛdgha) who wanted to get innumerable precious substances (rūpādṛṣṭrayya) obtained everything at will.167 King Ting cheng (Mṛdgha) reigned over the four continents (citra-dvīpapāta); the heavens rained down [on him] the seven jewels (saptaratna) and the things he needed; Śākra devānāṁ indra shared his seat with him and made him sit [beside him]; nevertheless, despite all his wealth, he was unable to obtain the Path.168 The bhikṣu Lo p’i schou (Losaka-tiṣya), although he was an arhat, begged for his food for seven days without receiving anything and returned with empty bowl (dhautapātrena); then he burned his own body in the fire of rapture (dhyāna-nirvāṇa) and attained parinirvāṇa.169

A similar sermon was given by Śāriputra immediately before the enlightenment, as soon as he took his seat of Bodhi. See above, Tract I, p. 228, n. 1.

The examples that follow lead to two theses: Thanks to merits, one can attain the realization of all one’s wishes; but if exertion is lacking, one does not attain the Path: this was the case for Meṣṭikā and, when he closed his left hand and touched it with his right hand, the sky rained down a shower of grain fall from the sky.170 – Dhammapada, 1435, k. 26, p. 191a seq.; Divyāvadāna, p. 210-226; Avadānakalpadūtra (no. 4), I, p. 122-153; Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa, references in Hopkins, Epic Mythology, p. 139.

Chinese: Tch’ou yao chuan, T 26 (no. 60), k. 11, p. 494b-496a: Ting cheng wang kou king. T 39, p. 822b-824a: Wen C’o kie wang king, T 40, p. 824a-825a; Lieou tou tsu king, T 152 (no. 49), k. 4, p. 21c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 137-142); Ting cheng wang yin yuen king, T 165, p. 393 seq.; Hien yu king, T 202 (no. 64), k. 13, p. 439b-440c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 107-108; cf. Schmidt, Der Weise und der Thur, p. 369-377); Tch’ou yao king, T 212, k. 4, p. 63c seq.; Ken pen shou... yao che, T 1448, k. 11, p. 51c; k. 12, p. 50b; Ken chou... p’o sent che, T 1450, k. 1, p. 100c; Tsang so che loun, T 1645, k. 1, p. 231a; Tch’ou che loun, T 1646, k. 5, p. 277c.

Iconography: Sivaramamurti, Amarāvatī, p. 222-224; fl. 17 (1); Longhurst, Nīlghuṇḍaṇḍa, p. 47-48, pl. 4; Fourcher, Buddh. Art, p. 225-230 (south-west corner of Borobudur).

The Mpp’s will return to this individual later (k. 30, p. 278c): The bhikṣu Lo p’in tchou (Losaka-tiṣya), a disciple of Śāriputra, observed morality, and exertion, and begged for his food. For six days, he was unable to get anything. On the seventh day, he had not much longer to live. One of his colleagues begged for food for him and gave it to him, but a bird stole it immediately. Then Śāriputra said to Mudgālavyana: “You have great miraculous power; watch over his food so that he can get it.” Mudgālavyana took some food and went to offer it to Losaka-tiṣya; but as soon as the latter wanted to put it into his mouth, it changed into mud. In turn, Śāriputra begged for food; but when he gave it to him, Losaka-tiṣya’s mouth closed up by itself. Finally, the Buddha came, took the food and offered it to him; this time, thanks to the immensity of the Buddha’s merits, Losaka-tiṣya was able to take the food. When he had eaten it, he experienced great joy and redoubled his faith and reverence. Then the Buddha said to him: “All conditioned dharmas (saṁskṛtadharmas) are suffering,” and preached the four truths to him. Immediately the bhikṣu’s impurities were destroyed (kṣīrānitya) and his mind was liberated (saṁvutkāraṇa) he obtained arhathood.

The story of Losaka is unknown to other sources, but, with some modifications, it has passed into the Pāli Śākya, no. 41, I, p. 234-236. After an unhappy childhood, at the age of seven, Losaka was ordained by Śāriputra. But his alms-tours were not fruitful and he received hardly enough to sustain him. When he became an arhat and his life was almost at an end, Śāriputra wanted to give him a proper meal; he went to Śrīvatsa to beg, but nobody paid any attention to him. Śāriputra took Losaka to the monastery, begged food for him and sent it to him by way of messengers, but the latter ate the food themselves. Śāriputra then went himself to the king’s palace, received a bowl filled with the four sweets (pattāpātra cauttamadhura) and brought it himself to Losaka. He asked Losaka to eat this food at once, saying: “Venerable Tisa, I will stay by you and hold this bowl in my hand; you must sit down and eat, of the seven kinds of jewels, which accumulated up to the height of his knees. He went to visit the world of the gods but a bird stole it immediately. Then he burned his own body in the fire of rapture (dhyāna-nirvāṇa) and attained parinirvāṇa.Łę
This is how we know that only by the power of merits (puṇyabala) does one realize the Path and that, if one wishes to attain buddhahood, it is necessary to show great exertion.

II. THE BENEFITS OF EXERTION.

Question. – What are the benefits (anuśāma) of exertion, benefits that the bodhisattva will investigate diligently and without slackening?

Answer. – All the virtues and all the benefits of the Path, in the present lifetime and in future lifetimes, come from exertion.

Moreover, if a person who wants to save himself already gives evidence of his eagerness and exertion, what can be said about the bodhisattva who has taken the vow to save all beings? The stanzas of praise dedicated to exertion (vīryastutigarhī) say:

The person who does not spare their life,
Whose wisdom and mind are firm (niyata),
Who practices exertion according to the Dharma,
Will easily find what he is looking for.

The workman who expends his efforts
Gathers an abundant harvest,
The traveler on a long journey who takes care
Necessarily reaches his goal.

Whether one obtains rebirth among the gods
Or whether one reaches nirvāṇa,
The cause of all that
Is the power of exertion.

But to individual action that these benefits are due.
What man is there who, knowing this
Would not make personal efforts?

The threefold world is on fire and is burning
Like a great flame.
The wise and decisive man
Can manage to escape from it.

This is why the Buddha taught
Right exertion to Ānanda.
Thus, avoiding laziness (kauśāyā)
One arrives directly at Buddhahood.

By digging the earth with persistent effort
One reaches the spring;
It is the same with exertion:
If one does not seek, one does not find.

The person who practices the Dharma of the Path
With relentless exertion
[173a]Will inevitably attain immense fruit;
His reward will not be lacking.

for if I don’t hold the bowl, I am afraid that something will happen.” Losaka then ate a substantial meal, but he died the same day and entered parinirvāṇa.

But to individual action that these benefits are due.
What man is there who, knowing this
Would not make personal efforts?

The threefold world is on fire and is burning
Like a great flame.
The wise and decisive man
Can manage to escape from it.

This is why the Buddha taught
Right exertion to Ānanda.
Thus, avoiding laziness (kauśāyā)
One arrives directly at Buddhahood.

By digging the earth with persistent effort
One reaches the spring;
It is the same with exertion:
If one does not seek, one does not find.

The person who practices the Dharma of the Path
With relentless exertion
[173a]Will inevitably attain immense fruit;
His reward will not be lacking.
Moreover, exertion is the root (mūla) of all the good dharmas (kuśaladharma); it can give rise to all the good dharmas, including supreme perfect enlightenment (anuttarasaṃyaksambodhi), not to speak of the lesser benefits. In the Abhidharma, it is said that all the good dharmas, including supreme perfect enlightenment, come from exertion and conscientiousness (apramāda).

Moreover, exertion calls forth the blessings (puṇya) of the present lifetime in the way the rain (varṣa) which, moistening the seeds (hiṅga), causes them to germinate. Even though one has the previous causes and conditions for [present] blessings, they will not be realized if exertion is absent; if in this way one obtains no benefits (artha) in the present lifetime, how would one attain buddhahood?

Moreover, the great bodhisattvas who commit themselves to beingsg undergo all the sufferings, including those of the Avici hell (nīruṣa). Their minds know no laziness, and that is exertion.

Moreover, no business can be realized if exertion is absent. Just as, in order to swallow some medicine, it is essential to take Pa tsem (Croton tiglium) because without this Pa tsem, one does not have the strength to swallow the medicine, so the foundations of mindfulness (smyrtaparāśāna), the bases of miraculous powers (ādīkāpāda), the faculties (indriya), the powers (bala), the factors of enlightenment (bodhyantara) and the Path (mārga) depend necessarily on exertion and, if the latter is absent, all matters are unworkable.

Morality (śīla) occurs only in the eightfold Path (asthāgamārga) and not elsewhere; faith (pratāpa, śraddhā) occurs only in the faculties (indriya) and the powers (bala) and not elsewhere; but exertion is not absent anywhere. Although it adds up all the dharmas [of the Path], it also makes up a separate category; it is like the “residue” of ignorance (avidyānusayaya) that occurs in all the latent defilements (anuśaya), but which separately forms independent ignorance (āvēnakāvadyā).[172]

III. PROGRESS IN EXERTION.

Question. – The bodhisattva wishes to acquire all the attributes of the Buddha, save all beings, destroy the afflictions (klesa); he obtains everything he wishes. Then why increase his exertion in order to become Buddha; for if a small fire cannot burn a large forest, the fire, the power of which is increased, is able to burn everything.

Answer. – From the time of his first resolution (prathamacittotpāda), the bodhisatta has made the vow (pratidhāna) to lead all beings to bliss (ānanda); he sacrifices his life ceaselessly for the entire world, since those who spare their lives cannot realize the good dharmas. This is why he increases his exertion.

Moreover, for many reasons, the bodhisattva criticizes laziness (kausthīya) and is joyfully attached to exertion. Laziness is a black cloud that hides clear wisdom; it engulfs the qualities (gosa) and cultivates evil (aśūla). The lazy person at first feels a little joy, but later suffers greatly. Laziness is like poisoned food (viṣāṅkṣa) which at the beginning gives off a pleasant perfume but kills the person in the long run. Laziness burns all the qualities like a great fire that ravages the entire jungle. The lazy person loses all their qualities; it is as if he underwent looting and had nothing left. Some stanzas say:

He does not get what he should get,
He despises himself
And beings do not esteem him.
Always plunged in darkness (śamanas),
He has no importance (anubhūṣa) at all.
Honor, nobility, knowledge and wisdom:
All of that is lost.

Hearing about the excellent dharmas of the Path,
He cannot profit from them himself.

All these faults
Come from laziness (kausthīya).

Although he hears speak of progress (vargāna) he does not succeed in rousing himself.

All these faults
Come from laziness.

He does not put any order into his actions

[173b] He does not get what he should get,
He loses what he has gotten.
He despises himself
And beings do not esteem him.
Always plunged in darkness (śamanas),
He has no importance (anubhūṣa) at all.
Honor, nobility, knowledge and wisdom:
All of that is lost.

172 Vṛṣya appears in the various categories of bodhipāḷiṣka-dharmas: it is an essential element in the four smṛtya-pāśāna and the four samyakvyākānas (Kośa, VI, p. 283); it is the third eśātīkāpāda (Mahāvyut., no. 969; indriya no. 2 or vīṣyāntīya (ibid., no. 978); bala no. 3 or vīṣyābala (ibid., no. 984); bodhyāntara no. 3 or vīṣyāsamudhyāntara (ibid.no. 991); mārga no. 6 under the name of samayag vyāpāra (ibid., no. 1002). – The list of the 57 bodhipāḷkas is found in Dīgha, II, p. 120; Cullānīddesa, p. 263; Viṃaya, III, p. 93; Puṭīsamhāḍḍa, II, p. 166; Divya, p. 208; detailed study in Kośa, VI, p. 281.

173 Āvēnakāvadyā is the independent ignorance that does not accompany the other anuśaya. rūpa, etc.: cf. Kośa, III, p. 84; V, p. 31; Samgraha, p. 17, 21; Siddhi, p. 276-277.
And does not enter into the Dharma of the Path:
All these faults
Come from laziness.

Rejected by people of great learning,
Kept out of the way by people of middle rank,
Submerged among the humble and the foolish,
He is like a pig that is pleased with the mud.

If [the lazy person] is a man of the world,
He loses the threefold advantage (triratna) of the lay life:
Sense pleasures (kama), wealth (artha)
And virtue (guna) disappear at the same time.

If he has gone forth (suvrajita) as a monk,
He does not realize the twofold advantage of the religious life:
Rebirth among the gods and nirvana.
For both,374 renown is lost.

If one wishes to know the cause
Of all this ruin,
[One should know] that, among all the enemies,
None is greater than laziness;
For all the punishments [that it brings along],
Laziness should be avoided.

The two bhikshus Mu (Aivaka) and Tsing (Panvarusaka)375;

Fell into the evil destinies because of their laziness.
Although they had seen the Buddha and heard his Dharma
They could not escape [from punishment].

It is by considering the punishments reserved for laziness thus in many ways that exertion progresses.
The benefits of exertion must also be considered. In this life as in the next, the benefits of the Buddhist Path (buddhamarga) and nirvana all result from exertion.

Moreover, knowing that all dharmas are empty (nirvanya) and nonexistent (asat), the bodhisattva refrains from attaining (savakkhara) nirvana but collects all the good dharmas (kusalaalharma) for compassion (karuna) for beings: this is the power of the virtue of exertion.

Moreover, being unique and peerless, the bodhisattva, thanks to his exertion and his merits, is able to destroy Mara’s army (samairasana) and thus reach buddhahood. Once having become Buddha, he know that all the dharmas are of a single characteristic (ekalakshana), free of marks (animita) and truly empty (nirvanya); he teaches these dharmas to beings by all kinds of speech (nandidhanumasamketa) and all kinds of skilful means (nandidhidoypa); he saves [173c] beings from the sufferings of birth (jayi), old age (jarafi), sickness (vyadhii) and death (marana).
When he is on the point of entering nirvana, he entrusts the “body of the dharma” (dharmaalaya) to the bodhisattva-mahasattva Mi lo (Maitreyya), to Kia cho (Kasyapa), to A nan 374 I.e., for the lay person as well as for the monastic.

(Ananda). etc., then he enters into the diamond concentration (vajropamasamādhi) and breaks the bones of his body into pieces the size of mustard seed (sūryapāra). Thus, he never abandons the power of exertion in order to save beings.

By “body of the Dharmā”, here we should understand the body of the scriptures. The Mppī seems to accept a twofold compilation of the Buddhist scriptures immediately after the Buddha’s death: the Śāstra texts were recited by the śrīvakas at the council of Rājagṛha presided over by Mahākāyapa (cf. Traité, I, p. 88-106F); the Mahāyāna sūtras were compiled by an assembly of bodhisattvas assisted by Ānanda. Is it to be concluded that these bodhisattvas actually existed and that Maitreya was ever an historic individual? This is the opinion of certain historians such as H. U. Maitreya as an Historical Personage, Mélanges Laman, 1928, p. 95-102; ZII, 1928, p. 215; G. Tucci, Some aspects of the doctines de Maitreya[nāthā] and Āsanga, 1930. Actually, the compiling of the Mahāyāna sūtras seems to be pure fiction invented entirely with a sectarian goal by adepts of the Mahāyāna.

When the Mahāyānamūlasāras began to spread in the Buddhist communities at the beginning of our era, some śrīvakas rejected them as apocalyptic. Then, to establish their authenticity, the Mahāyānists had recourse to all kinds of arguments.

Some are of purely speculative and subjective order. Even more than those of the Hīnayānists, the Mahāyāna doctrines are in harmony with the dharma, constituting the true path of salvation and the only vehicle of nirvāṇa; they are thus the authentic words of the Buddha (for this line of reasoning, see Traité, I, p. 80-82F, note). – Besides, continue the Mahāyānists, the main doctrines of the Mahāyāna are contained as a seed in the Hīnayāna sūtras and schools: the dharmarāṇaśāstra is already taught in the Samyuttanikāya, II, 17, III, p. 142 (Madh. avatāra, p. 22); the doctrine of the multiple teaching of the master, in conformity with current ideas (laksanavāramāraṇa) is already proposed by the Pārśvavālaka Hīnayānists (Madh. avatāra, p. 134); the Pārśvavāsīs had the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra written in Prakrit, and the Mahāvata, of Hīnayāna origin, already taught in the stage of the bodhisattva and the practice of the pāramitā (Grhī mitāḥ of Mahāyāna in Wassilieff, Buddhāsūnas, p. 264): the theory of the Āśāyānīśas, the central piece of the Mañjuśrī school, was already proposed in the Ekottaragama, the lamanas of the Mahāyāna and the Mahāyāna, and in the sūtras of the Ceylon school of the Tārāsputriya (Samgrahī, p. 26-28; Karmaniddhiśrikarana, p. 106; Siddhī, p. 176-182). It may be assumed further that all the doctrines of the Greater Vehicle were explained in the innumerable sūtras, which have now disappeared, of the Lesser Vehicle (Karmaniddhiśrikarana, p. 108).

As these subjective arguments seemed too weak, the Mahāyānists had recourse to historical fictions in order to establish their scriptures.

a. The Mahāyāna sūtras, they said, are as old as those of the Hīnayāna for the two vehicles co-exist: samapraṇayēh (Sūtīlāmākāra, I, 7, ed. Lévi, p. 3; Siddhī, p. 177). Immediately after his enlightenment, the Buddha preached the Greater Vehicle to the deities of the Trāyastriṃśa heaven and to the bodhisattvas (Fournier, Iconographie bouddhique, I, p. 86). The Buddha turned the wheel of Dharma three times: in the sermon at Benares on the four noble truths. He taught the reality of the elements of existence, in the Prajñāpāramitāśāstra, he spoke implicitly of the non-reality of the elements of existence (laksanavāramāraṇa); finally, in other sūtras such as the Samdhinirmocana, he clearly and explicitly taught the non-reality of the elements from the absolute point of view (paraniḥsāradharmābhaśvādāḥ): cf. Samdhinirmocana, VII, § 30, p. 206; Obersmiller, Doctrine of P.P., p. 93, sqq.

b. As we have seen at the beginning of this note, some Mahāyānists claim that the sūtras of the Greater Vehicle were compiled immediately after the death of the Buddha by an assembly of bodhisattvas. This council, a doublet of that of Rājagṛha, was held on the mythical mountain, unknown to geography, of Vimalavahāla, south of Rajgir; the compiling of the scriptures is attributed sometimes to the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, sometimes to Maitreya, assisted by Ānanda.

Mppī, k. 100, p. 75b: “Some say that Mahākāyapa, at the head of the bhikṣus, compiled the Tripitaka on Mount Geddrakūta and that after the Buddha’s death, the great bodhisattvas Mahāvīra and Maitreya, bringing in Ānanda, compiled the Greater Vehicle. Ānanda understood deeply the aspirations and behavior of beings; this is why he did not preach the Mahāyāna to the śrīvakas [of weak faculties].”

Tarkāvāla, Mdo XIX, 1802-4: “The scriptures of the Mahāyāna are the words of the Buddha. The main compilers were Samanatabhāda, Mahāvīra, Ghyākāyādhipī [or Vajrapāṇi], Maitreya and others. The śrīvakas were not the principal compilers of our (Mahāyānists) canon since the latter is not accessible to them.”

The same repetition has been made by the Tibetan historians Bhu stū, II, p. 101, and Tārāsputriya, p. 62. Traditions says that, on the mountain called Vimalavahāla, south of Rājagṛha, in an assembly of a million bodhisattvas, Mahāvīra repeated the Abhidharma, Maitreya, the Viśṇu, and Vajrapāṇi the sūtras (Bh stū). – “At the time [of Kaniska], in different areas there appeared an innumerable crowd of holy individuals who taught the Mahāyāna; they had all heard the teaching from Āryavālavakīvīra, Ghyākāyādhipī, Mahāvīra, Maitreya, etc.” (Tārāsputriya).

It is not hard to guess how this tradition was formed. In several sūtras of the Greater Vehicle, the Buddha entrusts his doctrine to one or another Bodhisattva or to Ānanda. When the Mahāyānists wanted to hold their council, they requested him. However, others think that the noble Ānanda compiled these sūtras for, in the same text, in the chapter of dedication, the Prajñāpāramitā is entrusted to him by these words: “Cause this Prajñāpāramitā to spread in Jambudīpa.”

We may add, in order not to be incomplete, that according to a Japanese tradition of no historical value, Mahāvīra and Maitreya released the Mahāyāna 116 years after the parinirvāṇa, and about 200 years after the parinirvāṇa, the edition of the Avatāramaka had completed this revelation. All these events would have been prior to Nāgaraṇa (cf. R. Fujishima, Le Bouddhisme japonais, 1888, p. 54).

c. The great Mahāyāna scholars brought out their treatises, they resorted to various subterfuges to give more weight to their teachings. Nāgaraṇa passed as, or was considered to be, a reincarnation of Ānanda (Lākṣikāvāra, ed. Nanjo, p. 286, and his Chinese translations T 671, k. 9, p. 564a; T 672, k. 6, p. 627); Mahāmeghasūtra, T 387, k. 5, p. 1099-1100, studied by P. Demiéville in BEFEO, XXIV, 1924, p. 227-228, and...
Moreover, when Ānanda was preaching the seven minds of awakening (saṃbodhyaṅga) to the bhikṣus and had come to the mind of awakening called exertion (vīrya), the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Are you talking about the mind of awakening called exertion?” Ānanda replied “Yes, I am speaking about the mind of awakening called exertion.” Three times [the Buddha asked] the same question and [Ānanda made] the same reply. Then rising from his seat, the Buddha said to Ānanda: “People who know, love and practice exertion, there is nothing that they cannot obtain; they will infallibly succeed in reaching buddhahood.” It is thus by considering the benefits of exertion in many ways that one succeeds in increasing this energy.

Sometimes the Buddha speaks about zeal (chanda), sometimes of exertion (vīrya) and sometimes of conscientiousness (apramāda).376 Zeal is compared to a man who, on the point of making a journey, first decides to go. Exertion is compared to a man who, once on his journey, decides not to stop.

Conscientiousness is compared to a man who is careful that his journey does not slow down. From this we know that zeal gives rise to exertion, that exertion in turn gives rise to conscientiousness and that conscientiousness in turn produces all the good dharamas including arriving at the state of buddhahood.

Moreover, the bodhisattva who wants to escape from birth, old age, sickness and death and who also wants to save beings always needs exertion (vīrya), one-pointedness (ekacitta) and conscientiousness (apramāda). When a person holding a pot of oil (tassalāpātra) is able to pass through a large crowd [without spilling any oil], his attentiveness and his carefulness are worthy of praise and profit (slokālībāha). When a man arrives safe and sound across difficult passages, on a sloping bridge or on a mountain path, with the help of a suspended rope or riding on a goat, during the present lifetime he gets praise and profit thanks to this attentiveness and his carefulness. It is the same for the person who seeks the Path with exertion; by means of his attentiveness and his carefulness, he gets whatever he wishes for.

Moreover, a stream of water is able to open up a passage through the middle of a rock, and it is the same for the conscientious mind; by particularly cultivating skilful means (upādya), by always practicing non-slaughtering, it is able to destroy the mountain of afflictions (klesa) and fetters (samyojana).

The lazy bhikṣu admonished by a demon.379 – A young forest monk (āranyaka), alone in the forest, was lazy in practicing dhyāna. In this forest there was a deva, a disciple of the Buddha, he entered into the body of a corpse, approached the young monk singing and dancing, with this stanza:

[174a] In the forest, little bhikṣu,

Why are you lazy?

If you do not fear me when I come during the day

I will return again during the night.

The frightened bhikṣu arose from his seat and reflected on himself. During the night, he fell asleep again.

The deva came to him [in the form of a monster] with ten heads, spitting fire from the mouths, fangs and claws like swords, eyes red as fire. Looking at the bhikṣu, he said that he would chase and grab him [and added]: “In this place, it is not allowed to be lazy. What are you doing there?” Very scared, the bhikṣu began to reflect: he meditated on the Dharma with special vigor and obtained arhathood. Thus, by means of effort on oneself, exertion, conscientiousness, one can attain the fruit of the path.

377 A slightly different form. 378 Vīrya is often combined with other good qualities: chanda, vīrya, citta, vimāna (Dīgha, III, p. 77); kṣatilānaṁ, duḥkhaṁ, uddhisūlaṁ chandaṁ jananīṁ vayam suttiṁ āvabhati, and vīryaṁ āvabhati, etc. (Dīgha, III, p. 221; Asagutta, II, p. 15; IV, p. 462).

*** *** ***

Moreover, by means of exertion, while sacrificing his life, the bodhisattva earns a reward (vipākaphala); in the four postures (āryapatha) — sitting (nisadana), lying down (sayaḍ), walking (gamana) or standing (sthāna) — he always demonstrates exertion. He prefers to lose his life rather than abandon practice of the Path. It is like in the case of a fire where one throws both pitcher and water into the fire: preoccupied only with extinguishing the fire, one does not spare the pitcher. A hermit (ṛṣi), taught this stanza to his disciples:

By means of decisiveness (niṣcaya) and spiritual joy
One is assured of a great reward.
When you will obtain that which you wish for,
You will understand their value.

For all of these reasons, consideration of the benefits which exertion presents can make the exertion increase.

Finally, the bodhisattva cultivates ascetic practices (duḥkaraczarya) and, when a person comes to ask him for his head, his eyes, his marrow or his skull (cf. Traité, I, p. 143F, n. 1), he gives them saying: “Even for me, who possess patience (kṣánti), exertion (prāya), wisdom (prajñā) and the power of skilful means (udayaḥala), it is suffering to undergo [torments]; how much more painful for those stupid people (ānudhā) who live in the three places of suffering (vinipāta)? In the interest of these beings, I must then make energetic efforts to attain the state of Buddhahood as soon as possible and then I will save them.”

---

CHAPTER XXVII: THE VIRTUE OF EXERTION (p. 946F)

I. THE NATURE OF EXERTION.

Question. — What are the characteristics of exertion (vīryalaksana)?

[174b] Answer. — Dynamism in activity, ease in enterprises, firmness of will, ardor of spirit, perseverance in action: these five things constitute the characteristics of exertion.

Moreover, according to the words of the Buddha, the characteristic of exertion is bodily and mental non-withdrawal (kāyācācināsākāramunāti).

Pañcārvudhajātaka – In a former lifetime, the Buddha Śākyamuni was once a merchant chief; at the head of some merchants, he went into a mountainous and difficult region where a rākṣasa demon stopped them.

Further, the principle of exertion is proved by the following.

In its version of the Pañcārvudhajātaka, the Mppi follows closely the version of Tsā pa tson king, T 203 (no. 97), k. 8, p. 487b-c (tr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 98-99): “Once there was a vast desert region between the kingdom of Khua che (Kāśi) and the kingdom of Pi t s hi (Videha) where there lived a wicked demon called Cha tch'a losu (85 and 4; 30 and 2; 108 and 11 = Śesaloma, and not Sadāsu as Chavannes suggests), who blocked the road so that nobody could pass. There was a merchant named Cha tseu (Śintha) who, leading five hundred merchants, wanted to go on this road.” Then follows the story of the struggle between the demon and Śintha: Śintha shot his bow and arrows and his sword, which all pierced the demon’s belly; then he advanced to fight with his fists, but his hands, his feet and his head got stuck. To the demon’s jibes, Śintha replied with the gīti: “There remains only my exertion for what is good which will not stick to you; as long as this exertion does not leave me, the fight that I will put up will not end.” The demon then let him go and set the five hundred merchants free. At that time Śintha was the Buddha, and Cha tch'a losu was the demon of that desert region.

A more developed version, but without indication of place or of individuals, occurs in the Kieou tsā pī yu king, T 206 (no. 1), k. 1, p. 510b-511a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, I, p. 347-351): the two enemies exchange a dialogue in verse, the yakṣa is converted and receives the five precepts. The version of the Mppi has passed into the King kiu yi sāng, T 2121, k. 43, p. 225b, word for word.

Finally, the legend has been incorporated into the Pāli jātaka, Pañcārvudhajātaka (no. 55), I, p. 272-275, of which here is a brief summary: The bodhisattva was the son of king Brahmadatta; he was called Pañcaveda ‘Five-weapons’ because on the day of his birth, eight bhūmanas had predicted that he would owe his fame to his feats of arms. He studied at Takasāli, in the kingdom of Gandhāra and, at the end of his studies, he took up a series of five weapons. Returning home, half-way between Takasāli and Benares, in the middle of the jungle, he met the yakṣa Sīlaśaloma ‘Sticky Hairs’. He fought with him and in succession launched his arrows (sava), his sword (kaγγa), his lance (jànuqa) and his club (muggarā); but all his weapons remained stuck in the yakṣa’s hair (lomeca allītima). Pañcaveda then engaged him body to body; stack to the yakṣa by his five weapons, the prince refused to surrender, and the yakṣa, marveling at the prince’s exertion, was converted and received the five precepts.

The bodhisattva, called Pañcavedha here, is called Śintha, ‘Lion’, in the Tsā pa tson king. Actually, Śintha is the surname given to the bodhisattva by the yakṣa who, in congratulating him, compared him to a man-lion: Mānasa, purisaśīlo tānu!
him, saying: “Stop! Do not move; I do not allow you to go on.” The chief of the merchants struck him with his left fist but it, too, could not be disengaged; next, he kicked him with his right foot, but the foot remained stuck; he kicked him with his left foot, but the same thing happened; he buttressed him with his head, but his head was stuck also. The demon asked him: “Now what are you going to do? Will you give in finally?” The bodhisattva answered: “Although the five parts [of my body] are fettered, never will my mind give in to you. I will fight you by the power of my exertion and never surrender to you.” The demon, amused, said to himself: “This man’s courage is very great”, and speaking to the merchant, said: “The power of your exertion is great; you definitely will not give in; I will let you go.”

The ascetic acts in the same way [in order to conquer] the good dharmas (kalaladharma). During the first, second and fourth quarters of the night, he recites the sutras, practices meditation and seeks the true nature of dharmas. Not obstructed by fetters (samyogajana), his body and mind are free of withdrawing: this is the nature of exertion.

Exertion is a mental event characterized by diligent and unceasing action. It follows the mind (cittasaññā) and arises with it (cittasahaja). Sometimes it includes investigation and analysis (savitarkasavicāra); sometimes it does not involve investigation, but only analysis (avitarkavicāra); sometimes it involves neither investigation nor analysis (avitarkavāccāra); sometimes it is the virtue of exertion (vīyādāvara); inasmuch as it opens the mind, it is called enlightenment of exertion (vīyādāvaruddhi); inasmuch as it makes the mind alive [sarejana], it is called the factor of exertion (vīyādāya); among the four infallible knowledges (pratimokṣa), it is the gateway of energy (vīyādvāra); among the four bases of miraculous power (śādhiyādāya), exertion is zeal (canda); among the six virtues, it is the virtue of exertion (vīyādāramīti).381

Question. – Earlier you praised exertion and here you are speaking of the characteristics of exertion, but what exertion is it?

Answer. – It is the exertion that is applied to [reuniting] all the good dharmas.

II. THE VIRTUE OF EXERTION.

Question. – But here in a treatise dedicated to the virtue of exertion, it is necessary to speak of the virtue of exertion; why do you speak about exertion being applied to all good dharmas?

Answer. – From the time of his first resolve (prathumacitotpāda), the bodhisattva applies himself with exertion to all the good dharmas; then little by little he acquires the virtue of exertion.

381 For these classifications, see above, p. 935F, n. 1

[174c] Question. – This too much about exertion in regard to all good dharmas; talk about the virtue of exertion now, for we already know exertion in regard to all good dharmas.

Answer. – Exertion that aims at obtaining the state of buddhahood is called virtue; exertion that has all the other good dharmas in view is called just exertion and not virtue.

Question. – Why is diligent application to all good dharmas not called virtue of exertion and why is it only the exertion of the bodhisattva that is called virtue?

Answer. – Virtue (pāramitā) indicates arrival at the other shore (pāramita), and the bodhisattva cannot practice the virtues completely. Therefore there is no virtue of exertion in them.

Moreover, these people do not have great loving-kindness (mahāmaitri) or great compassion (mahākaruṇā); they abandon beings and do not seek the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessesses (vaśāraddhā), the eighteen special attributes (āvenakāra), omniscience (sarvakāma), the infallible knowledges (pratimokṣa), the liberations (vinokṣa), the immense body (āpramāṇaśaśā), the immense rays (āpramāṇanirvāna), the immense morality, concentrations and wisdom (āpramāṇasambhāṣā), which is exertion among men is not described as virtue.

Moreover, with unceasing exertion the bodhisattva one-pointedly (ekacittena) seeks buddhahood; such effort merits the name of virtue of patience. Thus the bodhisattva must have great loving-kindness for himself; he wants only to reach the state of buddhahood and do good for beings. This is the nature [of disinterestedness] that constitutes the virtue of exertion in the bodhisattva.

Moreover, the exertion of the bodhisattva is applied in the practice of all good dharmas and mainly in great compassion (mahākaruṇā). The good father loves his son; if he has only one son and the latter contracts a serious illness, he one-pointedly (ekacittena) seeks a remedy to cure his sickness; thus the energetic bodhisattva in whom loving-kindness predominates will not cease until he has saved all beings.

382 For Hau che or Ta che (Mahāyāgavat), see references above, Traité, I, p. 265F, n. 1.
Finally, in the energy that characterizes the bodhisattva, knowledge of the true nature of things (satyalakṣaṇa-bodhi) is a major element. Practicing the six virtues [in these conditions] constitutes the virtue of exertion belonging to the bodhisattva.

Question. – The true nature of dharmas is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta) and non-fabricated (anahārasīmkrt). Now exertion is conditioned and ‘fabricated’. Why would the true nature be the main element?

Answer. – Although he knows that the true nature is unconditioned and unfabricated, by virtue of his original vow (maññashīlākaraṇa) and his great compassion (mahākārmaṇa), the bodhisattva wishes to save beings. This is why, in the unfabricated, he uses the power of his exertion to save and liberate all beings.

Moreover, the true nature of all dharmas is unconditioned (asaṃskṛta), non-fabricated (anahārasīmkrt), like nirvāṇa (nirvāṇasāmu), without one-ness (aneka) or duality (advaaya). Why then do you claim that this true nature is different from the nature of exertion? Actually, you do not understand the nature of things.

[THE WORLD OF TRANSMIGRATION].

Moreover, the bodhisattva sees that the beings of the threefold world (tṛaya-bhūtaka) and the five destinies (pañca-gati) are, each of them, deprived of happiness.

God realm. – The gods of the formless realm (ārūpya-bhūtaka), who enjoy the absorptions (samāpatti) and are attached to them, do not understand that when their life is over they will fall back into the desire realm and will take on the form of a bird or animal. In the same way, the gods of the form realm (rupa-bhūtaka), having fallen from the pure abodes (isuddhidhāvāla), will again conceive sensual desire and will abide in the impure spheres. Finally, the six classes of gods of the desire realm (kāmabhūtaka), attached to the five desirable objects, will fall into the hells (nīrāya) and be subjected to all the sufferings.

Human realm. – In the human destiny (manussayogati), the bodhisattva sees beings who, by practicing the ten meritorious actions, have obtained a human body. The human life involves many sufferings and but little joy; when their life is over, people often fall into the unfortunate destinies (durgati).

Animal realm. – The bodhisattva sees the animals (tiryaṅka) undergoing all the torments: they are made to gallop by blows of the whip or stick; they are made to make long journeys carrying burdens; their harness is damaged; they are branded with hot iron. People who, in their former lives, have trusted them up, whipped them or been guilty of crimes of this kind, assume the animal form of an elephant (pāhāsa), a horse (āla), a cow (go), a sheep (edaka) or a deer (urga). – If sensual desires (kīmarūga), passion and ignorance (avidyā) were predominant in them, they are reborn as goose (hunua), a duck (kāraṇḍava), a peacock (barhin, matāra), a cakra bird (caṭavāka), a pigeon (kapota), a cock (kukkuta), a parrot (śīka) or a blackbird; thus they become one of the hundred thousand kinds of birds. If they are guilty of lust, their body becomes covered with hairs and feathers; their plumage is fine and smooth; their beak, big and wide; thus they cannot distinguish touch (sparśa) and taste (rasa). – If hatred (āvesa, pratigha) is predominant, they take the form of a poisonous snake (āsīvīsita), a scorpion (vyceka), a spider (līṣa), a bee (madhuka), a myriapod (śīhapadā) or a poisonous insect. – If delusion (soma) is abundant, they are reborn as a kind of worm (kha), a butterfly, a dung-beetle, an ant (piṭika), an owl (ulika), among the insects and stupid birds. – If pride (abhūmāna) and anger abound, they take the form of a savage beast: lion (śīhoka), tiger (vyaghra) or leopard (aṭāhin). – As a result of stupid conceit (mithyāmūna), they re reborn as an ass (gāradaḥa), a pig (śākara) or a camel (uṣtra). – As a result of greed (māyārāja), envy (brājila); impulsiveness and hate; they take the form of an ape (marakata), a long-tailed monkey (vīnāra) or a bear (ṛiksa). – Guilty of evil desires (mithyārāja), hatred and jealousy (brājila), they take the form of a cat (mārgara), fox or field-tiger. – As a result of shamelessness (anupatīraja), lack of self-respect (āhṛtīrka) and glutony (grīḍhīrka), they take the form of a bird such as a crow (kāka), a magpie, an owl or a vulture (grīḍhra). – If they have deceived honest people (sajjandavāma), they take the body of a rooster (kukkuta), a dog (kukkara), a jackal (śīrgalī), etc. – Very generous (mahādātri) but short-tempered (krodhaka) and crafty (lakṣālacita), they take the form of a nāga. – Very generous (mahātyāgī), if they have tormented beings by their arrogances (cittonnata) and their tyranny (darpa), they take the form of a golden-winged bird (guruda). - As a result of all these passions [175b] (samyojana) and all these actions (karman), they undergo the sufferings reserved for animals (tiryaṅka), birds (pakṣaṇa) or quadrupeds (pāsa).

Courses through the five destinies. – The bodhisattva who possesses the divine eye (divyavacāyuk) sees beings wander through the five destinies and whirl about in them. They die among the gods and again are reborn among the gods. And it is the same for those in hells (nīrāya), the pretas and the animals.

Courses through the three realms. – They die in kāmadhūtaka and are reborn in rūpa-bhūtaka; they die in rūpa-bhūtaka and reborn in kāmadhūtaka; they die in kāmadhūtaka and are reborn in ārūpya-bhūtaka; they die in ārūpya-bhūtaka and are reborn in kāmadhūtaka; they die in kāmadhūtaka and are reborn in ārūpya-bhūtaka. It is the same for rūpa-bhūtaka and ārūpya-bhūtaka.

Courses through the hells. – They die in Śaṃjīva hell and are reborn in Kālaśūtra hell; they die in Kālaśūtra hell and are reborn in Śaṃjīva hell; they die in Śaṃjīva hell and are again reborn in Śaṃjīva hell. And it is the same for the other hells from Śaṃjīgata up to Avīchi. They die in the hell of blazing coals (kaṇḍāla) and are reborn in the hell of excrement (kaṇnapa); they die in the hell of excrement and are reborn in the hell of blazing coals; they die in the hell of blazing coals and are again reborn in the hell of blazing coals. And it is the same for the other hells, from the hell of the blazing forest (maññipāvāna) up to the Mahāpadma.

Courses through the five wombs. – In the course of their successive rebirths, they die among the ānādja (beings born from eggs) and are reborn among the jātisyā (beings born from the chorion); they die among the jātisyā and are reborn among the ānādja; they die among the ānādja and are again reborn among the ānādja, and it is the same for the jātisyā, the Suśvedaja (beings born from moisture) and the upapādika (apparitional beings).

Courses through the four continents. – They die in Jambudvīpa and are reborn in Pūrvavideha; they die in Pūrvavideha and are reborn in Jambudvīpa; they die in Jambudvīpa and are again reborn in Jambudvīpa. And it is the same for Aparagadānīya and Uttarakuru.

Courses through the classes of gods. – They die among the Cītarāmārājikas and are reborn among the Trāyastriṃśas; they die among the Trāyastriṃśas and are reborn among the Cītarāmārājikas; they die among the Cītarāmārājikas and are again reborn among the Cītarāmārājikas. And it is the same [for the other gods of kāmadhātu], from the Trāyastriṃśas to the Paranirmitavasūtins.

They die among the Brahmaṇāyikas and are reborn among the Brahmaṇapurohitas; they die among the Brahmaṇapurohitas and are reborn among the Brahmaṇakṣayikas; they die among the Brahmaṇakṣayikas and are again reborn among the Brahmaṇāyikas. And it is the same for the Brahmaṇapurohitas, [Mahābrahma]; Parittābha, Aparāmājītha, Ābhāśvara; Parittāsūthi, Aparāmājītha, Subhabhikṣa; Anābrahaka, Puṇyaprassāva, Bhūthapala; [gods belonging] to the place of infinite space (ākāśānantaśatana), to the place of infinite consciousness (āvijñānantaśatana), to the place of nothing at all (ākāśavāpyāntana) and to the place of the neither with perception nor without perception (naivasvamīlānasamājītyatana) gods. They die among the neither with perception nor without perception gods and are reborn in Avīci hell. Thus they are reborn in the five destinies successively.

Having seen that, the bodhisattva produces a mind of great compassion (mahākārūnīcittha): “I am of no use to these beings; even if I gave them [all] the [175c] happiness in the world, this happiness would end up in sorrow. It is only by means of the eternal happiness of the state of buddhahood and nirvāṇa that I can benefit everyone. How can I benefit them? I will use great exertion until I have obtained true wisdom; when I have attained true wisdom I will understand the true nature of dharmas and, with the help of the other virtues, I will do good for beings.” This is the virtue of exertion belonging to the pretas.

Pretas. – Then the bodhisattva considers the pretas. As a result of the hunger (kṣudha-) and thirst (pipāṣā) that torment them, their two eyes are sunken, their hair is long. They run about from east to west [to find drink], but when they approach some water, the demon guardians of the water chase them away with blows from iron rods or, if there are no guardians, the water dries up by itself; when it rains, the rain changes into coals. – There are pretas who always suffer from fire like at the end of the kalpa, when fire comes out of the mountains. – There are emaciated pretas who run around like madmen; their bodies are covered with long disheveled hair. – There are pretas who feed endlessly on excrement (gūtha), spirt (nissīhṇa), vomit (vāna) or the left-over water from laundry, sometimes they go to latrines and stand on guard there waiting for impure (aiśi) liquid. – There are pretas who are always looking for the blood of a woman in child-birth and who drink it; their aspect is like a flaming tree; their throat is like a needle (siśčihṭra); if they are given water, a thousand years would not be enough for them [to swallow it]. – There are pretas who break their own head, take the brains and lick it. – For some pretas, it is as if they had the iron chains of the black mountain (kālagasīri) around their neck, hitting their head on the ground, they ask for pity and take refuge near their guardians (bandhunāpakāla). – There are pretas who, in their previous existences, spoke harmful words (pāraṇayāvāda) and made course comments to people; beings hate them and look upon them as enemies. For all these faults they fall into the preta destiny and suffer all kinds of punishments there.

The eight great hells. – The bodhisattva sees the eight great hells and the ten thousand types of torments [encountered there].

164 For the torments of the pretas, see Śānyutta, II, p. 255 (tr. Woodward, Kindred Sayings, II, p. 270). The Milinda, p. 294, distinguishes four kinds of pretas: 1) those who eat vomit (suntāsīli); 2) those who are hungry and thirsty (bhappiṣṭo); 3) those who are consumed by thirst (nīḷhimaṭṭakīli); 4) those who live on alms (parādattāśappiṭṭho).
B. An evolution in the ideas on hell is marked by the more recent sources, notably the Sanskrit sources derived from the Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikā school:

1) There are eight great hells (instead of seven), each having a name and a given type of punishment; these are, in descending order, Sāṃśa, Sāṃskṛta, Sāmgha, Sāmghamūla, Tapana, Putāpama and Aśvīcitī: cf. Divyāvadana, p. 67; Avadānasūta, I, p. 4; Dharmasamuccaya, chap. 121; Mahāyānta, no. 4920-4927; Kośa, III, p. 149. This list of the eight great hells was adopted by the Cosmography of the Dīghāṅgara and related texts (T 1, k. 19, p. 121c-58; T 23, k. 2, p. 283b16-19; T 24, k. 2, p. 326c3-5). It has also passed into the Ceylonese texts, but with several variations in the order and nomenclature; cf. Pāli Jātaka, V, p. 266, 271; Sāfājī, Kālāsutta, Sānghāta, Sālāravu, Šālāravu, Dīlānuravu, Mahāvīrī, Tapana, Patōpama.

2) Each of these eight great hells opens into sixteen secondary hells, called utasad (thus there are 8 x 16 = 128 utasad). But the distribution of these sixteen utasads differs according to the source:

a. At the four cardinal points of each hell there are four utasad: i) the kuṇā, mine of excrement; ii) the kuṇā, mire of excrement; iii) three places of suffering forming a single utasa: āruṃma, path of knives; asipattavana, forest of leaves of which are swords; ayahalamaṅgana, forest of spines; iv) the river Vaitaraṇī of boiling water. Cf. Mahāyānta, no. 4917-4942; Pīḷo cha, T 1545, k. 172, p. 855a; Kośa, III, p. 159-151; Li che a pīḷ tamou, T 1644, k. 8, p. 211c.

b. Each great hell is completed by sixteen small utasad, each having a different name: Black sand; Boiling excrement; Five hundred nails; Manya copper pots; Iron millstone; Pus and blood; Proofing fire; River of ashes; Ball of iron (avoguda); Beheading axe; Wolf; Forest of swords; Cold water. Cf. Cosmography of the Chinese Dīghāṅgara and related texts: T 1, k. 19, p. 121c8; T 23, k. 2, p. 283c; T 24, k. 2, p. 326c.

3) Finally, the Sanskrit texts list eight cold hells (instead of ten) and the śiṅgāsa texts have consequently been modified. These śiṅgāsa are called: Āruda, Nirāruda, Āṇīra, Hārura, Hāhura, Upiṣā, Padma and Mahāpalāda. Cf. Tsu a hain, T 99, no. 1278. k. 48, p. 351c; Pī lo s a, T 100, no. 276. k. 14, p. 470b (which corresponds to Suttanāṇa, III,10, p. 126); Divyāvadana, p. 67; Avadānasūta, I, p. 4; Mahāyānta, no. 4920-4936; Dharmasamuccaya, chap. 122; Kośa, III, p. 154; Mppī, T 1509, k. 13, p. 158b; k. 16, p. 176c-177a; Pī ḷ o cha, T 1545, k. 172, p. 866a. In the present passage, the Mppī seems to be derivative from Sarvāstivādin-Vaibhāṣikā sources listed under above but is not followed there slavishly. Like the Mahāvata, I, p. 244, l. 19, it accepts eight great hells and sixteen utasad or small hells. The eight great hells are the Sāṃgha, etc.; the sixteen small hells are made up of the traditional eight cold hells, Āruda, etc., and the eight hot hells, of which most may be restored as: Kuṇā, blazing coals; Kuṇā, excrement; Adhāparvāna, burning forest; Asipattavāna, forest of swords; Kuṇārikā, path of knives; Ayahalamaṅgana, forest of spines; Khārokaṇākādi, salty river; Tāmānurambha, copper stake.

Other sources not listed here also show a certain interest in the study of the Buddhist hells; not to forget the Sadgūtamukkā, st. 1-37, ed. Mui, p. 216-243, we also mention Divyāvadana, p. 375-376; Mahāvata, I, p. 4-27 (Maudgalāyāna’s visit to the hells); Kāranyavasya, ed. S. B. Samaarama, 1873 (Maitreyī’s visit to the hells); a passage from the Suddhāmarṣyasyaśīlha citized in Śīkasamuccaya, p. 69-76; Nāgārjuna’s Śūlekhā, T 1674, p. 753a (tr. H. Wenzel, Friendly Epistle, IJTS, 1896, p. 21-24; S. Beal, The Śūlekhā or Friendly Letter, 1892, p. 29-31).

Among the works: L. Feer, L’Enfer indien. JA, 1892-93; B. C. Law, Heaven and Hell in Buddhist Perspective, 1925; Kirell, Kosmographie, p. 198-206; Przyluski, Āśa, p. 120-160.

1) In the great Sāṃgha hell, the damned fight one another; aggressive and pugnacious, they wield sharp knives and slash one another; they are pierced with lances and skewered with iron forks; they are struck with iron bars; they are struck with iron rods; they are thrashed by iron shovels and slashed with sharp knives; they are torn apart with iron claws; they are all covered in blood.237 Broken by these torments, they lose consciousness but, as a result of their previous actions, cold wind blows on them and, when the guards call them, they come back to life: this is why this hell is called Sāṃgha. When they revive (ṣyaktiṣṭha) they again undergo the [same] torments. Beings who, in their previous existence, liked to kill living beings, cows, sheep, birds, or other animals, or who killed one another for a field, a house, a slave, a woman or child, a kingdom or money, are found there; as punishment for all the killings they have done, they suffer thus.

2) The bodhisattva sees the damned in the great Kālaśūtra hell. Wicked rākṣasus, guardians of the hell (nirayapāla) and worker-demons ceaselessly [176a] measure the damned with a black cord (kālaśūtra) and are deemed to oppress the weak suffer the punishment of the coming anim als that harbor resentment against them take on their bird or animal forms and come to torment these beings. Their torn flesh is gathered into piles as on a threshing-floor; torrents of blood flow out; the eagles, vultures, dogs (kālaśūtra), foxes (kālaśūtra), tigers (vīrya), wolves, yaks (śākta), donkeys, big birds, eagles (garutama), and vultures (garutama). Having thus taken on the heads of birds and anim als, they put them to death and cut them to pieces; they shorten what is long (dīrgha), they lengthen what is short (kṛṣṇa); they round off what is square (varga), they square off what is round (vṛttā); they cut their arms and legs, tear out their ears and noses and cut off their hands and feet with a great iron saw (kvaracca); they amputate them and cut them up. They cut their flesh into pieces and weigh the quarters of meat. In the course of their earlier lives, these unfortunate people used to slander honest people and cause innocent people to die by means of lies (mṛṣīvāda), harmful words (mṛṣīvāda), malicious gossip (mṛṣīvāda) and idle comments (mṛṣīvāda). Or else, as perverted officials, they were cruel, violent, dishonest and harmful. It is as a result of their wrong-doings and calumnies that they undergo these punishments.

3) The bodhisattva sees the great Sāṃgha hell238 where wicked rākṣasas, guardians of hell (nirayapāla), take on all kinds of shapes: they become oxen (go), horses (āśva), pigs (tākara), sheep (eduka), deer (merga), dogs (kālaśūtra), foxes (kusāna?), tigers (vīrya), wolves (yaks), yaks (śākta), donkeys, big birds, eagles (garutama), and vultures (garutama). Their torn flesh is gathered into piles as on a threshing-floor; torrents of blood flow out; the eagles, vultures, tigers and wolves begin to fight over it. In their previous lives, these unfortunate had frequently killed oxen, horses, pigs, sheep, deer, doves, rabbits, tigers, wolves, lions, donkeys and big birds, and so all these animals that harbiour resentment against them take on their bird or animal forms and come to torment these damned. - Those who have exploited their power to oppress the weak suffer the punishment of the coming

---

237 Here the Mppī does not mention the torture of the five bonds (pañcaviśālābhanda) that characterizes the first hell according to Mahājīma, III, p. 166; Divyāvadana, p. 376; Tsonang a, T 26, k. 53, p. 760b.

238 Sāṃgha means “accumulation, assemblage, squeezing”. That is why three punishments are imagined in this hell: the damned are assembled in a mass (sūlekhā) and massacred (cf. Sadgūtamukkā, no. 10); they are crushed between two mountains which come together (samhan); they are pounded in an iron mortar (these last two torments in Śūlekhā, tr. Wenzel, p. 22).
together of the two mountains. Those who, out of greed (rāga), hatred (dveṣa), stupidity (moha) or fear (bhaya), have not followed rules of good conduct or even those who have destroyed the proper way and perverted the Holy Dharma suffer the punishment of being crushed in the groove of the hot iron wheel and ground up in the hot iron mortar.

4-5) The fourth and fifth [great hells] are Raurava and Mahāraurava. The damned who are in these great hells have as guardians rākṣasas with heads yellow (pūta) like gold; their eyes shoot out fire and they are clothed in red cloaks (lohitavāstra); their flesh is solid; their gait is as swift as the wind; their hands and feet are long; their mouth utters evil sounds; they hold tridents (trisūla) and forked arrows with which they stab and hurl at the damned like rain. Carried away by their fear, the damned strike their heads on the ground and beg for pity: “Leave us be for a while; have pity for a while!” Then the demons throw them into the burning iron hell, one hundred yojanas in extent, and make them gallop there with whip lashes: their feet are completely burned, their fat and marrow run in rivulets like pressed oil. The demons break open their heads with iron bars and the brains run out of their smashed skulls like cream from a broken pot. The demons slit them and cut them up; when their bodies are completely burned, they put them in an iron room where the first is called...

6-7) The sixth and seventh [great hells] are the Tapana and Pratapa. There are two great copper cauldrons there; the first is called Nan t'o (Nanda) and the second Po nan t'o (Upurananda); in the language of Ti'sin, “Joy” and “Great Joy”; they are filled with boiling brine. The rākṣasa demons, guardians of hell, throw the damned into them, like head chefs cooking meat. The people in these cauldrons have their feet up and their heads down; they are boiled like beans; their bones and joints become detached; their skin and flesh dissolve. When they are completely cooked, the demons fish them out with a fork. According to the law of karma, a cold wind blows that brings the damned back to life. Then they are thrown into the glowing coals (kukkula) or into the excrement (kukupa), like fish pulled out of the water and thrown onto the hot sand. There they are cooked in pus (read nong, 130 and 13) and blood. Then they are taken out of the glowing coals and thrown onto a bed of flames where they are forced to sit; their eyes, ears, nose and mouth, up to the pores of their skin, emit flames. In their previous lives, these unfortunates had tormented their parents, their teacher, śrāmaṇa and brāhmaṇa; they had tormented honest people and fields of merit (punnadāsana) to the point of arousing their anger; for these reasons they suffer the torments of the Tapana hell. Or else, in their previous lives, they had roasted live cocoons, roasted live pigs and sheep, spit-roasted living human beings. Or else they had set fire to the jungle, burned villages, stūpas, monasteries (vihāra), temples (devacaitya), etc., or else they had thrown beings into pits of fire. It is for all these reasons that they are reborn in this hell.

8) The bodhisattva sees the Avīci hell, four thousand li in size, surrounded by iron walls and situated even deeper than the seven hells. The rākṣasa guardians hammer the damned with great iron hammers like blacksmitห hammering out iron. They crush them from head to foot. They pin out and stretch their bodies with five hundred nails, like an ox-hide is stretched. The damned drag themselves along and tear themselves apart with their hands. A fiery iron chariot rolls over their bodies.

Various usada annexed to the Avīci: 1) They are forcibly pushed into the glowing coals (kukula) and made to carry the glowing coals.

2) They come out by the river of excrement (kukupa) which they are made [176c] to enter. There poisonous iron-beaked insects enter their body through their nose and leave through the soles of their feet; entering by the soles of their feet, they leave through their mouths.

3) There arises before them the path of knives (urama), scorpions (ama) and forked arrows with which they stab and pierce them. There poisonous dogs (asas) with heads yellow (kukkula) of the Mppa, V, p. 269.

4) The path of knives is the asamamārga or kṣuradhāramārga and they are made to gallop there by whip-lashes. The soles of their feet are cut into pieces like meat minced for cooking; knives, swords and sharp blades fly through their bodies. Just as leaves falling from a frozen tree are scattered at the mercy of the wind, so the sliced-off hands, feet, noses and limbs of these damned cover the ground and torrents of blood flow.

Two evil dogs, Che mo (Śyāma) and Che p’o lo (Śāhala) feast on the damned, big long-beaked birds break their heads and feast on their brains.

745

746
4) The damned enter the salt river [Khārodakā nadī or Vaitarṇī],184 which they enter and are swept downstream. When they emerge, they tread on a ground of burning iron (ayonmā yāhūṃ āḍīpā). Walking on iron spines (ayabhāṇatakā) and sitting on iron spikes (ayuṣṭamkhā)185 that enter them from behind. The guardians open their mouths with pliers (viśkambhenena mukhadvāram viśkambhyā) and pour in molten copper (kvatiṭam tānumpaye prakṣijanti); they make them swallow flaming balls of iron (ayugudā āḍīpāṃ desyaprakṣijanti);186 these balls enter and burn their mouth (ṣūkhaḥ), penetrate into and burn the throat (kaṇṭhaḥ). They penetrate into and burn the belly; the five viscera (read tāng, 130 and 18) having been burned, they fall to the ground (aḍdhū pragh ṛhanti). The damned, who see only ugly colors, breathe only fetid air, touch only rough things and undergo all the suffering, are bowed down with sorrow. Sometimes they act like savages, sometimes they run and hide, sometimes they trip and fall.

In previous lives, these unfortunates had committed many great wrongs and perpetrated the five grave sins of immediate retribution (paṭkūnataraya); they destroyed the roots of good (kulaṭalūmālī); they called the Dharma ‘adharmā’ and ‘adharmā’ they called ‘Dharma’; they denied cause (hetu) and effect (phala), despised and envied honest people. For all these sins they enter into this hell and undergo such hard punishments.

The sixteen utsadas annexed to the eight great hells. – Outside the boundary of these eight great hells there are also sixteen hells that form annexes (utsada): eight hells of cold water and eight hells of fire and flame. The punishments there are of rare unprecedented (adṛṣṭātara) severity.

The eight hells of fire and flame are: the blazing coals (kukūla); excrement (kunapa); the blazing forest (āḍīptavaram); the forest of swords (asipattravana); the path of knives (kuśramārga or kuśradhāramārga), the forest of iron spines (ayuṣṭamalivana); the salt river (Khārodakā nadī or Vaitarṇī); the copper stake (tānumpṣambhā).

The eight hells of cold water are: Nyo feou t’o (Arbuda) ‘having many holes’; Ni lo feou t’o (Nirarbuda), ‘not having holes’; A lo lo (Atata), groan [177a] (uttered by the damned) under the biting cold; A p’o p’o (Hahara), another groan caused by the cold; Heou feou (Hahava), another groan caused by the cold; Ngeou po lo (Utpala), because the outer walls of this hell are like blue lotus (nīloṭpalā); Po t’ou mo (Padma), punishment that makes the damned look like red lotuses; Mo ho po t’ou mo (Mahāpadma).

The eight hot hells: 1) People have violated the pure precepts (śīṣadadhātā) and the monastic code (pravrajitadharma); they have induced laypeople (ovadattasavaṇa) to distrust the Buddhist path; they have thrown people into a ditch filled with fire; they have roasted beings while they were still alive. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of blazing coals (kukūla): hot blazing coals burn these damned up to their knees.

ii) Some people have touched food meant for the śīrvakas, brahmānas, or ‘fields of merit’ (punyakṣetra) with their impure hands; they have eaten before them or introduced filth into their food; they have emptied hot excrement over their bodies; they have abandoned the means of pure existence (parīśuddhīṇāb) and derived their subsistence from evil ways of living (mīthyādīvā). For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of excrement (kuṇapa): this sewer is as deep and vast as the ocean; there are iron-beaked insects that crush the heads of the damned and eat their brains, that crush their bones and eat their marrow.

iii) Some people, setting fire to grass and wood, have destroyed insects; by chasing them away, they have burned the forest to complete the carnage. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of the burning forest (āḍīptavama) where the damned are burned in the fire of grass and wood.

iv) Some people, sword in hand, have gone into battle, wounded and killed; they have cut down a tree under which they have crushed their enemy in order to avenge some old grievance; they have betrayed the despised and envied honest people. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of swords (asipattravana). When the damned enter into this hell, the wind blows over the sword-shaped leaves that then cut off the hands, feet, ears and noses of the damned. In this forest there are ravens (kākā), vultures (gṛdhaka) and evil dogs (śvanc-) that come to eat the flesh of the damned.

v) Some men have stabbed their enemy with sharp knives; they have wounded their enemy with a stake or a lance; they have run down and engaged in sex (nirvāṇa) under which they have crushed their enemy in order to avenge some old grievance; they have betrayed the despised and envied honest people. For all these reasons, they fall into the hell of knives (kuśramārga); in this hell, on a path closed off between two barriers, sharp knives have been fixed in such a way that the damned must pass under them.

vi) Some men have given themselves up to lust and have taken over other men’s wives; they have lusted after and engaged in sex (mahāparājanya). For all these reasons, they fall into the forest of iron spines (ayuṣṭamalivana). At the top of spiny trees, one yojana in height, are huge poisonous snakes (śīrṣa) transformed into beautiful women; they invite the damned to climb up and take their pleasure with them; besides, the guardians of hell (nīlāyupalā) force the damned to climb the trees. Immediately the snakes turn downwards and transfix the damned who endure the spines piercing through their bones into their marrow. When they come to the top of the trees, the magical women change back into snakes which break the heads of the damned, penetrate into their bellies and pierce holes in many places until they are completely torn apart. [177b] Finally, when they are brought back to life and in their normal state, the magical women, now standing at the bottom of the trees, call them again; the guardians of hell shoot arrows at them and make them descend: the spines reverse their direction and when they reach the ground, the magical women change back into poisonous snakes which tear up the bodies of the damned.187

---

184 This river is the Khārodaka nadī of the Majjhima, III, p. 185. the kaṇṇoda of the Saddharmasmyapunāsthaṇā, cited in Śīkṣāsūnacayya, p. 75; the vaitarṇī, “fordless river” of the Kośa, p. 151 and the Suhelikha, v. 73, 79.

185 The punishment of the iron or copper spikes is listed in Suhelikha, v. 79.

186 On the punishment of molten copper and iron balls, see, among other sources, the detailed descriptions on Mahājīma, III, p. 186; Divyāvadāna, p. 375; Śīkṣāsūnacayya, p. 73.

187 The Saddharmasmyapunāsthaṇā, cited in Śīkṣāsūnacayya, p. 71-72, also mentions the presence in the hells of these magical women, but they do not change into snakes, they have a body of red-hot iron.
vi) After a long time, when the damned come out of the forest of burning iron spines, they see in the distance a river (Khodradak nadi or Vairatara) of fresh delicious water; they go towards it but, when they get into it, it becomes boiling salt water. The damned are in it hardly a moment when their skin and flesh decompose and their bones fall into the water. The rākṣasas, guardians of hell, pull them out with a forked hook and set them down on the river-bank. In their previous lives, these unfortunate had wounded and killed water animals, fish or turtles; they had pushed people to fall into the water; they had thrown them into boiling water or into icy-water. They suffer this punishment for all these evil acts.

vii) In the hell of the copper cauldron (tānurastamba), the rākṣasas, guardians of hell, ask the damned where they are going, and the latter answer: “We are unfortunate and we do not know where we are going; we are hungry (kṣudṛ) and thirsty (pipāṣa).” When they say they are thirsty, the guardians make them sit on a red-hot copper stake (tānurastamba); they open their mouths with piers (vīṣkambhaena mahādāvārm vīṣkambhyā) and pour in molten copper (kvatīṣṭham tānurastambayāṃ prakṣipantam). If they say they are hungry, the guardians make them sit on a copper stake and make them swallow iron balls (ayaṇudā) which enter and burn the mouth, penetrate and burn the throat (kānṭha), penetrate and burn the stomach (antarā); having burned the five internal organs (read Tsang, 130 and 18), they fall down onto the ground (adhib prajāhantam). In their previous lives, these unfortunate had stolen other peoples’ goods to have enough to eat; as monks, they sometimes pretended to be sick to get melted butter (ghṛta) or honey (madhū); without discipline (śīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (prajñā), they had accepted many gifts and hurt people with slander (pāpaśravāśād). For all of these previous wrongdoings, they fall into the hell of the copper stake.

The eight cold hells. – i) In the Arbuda hell, people are plunged into a body of water where a pernicious wind blows so that their skin is torn off, their hair falls out, their tendons broken, the flesh torn, the bones broken and the marrow runs out. When they recover their wholeness, the damned undergo the same punishment again from the beginning. In their previous lives, these unfortunate had striped human beings during the winter months, or stolen fuel and fire from people in the grip of the cold; or else they had been wicked nāgas, angry and full of hate, who had caused a rain of hail and ice to fall to annoy humans; or else they had scorned and slandered the Buddha, his disciples or people who were observing morality; or else they had killed water animals, fish or turtles; they had pushed people to fall in to the water; they had thrown them into boiling water or into icy-water. The sage (Śākyamuni), or because the cold wind produces blisters on their bodies. Cf. Hobogirin, Abuda, p. 8.

130 Other etymologies are found in the texts. This hell is called arbuda because those who are there are like bubbles (arbuda) or like thick clouds (ambuda), or because the cold wind produces blisters on their bodies. Cf. Hobogirin, Abuda, p. 8.

749

177c vi) In the Utpala hell, the ice and mud are like a blue lotus (nilotpala).

vi) The shape of the Padma hell is like a red lotus.

vii) The Mahāpadma hell is the dwelling-place of Kiu kia li (Kokalika).

The sage (gītāmin) who hears [about these hells] cries out in fear: “Alas! It is because of ignorance (avidyā), hatred (pratigha) and attachment (anumaya) that one comes to undergo these sufferings; one comes out of them only to re-enter them again infinitely.” Seeing these hells, the bodhisattva says to himself: “These sufferings are the acts for causes and conditions; they all result from ignorance (avidyā) and the afflictions (kleśa). I will apply myself energetically to the six virtues (pāramūtā) and accumulate the qualities (guṇa) in order to relieve beings of the sufferings of the five destinies.” Thus the bodhisattva stimulates his compassion and increases his exertion. If one saw one’s father and mother shut up in prison, beaten and afflicted in ten thousand ways, one would look for any way (upāya) to save them and one’s mind would not rest for one moment. Thus the bodhisattva, who sees beings undergo the sufferings of the five destinies, thinks ceaselessly as his parents.

III. EXERTION AND THE OTHER VIRTUES.

1. Moreover, the exertion of the bodhisattva is practiced diligently from lifetime to lifetime: the mind of the bodhisattva never draws back from seeking wealth and treasures to give to beings; if he himself possesses good things, he never ceases to give them all away.

2. Moreover, the bodhisattva observes the precepts (śīla) energetically; whether they are great (mahat) or lesser (ksudra), he takes them all, he keeps them all without transgressing or violating them. If he happens to miss a precept, be it small as a hair, he confesses at once and hides nothing.

3. Moreover, the bodhisattva diligently cultivates patience (ksanti). Whether one strikes him with a knife or a stick, whether one harms him or insults him, whether he is covered with veneration (sukla) or worship (pijja), he endures all of it and remains indifferent and detached. In the face of the profound Dharma (gambhiradharmam) that his mind is unable to probe, he ignores doubt and hesitation.

4. Furthermore, the bodhisattva cultivates the four trances (dhyāna) with exertion and special attention. He can dwell there, keep them and thus obtain the five superknowledges (abhijñā), the four boundless ones (read saṃsa vo bhājan sam asamuccaya, p. 74), the eight liberations (vimokṣa), the spheres of mystery

401 According to the Kośa, III, p. 154, Utpala and Padma indicate the shape taken by the damned: they are like a blue or red lotus. According to the Chinese sources studied by Beal, Catena, p. 63, the inmates of Utpala and Padma are covered with spots resembling blue and red lotuses respectively.

402 For Kokalika, see above, p. 806F.

403 The gambhiradharmas have been defined above, Traité, I, p. 337-338F.
(abhibhvāyatana) [p. 969F, l. 6] and the ten spheres of totality (kṛtsnāyatana). Provided with these qualities (guna), he obtains the four foundations of mindfulness (smeṛtyayatanā) and all the samādhis of the bodhisattva, such as the vision of the Buddhas, etc.

5. Finally the bodhisattva’s exertion is without drawing back in seeking the Dharma (dharmanāyatanā); he uses body and mind to pay homage to Dharma teachers (dharmanātikāryā); he increases offerings, alms and gifts without fail or relapse. He dedicates his life to study and discussion of the Dharma. During the first, second and last watch of the night, he contemplates (manastikāroti), meditates (cintaya), calculates (pramānasya) and speculates (vikalpayā); he looks for causes and conditions (hetupratyaya); he distinguishes between identity and difference (sāmānyavīśeṣa); he seeks to understand the true nature (sātyalakṣaṇa) and to establish, for all dharmas, their specific nature (svalakṣaṇa), their general nature (anyalakṣaṇa), the general characteristic (sāmānyalakṣaṇa), the specific characteristic (bhinnalakṣaṇa), the unique characteristic (ekalakṣaṇa), the nature of existence (bhāvālakṣaṇa), the nature of non-existence (abhāvālakṣaṇa) and the essential nature (tathātālakṣaṇa). The absence of decrease (asaṁlaya) or of relapse (avivarana) of the Buddhas and bodhisattvas constitutes the exertion of the bodhisattva. For all these reasons, he can produce and realize the many good dharmas and this is the “virtue of exertion”. For the meaning of the word virtue (pīramitā), see what has been said above. In addition, the exertion of the bodhisattva is the only one to be called [178a] virtue of exertion (vīryapīramitā); the exertion of other people does not merit the name of virtue.

Question. – What is meant by perfection of exertion (vīryaparipūrī)?

Answer. – When the bodhisattva, in his body of birth (jānakāya) and his essential body (dharmanātikāya), unites all the qualities (guna), there is the perfection of the virtue of exertion (vīryapīramitā). For the meaning of paripūrī, see what has been said above: “In bodily and vocal exertion, the bodhisattva does not draw back.” (p. 927F)

IV. BODILY AND MENTAL EXERTION.

Question. – Exertion is a mental event (caitāsikadharmya). Does the sūtra speak of bodily exertion (kāyikarūpya)?

Answer. – Although exertion is a mental event, it is called bodily exertion when it makes use of physical strength. It is like sensation (vedanā); although it is a mental event, it is called ‘bodily sensation’ (kāyikavedanā) when it is associated with the [first] five consciousnesses (pāramāṣṭikāvijñānānāmprayagāti), ‘mental sensation’ (caitāsikavedanā) when it is associated with the mental consciousness (manovijñānānāmprayagāti). It is the same for exertion: when one expends physical force either by giving with the hand or vocally reciting religious texts and preaching the Dharma, it is a question of bodily or vocal exertion (kāyikarūpya).

Moreover, exertion is bodily when it is practicing generosity (dāna) or morality (śīla); it is mental when it is practicing patience (ksanti), meditation (dhyāna) and wisdom (prajñā). Moreover, exertion is bodily when it is practiced on outer things (bāhyavasuto); it is mental when there is effort special to oneself (ātsikhāyakāprayogā).

Finally, gross exertion (sthitārūpya) is bodily; subtle exertion (sādārūpya) is mental; exertion that has merit in mind is bodily; exertion that has wisdom (prajñā) in mind is mental. In the bodhisattva, there is bodily exertion during the time from the first citotāpa (resolution) until the attainment of anupatīkaśānti (acceptance of non-production) for, until then, he has not yet given up his body of birth (jannakāya). Starting from the moment when, obtaining the anupatīkaśānti, he rejects his body of flesh (mānasākāya) and attains the essential body (dharmanātikāya) up to the moment he becomes Buddha, it is a matter of mental exertion.486

When the bodhisattva is in his first resolution (pravacanatītpāda), his qualities (guna) are not complete; he is then planting the causes and conditions of the threefold merit (tripuṇyānahaḥpratītyaya). When his generosity (dāna), morality (śīla) and good intention (kṣaṇikacittā) have finally been rewarded, he uses the latter to give gifts to beings. But as beings are not satisfied, he cultivates merit on a grander scale and makes a resolution for great compassion (mahākāyaruddhāpāya); he says: “Beings have insufficient wealth and many are bad. I am incapable of satisfying their desires with my small wealth. If their desires are not satisfied, they will not willingly accept my teaching; if they do not accept my teaching, they will not be liberated from birth (jīva), old age (jātra), sickness (vyādhi) and death (mavaṇa). Therefore I will use great skillful means (suhaśayā) to load them with riches until they are satisfied.” Then the bodhisattva goes to the great sea to look for various treasures; he climbs mountains and faces dangers in the search for marvelous medicines; he penetrates into deep caves in search of various objects, stelaeic or precious gems (maniratana) and he gives them to beings. Or else, he becomes the leader of a caravan (sthravāla) and he daringly crosses mountain trails, facing robbers, lions, tigers, wolves and madmen. In order to make gifts to beings, he carefully seeks the most precious materials, and he considers nothing too difficult. With medicinal herbs (osaṣṭhī) and magical spells (mantras), he can transform copper into gold; by means of these many transformations (parātana), he produces all kinds of precious substances; and when he is successful [in fabricating] things that are not native in the four directions, he gives them to beings. That is bodily exertion. But, when he has acquired the five [178b] superknowledges (abhijñā), he can transform himself and create exquisite tastes; or else he goes to the heavens (svarga) to gather the food [that grows] there spontaneously. That is mental exertion.485

486 In other words, it is in the eighth bhūmi (acal bhūmi) that the bodhisattva attains anupatīkaśānti (patience that consists of accepting and understanding that dharma do not arise), the yāna (predestination for Bodhi), the avivartana (assurance of non-regressing); then he exchanges his body of birth (jannakāya) or body of flesh (mānasākāya) for the body of the Dharma (dharmanākāya), and his exertion, bodily (kāyika) as it was before, becomes mental (caitāsika). See above, p. 711F, n. 1.
When the bodhisattva collects riches and gives them away, this is bodily exertion; when he uses his qualities of donor to reach buddhahood, this is mental exertion. When the bodhisattva of birth body (jannamākṣaya) practices the six virtues, this is bodily exertion; when he bodhisattva of essential body (dharma-mahākātyāya) practices the six virtues, this is mental energy. [Note by Kumārajīva: when one has not acquired the Dharma-body, the mind follows the body; but when one has acquired the dharma-mākṣaya, the mind does not follow the body and the body does not hinder the mind.]

Furthermore, not to spare one’s life in order to realize the qualities is bodily energy; never to relax (asramasannātā) in seeking dhyāna and wisdom (prajñā) is mental exertion.

Finally, bodily exertion consists of not drawing back in the difficult efforts that one undertakes.

Nigrodhamita 847
It is told that, in the kingdom of Po lo nai (Vārānasi), the king Fan mo ta (Brahmadatta), while hunting in the jungle (arāmya), saw two herds of deer (megayālha): each herd had its leader; the one had five hundred deer and his body was the color of the seven jewels (saptaratna): this was the Bodhisattva Śikṣyamuni; the other leader was Devadatta.

The Bodhisattva, king of the deer, on seeing king Brahmadatta killing his herd, felt great compassion (mahākarunācitta) and went to Brahmadatta. The king’s people drew their bows and let fly a rain of arrows. But Brahmadatta, seeing this deer approaching him, commanded his retinue to put away their bows and arrows so he could learn the motive for the deer’s coming. Approaching the human king, the deer-king knelt and said: “Sire, it is for a useless motive, namely, the pleasures of an outing and diversion that our deer are suffering all the pains of death. If you wish, we will furnish you with food; we will establish a sequence and send you every day one deer for the royal kitchen.” The king approved this proposition and gave in to the deer-king’s wish. Then the two herd leaders, in a great meeting, set up a sequence; and each in turn, sent the deer from his herd whose turn it was [to be killed].

One day, a pregnant doe in Devadatta’s herd said to him: “Today is my day to go to my death; but I am pregnant and it is not my baby’s turn. Therefore I beg you to condescend to an agreement so that I, who must die, will undergo my lot, but that my baby should not suffer it.” The deer king, Devadatta, became angry with her and said: “Who is there who would not take care for his life? The deer go [to their death] when their turn comes; why would they accept your terms?” The mother deer then said: “My king is inhumane and has no pity; he has not considered my proposition and has become angry without valid reason. There is no way to talk to him.” Then she went to the bodhisattva-king and told her story. The bodhisattva-king asked the doe: “What did your leader say?” – She replied: “My leader is inhuman; he did not come to an arrangement but got angry. Great king! Your humanity extends to all; that is why I come to you for refuge. As vast as the world is, today for me there is no place to appeal to a higher court.” The Bodhisattva thought: “This doe is very sad. If I do not intervene, her baby will be savagely killed; it is not the baby’s turn. But how can I send in her place [a deer] whose turn has not yet come? Only I myself can replace her.” Having thought thus, he made his decision: he delegated himself and sent away the mother doe: “I will replace you today, do not worry”, he said.

Then the deer-king went to the palace of king Brahmadatta; the servants were astonished to see him come and reported the thing to the king. The king also was astounded and, having him brought before him, he asked: “Is your herd exhausted? Why have you come?” The deer-king replied: “Great king, since your protection extends to the deer, nobody hurts us and we have increased; why would the herd come to an end? But, in my neighbor’s herd, there is a pregnant doe ready to give birth; she is to be killed and butchered and her baby put to death. She came to me and I had pity on her. It is impossible to replace her by someone who is not involved in this business. If I send her away and do not save her, I am no different than a piece of wood or a stone. My body will not last long; it will surely not escape death. To save the unfortunate compassionately is of immense merit. Those who have no loving-kindness (maitrī) are like tigers and wolves.” Hearing these words, the king rose from his seat and spoke these stanzas:

Truly I am an animal
A ‘beast in human form’,
You, despite your body of an animal
Are a ‘man in the form of a beast.’

It is correct to say
That external form does not make a man.
Although he is an animal, whoever knows how to express loving-kindness
Is a man.
For my own part, starting from today, I will not eat any meat whatsoever. I make you the gift of absence of fear (abhayaadāna), You may reassure your mind.

The deer rejoiced in peace and the king found loving-kindness and faith.

[DHARMARAKTA SACRIFICES HIMSELF FOR A STANZA].

The brahmācārin Nāga fa (Dharmarākta) traveled about in Jambudvīpa for twelve years in search of the holy Dharma (āryadharmā), but was unable to find it. At that time there was no Buddha and the Buddha-dharmā also had disappeared. There was a brāhmin who said to him: “I possess a stanza of the holy Dharma; if you truly love the Dharma, I will give it to you.” Dharmarākta answered: “I do love the Dharma truly.” The brāhmin replied: “If you truly love the Dharma, you will take your skin as paper, one of your bones as pen and you will write the stanza with your blood; then I will give it to you.” Dharmarākta agreed to these orders: he broke a bone, flayed his skin and wrote the following stanza with his blood:

Practice the Dharma,

Do not adopt adharma!
In this world and in the other, The Dharmacārin dwells in peace.

[THE PHEASANT EXTINGUISHING A JUNGLE FIRE].

There was once a jungle fire consuming the forest in which there lived a [179a] pheasant (kapilījala) who used his strength to fly to some water, moisten his down and his feathers and return to extinguish the fire. The blaze was violent and the water [that he poured over it] was small in amount; but the pheasant did not find discouraging the fatigue of flying there and back. Then the god Ti che (Sakra) came and asked the pheasant: “What are you doing there?” The pheasant answered: “I want to save this forest, for I have pity for living beings. This forest is shady, vast in extent, fresh and pleasant. The animals of my kind, my friends, do not adopt any evil actions. The forest is my home, this forest is my shelter. I rejoice in peace and the king found loving-kindness and faith in me.” The king of the gods asked him: “How long will you continue your effort?” The pheasant answered: “I will continue until death.” The king of the gods continued: “Who knows with certainty that that is indeed your intention?” Then the pheasant made the following vow (grānḍhādāna): “If my heart is sincere and my faith true, may this fire be extinguished.” At once, a god of the pure abodes (luddhāvīśadesva) heard the ardent vow of the bodhisattva and extinguished the fire. From early times until today, it is the only forest that is always flowering and is spared by fires.
These are the various exploits that the Bodhisattva accomplished in his previous lives: he carried out what was hard to do; he sacrificed his life, his kingdom, his wealth, his wife, his children, his elephants and horses, his seven pearls, his head, his eyes, his bones and his marrow; he gave everything eagerly and without regret. It is said that, for beings, in the space of a single day, the Bodhisattva would undergo a thousand deaths and a thousand births. Such are the exploits that he accomplishes in his virtue of generosity, morality, patience, trance and wisdom. All the nīdānas told in the Jātakasūtras are derived from bodily exertion.

Cultivation of the good dhāmas (kaśicchakamsaddhāna), confident faith ignoring doubt (nīsamādānaksapāsāda), absence of laziness (akustīla), insatiability in searching for the Dharma (dharmanupatyavasanantsati) conducted among the saints and up to worldly people – insatiability like that of the ocean that engulfs the waves – that is what characterizes the mental exertion of the bodhisattva.

Question. – The mention of insatiability (santsati) is not correct. Why? When one has found what one has been looking for, one should be satisfied; but when something cannot be pursued or arranged, one ought to give it up. Why this perpetual dissatisfaction? When someone is digging a well looking for a spring and has worked hard, if there is no water, he should stop. It is the same for the practice of the Path: having reached a certain point, it is not necessary to practice further. Why this perpetual dissatisfaction?

Answer. – The exertion of the bodhisattva cannot be the object of an ordinary comparison (laudikapamāna). If the person digging the well does not succeed in finding water, this is as a result of his small efforts and not because there is no water. If there is no water in that place, there is some elsewhere, to be sure, and he should go where it is. The bodhisattva must go to buddhahood, go there insatiably, and teach people relentlessly [to go there]. This is why we spoke of insatiability (asantsati).

Furthermore, the exertion and the aspirations (prājñādikāhana) of the bodhisattva are vast; he has sworn to save all beings. Now beings are inexhaustible in number.615 This is why his exertion also must be inexhaustible. You said that once something has been arranged, one should stop, but that is not correct. Although the bodhisattva may have come to buddhahood, beings have not all arrived there; therefore he cannot stop. Just as the nature of fire, even though it is not extinct, is to combat cold, so the exertion of the bodhisattva, even though he has not entered into nirvāṇa, never stops. This is why, of the eighteen special attributes (ābhīṣekadharma), zealousness (chanda) and exertion (vīrya) are two things to be practiced unceasingly.

Furthermore, the bodhisattva abides in the virtue of wisdom (prajñāpāramitā) by the method of non-abiding (asathānayogan);616 he never abandons exertion. The exertion of the bodhisattva is not that of the Buddha.

Furthermore, as long as the bodhisattva has not attained the state of Bodhisattva, his body of birth and death (cūṇapattikākāya, saṃkārakākāya) fills living beings with wonderful things. In turn, beings respond to praises (varana) with malicious gossip (paññavyādā), to signs of respect (saṅgha, arcanā) with scorn (avamāna), to friendly feelings (maitrīcitta) with looking for faults; they even plan to wound him. Deprived of power (sthāna), these beings come to torment the bodhisattva, who makes vast aspirations (pranidhāna) for these beings: “When I have attained buddhahood, I will save these beings, even the most wicked.” His mind unrelentingly feels great compassion (mahākārmaṇa) for these evil beings. Like a loving mother who laments the sickness of her son, he does not cease to worry about them. These are the characteristics of the exertion of the bodhisattva.

Furthermore, when the bodhisattva practices the virtue of generosity, all kinds of beggars come from the ten directions to ask him for things they should not be asking for, things to which the bodhisattva is attached and which are hard for him to give; they say to the bodhisattva: “Give me your two eyes; give me your head, your brain, your bones, your marrow, your wife and your dear children, your pearls and priceless jewels.” These things that are difficult to give, the beggars insistently demand them; but the bodhisattva’s mind is not moved; he feels neither miserliness (mātsarya) nor anger (krodha). Without hesitation, wholeheartedly (ekacittena), he gives [what they ask for] in order to realize the state of buddhahood. He is like mount Meru which is not shaken by the winds of the four directions. These are the characteristics of the virtue of exertion.

Finally, the bodhisattva’s exertion is the virtue of exertion when it practices the [other] five virtues on all occasions (sarvatva).

Question. – If the bodhisattva practices the virtue of discipline (śīlāpāramitā) and somebody comes to ask for his three robes (trīcīra) or his bowl (pātra), he is violating a precept if he gives them, for the Buddha has forbidden [making a gift of them].617 On the other hand, if he refuses, he is lacking the virtue of generosity (ādīnapāramitā). Therefore how can exertion practice the five virtues “on all occasions”?

Answer. – The beginning bodhisattva (ādīkārmaṇa-bodhisattva) is unable to practice the five virtues everywhere at the same time.

When the Bodhisattva was practicing the virtue of generosity, he saw a starving tigress, beset by hunger, about to devour her cubs; immediately the Bodhisattva felt great compassion (mahākārmaṇa) and gave her his body.618 The Bodhisattva’s father and mother, grieved for their son’s death, lost their sight, and the tigress, for having killed the Bodhisattva, had to undergo punishment.619 [179c] However, the bodhisattva does not take into account either his parents’ sadness or the punishment reserved for the tigress: he wants only to accomplish a gift and gain merit (punya).

614 The three robes and the alms-bowl were ceremonially given to the bhikṣu in the ordination ritual and were an integral part of the monk’s equipment: Vīsūkha, I, p. 94.
615 Vyāghṛjātaka or the “gift of the body” to the starving tigress; see references in Dvātā, I, p. 143F, and above, p. 723F.
616 This epilogue of the Vyāghṛjātaka is missing in the recensions of the Jātaka, but it is commonplace for parents to become blind as a result of mourning for their son (cf. Chavannes, Contes, IV, p. 91).
The bhikṣu who is observing the precepts conforms to the rules (niyama), small or large, and repulses those who violate the rules. The person who meets with his refusal is angry and vexed, but the bhikṣu only wants to observe the precepts and pays no heed to his anger.

Sometimes the bodhisattva practices ordinary wisdom (saṃvartaprajñā) and withstands his kindly and compassionate feelings (maitrīkaruṇācitta).

[The impostor brahmachīrin exposed by the Bodhisattva].

In a previous lifetime, the Bodhisattva Śākyamuni was crown prince of a great kingdom. His father, the king, had as teacher (guru) a brahmachīrin who did not eat the five grains [i.e., abstained from all food]. Full of respect and faith, the people considered this to be a miracle (aśācaryā), but the prince said to himself: “A man who has four limbs absolutely needs the five grains. If this man does not eat, it is surely to seduce men’s minds and it is not his real custom.” His father and mother said to him: “This zealous man does not touch the five grains; it is extraordinary (adhbhuta). Why are you so foolish as not to respect him?” The prince answered: “Be watchful: before long, this man will betray himself.”

Then the prince looked out for the place where the brahmachīrin lived, went to the forest and asked a cow-herder (gopālaka) there: “What does this man eat?” The cow-herder replied: “During the night, this man eats some butter and that permits him to stay alive.”

Having learned this, the prince returned to the palace and wanted to lead the brahmachīrin to betray himself. He perfumed a blue lotus (udālopa) with all kinds of medicinal herbs (niṇāvīdhānadhū) and next morning, when the brahmachīrin came to the palace and seated himself beside the king, the prince took the lotus and offered it to the brahmachīrin. The brahmachīrin joyfully said to himself: “The king, the queen, the greater and lesser people inside and outside all surround me with attention; only the prince shows respect nor trust; but today he is offering me this beautiful lotus; this is very good.” Then he took the lotus and out of respect for the prince, he brought it to his nose and smelled it. The medicinal vapors contained in the lotus penetrated into his stomach; soon the medicines began to act within his stomach and the brahmachīrin wanted to withdraw. The prince said to him: “Brahmacīrin, you do not eat, why do you want to go to defecate?” The brahmachīrin was seized with nausea and suddenly vomited beside the king. In his vomit, the intact butter betrayed him; the king and the queen understood his deceit. The prince then said: “This man is a real brigand; to make a name for himself, he has deceived the entire kingdom.”

Thus, when he used ordinary wisdom (saṃvartaprajñā), the Bodhisattva was trying only to fulfill wisdom, suspend his kindness and compassion (maitrīkaruṇācitta) and does not fear people’s anger.

When the bodhisattva, on some occasions (sāyaśāla) practices supramundane wisdom (lokottaraprajñā), he has neither the desire (ṛga) nor concern (abhiniveśa) to observe morality (śīla) or to practice generosity (dhāna). Why? Because the donor (dāyaka), the recipient (pratigrāhaka) and the thing given (deya) do not exist; because sin (śīpatti) and merit (anūpatti), anger (krodha) and gentleness (akrodha), exertion (viṣya) and laziness (kausāda), concentratedness of mind (cittasampagraha) and distraction (cittavikṣepa) do not exist (nopolabhyante).

Moreover, when the bodhisattva practices the virtue of exertion, he is faced with unborn (anatman) and unceasing (anitudha), non-eternal (anitya) and non-transitory (anantya), non-suffering (adukkhā) and non-happy (asukha), non-empty (aśūnya) and non-real (asatra), non-atman and non-anatman, non-unique (aneku) and non-different (ananyu), non-existent (asat) and not [180a] nonexistent (anasa) dharmas. He knows perfectly well that all these dharmas [are derived] from the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratiyasamagri), that they are only names and conventions (nāmasamketa) and have no real nature (satyadakṣaṇa). The bodhisattva who has made this examination knows that everything conditioned is deceptive (meye) and his mind rests in the unconditioned (anamāyika); he wants to destroy (niruddha) his mind and holds only nirvāṇa to be [true] salvation (yogakṣema). But then he remembers his original vow (mālāparvānāhānā) and, out of compassion (karuṇa) for beings, he returns to the practice of the dharmas of the bodhisattva and accumulates all the qualities (guna). He says to himself: “Although I know that all dharmas are deceptive, beings do not know this and suffer all the sufferings of the five destinies; therefore I will practice the six virtues (pāramitā) completely.” As reward, he also acquires the thirty-two marks (lakṣana) and the eighty minor (anuruddhājana) marks of the Buddhist path, omniscience (sarvakāya), great loving-kindness (mahākaruṇā), great compassion (mahākaruṇā), the [four] unhindered knowledges (pratigrāhaka), the [eight] liberations (vimokṣa), the ten powers (bala), the four fearlessnesses (vaśīdhyā), the eighteen special attributes (āvivākadharmā), the three sciences (āvivāya) and the innumerable attributes of the Buddhas. As soon as he has attained these attributes, all beings find purity of faith (kṛtadhīvsiruddhaḥ); they can taste the practices, are pleased with the Buddhadharmas and accomplish their task. All of that is due to the virtue of exertion and constitutes the virtue of exertion.

The Buddha said: The bodhisattva’s exertion does not consider either the body or the mind, or that which is done by the body or that which is meditated on by the mind. For him, the body and mind are identical (viṣṇuḥ); he uses the state of buddhahood sought by him to save beings. He does not think of beings as ‘this shore’ (pāra) or the state of buddhahood as ‘the other shore’ (gāruḍa). He rejects everything done by body and mind; he considers it to be the fiction of a dream (svaṇa), as not done. That is called nirvāṇa, and all these forms of exertion are called virtues. Why? Because he knows that all exertions are false. He holds all dharmas to be deceptive and unreal, like a dream (svaṇa) or a magic show (maṇḍya). The equality of all dharmas (sarvadharmasamātā) is reality; there is nothing to be sought for in equalized dharmas; this is why he knows that all exertions are deceptive. But, even though he knows that all exertions are false, he maintains them unflinchingly and that is the true exertion of the bodhisattva.

The Buddha said: For innumerable kalpas, I gave my head, my eyes, my marrow and my brain to beings to satisfy their desires. When I was observing discipline (śīla), patience (ksīnti) and meditation, I lived in the
CHAPTER XXVIII: THE VIRTUE OF MEDITATION (DHYĀNA) (p. 984F)

Sūtra: It is necessary to fulfill the virtue of meditation by being based on the non-existence of distraction and delight (dhyānaapradarśita pariprastavatyavaiśeṣapāramārthaṁ upādāya).

I. NECESSITY FOR MEDITATION.

Sūtra: Question. – The rule for the bodhisattva is to save beings; why does he dwell apart in forests and swamps, solitudes and mountains, preoccupied only with himself and abandoning beings?

Answer. – Although the bodhisattva stays away from beings physically, his mind never abandons them. In solitude (santānīhīna), he seeks concentration (samādhi) and gains true wisdom (bhūtaprajñā) to save all beings. When one takes a drug (bhasajya) for health reasons, one temporarily interrupts family affairs; then when one’s strength has been recovered, one resumes business as before. The rest that the bodhisattva takes is of that nature. He swallows the drug of wisdom (prajñā) by me; rising up into the air, 418 I praised the Buddha Dipumkara in verse. I saw the innumerable Buddhas of the ten directions and then I obtained the real exertions; exertions being equal, I found the equality of mind (citrasamātā) and, as a result of this equality of mind, I found the equality of all dharmas (sarvadharmasamātā).

These various causes and characteristics constitute the virtue of exertion.

617 For the offering to Dipumkara, see above, Tratā, I, p. 248F, 410F n.
618 For this phenomenon of levitation, see Tratā, I, p. 284F, note 2.

619 Cf. Rājavaśantaka (Samyutta, V, p. 342; Tsa a han, T 99, no. 835, k, 30, p. 214a) Rāja cakravatā caturram dīpamān issurāyādibhāpaccaya rajjam kMārtvā kāyasaṃ bhukā paramarmaniṇaṃ sugatim sugaṃ lokam upaṣajjati devānām Tālāvatīmānān sabhavati. “At the dissolution of his body after death, a cakravartin king who has exerted his sovereign power and his royalty over the four continents is reborn in a good destiny, in the god realm in the company of the Tālāvatīma gods.”
a distracted mind (vikṣiptacitta): if the shelter of dhyāna is absent, the wisdom will exist, but its usefulness will be very restricted. It is necessary to have dhyāna so that the true wisdom is produced. This is why the bodhisattva, separating himself from beings and withdrawing into solitude (śāntavihāra), seeks to obtain meditation. It is because meditation is pure that the wisdom is pure also. When the oil (taila) and the wick (vartī) are clean, the light of the lamp is also clean. This is why those who want to attain pure wisdom practice meditation.

Moreover, when one is pursuing worldly business (laukikārtha) but does not apply one’s whole mind to it, the business does not succeed; then how [would one reach] very profound (gambhīra) Buddhist wisdom if one neglects meditation? Meditation is the concentrating of the distracted mind (vikṣiptacittasamgrahana).

Distractions whirl about more easily than the down-feathers of the wild goose (sārasaloman); if their flying off is not restrained, their speed is greater than that of a hurricane; they are harder to contain than a monkey (markata); they appear and disappear more quickly than lightning (vidyut). If the characteristic of the mind is at this point not fixed, those who want to control it would not succeed without dhyāna. Some stanzas say:

Dhyāna is the treasury (kośa) in which wisdom is kept.
It is the field of merit (punyakṣetra) of the qualities (guna).

Dhyāna is the pure water (viśuddhajala) that can wash away the dust of desire (ādīgarajas).

Dhyāna is the diamond armor (vajravarman) that stops the arrows of the afflictions (kleśas).

Even if one has not attained nirupādasamāpatti, one has already partially obtained it.

When one has the diamond concentration (vajrasamādhi) one breaks the mountain of the fetters (saṃyojanagiri), one obtains the power of the six superknowledges (abhiṣikṣa), one is able to save innumerable beings.

A heavy rain can penetrate

The whirlwind of dust that hides the sun;
[In the same way] dhyāna can dissipate
The wind of vitarka-vicāra that distracts the mind.

Finally, dhyāna is hard to obtain (durlabha); it is by means of sustained attentiveness (ekacitta) and unrelenting special effort that the ascetic will succeed in acquiring it. If gods and sages (iśi) do not succeed in obtaining it, what can be said of ordinary people (prthagjana) with lazy minds (kusīdacitta)?

[The second attack of Māra’s daughters]. — When the Buddha was seated in meditation under the nyagrodha tree, the three daughters of Māra questioned him with these stanzas:

[181a] Alone, sitting under a tree
The six organs ever in repose.
Would you have lost a treasure?
Do you not feel the poison of grief and sorrow?
Your face is unequalled in the world
You remain alone, seated, your eyes closed.
Our minds are uncertain:
What are you looking for in this place?

Then the Bhagavat answered with these stanzas:

I gave found the taste of nirvāṇa,
I do not like to dwell among the emotions,
I have chased away the internal and external enemies,
Your father also I have put to flight.

I have found the taste of the Deathless (amṛitarasa),

421 See references above, p. 880F, n. 1.
I am seated in this forest in peace.

Beings are prey to attachments,
I feel compassion for them.

Then the girls felt ashamed and said to themselves: “This man has abandoned pleasures (śīhatāga); he is unshakeable.” At once they disappeared and were not seen again.

II. MEANS OF ACQUIRING MEDITATION\(^{422}\)

Question. – By what means (upāya) is the virtue of meditation (dhyānapāramittā) attained?

Answer. – By eliminating five objects [namely, the five sensual desires], by avoiding five things [namely, the five obstacles] and by using five practices.

A. First Method: Eliminating the sensual desires.\(^{423}\)

How to eliminate the five objects? The five objects of desire (pañcaśīhasaṅgaṇappahana) should be condemned by saying: Alas! Beings are always tortured by the five objects of desire and yet they seek them senselessly. Once obtained, the five objects of desire develop and progress like fever or magic. The five objects of desire are useless like the bone gnawed by a dog; they foment quarreling (vaṇṇapāla) like the meat over which birds are contending; they burn a man like the torch carried in the wind; they harm a man like treading on a poisonous snake; they are futile (ākāśāra) like profit made in a dream; they are as short as a short-term loan.\(^{64}\) Foolish people are attached to the five objects of desire and will arrive at their death without having rid themselves of them; as a result they will suffer immense sufferings. A madman who coveted a beautiful fruit climbed up a tree, ate the fruit and refused to come down; the tree was cut down, and when he fell out of it, he broke his head and died painfully. [The same fate is reserved for the one who covets the five objects of desire]. – Besides, these five objects of desire last only an instant: when the pleasure [that they bring] has disappeared, there is great suffering. These objects are like a knife coated with honey (madhvāpiṇḍāstā): those who lick it covet the sweetness [of the honey] and are unaware of the knife that cuts their tongue. The five objects of desire set man close to the animals; the wise man who knows them can avoid them. Here is an example:

[The upāṣaka tempted by a goddess].\(^{65}\) – An upāṣaka who was the head of a group of merchants earned his livelihood by making distant journeys. Once when he was traveling at night in the cold and the snow, his lost his companions and stopped in a rock cave. At that moment, the mountain goddess (giridevatā) changed into a woman and, approaching him in order to tempt him, spoke this stanza:

> The snowy mountain covers the mountain,
> All the animals have gone away,
> I am alone and without refuge,
> I want only your sympathy.

\(^{181b}\) The upāṣaka covered his ears with his hands and answered with these stanzas:

> Impudent and evil woman
> Who speaks these impure words!
> May you be carried away by water or burned by fire!
> I do not want to hear your voice.

I have a wife, but I do not desire her.
How then would I commit a lustful deed [with you]?
The sense pleasures are not deep, But the suffering and torment [that they bring] is very deep.

\(^{422}\) This section was repeated almost word for word by Tche yi (538-597), the founder of the T’ien t’ai school. In his Siou sê tche kouan tso tchan fa yao, T 1915, k. 1, p. 463b-465b (tr. Beal, Catena, p. 258-267).

\(^{423}\) This paragraph is just an elaboration of canonical facts. For the early Buddhist, the ascetic who truly directed himself towards perfection must banish from his mind all attachment to the five objects of desire. The passage “Pāncā ime bhikkhave kāmagāpasi...” that defines attraction (avasīla) for the desires, their disadvantages (dālavasava) and the means of escaping from them, is found in many places in the scriptures: cf. Majjhima, I, p. 85-87, 92, 454; II, p. 42; III, p. 114; Asāgattara, III, p. 411; IV, p. 415, 430, 449, 458; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 25, p. 584c; Tseing yi a yhan, T 125, k. 12, p. 604c.

\(^{64}\) To the bhikṣu Arjītha, the Buddha compared the desires to a skeleton (yatīkāhāra), a piece of tainted meat (maṃsapācī), a grass fire (tīrīkādā), a trench of glowing charcoal ( parmāléku), a dream (sapātī), beggary (yātīla), the fruit of a poisonous tree (raukāphalā), a slaughterhouse (āsīmaka), a sharpened stake (atātīkā), the head of a snake (upāsasi): cf. Vinaya, II, p. 25; Majjhima, I, p. 130; Asāgattara, III, p. 97. - The Chinese sources also mention this conversation with Arjītha: Tchong a han, T 26, k. 54, p. 763c; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 8, p. 56c; Mo ho seng k’i liu, T 1425, k. 17, p. 367a; Siou fen liu, T 1428, k. 17, p. 682a; Che song liu, T 1435, k. 15, p. 106a; Ken Pen chouo ... p’i nai ye, T 1449, k. 39, p. 840b.

\(^{65}\) Story retold in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 37, p. 200b.
While one is enjoying pleasures, one is not satisfied;
When one is deprived of them, one feels great sadness;
When one does not have them, one wants to have them,
When one has them, one is tormented by them.

The joys of pleasure are rare,
The grief and pain they bring are abundant.
Because of them, men lose their lives
Like butterflies that dash into the lamp.

Hearing these stanzas, the mountain goddess released the man and led him back to his companions.
That man is wise who condemns the desires and is not attached to the five objects of desire, i.e., pleasant colors (ripa), sounds (sabda), perfumes (gandha), tastes (rasa) and tangibles (sparśaya). By seeking meditation (ālaya), one should reject all of that.

1. Rejecting colors.

How to reject colors [taken here in the sense of female beauty]? By considering the damage (upaghāta) done by color. When a man is attached (abhinivāya) to colors, the fire of the fetters (samojana) burns him completely and consumes his body, like a fire that consumes gold and silver. Boiling broth, hot honey, have color and taste, but they burn the body and take the roof off your mouth; one must hurry to reject them: it is the same for attachment to beautiful colors and exquisite tastes.

Furthermore, the fact of loving or detesting depends on the person; color in itself is indeterminate (anīyatā).
How do we know that? When we see a man at a distance whom we like, we have feelings of joy and affection; when we see at a distance an enemy or adversary, we have feelings of anger and hostility; when we see a man who is indifferent to us, we have neither anger nor joy. If we want to expel this joy or this anger, it is necessary to reject bad feelings and colors, abandon them together at the same time. When molten gold burns your body and you want to get rid of it, it is not possible just to want to avoid the fire while keeping the gold; you must avoid both the gold and the fire.

[Bimbisāra at Āmrapāli’s home]. Thus king P’i n p’o so lo (Bimbisāra), for the beauty of a woman, entered an enemy kingdom and stayed alone in the chamber of the courtesan (veisya) A fan p’o lo (Āmrapāli).

A fan p’o lo is a rare and defective transcription for Āmrapāli; see Fan fan yu, T 2110, k 5, p. 1017c. Āmrapāli (in Pāli, Ambāpali) was the rich courtesan of Viśālī who, shortly before the Buddha’s death, went to visit him in great pomp, provided a princely reception for him and gave the Saṅgha the Ambāpāḷavaṇa; this event is told in the sūtras (Dīgha, II, p. 95-98; Te’i-yang han, T 1, k 2, p. 131b-14c; T 5, k 1, p. 163b-164b; T 16, k 5, p. 178c-179b), in the Vinaya (Pāli Vin, I, p. 231-233; Wou fan liu, T 1421, k 20, p. 135b-136a; Sseu fan liu, T 1428, k 40, p. 856a; Ken pen choo... tsa che, T 1451, k 36, p. 385c-387c), and also elsewhere (e.g., Te’hong pen k’i king T 196, k 2, p. 161b). Āmrapāli was born miraculously in the flower of a mango-tree belonging to a brāhmaṇ in Vaiśālī. The brāhmaṇ adopted Āmrapāli and made her a courtesan. Seven kings disputed over the favors of the young lady; Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, even though he was at war with the Ličchāvī of Vaiśālī, surreptitiously entered the city, penetrated into the tower where Āmrapāli was shut up and amused himself with her for a week. Āmrapāli bore him a son who later became the famous physician Jīvaka. Cf. Nai nis’ki yu yin yun king. T 553, p. 896-902 (fr. Chavannes, Contes, III, p. 325-316). Nai nis’ki p’o king. T 554, p. 902-906. Wen ch’i si yu tung te king. T 701, p. 802c-803c. According to the Sarvāstivādins Vinaya, the son of Bimbisāra and Āmrapāli was called Abhaya (Gilgit Manuscripts, III, 2, p. 22), while Jīvaka was the son of Bimbisāra and the wife of a merchant whose name is not given (ibid., p. 23-25). In the Pāli sources, Vimāla-Kondakāña is given as the son of Bimbisāra and Āmrapāli (Theragāthā Comm. I, p. 146). Jīvaka’s father was Abhaya-Rājakumāra – one of Bimbisāra’s sons – and his mother, a courtesan of Rājagṛha called Śālavi (Manoratha, I, p. 399). The meeting between Bimbisāra and Āmrapāli, to which the Mppū alludes here, is told at length in T 553 and 554 (l.c.). The king enters the garden by way of an aqueduct, climbs into the tower, seduces Āmrapāli and, before leaving her, gives her his ring saying that if she has a daughter she can keep her, but if she has a son, she must bring him to the palace along with the ring as a sign of recognition.

A detailed recitation of the meeting is also given in the Chavannes of the Mūlaśūktāvāda Vinaya (cf. Dulwa in Rockhill, Līfī, p. 64, and Schiefner-Ralston, Tibetan Tales, p. 88-89). The original text, found at Gilgit, has been published in Gilgit Manuscripts, III, p. 19-21.

One day, the king of Magadha, Śreniya Bimbisāra, surrounded by his ministers on the palace terrace, said: “Sirs, do you know of a beautiful courtesan?” [The minister] Gopa replied: “Majesty, put aside the others. In Vaiśālī there is a courtesan named Āmrapāli, wonderfully endowed with beauty and youth, learned in the sixty-four arts, worthy of being loved by Your Majesty alone.” Bimbisāra said: “Gopa, if that is so, let us go to Vaiśālī and pay court to her.” Gopa replied: “For a long time the Ličchāvī of Vaiśālī have been the adversaries and enemy of Your Majesty. May they do you no harm!” The king answered: “To men it is befitting to do men’s deeds. Let’s go!” Gopa said: “If that is Your Majesty’s unshakeable wish, let’s go.” The king mounted his chariot and went to Vaiśālī with Gopa where they arrived at the right time. Gopa stayed in the park and Bimbisāra went into Āmrapāli’s house. Just then, a bell began to ring, the inhabitants of Vaiśālī were astonished: “What enemy has entered our city and made the bell ring?” they asked. The shouting grew louder; [hearing it], the king asked Āmrapāli: “My dear, what is that?” – She said: “Your Majesty, they are going to search the houses.” – “Why?” – “Because of Your Majesty.” – “Well, should I flee?” – “Don’t worry, they search my house only every seven days. During these seven days, amuse yourself here, make love, pay court; at the end of seven days I will know that the time has come [to send you away].” The king amused himself with her, made love to her and paid court to her, so much so that Āmrapāli became...
Why condemn sounds (śabda)? The nature of sounds is instability; once heard, they vanish. The madman (mūḍha) who does not know that sound is characterized by impermanence (anitavyata), change (paritamatra) and disappearance (abhūti), finds a futile pleasure in sounds (ghosa) and, when the sound has disappeared, he remembers it and is attached to it.

[The kinnar and the five hundred rṣis): Thus five hundred rṣis lived on the mountain. A tāchen t’o lo nia (kinnar) was bathing in a pool in the Snow Mountains (Himavat) and when they heard her song, the rṣis lost their meditation (āhāra): the rapture of their mind was so strong that they could not control it, as though a great wind were blowing in the trees in the forest.

[181c] Hearing this song of subtle beauty in sweet (nrūla), tender (taruṇa) and pure (viśuddha) accents, they had a bad experience and were unable to control the violence of their minds. In the present lifetime, they lost their qualities (guna) and in the following lifetime, they fell into a bad destiny (durgati).

The sage considers that sound arises and ceases from moment to moment (kuśāyāsamatva) and disappears (abhaṇekha) without any energy or energy itself (sabdamārga) and change (dhyāṇamārga), the rapture of their mind was so strong that they could not control it, as though a great wind were blowing in the trees in the forest.

The same story occurs in the Kīcāu tsa p’i yu king, T 206, no. 6, k. 1, p. 511c-512a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 358-360); Tchong king sian t’o yu, T 208, no. 10, k. 1, p. 533c-534a (tr. Chavannes, Contes, II, p. 87-88); King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 22, p. 121a-b.

Why condemn smells (ghiḍha)? Some claim that being attached to smells is a slight fault; but attachment to smells opens the door to the fetters (samojana). Even if one has maintained discipline (śīla) for a hundred years, one moment is enough to violate it.

[Udayana and the five hundred rṣis): Out of attachment to female beauty (rūpasaṅga), king Udayana (in Pāṇini, āṇa) spoke to his teacher, who became a nāraka (in Pāṇini, āṇa) and when his teacher left, the arhat entered the palace of the king.

For all these reasons, desire for colors (rūpakāmagra) is condemned.

2. Rejection of pleasant sounds.

pregnant. Then she announced to Bimbisāra: “Your Majesty, I am pregnant!” Bimbisāra gave her a robe and a ring marked with his seal, saying: “If it is a girl, she will belong to you; if it is a boy, you will clothe him in this robe, fasten this ring around his neck and send him to me.” The king went out, mounted his chariot with Gopa and returned. At once the bell was silent; the inhabitants of Vaiśālī said: “The enemy has gone. Let us chase after him!”

Five hundred Licchavi armed with a strap protecting their left arm (gudhā) and finger-guards (śīngalāśīna) set out to chase Bimbisāra. Gopa gave them and said: “Your Majesty, the Licchavi of Vaiśālī are coming. Will Your Majesty do combat with them or drive the chariot?”

The king answered: “I am a little tired, I will drive the chariot and you do combat with them.” Gopa engaged in battle with them. The Vaiśālī inhabitants recognized him and said: “That is a demon-man. Let’s go away!” They turned around, went back to Vaiśālī and made the following decision: “Sirs, we must take vengeance on these sons of Bimbisāra.”

Episode borrowed from the Vibhāṣa (cf. Pīḷ p’o cha, T 1545, k. 61, p. 314b-c; A p’i t’an p’o cha, T 1546, k. 32, p. 237b) and repeated in King liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 39, p. 175c-176b. – Another day, walking in his park (saṃyāna), Udayana (in Pāṇini, āṇa) saw birds with clipped wings. The king saw them and asked who they were. They answered: “We are the delicious perfumes; they all lost their miraculous power and fell down on the mountain, unable to fly again, like birds with clipped wings. The king saw them and asked who they were. They answered: “We are perfumes.” The king asked: “Have you attained the basic absorption (maulasamāpatti) called ‘place of neither unconsciousness nor non-unconsciousness’ (naisvāyamālsamāyikātāna)?” The rṣis replied that they had not obtained it. The king asked if they had attained the first dhyāna. They replied: “We had attained it once but now we have lost it.” The king became angry and said to them: “Men who have not renounced desire, why are you looking at the women in my palace? That is a demon-man. Let’s go away!” They turned around, went back to Vaiśālī and made the following decision: “Sirs, we must take vengeance on these sons of Bimbisāra.”

3. Rejection of pleasant smells.

Why condemn smells (ghiḍha)? Some claim that being attached to smells is a slight fault; but attachment to smells opens the door to the fetters (samojana). Even if one has maintained discipline (śīla) for a hundred years, one moment is enough to violate it.

[Udayana and the five hundred rṣis): Out of attachment to female beauty (rūpasaṅga), king Yeou t’ien (Udayana) cut off the hands and feet of five hundred rṣis.

For all these reasons, desire for colors (rūpakāmagra) is condemned.
The śrāmaṇera received some rice and ate it; moreover, he saw a nāga whose body was of perfect beauty and with unequalled perfume and grace; his mind became passionately attached to her and he made this vow: "May I take the place of this nāga and live in this palace." The nāga said [to the teacher]: "In the future, don’t bring this śrāmaṇera." When the śrāmaṇera returned, he applied himself one-pointedly (ekacittena) to practicing generosity (dāna) and observing discipline (śīla), only praying that he would become a nāga soon according to his vow. One day when he was circumambulating (pradakṣitā) the temple (caitya), some water appeared under his feet; then he understood that he definitely was about to become a nāga; he went to the shore of a great lake at the place where his master had previously entered [to go to the nāga]; he covered his head with his kāyika and entered the water; he died immediately and changed into a great nāga; because his merits were great, he killed the other nāga and the whole lake became red with blood.

A little later before this had happened, his teacher and the entire community (sauṅgha) had blamed him; but the śrāmaṇera had said: "My resolve is fixed and the various marks [that I am about to have a nāga’s body] have already appeared." His teacher and the whole community had gone to the lake to see him [throw himself in].

Such is the reason that one is attached to smells.

---

431 As Chavannes has noted, it was from the oozing of his hands that the śrāmaṇera of the Divyavadīna, p.346, noticed that he was becoming a nāga.
and blamed me for stealing your perfume!” The goddess of the pool answered: “That [182a] common evil man is always wallowing in the stench of sins and stains up to his head in impurity; I do not talk to him. But you are an honest man practicing meditation; however, by being attached to perfumes, you destroy the good that is in you; that is why I reproach you. If there is a black spot or some dirt on white immaculate cloth, everybody notices it. But this bad man is like a black spot on black cloth which nobody notices. Why question him?”

It is for all these reasons that the desire for perfumes (gandhakāmaguna) is condemned.

4. Rejecting pleasant tastes.

Why condemn tastes (rasa)? One must reason [and say]: Just by coveting exquisite tastes I will suffer all the sufferings; they will pour molten copper (kuṭṭhāśīrṣa) into my mouth, I will swallow balls of burning iron (ādānāyogada). If I do not consider the nature of foods, feelings of gluttony will be established in me and I will fall into the level of the impure insects (ātucikīrṇa).

[The śrāṇamāra who loved cream].

There was a śrāṇamāra who loved cream and was always thinking about it; each time the generous donors (āṅgipati) distributed cream to the community (sangha), he received the remaining portion; in his mind, the love [of cream] was deeply planted and his joy never went away. At the end of his life, he was reborn [as an insect] in a cream-pitcher. The teacher of this śrāṇamāra had attained the state of arhat. One day when the community was sharing some cream, he said to [the bhikṣu]: “Gently, gently! Do not hurt the śrāṇamāra who loved cream.” The monks said to him: “That’s an insect; why are you talking to us about the śrāṇamāra who loved cream?” The teacher answered: “This insect was once my śrāṇamāra, always coveting the remainder of the cream; this is why he has taken birth in this pitcher.” The insect was in the portion of milk which the teacher had received; he showed himself and the teacher said to him: “Cream lover, why have you come?” Then he took the cream and gave it to him.

[The crown prince who was poisoned by fruit].

In a kingdom ruled by king Yue jin (Candrabhāga), there was a crown prince (śīna) who loved exquisite tastes; each day the king’s gardener sent him fine fruits. There was a big tree in the garden at the top of which a bird was raising her chicks. This bird always flew full speed to the Perfumed Mountain (Gandhārīḍanā), took a fruit of delicious flavor and [returned] to give it to her chicks who, in arguing over it, let one of the fruits fall to the ground. Next morning the gardener noticed it and, finding it strange, brought it to the king. The king admired the perfume and the extraordinary color of the fruit; the crown prince saw it and asked for it; the king, who loved his son, gave it to him as a gift. The prince ate it and appreciated its flavor so much that he wanted to have one every day.

The king called the gardener and asked where the fruit came from. The gardener said: “This fruit was not planted; I found it on the ground; I don’t know where it came from.” The prince groaned, wept and refused to eat. The king reprimanded the gardener and commanded him to find another one. The gardener went to the place where he had found the fruit, noticed the bird’s nest and saw the mother arriving with a fruit [of the kind in question] in her beak. He hid in the top of the tree with the idea of taking away the fruit and, when the mother appeared, he took the fruit from her and brought it [to the king]. He did this every day. The mother bird, angry with the gardener, gathered on the Perfumed Mountain a poisonous fruit the perfume, taste and color of which were completely similar to the previous fruit. The gardener carried away this new fruit and offered it to the king; the king gave it to the crown prince but hardly had he finished eating it [182b] than the flesh of his body rotted and he died.

The taste for flavors is such that, [to satisfy it], one risks one’s life. For all these reasons, attachment to tastes is condemned.

5. Rejection of pleasant touchables.

Why condemn touch (sparśavāyu)? Touch is a flame that gives rise to all the fetters (samsyajana); it is the root that binds the mind. Why? The other four instincts [the need to see, to hear, to feel and to taste] are each limited to a part [of the body], but the instinct [to touch] is spread over the entire body consciousness (bhūtānyākha); its place of arising (khyātyākhaṇa); its place of arising being vast, it produces a lot of passions (saṅgīga), and the attachment to which it leads is tenacious. How do we know that? If a person, attached to beauty [of the body], contemplates the body’s impurities, which are thirty-six in number, he experiences feelings of disgust (nīvedacittā); on the other hand, if he is attached to [pleasant] touch, it feels good to know impurity, he does not covet sweetness in the least: to consider the impurity of touching is of no use; this is why this instinct is so tenacious.

Furthermore, since it is so difficult to renounce it, one is always committing grave sins because of it and one will fall into the hells (nirvāṇa). There are two kinds of hell, namely, cold water and burning fire. In these two kinds of hell, one will suffer punishment as a result of bodily touch; the poison of the pain will take ten thousand forms. Touch is called the place of great darkness (paritāna). If I do not consider the nature of foods, feelings of gluttony will be established in me and I will fall into the level of the impure insects (ātucikīrṇa).

The king of the Buddha, mother of Rāhula, is called called in the Pāli sources Rāhulamātā (Vinn., I, p. 63), Bhuddakaccānī (Buddhavamsa, XXVI, 15; Mahāvamsa, II, 24), Yasodharā (Buddhavamsa Com., p. 245), Bimbādāvari (Jātaka, II, p. 392; Sumanasala, II, p. 422) and Bimbabandarī (Jātaka, VI, p. 478). She was born on the same day as the Buddha (Jātaka, I, p. 54) and married him at the age of sixteen (Jātaka, I, p. 58).

432 Reproduced in the King Liu yi siang, T 2121, k. 22, p. 121b.
433 Compare the Kimpalaṅkājātaka, Pāli Jātaka no. 85, I, p. 367: Certain members of a caravan, despite the warnings of the bodhisattva, ate fruit from the kimpala tree which they mistook for mangoes; they were poisoned and died, victims of their own gluttony.
The different lives tell how the Buddha succeeded in winning the hand of his future wife in the course of a tournament where he showed his skill in the arts (śilpaṃsādāsana); in these sources, the Buddha’s wife is designated sometimes by the name of Yaśodharī (Fang kuang ta tchouang yen king, T 187, k. 4, p. 563c; Yün kouo king, T 189, k. 2, p. 629b; Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 13, p. 712c; Tchong hsiu li tchou ti king, T 190, k. 4p, p. 942c; Buddhacarita, II, v. 26; Mahāvastu, II, p. 48 seq.), sometimes as Gopā or Gopī (Śākyamuni pen k’i king, T 184, k. 1, p. 465b; T’ai tseu jsei ying pen k’i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 475c; P’ou yao king, T 186, k. 3, p. 500c; Yün ts’ou ti pen k’i king, T 188, p. 619a; Lailitavistara, p. 142 seq.). The marriage ceremony and the retinue are depicted on the Gandhāra monuments; cf. Foucher, Art Gréco-bouddhique, I, p. 334-337.

According to the present passage of the Mppē, Śākyamuni has two wives, Yaśodhara and Gopā. — The Mulāsārv. Yün attributes three wives to him, Yaśodhara, Gopā and Mṛgajī, each surrounded by 20,000 courtesans (Ken pen chouo ... p’i nai ye, T 1442, k. 18, p. 720x12(13); P’o seng che, T 1450, k. 3, p. 1184b24-26). The same Vinaya tells the circumstances in which Śākyamuni married them: 1) He himself chose Yaśodhara from all the young girls of his clan (T 1450, k. 3, p. 111b; Rockhill, Life, p. 20); 2) He stopped his chariot under Gopā’s terrace; seeing this, Śuddhodana took Gopā and gave her to his son (T 1450, k. 3, p. 112c; Rockhill, Life, p. 21-22); 3) Seven days before his Great Departure, when he went to the palace, Mṛgajī (Kisgotamini in the Pili sources, Mṛgī in the Mahāvastu); cf. Traut, I, p. 488 F n.s), spoke the famous stanza to him: Niratā nānasā mālit; thanking her, Śākyamuni threw her his necklace; seeing this, Śuddhodana took Mṛgajī and gave her to his son (T 1450, k. 3, p. 114b; Rockhill, Life, p. 23-24).

In regard to the conception and birth of Rāhula, at least three different traditions are distinguished: 1) According to a tradition represented by the Pili Itakas, I, p. 62 and the Buddhacarita, II, 46, Yaśodhara gave birth to Rāhula seven days before the Great Departure, and Śākyamuni came to kiss his son before leaving. After his six years of austerity and his enlightenment, when the Buddha returned to Kapilavastu, his son was seven years old.

2) According to a tradition attributed to the Mahāzhāngikhas by the Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 55, p. 908c₃, Śākyamuni had his first marital relations with Yaśodhara only seven days before the Great Departure (Ken pen chouo ... p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 4, p. 115a; Rockhill, Life, p. 24, and Rāhula was conceived just before his father left (Mahāvastu, II, p. 159). Yaśodhara bore Rāhula in her womb for six years (Mahāvastu, III, k. 172; T’ai tseu jsei ying pen k’i king, T 185, k. 1, p. 475a20; Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 55, p. 908a14-15; Tsu pao tsang king, T 202, no. 117, k. 10, p. 490b26; Mo ho seng k’i liu, T 1425,k. 17, p. 365c12-16), and gave birth to him the very night that the Buddha reached enlightenment (Ken pen chouo ... p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 5, p. 124c; Rockhill, Life, p. 32) - According to this latter tradition, the Buddha did not return to visit his family at Kapilavastu that year, but six years later; twelve years therefore had passed since his departure, namely, the six years of austerity and the six years following the enlightenment (Ken pen chouo ... p’o seng che, T 1450, k. 12, p. 159a4-9); Thus Rāhula was six years old when he first saw his father and was ordained by him (Fo pen hing tai king, T 190, k. 55, p. 906b26-28; Mppē, T 1509, k. 17, p. 182c).

3) Finally, according to another tradition, attributed to the Kāśyapīyas and to other teachers by T 190, k. 55, p. 908c₃; 909b24, Rāhula was two years old when his father left home to devote himself to austerity and fifteen years old when he returned to Kapilavastu. Rāhula thus had the customary fifteen years of age when he became a śrāmanera.

[1. Yaśodharī’s lengthy pregnancy] – Moreover, in the Lo heou lo mou pen cheng king... woman made a little cake (modula) of unique nature and brought it to the palace. Rāhula's mother took it, and before all the palace people, put it into Rāhula's hands, saying to him: "My child, take this cake and give it to your father." The Buddha, endowed with omniscience, understood in advance: he knew that by giving birth to Rāhula, Yāsodharā had been attacked; he wanted to put a stop that very day to the slander. Knowing that, the Bhagavat produced by metamorphosis (nirvīrana) five hundred individuals looking exactly like himself. Holding the cake in his hands, Rāhula passed by all these, not offering them anything, but he stopped in front of the (true) Buddha and gave him the cake. The Buddha accepted it, then gave it back to Rāhula who took it and swallowed it. The Buddha knew that after having eaten it, he would be under the influence of a spell. (Actually), when the Buddha arose from his seat and went away, Rāhula went with him. The courtesans wanted to prevent him from leaving the palace, but Rāhula wept with anger; he insisted that he would go with the Buddha. On leaving, the Buddha thought: "I know that Rāhula will not take up another existence (punabhāsana), that he will realize the fruits of the (Noble) Path (āryupala) and that he will not want to live in the world." Knowing that, the Buddha took him away with him.

Thanks to his earlier vows (pūrpavipākhāna), Rāhula had been able to recognize the Bhagavat in the midst of the five hundred buddhas; he did not want to leave him. Then king Siddhodhana, the palace people, the retinue and all the Śākyas, seeing this prodigy, were filled with respect for Yāsodharā. They understood the futility of the blame they had thrown on her previously. Free of all blame, Yāsodharā was satisfied.

The visit of the Buddha to Yāsodharā is represented on a stupa discovered near the village of Goli, (Guntur District): cf. T. N. Ramadhandran, Buddhīr Sculpures from a Stupa Near the Village of Goli, Bull Mus. Madras, a929, p. 5-7, pl. 3(B). Rāhula, easily recognized by his head-dress, is represented in three times in the same sculpture: on the right, he is respectfully receiving his mother's orders; in the center, he carefully carries in his right hand the 'cake potion' (modula) that Yāsodharā intended for the Buddha; on the left, he goes to welcome the Buddha who, clothed in the Roman manner with a nimbus and exhibiting the abhayamudrā, is at the gate of the women's quarters. According to the interpretation of Ramacharan, the Rāhula of the center panel was playing ball; but the round object he holds seems rather to be the modula that he was told to offer to his father according to the story of the Mahāvastu and the Mīlasārv. Vin. (l. c.)

(Rāhulamātṛijātaka): The Bodhisattva Śākyamuni had two wives: the first was called K'iu p'i ye (Gopiya or Gopā), the second Ye chou t'o lo (Yāsodhara) or Ye chou t'o lo hao lu mou (Yāsodharā Rāhulamātī). Gopi, being sterile (bandhya), had no children. Yāsodharā knew she was pregnant (garbhīhī) the same night that the Bodhisattva left home (pravrajīta). After his departure, the Bodhisattva practiced asceticism (dāsakaraṛud) for six years; Yāsodharā was pregnant also for six years without giving birth. The Śākyas asked her: "The Bodhisattva has left home; whose fruit are you bearing?" Yāsodharā said: "I have not committed adultery; the son that I bear in my womb is truly the descendant of the crown prince (Śākyamuni)." The Śākyas continued: "Why are you so long in giving birth?" She answered that she did not know [the reason]. In public discussion, the Śākyas asked the king (Siddhodhana) to inflict a suitable punishment on her. Gopā said to the king: "I would like you to absolve Yāsodharā; I have always stayed with her, I am her witness (sāksa) and I know that she has not committed any sin. Wait until her son is born and you will see whether or not he resembles his father; it will not be too late to punish her." Then the king treated Yāsodharā with indulgence.

In the meanwhile, the Buddha had completed his six years of austerities; the very night that he became Buddha, Yāsodharā gave birth to Rāhula. Seeing that he resembled his father, the king was overjoyed and forgot his anger; he said to his ministers: "Although my son has gone, today he has a son completely like him." Although Yāsodharā had avoided the shame of punishment, her bad reputation had spread in the kingdom; she sought to wash way this bad name. When Śākyamuni, having attained Buddhadhood, returned to K'iu p'i lo p'o (Kapilavastu) to convert the Śākyas, king Siddhodhana and Yāsodharā invited him at once to come to dine at the palace. Then Yāsodharā took a poison-cake (mōda) of a hundred flavors and gave it to Rāhula to offer to the Buddha. [182c] At the same time, by his miraculous power (ādihābāli), the Buddha created five hundred arhats who completely resembled. Rāhula, then seven years old, took the potion-cake, went directly to the Buddha and respectfully offered it to the Bhagavat [thus proving that he discovered his father among the five hundred arhats completely like the Buddha]. Then the Buddha suspended his miraculous power and the five hundred [bhikṣus] resumed their initial aspect: they were seated with empty bowls (āhanātāpārenas), whereas the bowl of the Buddha was the only one that contained a potion-cake. Yāsodharā said to the king: "This proves that I have not committed sin." Yāsodharā then asked the Buddha why she had been pregnant for six years.

[2. Jātaka explaining this prolonged pregnancy].636 – The Buddha said to her:

In a previous lifetime, your son, Rāhula, was the king of a country. At that time, a yāni possessing the five superknowledges (abhiññā) entered his kingdom and said to the king: "The king has the duty of punishing thieves; I want him to punish me." The king asked: "What fault have you committed?" The yāni replied: "I have entered your kingdom and have stolen (adittādāna); I drank water belonging to you unceremoniously and I took a willow twig belonging to you." The king said: "But I would have given them to you; what 636 This well-known Jātaka appears in the Mo lo sen g k'i lus, T. 1425, k. 17, p. 365c12-15, where the king who is accused of theft is called Li p'o (75 and 85 and 6). It is told at length but without precise details in the Lieou tou tsi, T. 2121, k. 7, p. 34a. The most detailed version occurs in two closely related works, the Mahāvastu, III, p. 172-175, and the Fo pen hing tou ti, T. 190, k. 55, p. 907a-908a (tr. Beal, Romantic Legend, p. 360-363). Śālaya and Candras were sons of a brāhman-king of Mithulā (called Jen t'ien, Manusayadeva (? in T. 190). The throne becoming vacant, Śālaya gave the kingdom to his brother and became a hermit. But having made the vow not to take anything, even a drop of water that was not given to him, one day he inadvertently violated his vow by drinking the water in the vase of an ascetic. Considering himself to be a thief, he demanded first from his disciples, then from his brother, the punishment he thought he deserved. Candras, in order to please him and to rid him of his scruples made him live for six days in an aśoka forest where he was given the most delicate of food. At the end of six days, he proclaimed a general amnesty that freed Śālaya. Rāhula was at that time Candras, the Buddha was Śālaya (summarized by E. Smart).

To explain the six years of bearing Rāhula, the Mīlasārv. Vin. resorts to the same Jātaka, but changes the names of the individuals: cf. Ken pen chouo... yao che, T. 1448, k. 16, p. 77c, which shows striking resemblance to Chavannes, Contes, no. 79, and the Mīlasārvījātaka of the Pāli Jātaka, IV, p. 376 seq.
crime have you committed? When I came to the throne, I gave this water and these willow branches to be used by everyone.” The rishi answered: “Although the king made this gift, I fear that my crime has not been suppressed thereby; I would like to undergo the punishment today in order not to have to suffer it later.”

The king answered: “If you absolutely insist, stay here a little and wait for me until I come back.” The king went back to his palace and stayed there for six days without coming out; the rishi stayed in the king’s garden and he was hungry and thirsty for six days, while saying to himself that the king did well to punish him thus. At the end of six days, the king came out of his palace and apologized to the rishi: “I forgot about you; please do not hold a grudge against me.” For this reason, the king suffered the punishment of the three evil destinies (duṣrgati) for five hundred lifetimes and, for five hundred [other] lifetimes, he remained in his mother’s womb for six years. This is how it was proved that Yásodhārā had not committed any crime.

347 The Mahāvamsa, III, p. 143, tells that Yásodhārā put on all her jewels to persuade the Buddha to remain in the world, but to no avail. In the Milindavā, Vin. (T 1450), k. 12, p. 160; Dīwāna, in Rockhill, Life, p. 56-57), Yásodhārā, Gopū, Mrgājī and their 60,000 followers appeared before the Buddha in all their finery when the latter came to the palace to beg. The Blessed One accomplished all sorts of miracles in their presence and established them in the faith. Gopū, Mrgājī and the 60,000 courtesans entered the Path, but Yásodhārā, blinded by her love, still hoped to reconquer her former husband. A little later, however, she became converted, entered the order and became an arhatī.

780

438 The story of the hermit unicorn, Rājaśī or Ėkaśī, seduced by a maiden (princess Nālīnī, the courtesan Śālī or the goddess Amaśju) belongs to universal and Indian folklore. The characteristic feature of the story is that of the victorious woman, perched on the back of the asetic she has seduced. Without specifying the many variations of the various versions of the story, we limit ourselves to the main sources.

Śanskrit sources: Mahāvamsa, III, p. 143-152; Buddhacarita, IV, v. 39; Avadānakalpadrāta no. 65 (III, p. 413-455): Ėkaśīgāṇīṭūḍa.

Buddhist iconography: Cunningham, Bāhūt, pl. 26 (7); Marshall-Foucher, Mom. de la Si, p. 225; Beal, II, pl. 27 (1); Foucher, Représentations des Jātakas, Mémoires concernant l’Asie orientale, III, p. 25 and pl. II (3 and 4); IV (3); Id., Deux jātakas sur la rose., aux Bigrum, India Antiques, p. 17-130; Fergusson, Tree and Serpent Worship, pl. 86; Ecke-Demouville, Twin Pagodas, pp. 64 and pl. 41 (2).

[The young man] understood the great holy books of the eighteen types; he practiced meditation (dhyāna); he practiced the four superknowledges (abhiññā). One day when he was climbing the mountain, there was a heavy rain; the muddy slippery ground was not suitable for his feet and he fell, breaking his container (read taṅkha; 167 and 9) and his foot; very annoyed, with his container full of water, he uttered a magical spell for it to stop raining; by the effects of the hermit’s merits, the nāgas stopped the rain. As there was no further rain, the five grain crops and the five fruits were no longer produced; the people were at the end of their resources and had no further means of livelihood.

The king of Vāraṇaśi was angry and worried; he commanded his [183b] ministers to meet and discuss the matter of the rain. In the discussion, a wise man said: “I have heard that, on the hermits’ mountain, there is a recluse called Unicom (Ekaśīrīga): because of his clumsy feet, he fell while climbing the mountain and hurt his foot; in his anger, he uttered a magical spell commanding it to stop raining for twelve years.” The king thought and said: “If it is not going to rain for twelve years, my kingdom and the people are lost.” Then the king published an appeal [to his people, saying]: “I will give half of my kingdom to anyone who can make this hermit lose his five superknowledges (abhiññā) and become an ordinary subject of mine.”

There was, at that time in the kingdom of Vāraṇaśi, a courtesan named Chanī (Śānti) of unequalled beauty; she came in answer to the king’s appeal. She asked people whether or not [Ekaśīrīga] was a man; they answered that he was the son of a hermit. The courtesan said: “If he is a man, I can get rid of him.”

Having spoken thus, she took a golden dish which she filled with fine precious objects and said to the king: “I will sit astride this hermit’s back.” Then the courtesan got five hundred chariots in which she placed five hundred lovely women, and five hundred chariots drawn by deer in which she placed all kinds of magical cakes made with medicinal herbs; she painted them in different colors so that they looked like various fruits; she also brought all kinds of strong liquor which, in color and taste, were like water. [She and her companions] dressed in garments of tree bark and grass and wandered through the trees in the forest like hermits. They made themselves leafy huts (paranālā) near the hermit’s dwelling and stayed there.

The recluse Ekaśīrīga, having gone for a walk, saw them; all the women came out to meet him and offered him lovely flowers and perfumes; the latter was happy with them; with sweet words and respectful expressions the women asked about the health of the hermit; they took him into a room, seated him on a fine soft bed, gave him some of the clear liquor which they called pure water and some of the cakes which they said were fruit. When the hermit had eaten and drunk as much as he wanted, he said to the women: “Since I was born, I have never found fruit so good and water so excellent as this.” The women said to him: “We do good with all our heart; this is why heaven grants us our wishes and we find these fruits and water.” The hermit said to the women: “Why is the color of your skin so gleaming and so fresh?” They answered: “It is because we always eat these good fruits and drink this excellent water.” The women said to the hermit: “Why not settle down and live here?” He answered: “Indeed, I could live here.” The women invited him to bathe with them and he accepted that also. The women’s hands touched him gently and his mind was moved thereby. Then he bathed in the company of these lovely women and, as lust had developed in him, he committed lustful actions with them. He immediately lost his superknowledges (abhiññā) and the heavens let fall a great rain for seven days and seven nights. [The courtesan] allowed him to give himself up to pleasure, to eat and drink, for seven days. At the end of this time, the liquor and the provisions were entirely used up, and they substituted mountain water and the fruit of the trees for them; but the taste was not at all pleasant and [the recluse] demanded the food that he had [183c] been given previously. [The courtesan] answered: “There is no more; now we will go and gather some; not far from here there is a place where we can find some.” — “As you wish”, said the hermit. Then they went together. Knowing that the city was not far away, the courtesan lay down on the road, saying: “I am at the end of my strength and I cannot walk any further.” The hermit said to her: “If you cannot walk, get up on my back, I will carry you.”

Previously the woman had sent a letter to alert the king, saying: “O king, you will see what my wisdom can do.” The king ordered his chariot, went out and saw the sight. He asked [the courtesan]: “How did you manage to do it?” She said: “I achieved this result by means of the power of my skilful means (upādā); there is nothing that I cannot do.” The king commanded that the hermit remain in the city; he made him abundant offerings and treated him respectfully; he satisfied his five wishes and named him prime minister.

When the hermit had lived in the city for some days, his body became emaciated; he thought of the joys of meditation (dhyānāsukha) and was weary of worldly desires. The king asked him why he was unhappy and why he was becoming thin. The hermit replied: “Although I enjoy the five objects of desire, I am always thinking of my forest retreat and the place frequented by the hermits; I cannot detach my mind from that.” The king said to himself: “I am doing violence to this man; this violence makes him unhappy; his suffering is extreme and he will die. My original purpose was to put an end to the calamity of drought and now I have attained it. Why should I still do violence to him?” Then he sent him away. [The recluse] returned to his mountain and thanks to his exertion, he soon recovered his five superknowledges (abhiññā).

The Buddha said to the bhikṣu: “The hermit Ekaśīrīga was myself; the courtesan was Yasodharā. At that time, she led me astray with a cake (modaka) and, as I had not cut the bonds, I was seduced by her. Again today she wanted to seduce me by means of the cake with medicinal herbs, but she did not succeed.”

For this reason, we know that slight attachments (uṭkānaṇḍasparśanā) can trouble recluses and, all the more so, worldly people (prīthagāna). For these reasons, subtle desires are condemned.

B. Second method: removing the obstacles.

---

485 In order to succeed in the first stage of meditation, it is not enough to keep way from desires (svācī’s eva kāmo); it is also necessary to stay away from bad dharmas (svācīva akāsena bhāvanāḥ); the latter constitute the five obstacles to dhyānā, which are envy, malevolence, laziness, torpor, excitement and regret, doubt. Cf. Diṭṭha, I, p. 71; 246; II, p. 500; III, p.234; Majjhima, I, p. 144;Samyutta, V, p. 60; Āṅguttara, III, p. 16: Pañca ni ṣvarūpāni: kāma cchandaṁ saraññam, uṇḍ ṭhītānādhiṁ saraññam, uṭkānaṇḍasparśanāṁ bhāvanās. – A canonical passage endlessly repeated, praises the complete freedom of mind of the ascetic who has destroyed these obstacles: cf. Diṭṭha, I, p. 71; Majjhima, I, p. 181, 269, 274, 347; III, p. 136; Āṅguttara, III, p. 92; IV, p. 437; V, p. 207.
Having thus condemned the five sensual desires, it is necessary to remove the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa).

1. Removing envy.

The person who is prey to envy (kāmacchanda) strays far from the Path. Why? Because envy is the basis for all sorts of worries and chaos. If the mind is attached to envy, there is no way to approach the Path. To remove this envy, some stanzas say:

How can a monastic (mārgapravīṣṭa), modest and reserved,
Carrying the begging-bowl and benefiting beings,
Still tolerate impure envy
And be plunged into the five attachments?

The soldier clothed in armor, bearing a sword and a rod,
Who withdraws and flees from the enemy,
Is nothing but a coward,
Scorned and ridiculed by everyone.

The bhikṣu in the rôle of a mendicant
Has cut his hair and put on the kāṣaya,
But still allows himself to be led by the horses of the five attachments,
He too collects nothing but mockery.

If a famous man
Richly dressed and with body adorned
Went to beg for clothes and food,
He would be mocked by people.

If a bhikṣu who has renounced adornment,
Scorns fashion and concentrates his mind
And, nevertheless, seeks sensory pleasures,
He too would gather only mockery.

Having renounced the five sense pleasures,
Having rejected them, having refused to think about them,
Why would he follow after them again
Like a madman who returns to his own vomit?

The greedy man
Ignores his earlier vows;
He no longer distinguishes between the beautiful and the ugly;
Drunkenly he hurls himself into desire (tryaṇa).

Modesty (ḥri), restraint (apātriyya) and other respectable qualities,
All of that has disappeared all at once;
He is no longer respected by wise people
And is visited only by fools.

Desires provoke suffering when they are sought out,
Fear when they are possessed,
Resentment and grief when they are lost;
They bring not a moment of happiness.

Such are the torments of desire!
How can one escape them?

The Māpi develops these ideas here. They will be found in Viśhālakṣaṇa, T 1545, k. 38, p. 194c; k. 48, p. 240c; cf. Kośa, V, p. 98-100, a better explanation. For the Pāli sources, consult Dhammasaṅghaṇī, p. 204-205; Atthasālinī, p. 380 seq.; S. Z. Aung, Compendium, p. 172.
By acquiring the happiness of dhyāna and samāpatti:
Then one is no longer deceived.

Attachment to sensual pleasures is insatiable,
How can one put an end to them?
If one acquires the meditation of the repulsive (āśubhāvāvāna),
These [greedy] minds disappear by themselves.

Attachment to desire is unconscious;
How can one become aware of them?
By considering old age, sickness and death;
Then one succeeds in getting out of the four bottomless pits.

It is difficult to reject desires;
How can one escape from them?
If one can be pleased with the good dharmas
These desires disappear by themselves.

Desires are difficult to undo;
How can one loosen them?
By considering the body and perceiving its true nature;
Then one is tied by nothing.

Considerations such as these
Can extinguish the fire of the desires:
The jungle fire
Cannot withstand a heavy rain.

It is for all these reasons that one removes the obstacle of greed (kāmacchandanīvaraṇa).

2. Removing malevolence.

The obstacle of malevolence (vyāpādanīvaraṇa) is the origin of the loss of all good dharmas (kulaiddharmahāni), the cause of falling into the unfortunate destinies (durgati), the enemy of all happiness (sukha), the abductor of good minds (kulaucitta), the reservoir of all kinds of harmful speech (pāruṣavyādā).

The Buddha addressed the following stanzas to a wicked disciple:

You must think and reflect
On the obscene and vicious [character] of conception, [184b] On the dark suffering of the stay in the womb,
On the hardships that accompany birth.

Thinking about all that, the person
Who does not pacify his wrath [toward people]
Would, by all rights, be considered
An unaware individual.

If the retribution for wrongs did not exist
And if they were free of all blame,
People would still have plenty to complain about.
How much more so if they are struck by painful punishment?

By considering old age, sickness and death
Which nobody can avoid,
It is necessary to feel loving-kindness and pity.
Why should you still afflict them with your hatred?

People who hate, rob and strike one another
Undergo the poison of suffering.

Why would an honest man
Further add to their torment?

One must always practice loving kindness and compassion,
Cultivate the good in a concentrated mind,
Not nourish bad feelings,
Not torment anyone.

If one cultivates the Path of Dharma diligently
One will commit no harm.
Good and evil are two opposing forces
That meet face to face like water and fire.

When wickedness covers the mind
One does not distinguish the beautiful from the ugly,
One does not separate good deeds from offences,
One no longer fears the bad destinies.

One does not take into account the sufferings of others,
One does not clean up physical or mental fatigue.
The suffering that one has at first suffered oneself,
One then extends that suffering to others.

The person who wants to destroy wickedness
Should meditate on thoughts of loving-kindness.
Alone, sheltered in retreat,
Stopping all activity, he destroys all the causes and conditions.

One should fear old age, sickness and death,
Exclude the nine kinds of anger.
By meditating thus on loving-kindness
One will attain the destruction of the poison of anger.

It is for all these reasons that one removes the obstacle of malevolence (vyāpādanaṇa).

3. Removing laziness-torpor.

The obstacle of laziness-torpor (stūnamiddha) can destroy the threefold benefit of the present world, namely, the happiness of pleasure (kāma), the happiness of wealth (artha) and merit (puṇya); it can destroy the definitive happiness (nīṣṭhasukha) of the present and the future life; it differs from death only by the presence of breathing. Here are the stanzas addressed by the Buddha to reproach a lazy disciple:

“Get up! Don’t stay lying down, overprotecting your rotten body! It is impurities of all kinds that are called a person. If you were struck by serious illness, if an arrow was shot into your body, if all the sufferings were piled upon you, would you be able to sleep in peace?

If the entire world were burning with the fire of death and you were trying to escape, would you be able to sleep in peace? When a man, laden with chains, is led to his death and misfortune menaces him, could he sleep in peace?

The chains, the enemies, are not destroyed; the torments have not been removed. If you were spending the night in the same room as a poisonous snake, or if you were going to engage in battle with a bladed weapon, would you then sleep in peace?

Sleep is this deep darkness where nothing is seen. Each day it comes fown [over us] and steals one’s clarity. When sleep covers the mind, nothing more is known. In the face of such a great loss, could you sleep in peace?”

It is for all these reasons that the obstacle of laziness-torpor (stūnamiddhānāvaraṇa) is condemned.

4. Removing excitement (restlessness) and regret.

The obstacle of excitement (auddhatya) and regret (kuṣoṭya). – Excitement is a dharma that harms the mind of the monastic (pravrajycitta): if a person with concentrated mind (sāṃghitacitta) cannot remain faithful, then what can be said of a person with a scattered mind (vikṣpañcitta)? The excited person is as uncontrollable as a mad elephant (gandhagaja) without a hook or a camel (uṣṭra) with pierced nose. Some stanzas say:

“You have shaved your head; you have put on the kāṣāya; holding the clay begging-bowl (pātra), you go to beg your food. Why do you still take pleasure in excitement? You will lose the profits of the religious life after having [already] renounced the joys of the world.”

The person who is prey to regret (kaukṛtya) is like a criminal always tortured by fear (bhaya). When the arrow of regret has entered the mind, it is implanted there and cannot be torn out. Some stanzas say:

If he has done what he should not do,
If he has not done what he should have done,
He is burned by the fire of regret.
Later, he will fall into the bad destinies.

A man can regret his crime;
After having regretted it, he [should] forget it.
In this way his mind will find peace.
He should not think [of his mistakes] incessantly.

There are two kinds of regrets,
According to whether there was omission or performance.
To attach one’s mind to such remorse
Is the mark of a fool.

One must not give oneself up to regret
Because [the good] that one has omitted doing one can always do;
And the bad that one has committed,
One cannot help having already done it.

It is for all these reasons that the obstacle of excitement and of regret is condemned (auddhatyakaukṛtyanīvaraṇa),

5. Removing doubt.

The obstacle of doubt (vicikitsānīvaraṇa). – When doubt covers the mind, one is unable to fix one’s mind on the good dharmas. Concentration (samāhitacitta) being absent, there is nothing to be gained from the Buddhadharma. Thus the man who goes to a mountain of jewels (vamsagiri) is unable to gather any if he has no hands. Speaking of doubt, some stanzas say:

The person at the crossroads
Who hesitates goes nowhere.
It is the same for doubt
About the true nature of dharmas.

As a result of doubt, one does not diligently seek
The true nature of dharmas.
Doubt is the outcome of ignorance (avidyā);
It is the worst of all the evils.

In regard to good and bad dharmas,
Saṃsāra and nirvāṇa,
[185a] The absolute truth (tathatā) and dharmatā.
One should not conceive any doubt.

If you conceive doubts,
The king of death and his jailers will enchain you;
Like the gazelle taken by the lion,

440 We know that every word spoken by the Buddha is recognized by four characteristics: it is useful and not harmful, it conforms to (ethical) Law and is not contrary to the Law, it destroys the afflictions and does not increase them, it inspires love for nirvāṇa and not for saṃsāra. See the passage of the Madhyāśāṃcānasudāna cited in Traité, I, p. 82F as note. On the other hand, the speech of the Buddha does not contradict the nature of dharmas (dharmaśāṃn na vilomayati), i.e., pratītyasamutpāda (ibid. p. 81F as note). These essential truths are not to be held in doubt by Buddhists.
You will find no way to escape.

Although here below there may always be doubts,
It is important to follow the Holy Dharma.
The person who comes across a fork in the road
Should always take the good Path.

It is for all these reasons that it is necessary to remove the obstacle of doubt (vīcikitsāṅvārana).

Removing these five obstacles is like escaping from the debt that you owe, curing a serious illness, finding an oasis in the desert, being saved from the hands of brigands and finding safety (yogakṣema) free of torment. Thus the ascetic who has removed the five obstacles has a pacified (kṣema) mind, pure (viśuddha) and joyful (sukha). The sun and moon are hidden by five things: when smoke (dīhāma), cloud (abhava), dust (rūṣa), fog (mahākā) or the hand of the āsura Rāhu intercepts them, they cannot shine; similarly, when a person’s mind is covered by the five obstacles (nāvaraṇa), it can be of no use either to oneself or to others.

C. Third method: Practicing the five dharmas.

If he has been able to reject the five sense objects (kāmagūra) and remove the five obstacles (nāvaraṇa), the ascetic practices the five dharmas: 1) aspiration (chanda), 2) exertion (vīrya), 3) mindfulness (smṛti), 4) clear seeing (samprajñāna), 5) concentration of mind (cittaśāṅkṛatā). By practicing these five dharmas, he acquires the first dhyāna furnished with five members (pañcaśāntasaṃvādāyātā).

1) Chanda is zeal in kāmadhātu; when it is produced, the first dhyāna is obtained.

2) Vīrya (exertion) in the observance of the precepts (illa), in leaving family life, concentrated zeal without laziness (kauśīlīya) during the two watches of the night, limited food (mitābhjāhāna) and one-pointedness of mind (cittasaṃgrahāhāna) without distraction (vikeṣa).

3) Smṛti is mindfulness applied to the happiness of the first dhyāna. The ascetic knows that kāmadhātu is impure, deceptive, contemptible, whereas the first dhyāna is estimable and laudable.

4) Samprajñāna is a clear seeing, appreciating and considering the happiness of kāmadhātu and the happiness of the first dhyāna, their importance and their respective benefits.

5) Cittāṅguti continues to be always fixing the mind on one object (ālambhana) and preventing scattering.

Furthermore, in pursuing the first dhyāna, one rejects the sense pleasures (kāmarūpa), for by incessantly trying to conquer one’s enemies that one is no longer tormented by them. The Buddha said to a brahman attached to desire: “At the start, I had precise vision (samanupasayāyā) of the desires (kāma); the desires are cause and condition (hetupratyāśa) of fear (bhaya), of sadness (duṣummanasa) and of suffering (duḥkha); the desires bring little pleasure (ajāntāsādāya), but much pain (bahuddhākā);” Desires are Māra’s net (jāli) and feater (jalā) from which it is difficult to escape; it is like a forest burning on all sides; desire is as dreadful as falling onto a ditch full of fire or handling a venomous snake; it is like a brigand brandishing a sword, like a wicked rakṣasa, like dangerous poison poured into the mouth, like molten copper (kvaṭkaṭṭāśāna) poured down one’s throat, like a mad elephant, like falling off a cliff; like a lion barring the road, like the makara fish opening its mouth: desires are as formidable as all of those. Attachment to desire is man’s misfortune. The person attached to desire is like a prisoner in his jail, a deer in a pen, a fish that has taken the bait, a snake in the presence of a wild boar, a mouse in the claws of a cat, a bird in a net, a cripple man in a fire. [Being attached to desire] is entering into a river of salt water, licking a knife coated with honey. Desire is meat sold at the crossroads, the slicing forest hidden under a thin cover, excrement covered with flowers, a poisoned jar dipped in honey, a chest full of poisonous snakes, the illusion of a dream, the loan that must be repaid, the magic show that fools little children, the flame without any solidity. [Giving oneself up to desire] is like diving into deep water, being swallowed by the makara fish’s gullet. Desire is the hail that destroys the grain, the lightning that strikes men. Desires are all of that, deceptive, unreal, without consistency or vigor, they bring little pleasure but much suffering. Desire is Māra’s army that destroys all good qualities. Since it torments beings unceasingly, it lends itself to many comparisons (upamāna). By rejecting the five desires, by keeping away from the five obstacles and by practicing the five Dharmas, one arrives at the first dhyāna.

442 This exertion manifests in the pursuit of the four qualities that make a monk incapable of falling back (saṅkappā parīhāya) and close to nirvāna (nirvānā; ‘eva santike’): observance of morality (illamsampatti), guarding the senses (indriyena guppadhīravādā), moderation in eating (bhjanaśīlāāśīri), and effort in the vigil (vjāyināṃ anuvīyāṃ) of the ascetic who has removed the five obstacles (nāvaraṇa). The ascetic knows that kāmadhātu is impure, deceptive, contemptible, whereas the first dhyāna is estimable and laudable.

443 The present passage of the Mppī precedes this verdict with a statement on kāma, the cause of fear and suffering: it occurs in Añguttara, IV, p. 289: Bhayaṃ ti bhikkhave kāmadhātu etam adhivacanam, saṃkhyā nī bhikkhave kāmadhātu etam adhivacanam, etc.
Question. – You have already said that the first dhyāna is obtained by condemning the five desires (kāma), by avoiding the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa) and by practicing the five dharmas. By what method and what path can the first dhyāna be obtained?

Answer. – 1. The qualities (guna) of all these absorptions are of the order of reflection (cinta) and meditation (bhāvāna). In the language of the Tso ysh’an san mei king, dhyāna means reflection and meditation. In speaking of the virtue of dhyāna, all the qualities are included.

2. Moreover, dhyāna is in the most important place, like a king. Speaking of dhyāna is to include all the other absorptions; speaking of the other absorptions does not include dhyāna. Why? Because in the four dhyānas, knowledge (jñāna) and the absorptions are equal and balanced. In the anūgama (preliminary absorption preceding the first dhyāna), knowledge (jñāna) overcomes absorption (sāṃpatti) whereas, in the formless absorptions (ārya-vasantā-sāṃpatti following the dhyāna), absorption overcomes knowledge: these states are not balanced. When one wheel of a chariot is more solid than the other, it is not safe (kṣema); it is the same when knowledge and absorption are unequal.

Finally, in the four dhyānas there are the four equalities of mind (samacitva), the five abhijñās, the vinokhas, the abhūvāya-sāmatas, the kṛṣṇa-samādhis, the concentration hindering the arising of the passions in others (aranyakamādhi), the knowledge resulting from vows (pratidhi) the summit dhyāna (prāntakaśādikāvāna), the sovereign concentration (śīvaramaśādi?), dhyāna brought to its maximum (vyādhikāśādikāvāna), the four magically creative minds (nīrmanacitvā), the Pan teheum pan (prārya-paṇnā-sāṃpatti), etc., all the Bodhisattva’s sāṃpatti, the Hero’s Walk (śārangama), etc., which number 120, all the Buddha’s sāṃpatti, Unmovable, etc., which number 108, the attainment of wisdom by the Buddhas and their renouncing of life (āyukṣārinyāga): all these various absorptions occur in the dhyāna; this is why dhyāna is qualified as a virtue (pāramitā), whereas the other absorptions are not.

III. DEFINITION OF THE VARIOUS DHYĀNAS AND SAMĀPATTIS.

---

446 All these qualities will be defined below, p. 1041F seq. The prārya-paṇnā-sāṃpatti is the subject of the Bhadrāśūlī-sūtra; cf. Traité, I, p. 450F, n. 1.

447 For these 108 sāṃpatti, see references in Traité, I, p. 324F, n.1

This section is limited to commenting on a very old Dhyānasūtra where the nine successive absorptions (nīlapiṇārvasāṃpatti) are defined in precise terms: cf. Vinaya, III, p. 4; Dīgha, I, p. 37, 73, 172; II, p. p. 313; III, p. 78, 131, 222, 265; Majjhima, I, p. 21, 40, 89, 117, 159; II, p. 15, 204, 226; III, p. 4, 14, 25, 36; Sānāyutta, II, p. 210, 216, 221; III, p. 225; IV, p. 225, 262; V, p. 10, 198, 213; Aṅguttara, I, p. 53, 163, 182, 242; II, p. 126, 151; III, p. 11, 119; IV, p. 111, 176, 229, 410; V, p. 207, 343; Kathāvatthu, II, p. 484; Milinda, p. 289. – For the Chinese sources, see, e.g., Tch’ang a han, T 1, k. 8, p. 50c; Tchong a han, T 26, k. 47, p. 720a; Tsa a han, T 99, 41, p. 302a. – For the Sanskrit version of this sūtra, see Lātāvīṣṭara, p. 129; Pañcatantra, p. 167; Dalūsāhasrīkā, p. 98-99; Mahāyāna-sūtra, nos. 1478-1481, 1492-1495; extracts in Kośāvākyāyā, p. 665, 666, 673.

---

Question. – You have already said that the first dhyāna is obtained by condemning the five desires (ādīna), by avoiding the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa) and by practicing the five dharmas. By what method and what path can the first dhyāna be obtained?

[185c] Answer. – By being based on the gates of absorption such as the meditation on the disgusting (aabhābāhāvāna) and mindlessness of breathing (ānāpānasamāti), etc. 447

Thus, it is is said in the explanatory stanzas of the Tch’ an king (Dhyānasūtra): 448

Avoiding desires and bad dharmas
A person enters into the first dhyāna,
Furnished with examination (saṃvitkāra) and judgment (saṃviśrāna),
Coming from detachment (vivekajāti), which is joy (prīti) and happiness (sukha).
Avoiding the flames of lust,
He is endowed with clear cool absorption.
Happy like a person who, tormented by the heat,
Enters into a cold pool.

As in the poor man who has found a treasure,

Following is a translation of this sūtra: “Here, the monk, having avoided the desires, having avoided the bad dharmas, enters into the first dhyāna, furnished with examination, furnished with judgment, coming from detachment and which is joy and happiness. – By suppressing examination and judgment, he enters into the second dhyāna, internal peace, one-pointed mind, without examination, without judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and happiness. – By renouncing joy, he remains indifferent, reflective, aware; he experiences happiness in his body; he enters into the third dhyāna that the saints call ‘indifferent, reflecting, dwelling in happiness’; – By destroying happiness and by destroying pain, by the previous suppression of joy and sadness, he enters into the fourth dhyāna, free of pain and happiness, purified in renunciation and reflection. – Having surpassed any notion of matter, suppressing any notion of resistance, neglecting any notion of multiplicity, he cries out: “Infinite space” and penetrates into the space of infinite space. – Surpassing the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither awareness nor non-awareness and finally, the absorption of cessation of awareness and sensation.” For this technique of dhyāna, see the explanation of M. Eliade, Techniques of Yoga, 1948, p. 158-164.

447 These two “gates” have been studied at length in Kośa, VI, p. 148-158.

448 I [Lamotte] have not found these stanzas in the Tso ysh’an san mei king, T 614, p. 269a seq., Chinese translation of the Dhyānasūtra by Kumārajīva.
Vitarka of a great joyfulness moves his mind.
He analyzes it: this is vicāra.
This is how he enters the first dhyāna.

He knows that vitarka and vicāra disturb his mind,
Although good, he must separate himself from them,
For it is only on a calm sea
That the movement of the waves is not seen.

When a very weary man
Lies down to sleep in peace,
Any call to him
Strongly disturbs his mind.

In the same way, for the absorbed man in dhyāna,
Vitarka and vicāra are a torment.
That is why, avoiding vitarka and vicāra,
He succeeds in entering the sphere of unified consciousness
As a result of his inner purity (adhyātmasaṃprasadā),
He finds joy (prīti) and happiness (duhkha) in absorption.
Penetrating into the second dhyāna,
His joy is lively and his mind is very happy.

An absorption where concentration is very strong
Is calm and free of smṛti (memory).
Annoyed by prīti (joy), the ascetic wants to get rid of it
In the same way that he has already eliminated vitarka and vicāra.

It is because of feeling (vedanā) that there is joy.
If joy is lost, sadness is experienced.
Renouncing pleasant bodily feeling (sukhavedanā),
The ascetic abandons memory and methods.

The saint (ārya) is able to reach this renunciation;
For other people, this renunciation is difficult.
When one knows the torments of happiness (sukha),
One sees the grand immobile peace.

When daurmanasya (sadness) and prīti (joy) are eliminated,
Dukkha (suffering) and sukha (happiness) still remain to be cut,
Purified by equanimity and reflection (apakṣasatputapanītadharma),
The mind penetrates into the fourth dhyāna.

The sukha present in the third dhyāna,
Transitory (aniya) and changing, is suffering.
In kāmadhātu, the ascetic has cut the daurmanasya;
In the second dhyāna he has eliminated the prīti.

This is why the Buddha Bhagavat
Said, in the fourth dhyāna,
Having cut the daurmanasya and the prīti,
It is necessary now to cut duḥkha and sukha.

[1. Preparation for the first dhyāna]. – By means of purity of discipline (śīlavatādharma), solitude in retreat, guarding the senses, intensive meditation during the first and last watch of the night,⁴⁴⁴ the ascetic avoids external pleasures and takes pleasure in meditation. He avoids desires (kāma) and the bad dharman (ākusaladharma). Depending on the ānggamya (the preliminary

⁴⁴⁴ See above, p. 1020F, n. 2.
Question. – In the Abhidharma it is said that, from kāmadhātu until the first dhyāna, s single mind is associated with vitarka and vicāra; why do you say that vitarka is the first moment of a coarse mind whereas vicāra is a more subtle analysis?

Answer. – Although the two things reside in the same mind, their characteristics re not simultaneous: at the moment of vitarka, the vicāra is blurred (apaṇa); at the moment of vicāra, the vitarka is blurred. Thus, when the sun rises, the shadows disappear. All the minds (citra) and all the mental events (citta-viśayādharma) receive their name prorata with time: [vitarka and vicāra are distinct names of one single mind]. Thus the Buddha said: "If you cut one single thing, I claim that you will become an anāgamin; this single thing is avassāya (mātsarya)." Really, it should be said that the five fetters of lower rank (cittavāśāyagha ṣaṁyojana) must disappear in order that one may become anāgamin. Why did he say that it is necessary to cut just one single thing? Because avarice abounded in his questioner and the other fetters came from that; therefore it sufficed for that person to destroy avarice in order to cut through the other fetters at the same time. Similarly here, vitarka and vicāra take their name prorata from time.

[3. Second dhyāna] – The ascetic knows that, although they are good, vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind that is in absorption (samādhiśca); by mental renunciation (cittavāśāyagha), he condemns vitarka and vicāra and has this thought: "Vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind of dhyāna; as when pure water is disturbed by waves, nothing can be seen any more." When a tired and weary [186b] man regains his breath and wants to sleep, when his neighbor calls him, that makes him very annoyed. It is for all these reasons that he condemns vitarka and vicāra.

According to the definition given by the Buddha, the ascetic, "by suppressing examination and judgment, enters into the second dhyāna, one-pointedness of mind, without examination, without judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and happiness" (Dhammasāgata). Hence, vitarka, vicāra, prajñāviśeṣaḥ yā citāṣaṇādikatā. It is a more subtle analysis?

Question. – Are sound is strong, the subsequent sound is weaker; this is a more subtle analysis? Why did he say that it is necessary to cut just one single thing? Because avarice abounded in his questioner and the other fetters came from that; therefore it sufficed for that person to destroy avarice in order to cut through the other fetters at the same time. Similarly here, vitarka and vicāra take their name prorata from time.

[3. Second dhyāna] – The ascetic knows that, although they are good, vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind that is in absorption (samādhiśca); by mental renunciation (cittavāśāyagha), he condemns vitarka and vicāra and has this thought: "Vitarka and vicāra disturb the mind of dhyāna; as when pure water is disturbed by waves, nothing can be seen any more." When a tired and weary [186b] man regains his breath and wants to sleep, when his neighbor calls him, that makes him very annoyed. It is for all these reasons that he condemns vitarka and vicāra.

According to the definition given by the Buddha, the ascetic, "by suppressing examination and judgment, enters into the second dhyāna, one-pointedness of mind, without examination, without judgment, arisen from concentration, which is joy and happiness" (Dhammasāgata). Hence, vitarka, vicāra, prajñāviśeṣaḥ yā citāṣaṇādikatā. It is a more subtle analysis?

Pratyanuvakṣa manojalpaḥ, tathāvāyā yā citāṣaṇādikatā. – Here the Mppi is accepting a specific difference (jñābhedā) between vitarka and vicāra; this is the thesis of the Vaibhāskas; the Saṅgāyikas are of the opposite opinion, cf. Kośa, II, p. 174 seq.; Kośa-vāpya, p. 139. The Pāli sources themselves have attempted definitions: cf. Dhammasāgata, p. 10; Āthaṅkaṭh, p. 144-145; Mālinda, p. 62-63; Visuddhimaga, I, p. 142-143; S. Z. Aung, Compendium, p. 17, 40.

451 See a passage in Aṅguttara, III, p. 272, where it is said that, in order to attain the four dhyanas and realize the four fruits of the Path (sotāpattipāla, etc.), it is enough to have cut the fivefold avarice: ṣāla-, kula-, lāba-, varsa and dharmamacchāvara.

455 By saying that it is enough to cut one single fetter, avarice, in order to become mārgaṁīn, the Buddha was simplifying things for the benefit of his questioner; in precise terms, it is “by the disappearance of the first five fetters that a person becomes an apparitional being, that he attains nirvāṇa there (in the world of the gods) and is not subject to coming back from that world.” Cf. Dīgha, I, p. 156; II, p. 92; III, p. 132; Majjhima, I, p. 436. Paticchakāromambarhamāgyabāṇam paryupākto kathitathāparibhūyath etadavattitammano tumā lokā.
In possession of the second dhyāna, he obtains the prīti and sukha of the second dhyāna, incomparable joy and happiness not previously acquired until that moment. “By the suppression of examination and judgment (vitarkavichāramānī yuyapāsāt), they have disappeared because the ascetic knows their defects. This dhyāna is ‘inner peace’ (adhyātmasamprasmādā)458 for, by entering into this profound absorption, the ascetic has given up the vitarka and vicāra of the first dhyāna by means of faith (prasādā): the benefit is important, the loss minimal and the gain considerable. This dhyāna is called ‘inner peace’ as a result of “fixing the mind on one object” (causa ekotthātā).

4. Third dhyāna. – The ascetic sees the defects of prīti as he has seen those of vitarka and vicāra: according to the place occupied by the object of enjoyment, sometimes it is joy (prīti), sometimes sadness (dauramaṇaṇa) that dominates. Why is that? Thus, for example, when a poor man (daridra) finds a treasure, his joy is immense; but, as soon as he loses it, his sadness is profound. The joy changes into sadness.

This is why [according to the definition of the Buddha], the ascetic: “by renouncing joy, remains in equanimity, reflecting, aware; he experiences this physical happiness which only the saints are capable of renouncing; reflecting, remaining in bliss, he enters into the third dhyāna” (āśīraya samprajñānāna sukhaṃ ca kāyaṇa pratismaṃvedaya sat tad ārya ikācāṣṭa “Upakeṣu kṣatā smṛśīrmin sūkha-vīcharitāni” nisprāptaṃ triyāṃ dhyāṇam upasampadaya viharati).

He remains ‘in equanimity’ (upeksah), for he abandons any feeling of joy (prīti) and feels no regret; he remains “reflecting” (smṛśīrmin) and ‘fully aware’ (samprajñānāna), for, having obtained the bliss of the third dhyāna, he prevents bliss from arousing torments; he experiences ‘physical happiness’ (sukham kāyena pratismaṃvedaya), for he experiences, with his entire body, the bliss of the third dhyāna.457 ‘this bliss which only the āryas are capable of abandoning’; this bliss being the most outstanding in the world to call forth attachment of the mind and which ordinary people (prthagāna) rarely renounce. Also the Buddha said that the practice of loving-kindness is the foremost in the pure lands.

5. Fourth dhyāna. – The ascetic sees the defects of sukha as he has seen those of prīti; he knows that immovability of the mind ( cittīṛtyavasthā) is very superior to that, for wherever there is movement, there is suffering (dukkha). Since he is moved by the sukha of the third dhyāna, the ascetic seeks non-movement.

[According to the definition of the Buddha] “by the cessation of bliss and by the cessation of suffering, by the previous suppression of joy and sadness, the ascetic enters into the fourth dhyāna, free of suffering and bliss, purified in renunciation and reflection” (Dhyānasthāra, l.c.: Sukhaṇa ca prabhūktā dhuṣṭakṣa ca prabhūktā pīruvaṃ eva saumānayaṇau duṣṭakṣaṇau upapekṣāṃ vīcharitādham caturthāṃ dhyāṇam upasampadaya viharati).

458 For adhyātmasamprasmādā which is faith (śraddhā), see Kośa, VIII, p. 158.
457 The third dhyāna has five members: 1) upakāla, 2) mṛtti, 3) samprajñāna, 4) sukha, 5) samādhi; they are defined in Kośa, VIII, p. 148. But, whereas the sukha present in the first two dhyānas is simply the good physical state (praviveśhādhi), the sukha of the third dhyāna is the feeling of bliss (sukha vedanā): cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 156.

In the fourth dhyāna, there is no more suffering or happiness, but only non-moving wisdom (āniñjyaprajñā); this is why the fourth dhyāna is called ‘purified as to renunciation and reflection’.459 By contrast, the third dhyāna, because of the movement evoked by the bliss, is called suffering. Therefore the fourth dhyāna is “free of suffering and bliss” (asubhābhāshāh).

6. First samāpatti. – According to the definition of the Buddha, the ascetic “having surpassed any notion of matter, neglecting any notion of multiplicity, suppressing, any notion of resistance, enters into the sphere of infinity of space” (Dhyānasthāra, l.c.: Sa sarvaśā rūpasamāṇī samāttikramāṇā, nānāvasesājīhāṃ amanussaṅkārāḥ, pratīthiḥsājīhāṃ asaṃgamaṃ “Aṣantu aṣāṣā iti” aṣāṣāṃjāyatānām upasampadaya viharati).

The ascetic thinks thus: “Wherever matter is absent, there one escapes from the sufferings of hunger (kaḍḍa) and thirst (tipāṭā); cold (tīta) and heat (uṣṇa); physical matter is coarse, bad, deceptive and unreal: it is as a result of the complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasaṅgrahaj) of the former life that we inherit this body, the receptacle of all sorts of pains. How can these bodily torments be avoided? The space (ākāśa) present in the body must be considered.” Then the ascetic ceaselessly considers the space of the body like that in a cage or a pot; by endlessly thinking thus, he is freed from matter and no [186] longer sees the body. And the same for external matter (bhāyarāsā) as for the inner bodily space. Then the ascetic can contemplate immense infinite space (upamaṇaṃnantaśākāśa). When he has mastered this contemplation, he feels neither sadness nor happiness, and his mind progresses: he is like a bird closed up in a cage that finds its freedom when the cage is broken. This is the aṣāṣāṃjāyata.

7. Second samāpatti. - This immense and infinite space is grasped (ālambate) by the intellect; this vast object distracts the ascetic and can even destroy his absorption. Contemplating space, the ascetic sees feelings (vedāṇā), notions (saṁphoṣa), formations (saṁskāra) and consciousnesses (viṣṇāna)458 which seem to him to be a sickness (roga), an ulcer (ganda), a wound (āghāṭha) and an arrow (ālāha), transitory (anūta), painful (dukkha), empty (śūna) and non-self (anatman), an accumulation of deceits without true reality.460 Thinking in this way, he abandons the ākāśa object and holds only the consciousness (viṣṇā). Does he hold the present (pratyaupanuṣa), the past (ātita), future (anēgata) consciousness, or the immense, infinite consciousness (upamaṇaṃnantaśākāśa)? He holds the immense and infinite consciousness.461 Since this 458 It would be tempting to translate Chō ni en no ‘ing ting by “purity in renunciation and reflection”; but these four characters give the Sanskrit expression upakeṣāṃ vīcharitādham: 1) upakeṣaḥ is indifference for whatever the object may be (anabhāgalaṃkāra); 2) vīcharitādhaḥ consists of not losing sight of the nimiita (the motive, the reason) for this indifference (upakeṣāṃvīcharitādham). See, Kośa, VII, p. 148.

459 Whereas the dhyānas are accompanied by the five skandhas, the samāpattis consist of only four (vedāṇā, saṁphoṣa, saṁskāra and viṣṇā), all rūpa is absent; cf. Kośa, VIII, p. 134.
460 This phrase, which is of canonical origin, will be repeated for the second and third samāpatti; cf. Majhāna, I, p. 436: So yad eva atīḥa heti vedāṇagatāni sābhāyagatām viṣṇānagatam te dharmāni avacchato dikkhaṭa rogato ganda niye aghaṭha itibhāho parato palako bhutato anattato samapattati.
consciousness is immense and infinite like ākāśa, the absorption is called the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness (vijñānānityāyutanaṃsaṃpatti).

[8. Third samāpatti]. – This immense and infinite vijñāna is perceived by the intellect; this vast object, which seems to him to be a sickness (roga), ulcer (ganda), a wound (āghata) and an arrow (sāla), transitory (anīva), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anatman), an accumulation of deceit, without true reality. Thinking this way, he destroys the image of vijñāna, rejects the vijñānāyutanaṃsaṃpatti and praises the sphere of nothingness (ākāścandrayutanaṃsaṃpatti).

9. Fourth samāpatti]. – In this ākāścandrayutana, he perceives sensations (vedanā), notions (samjñā), formations (samskāra) and consciousnesses (vijñāna) that seem to him to be a sickness (roga), an ulcer (ganda), a wound (āghata), an arrow (sāla), transitory (anīva), painful (duḥkha), empty (śūnya) and non-self (anatman), an accumulation of deceit, without true reality. While he is meditating thus, the sphere of non-consciousness (asaṃjñāyutana) seems to him to be an ulcer (ganda) and the sphere of consciousness (asaṃjñāyutana) seems to him to be a sickness, an ulcer, a wound and an arrow: [for him], the sphere par excellence is the sphere of neither discernment nor non-discernment.

Question. – But the naivasaṃjñānāsaṃjñāyutana involves sensations (vedanā), notions (samjñā), formations (samskāra) and consciousnesses (vijñāna): why do you call it neither discernment nor non-discrimination?

Answer. – There is discrimination (samjñā) in this sphere, but as it is very subtle (sīkṣaṇu) and hard to perceive (dūrabuddhaḥ), we speak of ‘non-discrimination’; on the other hand, since there is discrimination, we add ‘not non-discrimination.’ Ordinary people (prahjayana) claim to attain the true nature of dharmas in this sphere and identify it with nirvāna; but in the Buddhist system, although it is known that this sphere includes discrimination, the old name is retained and it is called the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination.

Question. - What is non-discrimination?

Answer. – There are three kinds of non-discrimination: i) the absorption of non-discrimination (asaṃjñāsaṃpatti), 661 ii) the absorption of the cessation of discrimination and feeling (read Mīc śuṅga 661 On the point of knowing whether or not there is saṃjñā in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination, cf. Anguttara, IV, p. 427; Kathāvaththu, I, p. 263 (tr. Rh. D., p. 155); Kośa, VIII, p. 144.

662 Asaṃjñāsaṃpatti, its preparation, conditions and fruit are studied in Kośa, II, p. 132, 290, 211, 310; IV, p. 200.

801

IV. QUESTIONS RELATING TO THE DHYĀNAS

[Pure and impure Path] 663 – There are two kinds of dhyanas and samāpattis: impure (āsāra) and pure (ānāsāra). The āsāra type is practiced by worldly people (prahjayana) as has already been said; the anāsāra type consists of the sixteen aspects of the noble truths (sūdāśāryākāra).

664 The explanation that follows being somewhat abstruse, it may be of some use to recall the facts of the problem. The path of the absorptions consists of liberating oneself from the passions in the inherent ātman, the fourth dhyanas and the first three samāpattis as they have been defined in the preceding section. Each sphere involves nine categories of passions: strong-strong, strong-medium, strong-weak, medium-strong, etc. In order to pass from one sphere to another, it is necessary to liberate oneself from nine categories of passions. For each stage, the process involves nine mental actions by means of which one is detached from the passions, which is the ānantaramārga, and nine mental actions by means of which one takes possession of this detachment, which is the vimuttimārga. The process thus involves eighteen mental actions for each sphere, and 144 mental actions for the entire eight spheres. To attain nirvāna, it is also necessary to become liberated from the inherent passions of the ninth sphere, the fourth samāpatti, also called the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivasaṃjñānāsaṃjñāyutanaṃ) or the summit of existence (bhuvānā).

The absorptions can be practiced according to the worldly path (laukikamārga) or the supramundane path (lokottarāmārga).

1. The worldly path, also called impure path (āsāramārga), is followed by ordinary people (prahjayana) who have not ‘seen’ the truths preached by the Buddha. He is liberated from the passions in a provisional manner only. Then, and this is essential, the ascetic can only be liberated from the passions of one sphere by practicing the preliminary concentrations of the immediately higher sphere.

Thus, in the impure path, the ascetic successively enters the eight preliminary (sāmanata) absorptions which serve as passage-ways to the four dhyanas and the four samāpattis, in order to eliminate, in turn, the passions of kāmaghūna, the four dhyanas and the first three samāpattis. Since there is no preliminary concentration above the fourth samāpatti into which the ascetic can enter in order to destroy the passions of the fourth samāpatti, he is unable to liberate himself of the passions of the fourth samāpatti by means of the impure path. We may note that there are only eight preliminary concentrations: the first, serving as passage into the first dhyāna, is called āsāra; the other seven bear the generic name of sāmanata. The impure (āsāra) concentrations of the worldly path are described as pure (suḥsktuḥ) insofar as they are opposed to the concentrations associated with enjoyment (āvīrdbhāsasamprayaśa), tainted by desire; this is a regrettable terminology liable to trouble the reader.
When one is following the śāravamārga, one relies on the preliminary concentration (śāmantaka) of the level immediately above in order to abandon the passions of the lower level. When one is following the anātaryamārga, one abandons the passions of one’s own level and those of the higher level. This is [187a] why, when the worldly person (prthagjana) is in the bhavāgāra [fourth and last samāpatti], he does not succeed in freeing himself from the passions of this sphere, because [beyond it] there is no preliminary concentration (śāmantaka) leading to a higher sphere.

When the disciple of the Buddha wishes to abandon the desires (kāma) and passions (kleśa) of kāmadhūtu, by means of meditation he cuts the nine categories of passions, strong (adhītrāra), medium (madhyāra) and weak (mrudā), namely: 1) strong-strong, 2) strong-medium, 3) strong-weak, 4) medium-strong, 5) medium-medium, 6) medium-weak, 7) weak-strong, 8) weak-medium, 9) weak-weak.

Having cut these nine categories, the disciple of the Buddha can try to obtain the first dhīya by the śāravamārga. In this case, in the anūganyu (preliminary concentration preceding the first dhīya), in the course of nine anātaryamārgas (successive abandonments of the nine categories of passions of the lower level) and eight vimuktimārgas (taking possession of these successive abandonings), he first practices the śāravamārga, then the sāravra or anātaryamārga. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, in the anūganyu, he first practices the sāravamārga; then the sāravra or anātaryamārga of the anūganyu, and the sāravra of the sāmantaka of the first dhīya. If he wishes to attain the first dhīya by way of the anātaryamārga, he will do the same.

If he abandons the passions of the first dhīya by means of the sāravamārga, in the sāmantaka of the second dhīya, during nine anātaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he first practices the sāravra of the sāmantaka of the second dhīya, then the sāravamārga of the sāmantaka of the second dhīya as well as the first anātara dhīya and its sequel. During the ninth vimuktimārga, in the sāmantaka of the second dhīya, he first practices the sāravamārga of the sāmantaka of the second dhīya, then the sāmantaka of the second dhīya, then the anātara of the first dhīya and its sequel, the bhuddhaka or anātara dhīya.

If he abandons the passions of the first dhīya by means of the anātaryamārga, during the course of nine anātaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he first practices the anātaryamārga of his own level, the sāravra or anātaryamārga of the first dhīya and its sequel. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, he first practices the anātaryamārga of his own level, then the sāravra or anātaryamārga of the first dhīya and its sequel.

It is the same in the practice of the other concentrations from the second bhuddhaka or anātara dhīya up to the abandonment that characterizes the akīmōnyāyatana. In the abandonment that characterizes the nātravasaṃjñāsamsājñāyatana, during the nine anātaryamārgas and eight vimuktimārgas, he practices just the universal anātaryamārga. In the course of the ninth vimuktimārga, he practices the roots of good of the threefold world (traidhātikasamālāla) and the anātaryamārga; thus he drives out absorption without mind (acittakasamāpatti).

2. The supramundane path (lokottaramārga), also called pure path (anūtaramārga), is followed by the saints (ārya) endowed with pure wisdom, who have “seen” the four holy truths (ātyātmanā) and have understood the sixteen aspects (sodala礼s) by reason of the four aspects of each truth (see above, p. 641F). This path assures the definitive liberation of the passions and, whereas in the impure path the ascetic must enter into the preliminary concentration (śāmantaka) of the immediately higher sphere in order to be liberated from the passions of his own sphere, the saint who is following the pure path can dispose of the passions of his level directly without resorting to any śāmantaka whatsoever. Thus, having reached the fourth and last samāpatti, the saint can eliminate the passions of this sphere by means of nine acts of detachment and nine acts of taking possession, which was impossible for the worldly person following the impure path.

3. The ascetic can combine the impure and the pure path if he so wishes. This was the case for Śākyamuni. When he arrived in Bodhgaya under the Bodhi tree, he was still a worldly person (prthagjana), a man who had not yet seen the truths. But, by means of the impure path, he had eliminated all the passions of kāmadhūtu of the four dhīyas and the first three samāpattis. Only the passions of the fourth and last samāpatti remained in him, for, as we have seen, they cannot be destroyed by the impure path. When enlightenment occurred, Śākyamuni saw, in sixteen moments, the sixteen aspects (sodala礼s) of the truths: this pure wisdom made his deliverance from the lower desires definitive. There remained in him the nine categories of passions relating to the fourth samāpatti or bhavāgāra which he had by the nine mental actions of anātaryamārga that detached him from these passions and mental actions of vimuktimārga that put him in possession of this detachment. Then Śākyamuni obtained the state of arhat, without any passions, in 34 moments of mind: sixteen moments for the seeing of the truths, nine for the anātaryamārga of bhavāgāra, nine for the vimuktimārga of the same bhavāgāra. At the same time, he became a Buddha as a result of his meritorious works.

See a study on the path of the concentration in L. de La Vallée Poussin, Kośa, V., p. iv-x; Mooule bouddhique, p. 71-97.

[Development of the dhīyas]. – There are two types of development:

i) development by acquisition, ii) development by practice. Development by acquisition is to obtain now what one had not earlier obtained; later one will cultivate the thing itself and its general complement. Development by practice is to cultivate at present that which one had earlier obtained; but later one will not cultivate the complements. These are the different developments in the course of the dhīyas and the samāpattis.

[Types of concentration]. – In brief, the characteristic traits (nimitta) of the dhīyas and the samāpattis are twenty-three in number: eight concentrations of enjoyment (āsvādāna), eight pure (siuddhaka) concentrations and seven anātara concentrations.
[Causes and conditions in the concentrations]. – There are six kinds of causes (hetu): 1) associated causes (samprayatana), 2) mutual cause (sahabhāti), 3) similar cause (sahhūgo), 4) universal cause (sarvatraga), 5) ripening cause (vipaśīa), 6) nominal cause (nāmaheitu). 467 Taken one by one, the seven anūṣṭava are similar (ābhāṣeṣa) causes; the associated and mutual causes, the previous ‘dhīyāna of enjoyment’ and its causes, the subsequent ‘dhīyāna of enjoyment’ and its causes go in the same level. It is the same for the iśuddhaka dhīyānas.

The four conditions (pratyaya) are: 1) the causal condition (hetupratyaya), 2) the antecedent equal and immediate condition (samanantarapratyaya), 3) the object condition (āḷāmavatapratyaya), 4) the governing condition (adhīpapatrtyaya) 468.

1) The causal condition has been explained above [in the examination of the six causes].
2) In regard to the antecedent condition, we will make the following comments. 469

The first anūṣṭava dhīyāna can produce after itself six concentrations:

1-2) iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the first dhīyāna; 3-6) iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the second and third dhīyāna.

The second anūṣṭava dhīyāna can produce after itself eight concentrations:

1-2) iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the same level; 3-4) iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the first dhīyāna; 5-8) iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the third and fourth dhīyāna.

The third anūṣṭava dhīyāna can produce after itself ten concentrations:

1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7-10) four concentrations of the two higher levels.

The fourth dhīyāna and the ākāśatattvamānānyatana also [can produce after themselves ten concentrations.]

The anūṣṭava vijñānakālatanaya can produce after itself nine concentrations: 1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7-9) three concentrations of the two higher levels, [namely, iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava concentration of the ākāśamāna, iśuddhaka of the naivasaṃjñānānyatana].

The anūṣṭava ākāśaṃkhyāna can produce after itself seven concentrations: 1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels; 7) one concentration of the higher level, [namely, the iśuddhaka concentrations of the naivasaṃjñānakālatanaya].

467 The six causes in Kośa, II, p. 245 seq.
468 The four conditions in Kośa, II, p. 299 seq.
469 The successive arisings of the concentrations is treated in the same way in Kośa, VIII, p. 167-168.

The naivasaṃjñānānyatana can produce after itself six concentrations:

1-2) two concentrations of the same level; 3-6) four concentrations of the two lower levels.

It is the same for the iśuddhaka concentrations.

Moreover, these concentrations increase all the delight (āsvādāna) of their own level: immediately after the delight of the first dhīyāna, there follows the delight of the second, and so on up to the naivasaṃjñānakālatanaya.

3. In regard to the object condition, 470 we may note that the iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava dhīyānas always have as object (āḷāmbana) the dhīyāna of delight; they are concerned with the enjoyment of their own level; they are also concerned with pure desire (vīśuddhaḥśṛṣṭi). As they do not have a stainless object, they are not concerned with the anūṣṭava.

The fundamental non-material concentrations (maultī̄ṣyaṣaṃpadātti), iśuddhaka and anūṣṭava, are not concerned with the śrāvaka of the lower levels.

4. As nominal cause (nāmaheitu) and governing cause (adhīpapatratra), the dhīyānas enter into:
   a. the four boundless ones (apramāṇaśccita), 471
   b. the [first] three liberations (vīmokṣa), 472
   c. the eight spheres of domination (abhīṣhiṇyotanā), 473
   d. the [first] eight spheres of totality (kṛṣṇatātanā), those that are concerned with kāmadhātu 474
   e. the [first] five superknowledges (abhiṣikā) are concerned with kāma- and rūpadhātu. 475

The other concentrations are each adapted to its own object; the samādhiṣvaṣaṃpadātāniruddhasamāppadātti has no object.

*** *** ***
[Perfecting the dhyānas]. – In all four dhyānas, there is the principle of perfecting (vardhanadharma). By perfecting the sārāvāya means of the andaravāya, mastery of the mind (cetoasāpāya) of the fourth dhyāna is obtained. By means of the fourth andaravāya dhyāna, the fourth sārāvāya dhyāna is perfected. Similarly the third, second, and first dhyāna can perfect the sārāvāya of their own level by means of the andaravāya of the same level.

Question. – What is the perfecting of the dhyāna called?

Answer. – The saints (ārya) are pleased with the andaravāya concentration and do not like the sārāvāya; at the time of abandoning the passions (vaīrāgya), the sādharma and sārāvāya dhyānas displease them and when they are obtained, they try to eliminate the impurities: they resort to the andaravāya to perfect them. Just as melting rids the gold ore from its dross, so the andaravāya perfects the sārāvāya. From the andaravāya dhyāna, one enters into the sādharma dhyāna, and the repetition of this practice constitutes a kind of melting.

[Prāntakośikā dhyāna].476 – Among the dhyānas, there is one that reaches the summit (prāntakośa). What is meant by summit? There are two kinds of arhat: the arhat capable of regressing (parihānasādharma) and the arhat incapable of regressing (aparihānasādharma). The arhat incapable of regressing who has attained mastery (vaśita) over all the profound dhyānas and samāpattis is able to produce the prāntakośikādhyāna; possessing this dhyāna, he is able to transform [187c] his longevity into wealth and wealth into longevity.

[Pratidhiṣṭhāna, etc.]. – Among the concentrations, there are also the knowledge resulting from resolve (pratidhiṣṭhāna), the four infallible knowledges (pratijñānaṇidhi) and the concentration preventing anyone from harming you (arunāsamādhi). Pratidhiṣṭhāna.477– If he wishes to know the objects of the threefold world, he knows them according to his wish. The pratidhiṣṭhāna is of two levels, kāmadhātu and the fourth dhyāna.

The four pratijñānaṇidhis.478 – The infallible knowledge of teaching (dharma-pratijñānaṇidhi) and that of the voice (nirukta-pratijñānaṇidhi) are of two levels, kāmadhātu and the first dhyāna; the other two pratijñānaṇidhis, [of things (artha) and of eloquence (pratihānaṇidhi)] are of nine levels: kāmadhātu, four dhyānas and four āriyasaṃsādhatu.

Arunāsamādhi479 is a concentration preventing someone from harming you. It is of five levels, kāmadhātu and four dhyānas.

[Acquiring the dhyānas]480 – Question. – Does the acquisition of the dhyānas involve other modalities?

Answer. – The absorptions of delight (āśādhamasāpattis) are acquired by birth (upapatti) or by regression (kliṇa). The pure (sūrdhāka) dhyānas are acquired by birth or by abandonment (vaśita). The andaravāya concentrations are acquired by abandonment or by regression.

The andaravāya concentrations of nine levels, namely, the four dhyānas, the [first] three āriyasaṃsādhatu, the anugamanuṣṭhāna and the dhyānānanta puzzle are able to cut the fetters (sāmaya). Actually, the anugamanuṣṭhāna and the dhyānānanta have a connection with the sensation of equanimity (upekṣendrīya).

[Creation mind].481 – When a person possesses a dhyāna, he also possesses the creation mind (nīmaṇacāya) of the lower levels. In the first dhyāna he thus possesses two nīmaṇacittas, that of the first dhyāna and also that of kāmadhātu; in the second dhyāna, three; in the third, four; in the fourth, five nīmaṇacittas.

If the ascetic who is in the second, third or fourth dhyāna wishes to understand, see or touch something, he must resort to a consciousness of Brahmaloka [i.e., of the first dhyāna]; when this consciousness disappears, the perception stops.

The four apramāṇas, the five abhijñās, the eight viññākas, the eight abhiññāvibhavas, the ten kṛṣṇāvibhavas, the nine anupāvāsanāpattis, the nine samākha (of the āśādhamamāriśvāna), the three samādhis,482 the three viññākas, the three andaravāṇendrīyas, the thirty-seven bodhiṣṭhākiṣadharmanas and all the qualities of this type come from the virtue of dhyāna; here they must be explained fully.

476 The prāntakośikā is none other than the fourth dhyāna taken to its maximum. It is defined in Kośa, VII, p. 95-96.
477 Pratidhiṣṭhāna, in Kośa, VII, p. 88-89.
478 Pratijñānaṇidhi, in Kośa, VII, p. 89-94.
479 Arunāsamādhi, see above, Traité, I, p. 4F, n. 1; Kośa, VII, p. 86-87.
480 The three modes of acquiring the dhyānas are: birth (upapatti) or the transfer from one level to another after death, detachment (vairagya) which makes the passing from a lower level to a higher level; regression (kliṇa) which causes the passing from a higher concentration to a lower concentration of the same level. The ideas developed here occur in the Viśhālakī (cited by the Kośavyālikākhyā, p. 678), Kośa, VIII, p. 164-167, summarizes them in the following kārikā: Atavāte labhairate labdham vairāgyopapattitāḥ; andaravānum vairāgyaḥ; kliṇsam labhayapapattitāḥ.
481 The nīmaṇacāyas have been studied above (Traité, I, p. 381-382F); see also Kośa, VIII, p. 115-116.
482 They are listed in Mahāyānapūrijī, no. 1156-1164.
483 The āryanāṇa apramāṇa and āšādhamamāriśvāna defined above, Traité, I, p. 321-324F.
V. DHYĀNAPĀRAMITĀ.

Question. – You should have spoken to us about the virtue of dhyāna (dhyānapāramitā); why do you speak of dhyāna only?

Answer. – 1) Dhyāna is the source of the virtue [of dhyāna]. By possessing dhyāna, [the bodhisattva] has compassion for beings who, having at their disposal the many felicities resulting from the dhyānas and the samāpattis, do not know how to pursue them, but seek their happiness in outer things (bāhyādharma), impure and painful. The bodhisattva feels great compassion (mahākarunācittatā) at this sight and makes the following oath: “I will act in such a way that beings obtain all the inner bliss (adhyātmasukha) of the dhyānas and samāpattis, that they may be freed from impure bliss and that, in dependence on these dhyānas, they finally reach the bliss characteristic of Buddhahood.” It is in this way that the dhyānas and samāpattis take the name of virtue.

2) Moreover, in the dhyānas, the bodhisattva does not relax any enjoyment (āsvadana), does not seek any reward (vipākā) and does not pursue [heavenly] rebirths as reward. It is in order to tame his own mind that he enters into dhyāna. By the skillful means of his wisdom (prajñapāda), he will be reborn in kāmadhātu in order to save beings there. Dhyāna takes the name of virtue in this case.

3) Furthermore, when the Bodhisattva has entered into his profound dhyānas and samāpattis, neither gods nor men can know his mind (citta), his support (śārayu) and his object (dālambana), for this mind is not disturbed by what is seen, heard, thought or cognized (dyataitoramastavijñāta). Thus, in the [188a] P’1 no lo k’i king (Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra), Vimalakīrti explains quiescence (pratisaṃlayasuddhārtha) to Śāriputra: “Do not rely on the body (kāya), do not rely on the mind (citta), do not rely on the threefold world (traiṣādhatu); in the threefold world, not to obtain either body or mind is quiescence.”

4) Moreover, when a person hears it said that the bliss of the dhyānas and samāpattis surpasses divine and human bliss, he abandons the sense pleasures (kāmasukha) in order to seek the dhyānas and samāpattis. But seeking bliss and benefit for oneself is not enough; the bodhisattva does not act in this way; it is only for beings that he wants to acquire loving-kindness (maitrī), compassion (karunā), purity of mind (cittavīśuddhi) and the dhyānas of the bodhisattva who is not dissociated from beings; in dhyāna, he produces the feelings of great compassion. Dhyāna contains marvelous innermost bliss, but beings renounce it in order to seek external bliss. They are like a wealthy blind man who, not knowing and not seeing the many treasures that he possesses, goes out to beg his food; those who know have pity for those, who, having at his disposal such marvelous objects, cannot know of their existence and goes to beg from others.

809

In the same way, beings possess in their minds the bliss of the dhyānas and samāpattis; but unable to actualize them, they turn to seek outer bliss.

5) Moreover, the Bodhisattva understands the true nature of dharmas, and so, when he has entered into dhyāna, his mind is at peace (kṣema), and he is not attached to enjoyment (āsvadana). Heretics, even in dhyāna and samāpatti, do not have their minds at peace and, as they do not know the true nature of dharmas, they are attached to the enjoyment of the dhyāna.

Question. – However, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are not attached to enjoyment either; why do they not possess the virtue of dhyāna [like the bodhisattva]?

Answer. – Even though they are not attached to enjoyment, the arhats and pratyekabuddhas are without great compassion (mahākarunā) and consequently they do not possess the virtue of dhyāna. Furthermore, they cannot practice all the dhyānas completely; whereas the bodhisattva is able to do so: whether these dhyānas are coarse (sūhāsa) or subtle (sūkṣma), great or small, profound or lowly, whether they concern an inner or an outer object, the bodhisattva practices them all completely. This is why the concentration of the bodhisattvas is called dhyānapāramitā whereas those of other men is just called dhyāna.

6) Moreover, the tīrthikas, śrāvakas aand bodhisattvas acquire all the dhyānas and samāpattis. There are three kinds of faults in the tīrthika dhyāna: attachment to enjoyment (āsvādānabhāvītavaiśeṣa), wrong view (mithyadhṛṣṭi) and pride (abhimāna). In the śrāvaka dhyāna, loving-kindness (maitrī) and compassion (karunā) are slight; they do not have at their disposal a knowledge in regard to the Dharma sufficiently sharp as to progressively penetrate the true nature of dharmas; being exclusively interested in their own selves, they destroy the lineage of Buddhas [within themselves]. In the bodhisattva dhyāna there are no defects; wishing to unite all the attributes of Buddha, they do not forget beings during the dhyāna and they endlessly extend their kindness even to insects.

[Kindness of Śākyamuni towards animals]. * – Thus the Buddha Śākyamuni, in a previous lifetime, was a rṣi with a conch-shaped head-dress (saṅkhatīkha) named Chang chi li (Śāhkhāṭhā). He was always practicing the fourth dhyāna: interrupting his respiration (ānupāna), seated under a tree, he remained immobile. Seeing him in this posture, a bird mistook him for a piece of wood and laid her eggs (anda) in his top-knot (śūkham). When the bodhisattva awoke from his dhyāna and noticed that he had birds’ eggs on his head, he said to himself: “If I move, the mother will not come back, and if the mother does not [188b] return, the eggs will spoil.” Therefore he went back into dhyāna and came out only when the nestlings were ready to fly away.

7) Moreover, except for the bodhisattva, other people cannot be introduced into the dhyānas with a mind of kāmadhātu;637 the bodhisattva who is practicing the dhyānapāramitā is able to enter into dhyāna with a mind of kāmadhātu. Why? Because from lifetime to lifetime, the bodhisattva has cultivated the qualities (guṇa) and thus his fetters (saṃyojana) are slight and his mind soft and tender (nirvaharana).

636 This expression designates all the data of sense and mental experience; cf. Dīgha, III, p. 135, 232; Suttanīpāta, v. 1086, 1122; Hituvatka. P. 121; Cullanādīsena, p. 156; Kośa, IV, p. 160.

637 Vimalakīrtinirdeśa, tr. by Teße k’ien, T 474, k. 1, p. 521c; tr. by Kumārajīva, T 475, k. 1, p. 539c. – On this sūtra, see above, Traité, I, p. 515F, n. 2.
Furthermore, in the course of the concentration of the leap (vyuktāntakasamādhi), the ascetic jumps from the first dhyāna to the third, from the third dhyāna to theākāśayānāma, from theākāśayānāma to ākāṃśayānāma. In the Vehicles of the ārāvakas and the pratyekabuddha, one can leap thus over one level but not over two. But the bodhisattva who has mastery over leaping is able, on leaving the first dhyāna, to jump to the third dhyāna, – which is normal; - but he may also leap directly to either the fourth or to one of the four samāpattis: ākāśa, viññāna, ākāṃśa or naiva saṃjñānaṃdhyānānāma, or into the saṃjñāvedayita koṭidadhānapamātī. On leaving the samāpattis of the system, the bodhisattva enters into either the ākāṃśayānāma, or the viññāna, or theākāśayānāma, or finally into ādhyāya 4 to 1; sometimes he leaps over one level, sometimes over two and sometimes even over nine. On the other hand, the ārāvakas cannot leap over more than one level. Why? Because his wisdom (prajñā), his qualities (guna), the power of his concentration are slight. The ārāvakas and the bodhisattvas are like two kinds of lions (simha), the yellow lion and the white-maned lion: although the yellow lion can jump, he cannot jump as well as the royal white-maned lion. It is for all these reasons that we distinguish a dhyānapāramitā.

Moreover, the bodhisattva, always steady in dhyāna, concentrates his mind, is not moved, he produces neither examination (vitarka) nor judgment (vicāra) which necessarily precedes speech; therefore one can no longer preach the Dharma. Why do you say that the bodhisattva, constantly resting in dhyāna, no longer producing examination or judgment, preached the Dharma to beings?

The bodhisattva, having entered into dhyāna, must at first resort to ārāvakas and the bodhisattva are like two kinds of lions (simha), the yellow lion and the white-maned lion: although the yellow lion can jump, he cannot jump as well as the royal white-maned lion. It is for all these reasons that we distinguish a dhyānapāramitā.

This is why we know that the bodhisattva succeeds in eliminating his passions by the vision of the specific all-dwarms. All other people obtain only the dhyāna themselves, but do not obtain the dhyānapāramitā.

Moreover, other people know the mind of entry into concentration (dhyānapāra-samācāra) of a bodhisattva and the mind of leaving the concentration (dhyānapāra-nicchita), but cannot cognize the mind of the bodhisattva in the course of the concentration (dhyānapāra-āśami); they are ignorant of its object (ākāśa), its extent and depth of the dharma that it cognizes. If the ārāvakas and pratyekabuddhas are unable to know this mind, what can be said of other men? It is like the elephant (gajānga) that crosses the river: its footprints are visible when it enters the water and when it comes out, but when it is in the water, nothing can be seen. When someone has obtained the first dhyāna, those who already possess the first dhyāna know it, but they do not know [the mind] of the bodhisattva entered into the first dhyāna. Those who possess the second dhyāna know even more clearly the mind of the person who has obtained the first dhyāna, but they do not know the mind of the bodhisattva who has entered into the first dhyāna. It is the same up to the naivāsasamjñānaṃdhyāyatana.

---

488 See above, p. 994f.
489 Episode told in the Drumakinnarajānaprīcchā: see references above, Traite, I, p. 615f, n. 2. – Here the Mpi presents Druma as king of the Kinnaras; above he was presented as king of the Gandharvas (cf. Traite, I, p. 609f, n. 4).
490 For this wind, see above, Traite, I, p. 559f, n. 1.
491 According to the Atthasālatī, p. 187 (tr. Tin, Expositor, I, p. 231), commented on by Visuddhiargumenta, II, p. 374, there are four ways of traveling though the successive concentrations (four dhyānas, four ānubhavasamāpattis, and nirodhasamāpatti); in ascending order (jānānasamāpatti), in descending order (jānānasamāpatti), in ascending then descending order (jānānasamāpatti), or leaping over one level (jānānasamāpatti). The last method is described in Sanskrit as the concentration of the leap (vyuktāntakasamādhi). The corresponding Sanskrit formula seems to have been: Viṣṇukīrti vīcāra vācaṃ bhūhāye nāvāsitaḥ nāvācāya: cf. Kośa, II, p. 174, n. 3; VII, p. 93; Kośavyākhyā, II, p. 139, l. 10, Arthavinīcāya, p. 557.
Thus, the lute of the asuras constantly produces sounds and plays at will with out anyone plucking it. This lute has neither a distracted mind (vīskiptacitta) nor a concentrated mind (sanghīhitacitta), for it constitutes a reward for the asuras’ merits (asurasāyuvāpinākuśa); it produces its sounds according to people’s wish. It is the same for the dharmakāya Bodhisattva: he is without concept (vākulpa), free from distractions (vīskiptacitta), without [vīrāka and vīcra; the] factors of preaching (dharmadeśaśāntinimittā); but as a result of his immense merits (upamānāsamittā), his concentration and his wisdom, he produces the many sounds of the Dharma (naivādhaśāntasvāvā) in conformity with the needs of people (yātiyogyam). The miserly man (munīsakriya) hears a sermon on generosity (dana); the lustful, the angry, the lazy, the distracted and the foolish hear, respectively, a sermon on morality (sīla), patience (kaṇṭha), exertion (vīrya), dhyāna, and wisdom (prajñā). Having heard this sermon, each goes back home and gradually finds deliverance by means of the three Vehicles (sāṁyutapāramitā).

12) Furthermore, the bodhisattva knows that all dharmas, distraction (vīkṣapa) as well as concentration (sāmīlpatī) are free of duality (ādhyāya). Other men chase away distraction in order to seek concentration. How? They become impatient with distraction and develop attachment to concentration.

[189a] [Udraka, or immoderate attachment to concentration] 445 – Thus, the rśi Yu t'o lo k'ie (Udraka) who 445 This Udraka is certainly the Udāka Rāmaputra who taught Gautama the path of naivaseṣuṣāntamāyāvatām; finding this teaching inadequate, the future Buddha abandoned it (cf. Mañjūśrī, I, p. 165 seq.; 240 seq.; Jātaka, I, p. 66; Dhammapadātha, I, p. 85; Mahāvastu, II, p. 119; 200; Divyāvāntra, p. 392; Lalitavistara, p. 243-247). However, when the Buddha attained enlightenment and decided to preach the Dharma, he first thought of teaching his former master whom he judged capable of understanding it; but a god informed him that Udraka was dead and had taken birth in the naivaseṣuṣāntamāyāvatām (Vinaya, I, p. 7; Jātaka, I, p. 81; Tseng yi a han, T 125, k. 14, p. 618b; Wou fen liu, T 1421, k. 15, p. 104a; Siou fen liu, T 1428, k. 32, p. 787b; Mahāvastu, III, p. 322; Lalitavistara, p. 403).

The story that the Māpi devotees to Udāka tells us that this ascetic took rebirth in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination before falling into hell. The text of the Māpi is reproduced without any changes in the King liu yi sinh, T 2121, k. 39, p. 208b. A more detailed version of the same story occurs in the Vibhaṅga in 60 scrolls, T 1546, k. 32, p. 237b (reproduced in T 2121, k. 39, p. 208b-209a) and in the Vibhaṅga in 200 scrolls, T 1545, k. 61, p. 314c-315a. Here is the translation of the latter source, by which the Māpi was probably inspired:

Once there was a rśi named Mong Hi tseu (cf. Rosenberg, Vocabulary, p. 319; Udāka Rāmaputra); he was invited at meal-time by king Chong kiao (Prasenajit) and, mounted on his power of abhijñā, he flew like a royal swan (vajrhaṃsa) to the palace. The king himself received him, placed him on a golden bed, burned incense, threw flowers, served him with delicious foods with many courtesies. The meal finished, the rśi according to the palace. The king then spoke to his young wife: “When I am gone, would you be able to entertain the rśi in place of me?” His wife replied that she could. The king insistently recommended his wife to honor the rśi according to the usual rules and then went away to take care of the business of the kingdom.

The next day when meal-time approached, the rśi, flying through the air, came to the palace; the king’s wife received him and placed him on the golden bed. The rśi’s renunciation (vairāgya) was incomplete, and when he felt the woman’s gentle touch, he lost his abhijñā. He took his meal as usual, went on to perform his ablutions and pronounced the blessing; but when he tried to rise up into the air, he noticed that he could no longer fly.

The rśi withdrew into the king’s garden trying to regain his former powers; but as he heard all kinds of noises, cries of elephants, horses, etc., he returned no success. The rśi knew that at Śīravati the people thought that, if a great rśi trod on the ground, all should pay homage (pājā) to him by taking hold of his feet (pāddhāvivantana). Pretending to false claim, the rśi said to the queen: “Announce in the city that today a rśi will go out of this city treading on the ground, and that everything necessary should be done.” The queen obeyed this order and in this news all the citizens cleaned the city of fragments of tiles and refuse, sprinkled and cleaned the city, hung rows of banners, burned incense, decorated it with flowers and played music: the setting and wealth equaled that of a city of the gods.

Then the rśi left the city on foot and, not far away, entered into a forest. He wanted to regain his powers, but when he heard the cries of the birds, he was distracted and did not succeed. Then he left the forest and came to the edge of a river; there too he heard the igla fish jumping about, and his mind, being disturbed by all these sounds, he could not practice. Then he climbed a mountain, saying to himself: “If I have fallen from my good qualities, it is as a result of beings; since I have otherwise observed the precepts (sīla) and asceticism (dhyānaśāya), I would like to become a winged fox: everything that goes in the water, on earth or in the air will not escape me.” After he had made this vow (pranāśima), his wrath (viśāma) weakened a bit and, soon afterwards, he was able to eliminate the passions of the [possessed the five superknowledges (abhijñā), each day flew to the palace of the king where he took his meal. The king and queen, according to the custom of the land, greeted him by [placing their head at his feet (pādasārābāhīvandana). The queen having touched him with her hand, the rśi lost his abhijñā. [Unable to fly,] he asked the king for a chariot and drove away. Returning home, he went into a forest and tried to retrieve his five abhijñās. The concentration returned, but as he was about to regain the abhijñās, a bird perched on a tree suddenly began to sing and distracted him. Udraka then left the forest and went to the shore of a lake in search of concentration; there too he heard some fish that were fighting and disturbing the water. Not finding the concentration that he wanted, the rśi became angry and said: “I would like to kill every last fish and every last bird.” Long afterwards, by the power of meditation, he regained samāpatti and [after his death] he was reborn in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivaśamjñānaśamjñatāyu). When his life was over, he was reborn as a flying fox and he killed all the fish and birds that he encountered. Having committed innumerable crimes, he fell into the three unfortunate destinies (durgoṭi). This [sad fate] was caused by his attachment to the dhyānas and samāpatti. It will be the same for heretics [immediately attached to the dhyānas].

[ Punishment of a bhikṣu who confused dhyāna and fruits of the Path].

— Among the disciples of the Buddha, there was a bhikṣu who, possessing the four dhyānas, conceived great pride (abhintinīṣa) therefrom: he claimed from that very fact to have obtained the four fuits of the Path. He said: “By the first dhyāna, srotāpanna is obtained; by the second, saṅkhiṇi; by the third, anūgami; and by the fourth, arhat.” Based thereon, he stopped and made no further progress on the Path. About to die, he saw the [five] aggregates (skandha) present in the four dhyānas; he produced a wrong view (nīvṛtyādṛṣṭā) and claimed that nirvāna does not exist and that the Buddha was mistaken; by this error, he lost the aggregates of the four dhyānas. Then he saw the aggregates related to Avīcī hell and, his life being over, he was reborn in Avīcī hell.

[foot] eight levels; as a result he was reborn in the sphere of neither discrimination nor non-discrimination (naivaśamjñānaśamjñatāyu) which is the absorption of the summit of existence (bhuddhāna) and the door to the immortal (amarañca). For 80,000 kalpas he enjoyed the bliss of retreat; but when the retribution of his actions and his life-span (āyus) were exhausted, he was reborn here below in a hermitage (tapaśāna); he had the body of a fox and his two wings were each fifty yojanas wide; with this huge body, he tormented all classes of beings and nothing that moved in the air, in the water or on earth could escape him. When his life was over, he fell into Avīcī hell where he was reborn as a flying fox and he killed all the fish and birds that he encountered. Having committed innumerable crimes, he fell into the three unfortunate destinies (durgoṭi). This [sad fate] was caused by his attachment to the dhyānas and samāpatti. It will be the same for heretics [immediately attached to the dhyānas].

The bhikṣu questioned the Buddha: “Where did this forest-dwelling bhikṣu take rebirth when his life was over?” The Buddha told them: “This man has taken rebirth in Avīcī hell.” Frightened and astounded, the bhikṣu continued: “This man was practicing the dhyānas and observed the discipline (śīla); what is the cause of it?” The Buddha answered: “This bhikṣu was very proud; as he possessed the four dhyānas, he claimed to have obtained the four [fruits] of the Path. When he came to the end of his life and saw the skandhas of the four dhyānas, he fell into wrong view and claimed that nirvāna does not exist. ‘How is it’, he said, ‘that I am an arhat and here I am returning to new existences (jūnārābaśa); the Buddha is an impostor!’ It was then that he saw the skandhas relating to Avīcī hell and, his life being over, he took rebirth in Avīcī hell.” Then the Buddha pronounced this stanza:

By knowledge, morality and dhyāna
One does not obtain the stainless (ānavāraṇa) Element.
Even if one possesses these qualities,
The result, however, is not assured.

The bhikṣu therefore underwent the suffering of the unfortunate destinies. This is why we know that by grasping the characteristic marks of distraction (vikāpanāmittodgahanā), the affliction of anger, etc., (deviṣaśūlīsā), can be produced, and that by grasping the characteristic marks of concentration, attachment (abhintinīṣa) is experienced. The bodhisattva does not perceive either the characteristic marks of distraction or of concentration and distraction and concentration have only one and the same characteristic (ekanīna): this is what [189b] is called dhyānapūrṇamātī.

In the first dhyāna, desires (kāma) are expelled, the obstacles (nīvarana) are chased away and the mind is fixed one-pointedly. But because of his keen senses (tikhenāraṇa), wisdom (prajñā) and insight (samanupaññā), the bodhisattva does not have to detach himself from the five obstacles nor grasp the images of the dhyānas and samāpatti, since all dharmas are empty by nature (lakṣanaśūlīnā). Why does he not have to detach himself from the five obstacles?

The first of these obstacles, envy (kāmacchanda), is neither internal (ādhyātmika) nor external (bahirādha) nor both.494 If it were internal, it would not depend on an external object to arise. If it were external, it would not trouble the Self. If it were both, it would be nowhere. – Neither can it come from the preceding lifetime (pūrayājmanā), for all dharmas are without origin; a baby has no envy; if it had envy in the previous lifetime, it would still have a little; therefore we know that envy does not come from the previous lifetime. – It does not go on to the next lifetime (aparaśajmanā); it does not come from the directions (dīvi); it does not exist by itself eternally; it does not occur either in a part of the body or in the whole body or in both places at once; it does not come from the five sense objects (rajya) and does not go to the five emotions; there is no place that it arises and no place that it perishes. – It is wrong that envy has a previous, 494 For these alternatives to be rejected back to back, see above, Traisī, I, p. 361F.

later or simultaneous birth. Why? If birth existed before and envy later, there would be no arising of envy since envy did not exist. If the arising existed later and the envy before, the arising would have no substrate. If the two were simultaneous, there would be neither something that arose nor place of birth, for between the thing that is born and the place of birth, any difference would have been suppressed. – Finally, there is neither identity nor difference between envy and the envier. Why? Because the envier does not exist apart from the envy, and the envy does not exist outside of the envier. Therefore envy arises only from a complex of causes and conditions (hetupratyayasamguṇa). Now, dharmas arise from such a complex are empty of self nature (svabhāvāvyavasaya). Therefore there is neither identity nor difference between envy and envier. For all these reasons, the arising of envy is impossible. Dharmas that are without birth (anuppanna) are also without cessation (anuuddhā). As they are without birth or cessation, concentration and distraction do not exist. Thus we see that the obstacle of envy (kāma-cchanda-suvarana) is one with the dhāyuṇa, and that it is the same for the other obstacles. In possession of the true nature of dharmas, we hold the five obstacles to be non-existent; we know then that the true nature of the obstacles is mingled with the true nature of the dhāyuṇa and that the true nature of dhāyuṇa is the five desires (kāma), the five obstacles (nīvaraṇa) that the bodhisattva knows that the five desires, the five obstacles, and the samādhi all have the same nature (ekaluksana) and are without support (anāśraya): to enter concentration in this way is dhyāna-pratimiti.

13) Furthermore, by practicing the dhyāna-pratimiti, the bodhisattva lends his support to the other five pratimiti: this is dhyāna-pratimiti.

[189c] 14) Furthermore, the bodhisattva who, thanks to dhyāna-pratimiti has mastered the superknowledges (abhijñā), in one moment of thought and without going into absorption, is able to pay homage (gāja) to the Buddhas of the ten directions with flowers (puṣpa), incense (gandha), jewels (mani) and all kinds of offerings.

15) Moreover, the Bodhisattva, by the power of his dhyāna-pratimiti, transforms his body in innumerable ways, enters into the five destinies and converts beings there by means of the Dharma of the three Vehicles (yānāvatya).

16) Furthermore, entering into the dhyāna-pratimiti, the bodhisattva expels the bad [desires] and bad dharmas and enters [into the nine concentrations], from the first dhāyuṇa up to naivasaṃjñānikāhāṃsāhjāyatana. His mind, disciplined and supple, practices great loving-kindness (mahāmahāvīra) and great compassion (mahākārūni) in each of these concentrations; as a result of this loving-kindness and compassion, he eradicates the errors committed during innumerable kalpas; as he has obtained the knowledge of the true nature of dharmas, he is commemorated by the Buddhas and the great bodhisattvas.

17) Furthermore, entering into dhyāna-pratimiti, the bodhisattva, by means of his divine eye (dīvacakṣa) contemplates beings plunged into the five destinies of the ten directions; he sees those who have taken birth in rūpadhātu taste the enjoyments (āsavādana) of the dhāyuṇa and then return into a animal destiny (ātivagoti) and undergo all kinds of sufferings; he sees the gods of kāmadhātu in the rivers of seven jewels taking their pleasure among flowers and perfumes and they fall into the hell of excrement (ākāmāpanīraya); he sees wise men (bahuvarṣa) and men learned in the worldly sciences (laukkāka-jñāna) who are incapable of finding the Path fall into the rank of pigs or sheep, without discernment. These various beings thus exchange great happiness for great suffering, great benefit for great ruin, a noble state for a lowly state. The bodhisattva experiences feelings of compassion for these beings which increase little by little until he realizes great compassion (mahākārūni); he does not spare even his life and, in the interest of beings, he practices exertion (vīrya) diligently and seeks Buddhahood.

18) Finally, the absence of distraction and enjoyment is called dhyāna-pratimiti. Thus the Buddha said to Śāriputra: “The bodhisattva dwelling in the virtue of wisdom must fulfill the virtue of dhāyuṇa by being based on the non-existence of distraction and enjoyment.” (P. pātāla, above, p. 984F; bodhisattvamahāsavatvam prajñāpradānāt tīrthā dhyāna-pratimiti pariṣṭhānavyāvāsitaṁ anavadānāt upatyāya).

Question. – What is distraction (vīrya)?

Answer. – There are two kinds of distraction, subtle (ākṣṇa) and coarse (sthitā).

Subtle distraction is of three types according to whether it abounds in attachment (āsaṅga-bahula), pride (abhināma-bahula) or wrong view (deśṭhābula). What is abounding in attachment? Having obtained the bliss of concentration, the ascetic’s mind becomes attached to it and he enjoys the taste (āśūdana). – What is abounding in pride? Having obtained the concentration, the ascetic tells himself that he has attained a very difficult thing and praisess himself (āśūnāma ukāravārya). – What is abounding in wrong view? This is to enter into concentration with the wrong view of the self (ātma-dṛṣṭi), etc.; to make distinctions (prāvīdṛṣṭi) and grasp at characteristics (nimittodgahana) saying: “This is true, the rest is false” (adām evacacum megham abhitān it). These three distractions are subtle distractions. Because of that, one falls out of the concentrations and produces the threefold poison (rāga, dveṣa and mohā) that constitutes the coarse distraction (sthitāśīlaśikṣa).

Enjoyment (āśāhāna) consists of becoming passionately attached with one’s whole mind (okācittas) to the concentration once one obtains it.

Question. – All the afflictions (kleśa) are adherence (abhinivēsa): why do you reserve the name of attachment (āsaṅga) for enjoyment?

Answer. – Because attachment (āsaṅga) and dhāyuṇa resemble each other. How is that? Dhāyuṇa is the fixing of a concentrated mind (saṁghṛhičapratāpāhāna), and attachment also is an exclusive adherence, difficult to eliminate (abhinivēsa). As soon as one seeks dhāyuṇa, one wishes to [190a] obtain it absolutely; becoming attached to it is as natural as pursuing the objects of desire (kāmagunaparyesāṁ). [From this point of view], there is no opposition (virodha) between desire (kāma) and concentration; the ascetic in possession of an absorption is deeply attached to it, does not let go of it, and thus taints his absorption. Just as there is no merit in giving something when one is certain of a reward, so the absorption [is of no value] when one is enjoying its taste and is passionately attached to it. This is why we reserve the name of attachment for enjoyment without resorting to other passions in order to describe it.
CHAPTER XXIX: THE VIRTUE OF WISDOM (p. 1058F)

Sūtra: The Bodhisattva must fulfill the virtue of wisdom by not adhering to any system (prajñāprāmitā paripāramitāvāyāravadharmānabhāvavasamāvadā).

Śāstra. – Question. – What is prajñāprāmitā?

Answer. – From the first production of the mind of Bodhi (prathamacitotpāda), the bodhisattvas seek the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñāna), in the course of which they understand the true nature of dharmas: this wisdom is the prajñāprāmitā.

Question. – If that is so, this wisdom should not be called virtue (pāramitā). Why? Because it does not reach the end (na pāram ita) of wisdom.

Answer. – Only the wisdom obtained by the Buddha is the true wisdom; but, as a result of this virtue, the efforts of the bodhisattva are also called virtue, for the effect (kārya) is included in the cause (kārani). Inasmuch as this virtue resides in the mind of the Buddha, it changes its name and is called the knowledge of all the aspects (sarvākārajñāna)1499 but when the bodhisattva, practicing this wisdom, seeks to attain the other shore (pāra), it is called virtue (pāramitā). As the Bodhisattva has already attained the other shore, his wisdom is called knowledge of all the aspects.

Question. – The Buddha, who has destroyed all the passions (kleśa) and impregnations (vāsana) and whose eye of wisdom (prajñākālacakṣus) is pure, can truly understand the true nature of dharmas and this true nature is prajñāprāmitā; but the bodhisattva has not destroyed the impurities (aksahādraśā) and his eye of wisdom is impure; how can he understand the true nature of dharmas?

Answer. – This will be fully explained in the following chapters; here a summary (āṃśikapokhi) must be sufficient. Suppose [two] men walk into the sea; the first just begins to go in whereas the second already touches the bottom. Despite the difference of depth, both are said to have ‘gone into the sea’. It is [190b] the same for the Buddha and the bodhisattva: the Buddha has attained the depth [of wisdom]; the bodhisattva has not destroyed the impurities (akṣiḥādraśā) and whose power is weak, cannot penetrate [into wisdom] deeply. We will see this in the following chapters.

When a person lights a lamp in a dark room, it lights up the objects that all become visible. If a big lamp is the same for the Buddha and the bodhisattva: the Buddha has attained the depth [of wisdom]; the bodhisattva has not destroyed the impurities (akṣiḥādraśā) and whose power is weak, cannot penetrate [into wisdom] deeply. We will see this in the following chapters.

500 For sarvākārajñāna, see above, p. 640F.

501 In place of sarvādhaṃsaśabdhavānvesa there is, in the Pālaśaṅgīti, p. 18; prajñādhaṃsaśabdhavānaldhitāṃ; in the Śāntarakṣita, p. 56: sarvādhaṃsaśabdhavānaldhitāṃ.

502 Pāramitā: derived from the adjective parama, simply means superiority. The etymology pāram ita “that which goes to the other shore” or pāra-miti “that which attains the other shore” is purely fanciful. For the etymology of the word, see Kośa, IV, p. 231; Madh. avatāra, p. 30 (tr. Muséon, 1907, p. 277); Sambhūtanamocana, IX, par. 13; Sūtrālaṃkātra, XVI, p. 101; Samghraha, p. 186; Siddhi, p. 628; T. 1606, k. 11, p. 747c21. – F. W. Thomas, JRAS, 1904, p. 547.

503 For sarvākārajñāna, see above, p. 640F.
The Prajñāpāramitā,
The true Dharma, free of error (aviparita).
Mind, concept, view are expelled,
The elements of speech have been destroyed.

Immeasurable, free of any defect,
Mind pure, always unified:
This is how the venerable one Sees Prajñā.

Immaculate like space,
Free of speech and designation:
To see Prajñā in this way
Is also to see the Buddha.

Seeing the Buddha, the Prajñā and nirvāṇa
According to the rules,
These three things are identical;
There is no difference among these realities.

Of Buddhas and bodhisattvas
Who carry out the benefit of all beings,
Prajñā is the mother:
She gives birth to them and nourishes them.⁵⁶⁶

[190c] The Buddha is the father of beings
Prajñā is the mother of the Buddha.
Thus, the Prajñā is the grandmother
Of all beings.⁵⁵⁷

The Prajñā is a unique dharma
To which the Buddha applies all kinds of names;
According to the capacities of beings
He applies different sounds.⁵⁵⁸

Of Buddhas and bodhisattvas
Who carry out the benefit of all beings,
Prajñā is the mother:
She gives birth to them and nourishes them.⁵⁶⁶

“HOMAGE to thee, O inconceivable, immense Prajñāpāramitā! With irreproachable members, you are contemplated by the irreproachable ones.”

“Immaculate like space, free of speech and designation; he who sees you in truth sees the Tathāgata.”

“Between you who are so rich in holy qualities and the Buddha, the teacher of the world, honest people see no more difference than between the moon and the light of the moon.”

“Of all the heroes who have dedicated themselves to the good of others, you are the nourisher, the generator and the tender mother.”

“Since the Buddhas, the compassionate teachers of the world, are your own sons, you are, thus, O virtuous one, the grandmother of all beings.”

⁵⁵⁵ Nirvikalpa namas tubhyaṃ prajñāpāramitāṃ ‘mite, yā tvam sarvānantarādhi nirvāṇayair nirākāros.

⁵⁵⁶ Sarvāṃ api viśuddhim patrītahe nityāntamanām, pustikā janaśyijī cha mānā tvam asī vatsalā.

⁵⁵⁷ Yad buddhā lokaguravāḥ putrās tava kepalavah, tena tvam asi keśyati sarvasattvavipīlamahi.

⁵⁵⁸ Vineyam janam āditya
tatra tatra tathāgataḥ, bhūriśāp tvam evaśī sānāmamabhir ādyase.
For the person who has grasped the Prajñā
Speech and thoughts vanish,
Like the morning dew evaporates
All at once at day break. 509

The Prajñā has this wonderful power
Of stimulating two types of people,
The ignorant by means of fear,
The wise by means of joy. 510

The person who possesses the Prajñā
Is the king of Prajñā.
He is not attached to Prajñā
And even less to the other dharmas. 511

Prajñā comes from nowhere
Prajñā goes nowhere.
The sage looks for it everywhere
But does not find it. 512

The person who sees Prajñā
Finds deliverance.
The person who does not see Prajñā
Also finds deliverance. 513

The Prajñā is astounding,
Very profound and glorious.
Like a magical object,
It is seen without being visible. 514

“Singular although multiform, you are invoked everywhere under various names by the Tathāgatas, in the presence of beings to be converted.”
509

Prabhāṃ prāpyeva dipātvāno
